SIR: Miss Gaffney's sardonic suggestion in the February 16 Nation for the labeling of "admittedly abnormal, tainted, diseased authors" reminds me of an experience I had as a library worker. In prehistoric times we had in all the branches of a large city library a small cupboard, where books which the library staff considered dangerous to the morals of the young were kept under lock and key. This tainted cell was known as the "locker" and in it were such books as "The Hunchback of Notre Dame" and other classics with which we now like our flappers to consort. An ancient spinster, with snooping manner, visited the library once a week, looked surreptitiously about, and breathlessly whispered a request for a book from the "locker." When she had exhausted the supply we, with the worthy aim of keeping up our circulation figures, planted innocent books with the guilty. Thus she borrowed "Marius the Epicurean." She kept it out two weeks and returned it with a mournful gesture. "I've read it from cover to cover," she wailed, "and I can't find a thing in it."

Literary Ballyhoo

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: For generations your periodical has been the most consistent foe of moral and intellectual goose-stepping. Times without number you have taken up the cudgels against efforts to rotarize, babbittize, and moronize homo americanus. Now you seem to be surrendering to literary standardization.

The Japanese have a national organization, the Society of the One Idea. The idea is loyalty to the rulers and their decrees. To be strictly kosher it is necessary to accept without question all the standards and judgments of those whom Providence has ordained to rule the Yankees of the East. Now suppose a son of the Sun objects to the particular brand of cigarettes ballyhooed as the One Idea, complaining "These cigarettes are not mild, neither do they satisfy, and I refuse to be nonchalant about it." In steps the one-idea society. "We know the kind of cigarettes our citizens should smoke. We are experts in selecting smokes to suit the national tastes."

To be sure, Germany has book guilds—inevitably so. It is part of the katzenjammer of Prussian regimentation and goose-stepping of other days. Your comparison to subscribing for magazines falls down; when a year's subscription is paid for The Nation, we know in advance that its columns will not be filled with aesthetic news from Hollywood or the confessions of a heart-breaker, and a subscription to Snappy Stories does not go with the expectation of a foreign relations section or politico-economic essays.

When we permit others to select books for us, adult infantilism is the result; the cultural loss is marked. The only gain is an increased membership for the Society of the One Idea.

The New Modernism in Ohio

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Ohio State Bar Association recommends the passage of a law "making it an offense to libel the dead," with a fine of $500 and a six-month jail term for violators. In its recommendation the Ohio Bar Association says: "It is becoming more and more a matter of shame that deceased persons who held high offices and positions of trust should be held up by malicious, false, and libelous statements to the ridicule of the world."

This is due to the publication of W. E. Woodward's book on George Washington.

Cincinnati, February 10 NICHOLAS KLEIN

Michigan on the Brink

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Michigan stands upon the very brink of a chasm of barbarism. In our churches and local press, clamorings gurgle forth acclaiming capital punishment. Before our State Solons are various bills for the introduction of this legal-murder law. Protests, arguments have come against this evil thing from our prosecuting attorney, Robert Toms, from Dr. Arnold Jacoby, City Psychiatrist, Judge Murphy and Judge Jeffries of the Recorders Court, the Hearst paper the Times, and from such liberals in the church as Reinhold Niebuhr. But apparently our citizens are hungry for blood and for reprisal against crime with crime.

Detroit, February 19 HAROLD AUER

Broadcasting a Coney Island Hope

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Most of your readers will remember John Howard Lawson's "Processional," one of the thrilling classics of the modern American stage, new in technique and in content.

The New Playwrights Theater has been formed to present a program of plays of this kind. Mr. Lawson is one of the playwright-directors; others are Em Jo Basshe, author of "Adam Solitaire"; Francis Edwards Faragoh, author of "Pinwheel"; John Dos Passos, author of "The Moon Is a Gong," and lastly, the present writer.

We have the faith that there is a new generation of strong young writers who feel keenly the chaos, the wild humor and melodrama, the Dostoevskian darkness and Coney Island hope of our mad America, and who if given a theater will produce modern American plays for that theater, and not copies of Chekhov, Shaw, Ibsen, or others of the great and dead. We have the faith, too, that immersing oneself in one's own environment is the surest way to produce plays that will be more vital and amusing than the dreary stupidities of the commercial theater or the dreary introspections of the intellectual theater.

We issue a special invitation to Nation readers to come and see us; this theater has been created for them, as much as The Nation is created for them.

African Art in America

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Every person—critic or art lover, professional or amateur—has the right to his own reaction as to the aesthetic value of the Blondiau-Theater Arts Collection of African Art as a whole or of the objects individually. But we cannot concede without challenge Mr. Munro's presumption, in your issue of March 2, to dogmatize about Negro art in general, using this collection as his text. So, although we have been excommunicated in one anathema's breath in the good company of the British Museum, the Congo Museum at Tervuren, and "most of the German museums," we must still protest that Congo art is representatively African and the Blondiau Collection more representative of its range and types than any other ever exhibited in America.

The obvious ethnological character of much of the Blondiau Collection, to which Mr. Munro takes such exception, is its best certification. Certainly it is at least as legitimate a modern use of African art to promote it as a key to African culture and as a stimulus to the development of Negro art as to promote it as a side exhibit to modernist painting and to use it as a stalking-horse for a particular school of aesthetics.

Mr. Munro's arbitrary distinction between art and handicraft is a vicious misinterpretation of African art. The distinction did not exist in that culture itself, and recognition of that fact is basic in the competent study and appreciation of African art. If the distinction were insisted upon as Mr. Munro makes it, more than half the plates of his own book on "Primitive Negro Sculpture" would have to be eliminated. If ours were only "African copies," as Mr. Munro insinuates, they would at least show the principle and exhibit the characteristics in question. Of one thing can we be thankful—that your reviewer has not accused the Blondiau Collection of being "made in Paris."

Who Helped the British Miners

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: According to the Secretary of the British Miners Federation the workers of many countries contributed to the relief of the striking British miners. But the other contributions were insignificant compared with those made by the workers of the Soviet Union (61.2 per cent of the total).

The exact figures were recently published as follows:

Soviet Union workers	$5,750,000
Amsterdam Federation of Trade Unions	295,720
American Federation of Labor	80,620
Other workers of the United States	100,000
British workers	2,152,825
Women workers of all countries	791,980
Miners of all countries	250,000
Total	$9,421,145

It is not a question of blame. The German worker from his starvation wage can make very few contributions. The Russian workers, on the other hand, 100 per cent organized, facilitated by the state machinery, better paid than the workers of Germany, were able to make much greater contributions.

Brooklyn, N. Y., February 21 ELLA G. WOLFE

Georg Brandes in 1919

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Spending a week in Copenhagen in February, 1919, I called on Georg Brandes. I found him wrought up over the general temper of the Allies since the armistice and the sorry prospects for a reasonable peace. He was well-nigh in despair, for he saw the Allies in no frame of mind to act with wisdom and moderation. I recall his hot indignation; his keen eyes flashed as he leaned over his desk toward me and denounced the chief Allies for continuing the war upon Germany after the preliminaries of peace had been signed, by refusing to allow provisions to be shipped into Germany for the relief of its starving people.

My interview did not find favor in certain editorial quarters; so the readers of The Nation had a little "scoop"; it was printed in your issue of May 17, 1919.

Observing an unusual display of flowers about Brandes's study I made some remark about it; he replied: "Yes, it is my birthday, and my friends have remembered me. But Mr. Dreher, there is no pleasure in being seventy-seven years old." Yet he was not willing to enjoy the little prerogatives of age. He accompanied me to the street to meet his two little grandchildren for a walk. I offered to help him draw on his overcoat; he declined with decision.

Arrived on the street, the youngsters—a boy and girl of eight or ten—came storming to meet us, highly elated at sight of their grandfather. And he was as transformed; such beautiful, heartfelt joy in children I have seldom witnessed.

Amherst, Mass., February 26 WILLIAM C. DREHER

Lucy Salmon

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I shall not forget my first meeting with Lucy Maynard Salmon when, as a younger woman, I said somewhat timidly "Miss Salmon, I must tell you that I am a radical," and her spontaneous and anything but timid reply: "My dear, I have been a revolutionist all my life." She may have been in this world seventy years, but they only made her, as Oliver Wendell Holmes once said of another, "seventy years young."

It was but four years ago that Miss Salmon, notwithstanding her weight of responsibility as professor of history at Vassar College, brought out the two great volumes, great in important usefulness as well as in size, "The Newspaper and the Historian" and "The Newspaper and Authority." It was her object to discover, if possible, the advantages and limitations of the periodical press as historical material. Her reading and her scholarship were both on a large scale, for she took up newspapers—daily, weekly, and monthly, their news, their editorials, their advertisements—and showed their contribution from Greece and Rome down through the account of the battle of Waterloo to the Great War. Yellow journalism, religious journalism, biographical interviews, cartoons—all came within her ken. She proved the importance of the books, pamphlets, and papers which accumulate in any old house; they should not be destroyed but sent to some college where they could be carefully examined and used.

Miss Salmon's sympathies with progressive causes remained vivid to the end of her life. In 1925 a committee was formed to defend Senator Wheeler. Some professors were too academic to lend their names as members. Not so Miss Salmon—by return mail she gave the use of her name and sent with it a contribution to the Defense Fund.

Books and Plays

The Eternal Mercy

By S. BERT COOKSLEY

A little sadly at first she remembered
  The small room and the hour
When for a moment every dream slumbered
  And tears were a white shower.

She went into the fields and desired
  A knowledge of all things
Inoffensive; the triple-spired
  Lily and blue spider wings.

And so one day, quite without her knowing
  How such things come to pass,
She was watching a tall dark boy and blowing
  New dreams over fresh grass.

First Glance

THE publication of the collected "Autobiographies" of William Butler Yeats (Macmillan: $2.50) completes a six-volume edition of the author which promises to be final. Like his compatriot George Moore, and like Henry James, Mr. Yeats is afflicted with the disease of rewriting, so that one cannot feel exactly safe in the possession of these six green books which it has taken years to polish and reprint; but here at any rate is one edition of the flowing-minded Irishman, and it may very well be the best. The poems early and late, the plays in verse and prose, the stories and articles and essays, and now the memoirs are all at last available in compact form.

"Sometimes when I remember a relative that I have been fond of, or a strange incident of the past, I wander here and there till I have somebody to talk to." So Mr. Yeats wrote in the preface to the first of his autobiographies, "A Reverie Over Childhood and Youth," in 1914. It is obvious that memory has been the mother of Mr. Yeats's muse, first and last—not only when he wrote memoirs, where the fact would be taken for granted, but when he thought about Ireland, considered how much poetry lay in its antiquity, wrote poems and plays himself, or in any way made use of his mind. But here in the memoirs the process whereby memory in him becomes literature is perfectly exposed. I do not mean that it is easily to be seen. Study would be necessary in order to master all the details of the mechanism—and such a study will undoubtedly be made. I am simply convinced that in the "Autobiographies" we have the evidence, charmingly beclouded though some of it may be.

Mr. Yeats like Mark Twain, and surely the two are alike in no other respect, has the power of remembering anything whether it happened or not. Doubtless many of the moods and meetings recorded in the "Reverie" and in "The Trembling of the Veil" are incorrectly recorded, and doubtless some of them never had existence outside these books. Mr. Yeats is so willing, in his bewildered way, to admit the possibility of error with regard to dates, streets, names, and even identities that we are forced to suspect him guilty of invention with regard to certain whole events —and I have heard the suspicion is amply justified. But it makes no difference, unless indeed it makes the book even more beautiful than it would otherwise have been. The "Autobiographies" should be read as a history solely of the author's mind, and then not by any means as an accurate history. They set down many things he saw; they set down with equal particularity the things he wishes he had seen or thinks he did. One sentence near the beginning of the "Reverie" is surely significant. At Sligo, he writes, "all the well-known families had their grotesque or tragic or romantic legends, and I often said to myself how terrible it would be to go away and die where nobody would know my story." In this world, I fancy, Mr. Yeats is one who thinks how terrible it would be to die and leave no story. So he has left one, and though it is not his story purely, it is a story and it is beautiful. Out of the mist of his symbol-haunted mind steps here not only a clear, firm image of himself but a long procession of other men—J. B. Yeats his father, William and George Pollexfen, York Powell, William Morris, John O'Leary, Edward Dowden, W. E. Henley, Oscar Wilde, Douglas Hyde, Lionel Johnson, Aubrey Beardsley, Macgregor Mathers, and Edwin Ellis, to name only some of them. The "Autobiographies" are important for other reasons than this gallery which it contains; but it may well remain a question whether Mr. Yeats has created anything more permanently interesting.

MARK VAN DOREN

Mr. Babbitt's Spiritual Guide

Elmer Gantry. By Sinclair Lewis. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

WITH "Elmer Gantry" Mr. Lewis returns to the practice of his own particular trade. In "Arrowsmith" he turned aside in an effort to achieve certain qualities, characteristic of the conventional novel, which his detractors had declared outside his range, and in "Mantrap" he demonstrated that he had not forgotten the requirements of merely popular fiction. The new book is in every way a companion volume to "Main Street" and "Babbitt." In it the author, sure of the tested effectiveness of a certain technique, and with a zeal undiminished by success, turns his attention to Mr. Babbitt's spiritual guide and adds the third member to his impressive trilogy devoted to the most grotesque aspects of American life. What "Main Street" was to the small town and "Babbitt" to the business man that, neither more nor less, is "Elmer Gantry" to the vulgarest contemporary type of pulpit-thumping materialist.

The book begins with its hero, a coarse young giant, happily engaged in a street fight and in that most blissful condition to which a powerful young man can attain—"unrighteous violence in a righteous cause"; it carries him through his muddled conversion in a denominational college, through the ups and downs of his checkered career as pastor and evangelist; and it ends with his triumphant vindication at the hands of an enthusiastic congregation from the latest of the many near-scandals which threatened his career. Too unreflective ever to know himself, too incapable of thought ever to be really a hypocrite Elmer is honored and beloved of most of those with whom he comes in contact because he is made of the same coarse clay as they, because no learning, no integrity, and no spirituality sets him apart from those to whom he is paid to minister. He is the type most fit to occupy the pulpits supported by materialists like himself to whom the church is half the defender of petty privilege against subversive forces and half the instrument through which a nominal respect may be paid to virtues inconvenient to practice; and to Elmer himself the pulpit is quite as useful as he is to it since, by virtue of the license which permits him to mount it, he is enabled not only to taste the intoxication of an orator's power but to enjoy as well an income and a position which the mediocrity of his will, the fundamental meanness of his character, and the shallowness of his brain could not have earned for him by any other means.

Mr. Lewis is careful not to leave his picture unrelieved. He does take pains to indicate that every one of the few civilizing influences which the boy Elmer had ever received—the most rudimentary forms of art, music, literacy, learning, and ethical idealism—had been, in his experience, connected with the church, and he allows to appear momentarily upon the scene certain ministers of a higher type. But in the book it is everywhere darkness that prevails. Elmer himself has not a single quality which goes to the making of a decent man. He is heartless, treacherous, and cruel; he has nothing resembling even the puritan virtues except the vices of vindictiveness, phariseeism, and hypocrisy into which they can turn; and his career is an indictment of the church as a whole at least in so far as it shows how the mechanism of the church permits the rise of such a man and demands of its servants no qualities which viciousness cannot convincingly imitate. "Elmer Gantry" is as good as "Main Street" and "Babbitt" and it is good in exactly the same way. Here again, as in the two books which made Mr. Lewis's the best-known name among contemporary American novelists, is a completeness of documentation not less than amazing, a power of mimicry which, so far as I know, no living author can equal, and a gusto which, considering the meanness of the material, is all but inexplicable. No mere study, however painstaking and devoted, could make possible the intimate ease with which Mr. Lewis handles the material or the completeness with which he fills in the details of every picture. He seems to know the life he is describing with a thoroughness which could only come from his having in a real sense lived it; the contagious rapture with which he pours out his scenes is the only thing which can keep one from entertaining a profound pity for a writer compelled to do anything so dreadful. Some strange twist in Mr. Lewis's character has enabled him to take a joy in examining, almost participating in, mediocrity at its most grotesquely intolerable moments, and has enabled him, miraculously, to make it interesting to others too.

In one respect at least "Elmer Gantry" is superior even to its companion pieces, for up to the last seventy-five pages (which are distinctly less interesting than the rest) it has a greater variety of incident and a more sustained interest than either of the other two. In both "Babbitt" and "Main Street" there was a certain static, descriptive quality. The picture unfolded without developing new interest, and there was no continuous, steady march of incident, while in the new book there is a progressive plot which never, until it has almost reached its conclusion, shows any signs of flagging. There is, besides, an exposure of Elmer's character which goes further, perhaps, than anything else to justify Mr. Lewis's method—an exposure which seems detached, unhurried, relentless; too calm and too sure to seem to spring from hatred or malice, but inspired by a rage which a confidence in his power to describe has calmed.

"Elmer Gantry," with its innumerable incidents and its many ramifications, is indeed a structure far more impressive than most satires, a sort of cathedral in which every stone is a gargoyle; and though there will be many who will not be able to read it without the Devil's question, "But is it art?", it is not likely that any review will answer that question definitively. At least it can be said that Mr. Lewis has done something that no one else is capable of doing. In a manner that seems to be merely the almost too literal truth but which manages nevertheless to contain its own criticism he has, in three books, recorded a reign of grotesque vulgarity which but for him would have left no record of itself because no one else could have adequately recorded it.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

A Note on the Labor Talmud

The Government and Labor. By Albert R. Ellingwood and Whitney Coombs. A. W. Shaw Company. $6.

THE classic in economic legislation is still the Book of Leviticus and its rabbinic exegesis. One can hardly imagine a greater cultural disparity than that between the theocratic feudalism of the ancient Jews and our own syndicalist plutocracy. But the sovereign technique of transmuting wrongs into rights is sufficiently alike in both systems to render comparison illuminating. First comes the law. Then comes its sophistication under the widely discretionary scholasticism of the judges, who expand the sacred texts into endless Mishnas and Gemaras. This growth of a judicial Talmud is really more or less inevitable, for the sufficient reason that legal principles, no less than others, must pay interest to the keepers of the culture under which they are obliged to function. Finally, the executive transubstantiates all this rabbinics into the realities of government, whose justice is finely balanced by a just appreciation of the respective powers of the litigants; by and large and on the whole.

This tendency naturally leads to an ever-widening gap between the basic jurisprudence and its equitable distribution, especially in those phases of the law which deal with the challenge of work to avarice. The only way to bridge this "cultural lag" is by rationalization, whose awareness and subtlety varies with the wisdom of the judges, the mental age of juries, and the expensiveness of counsel. Under this juridical mechanism the vested interests, as the de facto guardians of order, are more or less entitled to the de jure benefits of doubt. Doubt leads to controversy, controvery to debate, debatableness to further doubt with accreted benefits to the vested beneficiary, if not in judgment at least in the loopholes for its evasion. The process as a whole is a continuous refinement in the egalitarianism of the opportunities for those who have them and those who don't. In labor law especially the all-important thing is the nicety of ritual, a nicety only now and then marred by the police.

Of course the development of such a ritual is rather a hair-splitting and complex business. Labor law has probably less intrinsic reason for technicality than any other branch of law. Yet its lingo is constantly intricated into the precisionist turgidity which tends to balance rights primarily on wit. Hence the growth of this ritual into a rabbinics, compared to which the Hagiographa are a collection of simple homilies. The best way of teaching it, as all rabbinics, is by the case method; for it is not so much a matter of principles courageously revaluated as a matter of precedents redoubtably interpreted which determines the relation of work to profit under modern capitalism.

Doctors Ellingwood and Coombs performed an important service to the student of law, labor, and reform. With emphasis on the case method they fine-combed, bowdlerized, synthecized, and summarized the whole field of labor law into the most competent outline in the market. In the best Talmudic fashion they take up each major division of the labor law synoptically. Then they print the most significant texts of the laws. These they adumbrate at length with the sayings of the wise men on the bench or elsewhere authoritative. Here and there they permit themselves a historic or interpretative interpolation, sagely relevant. And at the end of each chapter they posit whatever conundrums and likely quibbles logically flow from it for further caviling by aspiring Levites. Like all outlines, so fashionable today, it is essentially a crib. But unlike the usual outline-crib, it is so competent that the tyro, the pundit, and the intelligent man can all profit from its availability on their shelves.

If in doubt about the legal theory of employment, read what happens to "wilful" workers in the first chapter. Or if hazy about the doctrines of labor conspiracy and the restraint of trade, look up the discussion on the legal status of the labor union—in conjunction with the fifty pages on the injunction, whose use in effect denies the legality of labor when it finds it necessary to function for the purposes for which it is organized. The employers, on the other hand, seem to have a much smoother time in the use of their weapons—the lockout, the blacklist, and the anti-union contract. With majestic impartiality the law does not care how capital and labor disagree, provided no property rights, no matter how recondite or potential, are ever threatened. The chapters on social legislation give an excellent gist of it. Unfortunately the scope of their task precluded the authors from gauging the paucity of the reform accomplished by social needs.

To some the value of this book will be enhanced by a recommendatory note from the pen of Rabbi Yehokhanan ben Yehokhanan Commons, head of the Wisconsin Labor Talmud Torah and the greatest theoretical exponent of the doctrine that labor's best remedy against judge-made law is its "nonpartisan" vote for some more Republican and Democratic judges.

BENJAMIN STOLBERG

The Father of the Little Theater

Antoine and the Théâtre-Libre. By Samuel Montefiore Waxman. Harvard University Press.

AS the first book in English on Antoine's notable experiment, Professor Waxman's account of the stormy fortunes of the Théâtre-Libre fills a real void in our dramatic literature. The importance of the work carried on by that "most consistent rebel" of the French theater, under difficulties that would have been fatal to a man of less courage and determination, has only begun to be acknowledged. For it was André Antoine who not only created a series of permanent reforms along naturalistic lines but introduced to the world masters of such caliber as Curel, Porto-Riche, Brieux, and from abroad, Ibsen, Hauptmann, and Tolstoi.

From 1887 to 1893 the Théâtre-Libre was a bold factor in French drama, producing plays that for the greater part were so ultra-realistic in genre as to call forth the most unmitigated criticism. Seeking ever the foreign, the unusual, or the new, Antoine presented his subscribers with a menu not always digested even by their "hardened stomachs" and openly revolting to members of the Conservatoire and supporters of the Sardouesque tradition of the "well-made play." Because he occasionally included, among his pessimistic—often sordid—productions, subjects of a mystical, symbolical, or poetic nature, Professor Waxman refuses to classify Antoine as belonging to any naturalistic school. Rather he assigns him a place as a protagonist of the "free" or "unconventional" drama, though it is difficult to elaborate this distinction when one remembers the intimate relation of Zola and Henry Becque to the "comédie rosse," and Antoine's indulgent attitude toward vraisemblance at the expense of the happy ending.

Antoine's sincerity, in his varied role of actor, director, or producer, is the outstanding memory of the Théâtre-Libre. Never does he consider the commercial aspect. "He is the most glorious financial failure of the contemporary stage." Instead, his labors secured recognition for playwrights who later became famous; he did much to abolish old conventions of mise-en-scène, of diction, of movement. Not only was his influence afterward apparent among authors like Georges Ancey, Jules Lemaître, Brieux, and Hervieu, but it was his inspiration that led to the Freie Bühne Theater in Germany, the Independent Theater in England, and in this country the host of "little theaters" that have sprung from present-day offshoots of the Thèâtre-Libre in Paris.

Professor Waxman has contributed the fruits of a personal acquaintance with Antoine to his chronicle of the Thèâtre-Libre. His limitation to that and a few other sources proves there is yet a wealth of untouched material bearing on this interesting theatrical laboratory.

HENRY S. VILLARD

A Source of Innocent Merriment

Gilbert and Sullivan: A Critical Appreciation of the Savoy Opera. By A. H. Godwin. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

THE real trouble lies with Sullivan's golden music. You hear timid bobbies lament their highly nervous state and overlook the plain fact that Gilbert is calling policemen cowards. You are seduced by the orchestration of "Princess Ida" and so think it very quaint of Gilbert to call soldiers idiots. You sit hilarious at "Ruddigore" wherein Gilbert calls sailors poltroons afraid of the French. The landlubber admiral parodied in "Pinafore" went to the show and had the time of his life, and for fifty years the English have enjoyed Gilbert's cold and cynical ferocity as a source of innocent merriment. It is partly his own fault for writing lyrics so suave in courtly grace and so turned in beautiful refinement. He never squashes your head with a knobbed club. He pinks you with a flourish of swordsmanship so delicate that you hardly care if the blade wears poison.

Even so the real trouble does lie with Sullivan's golden music, which changes the sting of Gilbert's barbed words into a sweet and fair radiance. There is no other world in art so enchanted as that created by Gilbert and Sullivan and no world so cruel and heartless and no world so filled with pure laughter. Once you are caught into the shining net of the wit and the music you just can't reflect soberly on the fundamental corruption of the society which parades its meanness and selfishness with so infinite a charm. Here go bought politicians and brainless peers and unscrupulous statesmen and scheming lovers and lustful old maids and cringing warriors admitting their shames with an impudence so engaging and polished and genteel that you find yourself laughing genuinely the laughter of absolute innocence. The world at which you're laughing is no world of innocence. There never were any characters so exact in their knowledge of their own corruption as the characters of Gilbert. It is of course the world of Philistia and no more; but it is a very complete domain and the men and women know just what they are up to in all their really nasty ways. The people themselves are most distinctly not nasty: they are irresistible and wholly fetching. They are so well-bred, they make vice so attractive, they admit their sins in language such as only ladies and gentlemen employ. When Gama says: "Yet everybody says I'm such a disagreeable man! And I can't think why!" he knows quite well why: he's not fooled for one minute. Like all of Gilbert's greatest creations he's quite a horrible old man; and you take him to your heart.

It is a world of exquisite aristocracy in words and music; and therein lies the explanation of the whole paradox. You can pardon a gentleman doing and saying things no gentleman would do and say in a way that only a gentleman would do and say those things. You wince and cry out at Swift's savage remarks about the general nobility of mankind. You laugh and cry out in joy at Gilbert's no less savage remarks about the English. (All the time you mustn't forget that no one except Gilbert had a Sullivan to turn your heart to water while he runs you through with a rapier.) It is therefore easy to understand why all the books on Gilbert and Sullivan display such a lamentable stupidity in their estimations of Gilbert's art. Like all the rest of Anglo-Saxon mankind these authors have had their brains softened with joy. They can not see the Gilbert technique as anything but an exhibition of good-natured satire. They never mention Aristophanes, whose verses are Gilbert's in more than just rhythm and whose cold philistine soul is the soul of Gilbert. They are not critics with the duty of defining in exact and subtle terms the nature of Gilbert's world. They are men ravished by the beauty of a woman whose haunting voice may distil the unknown sinister poison of the lotus flower. What else can you expect? In the theater the rest of us are as bad. It isn't a theater; it's a magic temple and we are worshipers taken with a divine frenzy.

The latest commentator on the Savoy is just as feeble and moon-struck as the authors of Gilbert's "Life and Letters." In passage after passage you can hardly believe your eyes; and yet all the books go in just the same old way. "Gilbert and Sullivan is the heritage of the average man, the man who has no poses or predilections, the man whose simple craving it is just to be lifted out of the cares of the day." Even in the theater and under the spell of the opera you can hardly be excused for that kind of remark! Gilbert and Sullivan as the nirvana thoughtfully provided by the genius of art for the tired business man! But just listen to this one: " 'England is the greatest, the most powerful, and the wisest country in the world,' declares one of the Anglophiles in the lotus-land of Utopia. As a plain statement this does not seem to stray very far from platitude . . . the compliments are 'put on too thick' for the average Englishman. So far as it is irony—and probably the dramatist meant it for that—" But enough, quite enough. Probably the dramatist meant it for irony! Mr. Godwin assures us quite solemnly that Richard's song in "Ruddigore" is filled with the anti-French sentiment of the day. It's the song where Gilbert is plainly enough showing up English sailors as cowards. Then in reference to Goldbury's song in "Utopia" (a perfectly ruthless and altogether delightful attack upon the brainless English girl) Mr. Godwin concludes: "Gilbert, . . . a man with a zestful, robust faith in his own age, his own world, and his own people." After that you're about ready to quit; and the known fact that Gilbert himself led a satisfied Tory life has nothing to do with the case of his art.

In his commentary upon Sullivan Mr. Godwin is equally feeble. He makes a number of nice amiable remarks about the beauty of the music and the parody involved in a few songs. Here it's just that Mr. Godwin obviously knows really nothing exact about music, and therefore can hardly show that while Gilbert is showing up Philistia Sullivan is having no end of fun with the Italians and particularly with the musical conventions of recitative and melodramatic writing in grand opera. Herein Sullivan is as supreme a humorist as Gilbert without being in the least way unpleasant. Mr. Godwin asks us to accept the trio of Gama's sons in "Princess Ida" as "written in the best Handel manner," though how Sullivan can use a "Handel manner" to parody the Giant-motive from "Rheingold" is beyond my understanding. To be told that the music of "The Yeoman of the Guard" is "English" doesn't help in the least; and indeed the whole book helps us just about that much to estimate Gilbert and Sullivan's place in art. One wishes there were some way of inducing a real critic with a cold brain and a warm heart to do for Gilbert what a merely good-natured man cannot possibly do.

Cosmic Evolution

Cosmic Evolution. By John Elof Boodin. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

IN Professor Boodin's view "it ill befits mind to despise matter. And it ill befits it to despise itself by making itself a function of something lower than itself." The besetting sin of bifurcation involves us in absurd paradoxes, by leading us to separate in our thought things which in reality are inseparable. When the materialist undertakes to account for mind merely in terms of matter, or when the more recent advocate of emergent evolution tells us that mind somehow emerges from matter, both of them neglect to take due account of the cosmic whole. Really to understand how B is caused by A or emerges from A, we must consider not only A and B, but also the controlling field apart from which they are merely abstractions. It is the cosmic plus which makes motion, evolution, progress possible. "There is no reason for regarding the higher levels in the universe as secondary to the lower," says Professor Boodin. "While the lower furnish the body or instrument to the higher, the latter furnish the vitalizing and orderly touch to the lower. They are thus interdependent."

The central idea of the book is thus suggested by the adjective in its title. In dealing with his fundamental issues Professor Boodin has surveyed the whole sweep of contemporary scientific thought. Part I, Interaction and Cosmic Evolution, develops the idea that "cosmic influences, cosmic energy patterns covering the whole range of evolution are communicated to all parts of the cosmos, but the responses are various according to the stage of adaptation of the various parts." In Part II, Human Nature and Cosmic Evolution, the advance of modern neurology, psychology, and sociology is examined with a view to reaching a more intelligent theory of mind, the minded organism, in its cosmic setting. The last part of the volume, Relativity and Cosmic Evolution, contains a philosophical interpretation of the work of Einstein and his colleagues. The theory of relativity shows that even for the abstract purposes of physics and astronomy it is necessary to take account of time as well as of space, and that the fundamental type of reality is history, the adaptation of parts striving to get into rapport with the larger whole.

A work of this sort, reaching out into a dozen fields of special scientific research, is bound to be, in some detail or other, subject to a specialist's criticism. But Professor Boodin's strength is in the incontestable sanity of his main thesis. His book is informing and stimulating, and it has distinction of style. The poetic flights which enliven his cosmological speculation show that a philosopher can use his imagination just as well as a modern physicist. In the spirit of Giordano Bruno, Professor Boodin has undertaken a philosophical synthesis of contemporary knowledge of matter, life, and mind; the result is a cosmology which negates the materialism of so much current speculation, a philosophy which takes the higher categories and values seriously, and in which the term God does not require quotation marks.

RADOSLAV A. TSANOFF

Books in Brief

Spell Land. By Sheila Kaye-Smith. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

The power which has since matured and borne fruit in a succession of notable novels by this author is discernible, though tentative and erratically applied, in this early work, now published in America for the first time.

The Blind Ship. By Jean Barreyre. The Dial Press. $2.50.

Imagine a ship with all of its crew gone blind and, for a desperate space, the cook in command with no knowledge of navigation. The Sea-Shine is a three-master, plowing the high seas, her canvas bellying to the wind, wandering aimlessly with no "iron mike" (gyroscope) to guide her along her proper course. The tale is well told. Its best quality is forthrightness but, in view of possibilities, it may be said to lack invention.

Tomorrow Morning. By Anne Parrish. Harper and Brothers. $2.

When Anne Parrish wishes to preserve an impression of American life, she does it without first running the ingredients through a colander. Pulp, seeds, and all go into her family-size jars, and are sealed with care. In one way, of course, she thus keeps the full flavor of those lives with which she deals, and that is of first importance. But at the same time her story is inclined to be somewhat too burdened with irrelevant detail and talk without momentum.

Green Forest. By Nathalie Sedgwick Colby. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

This is not a forest primeval—either of the imagination or of the emotions. Rather is it a domain of subdued light and disciplined vistas, divested of all the underbrush of crudeness and carpeted with the russet leaves of metaphor. Mrs. Colby has set down her story in a pattern of studied impressionism—swift and successful except in the spots where she has over-experimented with verbal acids. Some of her thrusts are deliciously right—"It was fortunate that Suzette had been born in wedlock, for it would have been difficult to tell her she was illegitimate"; others are palpable misses.

Birth Control Laws. By Mary Ware Dennett. Frederick H. Hitchcock. $2.50.

It is a crime in America for a mother to tell her daughter how to postpone the advent of her first child. Mrs. Dennett for years has been trying to induce Congress to change the law; in this book she tells the long story of her struggles to persuade politicians to vote in public as they talk and act in private. To many people her summary of the state of the law will be a revelation of unconscious barbarism.

Sutter's Gold. By Blaise Cendrars. Translated by Henry Longan Stuart. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

If you are one of that small and select group of couturiers who know the styles even before they are created, you will say that Blaise Cendrars is the greatest living French poet. In this work, his first done into English, he presents a tragical-comical-historical pastoral of American frontier life. If Dreiser's book was the American tragedy, this is surely the American comedy. There is the same pervasive motif of dollar-chasing, but the denouement instead of being moving is merely grotesque. Johann August Sutter, whose sole monument is Sutter Street in San Francisco, hobo, thief, forger, and slave-trader, the greatest pastoral patriarch since Abraham (saving the late Senator Clark, who also laid claim to that title), the first American multimillionaire, and the leading pioneer of the Pacific Coast, was ruined by the discovery of gold on his land for the simple reason that all the riff-raff of Europe and America—vagabonds just like himself—descended upon his fabulously prosperous and fabulously extensive ranch and helped themselves to gold, land, produce, live stock, and everything else that was not tied down, and most of the things that were. Whoever Sutter hired to defend his property, including United States troops, found it more profitable to desert and dig for gold too. This was the gold rush of 1849. There are several ways of treating this spectacle of the plunderer plundered, of the revolutionist revolutionized against. One is obviously with a loud guffaw. Cendrars has chosen to treat it as a medieval idyl, in which Sutter's convoys of forced labor are passed lightly over, his bees and flowers are emphasized, and the serpent that poisons this picture-book Eden is simply gold. One can only say that he has done this particular job as well as it could conceivably be done.

Människor Jag Mötte. By Annie Wall. Oslo: H. Aschehoug.

A collection of unilluminative anecdotes about important personages, written in a delightful Swedish by a well-known and charming woman.

Drama

A Jesting Pilate

LUIGI PIRANDELLO'S almost obsessional preoccupation with a single theme is hardly less striking than the variety which he manages to achieve while remaining always concerned with what is essentially the same problem. Each one of the plays which have made him known to Americans turns upon the same metaphysical difficulty—that of distinguishing between reality and appearance—and yet, despite this sameness, the effect is by no means one of mere monotony. What was largely comic in "Right You Are If You Think You Are" becomes dramatic in "Six Characters," grotesque in "Henry IV," and starkly tragic in "Naked." "In Pirandello," said an Italian critic, "metaphysics becomes poetry," but that is only half the truth, for it becomes comedy and tragedy as well. Having withdrawn himself from that "real" world in which men live by virtue of pragmatic sanctions alone and taken up a position in a realm of mingled fancy and logic, he has found there the possibility of an emotional variety comparable to that of the "real" world which he abandoned. Logic, like fate, is capable of tricks which are now amusing, now ironic, and now terrible.

Pirandello has not always been fortunate in the productions accorded him here, but he could have no complaint to make of the treatment which his "Right You Are If You Think You Are" is receiving at the hands of the Theater Guild company in a series of special matinees at the Guild Theater. For the play, a gossamer comedy, is handled with a delicate skill which leaves its intricate pattern beautifully intact. In it a group of provincial busybodies endeavor to penetrate the secret of the mysterious way of life adopted by three newcomers among them. Each of the three offers, upon demand, a different explanation; and because of an intricate series of circumstances the inquisitive villagers find themselves absolutely incapable of deciding where the "truth" lies and hence are absolutely at the mercy of the jesting Pilate of the piece, who mocks them with the familiar Pirandellian moral. Any one of the three or all together may be "right," every person or event is as many different things as he is thought to be, and if truth as distinguished from appearance exists then it is something which the human mind can never experience. Though a tragedy is involved in the central situation it is upon the comic aspects of the gossips' bewilderment that attention is focused, and the metaphysical difficulties of their predicament are unfolded in Pirandello's lightest and adroitest manner. Like a toy balloon, the paradox bounces gaily back and forth during three acts and then at the end, when it seems about to be firmly grasped at last, it escapes entirely while the delighted gaze of the spectator sees it disappear into the blue. To make two hours and a half of metaphysics genuinely amusing is no small task, but the company, headed by Reginald Mason, Laura Hope Crews, and Helen Westley, has succeeded in making logic sparkle.

The method by which Pirandello makes his conceptions dramatic is twofold. It consists, first of all, in objectifying in concrete situations the most ideally complete paradoxes which ingenuity can conceive; and second, in creating characters who feel metaphysical dilemmas not merely as intellectual exercises but as profound emotional experiences as well. Nor is it, perhaps, mere accident that in the case of the four plays mentioned above the order of composition corresponds with the order of increasing intensity. "Right You Are If You Think You Are" was written first, "Naked" last; and between them lies the progress from sportive dalliance to the agonized despair of the mind veritably lost in an intellectual morass. Metaphysical subtleties have a way, sometimes, of taking their revenge—the game grows earnest, and the toy turns to a weapon of self-destruction. Delighting to bewilder others, Pirandello has at last bewildered himself and is in danger, like some of his characters, of dying of a paradox.

In Frank Craven's "Money from Home" (Fulton Theater) a discontented country girl inherits some money and goes to town for a spree. There a crook scrapes an acquaintance with her under the impression that she is wealthy, and when he finds that she is not decides that he will marry her and reform. It has a good deal of mild, innocuous humor, but its chief effect is to provoke the question "What of it?"

"What Ann Brought Home" (Wallack's Theater) is the play about the dumb young man in the village who turns up with an option on the land which the great power company must buy just at the moment when even his young wife is beginning to lose faith in him; "Window Panes" (Mansfield Theater) is the one about the lowly and mysterious stranger who turns out to be either Christ or somebody very much like him. The first is entertaining enough, the second pretty distressing.

Unemployment in France

STABILIZATION of the franc has brought with it in France an unemployment crisis of exceptional severity. We print below a series of statements dealing with this crisis from various points of view.

Poincaré Faces the Crisis

Facing a storm of criticism in the Chamber of Deputies on February 5, Premier Raymond Poincaré made the following statement of his policy, taken from the Temps (Paris) of February 6:

The economic difficulties of today have been inevitable for some time past. To attribute them to the financial policy of the Government is a strange abuse of "post hoc propter hoc" reasoning. These difficulties have been stated by all competent observers, especially by the experts, who even maintained that the crisis would be much more acute if the franc were allowed to depreciate any more. . . .

France, cruelly impoverished by the war and the heavy cost of rebuilding the devastated regions placed upon her as a result of Germany's long default, has nevertheless enjoyed for a certain period an illusory ease which, sooner or later, was bound to disappear. This artificial prosperity she owed to inflation. Even during the war France was forced to issue an enormous amount of paper money to meet expenses which were essentially destructive and sterile—sterile from an economic point of view.

Since then, in 1925 and in the early part of 1926, various issues of bank-notes had to be provided to meet payments on the National Defense bonds. Today the defense bonds, far from lacking subscribers, are sought after with an eagerness which we have recently had to discourage. These successive inflations for which, as a Senator, I could never bring myself to vote, are a burden upon us today. They have decreased the purchasing power of money and brought about a rise in prices. They have depreciated the franc, and they have upset our whole economic structure.

This sad spectacle has been described a hundred times: feverish business activity, scorn of saving, haste of merchants and manufacturers to purchase materials abroad, and persistence in carrying to extremes their policy of inaction.

As long as the disastrous effects of inflation last, stocks go up, land purchases increase, and, on the other hand, home prices drop in relation to the international market. Industry is induced to concentrate somewhat arbitrarily on exports; it is none the less forced to purchase its raw materials abroad on a gold basis, so that it sells at a loss and the country is deprived of its products, as has been so often pointed out.

At the same time, foreigners rush in to the countries where the exchange is low: that is how the English unemployed can come and rest on the shores of France, how the Americans can buy French land and houses, and how part of our national heritage comes to be subject to progressive denationalization.

Paper prices increase even more as circulation grows: this is what professors of law and political economy call the quantitative theory. The example of the neighboring countries that have experienced this excess of paper money only goes to confirm this theory; doubtless there is no absolute parallel between the curve of circulation and the curve of prices, but there is a reciprocal action and reaction.

Thus at the basis of everything lies inflation—dangerous, fatal inflation—the arbitrary creation of purchasing power, and there is no trick, however ingenious, that can destroy this historic truth.

Is it possible for a phase of readaptation to follow this phase of inflation? When the symptoms of this healing crisis appear, I do not deny that it is the task of the Government to check the transitory effects, especially in the interests of the workers, who are its innocent victims.

It is necessary, therefore, to look the facts in the face, without exaggerating them for party reasons.

What, then, has been the action of the Government? Let us first repeat that of all the nations that fought in the war, France is perhaps suffering least from unemployment: the difficulties that we are going through are only an extension, elsewhere more acute, of what is occurring in all of Europe.

In England the number of unemployed has never sunk below one million; in Germany the crisis has developed in proportions which have exceeded the most pessimistic forecasts: on December 15 there were one and a half million registered unemployed, and on January 15, 1,765,000; it is furthermore incorrect to assert that the German crisis is a result of the ending of the English strike; it was even more acute in 1925, when the number of unemployed exceeded 2,000,000.

At home we have to deal with only a few tens of thousands of unemployed: the official figures show 56,269 registered unemployed, approximately 42,000 men and 15,000 women. I know that M. Ernest Lafont stated that there were in addition to this number many unemployed who were not registered; but in the last few days there have been less and less, owing to the recent vigorous campaign which has been carried on to get the unemployed to apply for relief; I, for my part, do not criticize this action, which might be interpreted in other ways. In any case, we are far from the figures of 1921, when we had 91,000 registered unemployed. . . .

Before the war the number of unemployed was always in excess of 100,000, sometimes reaching twice that number. Now, the war cruelly diminished our population, which decreased by 700,000, in spite of the return of Alsace and Lorraine; but the working population has increased, and the number of foreign workers has, since 1913, risen from 680,211 to 1,480,000. Furthermore, many people of small incomes and women who were not accustomed to manual labor have had to seek employment which they would not have wanted before the war.

How has industry adjusted itself to this influx of labor? The reconstruction of the devastated regions has called for a large working force. Then in 1925 and 1926 the purchasing power of the foreign market was provisionally increased because of the lowering of the franc, despite the risk of a sudden contraction as soon as financial devalorization should set in.

We have no longer—thank God!—the sedative of inflation, and the devastated regions are using less labor, although the reconstruction work is not yet completed. And because merchants and manufacturers stocked up with materials in 1925 and 1926, consumption is reduced today.

For this ill, they say, there is a remedy: stabilize, and stabilize at once! . . .

At the moment I have only this to say: Without compromising the future, without mentioning any date, without setting down any amount, without disregarding in any way future possibilities or the freedom of action of the Government, I consider it desirable, extremely desirable, to maintain, as long as possible, a de facto stabilization, such as exists today, to allow French industry—and by "industry" I mean employers and workers—the time and the means to readapt itself to the new economic circumstances. [Applause from center, left, and right.]

The fact remains that we have at present a surplus of labor, thanks most of all to the foreigners who have come to France. It is impossible for us completely to absorb this foreign labor and it will be still more so in the future. It is still useful in the mines, in agriculture, and in the devastated regions, and even if this were not true we would not think of eliminating it in any brutal way. Nevertheless, it is a paradox to have such a large number of foreign workers in France when so many Frenchmen are looking in vain for work.

Last week 146 foreigners came here, 97 of whom have received work. It is true that during the same time 2,293 foreigners left the country. But in Paris alone there were 2,000 unemployed foreigners receiving state aid. That is natural, but it should be only temporary. . . .

The reestablishment of passports, which we considered, aroused much uneasiness, almost indignation, in friendly countries, especially in Belgium, and we decided that it was better to notify foreign governments to warn their nationals of the discomforts that they might experience in France. This, however, is not enough. It is probable that in the future we shall not be able to employ the full number of foreign workers who have settled in this country. We must, then, continue to provide for the gradual return of foreign workers, by giving them transportation facilities.

All that does not relieve us of the duty of assisting the unemployed. It was only during the war that a national unemployment fund was created, and I consider that great progress has been made in that respect. In December, 1926, state aid was fixed at 33 per cent of the allowance granted by the departments and communes within limits which the decree of December 28 raised from 2.25 to 4.50 for each person unemployed. For the whole family, the total allowance, of which the state guarantees one-third, cannot exceed 12.50 francs. Of course, the department and the commune can grant more. . . .

A Moderate Labor Analysis

Early in the crisis the General Federation of Labor, the Right-wing trade-union organization, made an investigation of the situation. The results are shown in an analysis which appeared late in January in l'Atelier, official organ of the General Confederation of Labor. The following is a summary of this statement:

Unemployment Statistics. The official figures do not begin to cover the situation. They refer only to the number actually receiving unemployment doles, which represents but a small proportion of those out of work. This is due to the following causes: First, application for relief is made only as a last resort. This is due partly to the small amount granted—a maximum per family of 12.50 francs (about 50 cents) per day, partly to the red tape that must be gone through in order to obtain it, and partly to the rigid requirements which appreciably limit the number of those eligible. Second, lack of appropriations. Relief is a matter of local option—the state only guarantees one-third of what is provided by the local authorities. On December 30 only 8 out of 31 departments had funds available, and only 41 municipalities out of 233.

But granted the inadequacy of the unemployment figures, their rapid increase, 600 per cent in one month, gives at least an indication of the acuteness of the crisis.

Industries Affected. The industries that have been hit hardest are the following: metal, hide and leather, wood, clothing, building, foodstuffs, transportation, office workers, and day labor. The metal industry is the most seriously affected, excepting naval construction, where the crisis is only beginning to be felt. The crisis is particularly evident in the food industry, because it comes at a time of year when it is usually at its height. Spice sales in Paris have fallen off 50 per cent. Paris hotels have discharged 15 per cent of their employees.

Partial Employment. While reduction of hours is no doubt preferable to no employment at all, it must be recognized that this can be carried so far as to bring wages down below the bare subsistence level. Therefore the increase in "partial unemployment" should be met with the demand that the relief system should be applied here, of course without prejudicing the steps taken to bring up to a reasonable level the allowance for those who are totally unemployed.

Comparison with Past Conditions. It has been said that this crisis is less acute than that of 1921, when the number of registered unemployed reached 91,225. But this assumes that the present crisis has reached its limit, and there is no justification for such an assumption. Furthermore, the 1921 crisis came at a time when prices were at a low ebb. Even though wholesale prices have dropped since the adjustment of the exchange, retail prices have been rising steadily. "The cost of living, then, has increased just when general economic conditions, far from permitting an adjustment of wages, are bringing a reduction, if not a total deprivation, in their [the workers'] very means of existence." Furthermore, the cause of the 1921 crisis was very different. "It was a reflection of world-wide depression due to underconsumption, which, with the liquidation of stocks in expectation of a rise, resulted in an abrupt lowering of prices." Since then unemployment figures have been as follows: January, 1922, 10,000 registered unemployed; January, 1923, 2,600; January, 1924, 1,200; January, 1925, 700; January, 1926, 705. The most alarming aspect of the present situation is that it is developing at a much faster pace than the crisis of 1921.

While the character of French industry—which is not so highly developed as in England and Germany, for instance—makes it less susceptible, generally speaking, to industrial crises, this has been partly offset by the influx of foreign labor.

Final Analysis. There are some who claim, as does M. Poincaré, that the nature of this crisis is accidental and transitory, that it is not due to the present financial situation. They consider it the natural result of the shift in the value of the franc during the first part of the last year. There is undoubtedly some truth in this position, especially with regard to the clothing industries. Purchases were made in excess of needs while prices were low, and relative stabilization resulted in a restriction of purchases. But there is a most important factor which cannot be ignored: the continued increase in the cost of living has decreased purchasing power.

If this were the only other factor we still might consider the crisis as transitory, provided that prices should fall again as much as is expected. It is not only the individual consumer who is holding off for this drop. Merchants and manufacturers also overstocked when prices were low, and the result has been frequent cancelations of orders.

Foreign trade has been seriously affected. France has lost the advantageous position she held when the franc was low. Stabilization has not only reduced the margin of this advantage but in some cases brought the price of French exports above other prices in the world market. Hence, a cancelation of foreign orders as well as a falling off of the demand for French products. This in itself points to the probability of an accentuation, rather than an alleviation of the crisis.

Remedies. The Confederation calls for the following measures to remedy the situation:

1. Adjustment of allowances granted to the totally unemployed, based on the subsistence needs of the unemployed workers and their families; increase for this purpose in the quota provided by the state, and simplification of the administrative formalities that have been imposed;

2. Extension of this relief to the partially unemployed, who are more numerous, and who have hitherto been refused aid;

3. Large-scale organization of public works, in proportion to the labor available, and immediate appropriations for this purpose of credits from the 1927 budget, these credits to be used to carry out a systematic program for rebuilding and improving national equipment;

4. Regulation of the employment of foreign labor in France, not by arbitrary repressive measures to which the labor organizations could not agree but by providing them with some work which would not be prejudicial to the interests of the French workers; also through the stopping of immigration, except for employment which is absolutely justified;

5. Strict enforcement of the eight-hour day; prohibition of evasion except under exceptional circumstances, or in cases where it is proved that the labor necessary for indispensable and urgent work is not available. . . .

Early in the crisis the United Federation of Labor (the Left groups) issued the following statement and program, which we reprint from La Révolution Proletarienne, a Syndicalist-Communist bi-monthly, for January:

When unemployment is developing rapidly, bringing misery and privation into the homes of the workers, the Federation recalls that it has constantly warned the exploited masses of the imminence of the crisis and denounced those who are responsible for it.

Finance and Big Business, served by the successive governments, during and after the war piled up huge profits from the labor of the working class. The governments, from Poincaré's War Ministry to the Poincaré-Herriot Unemployment Ministry, by borrowing and inflation, made the French franc the victim of international speculation. To cover the expense of these operations a muzzled Parliament voted without protest taxes which, a dead weight on the poor, were light for the rich.

The plunderers of finance, after gambling with the lives of the workers when the franc was low, piled up millions in the revalorization, which is one of the causes of the present crisis.

The captains of industry, in spite of their loud complaints, are rejoicing at the economic crisis, and aggravating its effects by premature and uncontrolled dismissals. They hope thereby to corner a still larger share of production through the dissolution of the less favored companies. They are also trying to bring about a lowering of the cost prices by forcing a proletariat faced with unemployment to accept wage reductions.

This policy causes an unparalleled increase in the burdens of the working class, a continual increase in the cost of living, and famine wages. This is not enough for the capitalist exploiters—by unemployment and hunger they must still further prejudice living conditions, already insufficient and precarious.

The Federation appeals to the workers to take up the challenge. Already, in their various organizations, immediate steps have been taken, but general, coordinated, and vigorous action must be started.

The struggle of the united organizations against unemployment will be based on the following program, which sums up the most necessary demands:

1. Organization of unemployed by the local unions in cooperation with their national unions;
2. Right to work for everyone;
3. Workers' control of production to combat dismissals by employers with a view to reemployment under worse conditions;
4. Strict enforcement of the eight-hour day, without exception, of the 44-hour week (or less), without decrease in wages;
5. Observance of the weekly rest day, which has been ignored in innumerable cases;
6. Prohibition of shut-downs; opening of public works;
7. Cessation of the mass immigration organized by the employers and officials in order to develop competition in the labor market;
8. Payment of relief to the unemployed on the basis of a living wage permitting them and their families to live;
9. Exemption of the unemployed from all direct taxes and from the payment of rents.

A Communist Proclamation

When unemployment first began to assume alarming proportions, the French Communist Party issued a manifesto, which we reprint in part, from l'Humanité for December 25, 1926.

Workers! . . . There is an effort on foot to line up the workers against each other, skilled against unskilled, French against foreign and colonial workers, women and young workers against adults, reformist against revolutionary workers, employed against unemployed, etc. They are all asked to accept, "for the sake of the common good," the consequences of "stabilization." This "stabilization" has found adherents in the person of Jouhaux [secretary of the Right trade unions], who is officially supporting it, and among Socialist leaders who are singing the praises of a policy of "watchful waiting."

If the unemployment becomes general, more radical measures must be obtained. Jouhaux has talked of public works. As if it were a question of that! Workers' quarters must be built, crowded districts must be made sanitary, transportation facilities, facilities for workers must be developed, additional relief and hygiene establishments must be provided, etc.

Let these most urgent works be started, let the workers control their execution, and there will be no more unemployed.

Let us obtain: The eight-hour day; no reduction in wages; a living wage for the unemployed; equal wages; the right to organize and the right of asylum for foreign workers; control of employment and dismissal; control of immigration; progressive taxes on the capitalists; every measure necessary to make the capitalists pay the costs of the crisis, and to enable the workers, peasants, and small tradespeople to escape the terrible dangers which beset them.

And in the present struggle let us prepare for the decisive battle from which will emerge the government of the workers and peasants which alone is capable of bringing victory to working-class "rationalization," that is to say, socialism.

THE UNEMPLOYED SAID:

In preparation for the demonstration which was staged the day of Poincaré's speech before the Chamber, in which many thousands of workers took part, the Central Committee of the Unemployed, under Communist inspiration, issued the following statement, which we reprint from l'Humanité of February 2:

For several weeks the unemployment crisis has been causing great suffering throughout the country, particularly around Paris.

Business after business has been affected, and the army of unemployed is increasing every day.

In the face of the misery in the homes of tens of thousands of workers, the Poincaré-Herriot Government of the national bourgeois union, allied with capitalism, has so far refused to take any measures likely to offer a possibility of livelihood to the unemployed workers and their families.

Cynically, Poincaré said in the Chamber of Deputies that "The discussion on unemployment may last a week or two more —the unemployed will be no worse off for that." These words reveal the attitude of one of those who were chiefly responsible for the world slaughter of 1914-1918, who by his present policy is causing another wave of distress and misery to sweep over the working masses. He wants to starve the workers and make them bear the brunt of the present situation.

In many places the unemployed, organized in their local committees, have already gone into the streets in demonstrations to show that they want work or bread.

That is not enough. The unemployed should meet the insulting allowance of 4.50 francs, which is sparingly distributed to heads of families, with the following demands:

1. Relief for all unemployed workers, without regard to age, sex, or nationality;
2. Work, with guaranty of a normal wage;
3. Indemnity on the basis of a living wage, namely 25 francs per day, which is the minimum necessary for nourishment (the contribution of the state, which is still 33 per cent, must be increased to 75 per cent); immediate increase of the present allowance to 15 francs;

MORE LETTERS

By KATE CRANE-GARTZ

The letters of Mrs. Gartz have become an institution in the movement for social justice. "The Parlor Provocateur" has been translated and published in Germany, and the second volume, "Letters of Protest," brings letters of praise from many parts of the world.

From Eugene V. Debs: I am very glad to learn that Mrs. Sinclair is to issue another series of your Letters, and I only wish it could be distributed by the hundreds of thousands of copies.

From Albert Weisbord: You have proved an ever ready supporter of the workers in their struggles for better conditions. And it is this, and this alone, that will entitle posterity to say of you, "She has built a monument more lasting than bronze."

From Floyd Dell: I like Kate Crane-Gartz's letters. Even if I did not know her, they would picture for me a brave and clear intelligence.

From George Sterling: If there were a thousand more such women as you in this country, there would soon be a change for the better. Even as it is, you are like a clear light on a high place, an example of what a brave woman can be.

4. Exemption from payment of rent and suspension of all pending eviction cases;

5. Free transportation by street-car, subway, and suburban trains (the unemployed should not have to be confined to their own localities);

6. Exemption from taxes, free medical care, distribution of food by municipalities with the cooperation of the state;

7. Allowance for the partially unemployed;

8. Observance of the eight-hour day without exception or compensation;

9. Free meals at the school canteens for children of unemployed workers.

Unemployed workers! You cannot obtain these demands except by resolute action and by coordination of all efforts. The Central Committee, directly responsible to the unemployed, appeals to you today to hold demonstrations in all your districts. You must respond to its appeal.

[The appeal then calls for local parades and a central delegation of all local committees to go to Parliament to submit to the Chamber of Deputies the statement of the demands of the unemployed.]

The Government responsible for the crisis will be driven to the wall. It is to show this Government that you are not willing to starve in the face of the insolent luxury of the bourgeoisie, that you are to demonstrate before the city hall.

Work or bread!

Unemployed workers, be at the city hall at 3 p. m.!

LESS THAN EIGHT YEARS AGO some Germans arrived in Paris officially to represent their country at the signing of the Treaty of Versailles. They were confined behind barbed wire like beasts in a menagerie. No one welcomed them; no one offered to associate with them; sullen crowds watched them exercise behind their bars. Now, in March, 1927, we have the extraordinary spectacle of another German presiding over the meeting of the Council of the League of Nations—presiding over the successors of those Allied statesmen who thought barbed wire and non-intercourse the wise and manly way to treat a beaten enemy. We confess to having been unable to read of Dr. Stresemann's presiding at Geneva without a thrill of satisfaction that the wheel of time has turned so rapidly, that the new spirit of Europe has found cooperation a better and more Christian way than abuse, hatred, misrepresentation, and ostracism. So far as the League of Nations is responsible for this change or has been the medium for it, we salute it. But the action of the Council itself as to the Sarre and the relations of the German minority schools in Upper Silesia was another triumph of compromise. Dr. Stresemann presided—but the question now is whether the settlement of the Sarre by which a new frontier force of 800 men is to be created to take the place of the French garrison may not cost him his prestige at home. Even Briand made jingo speeches about the enforcement of the much-breached Versailles Treaty for home consumption, and no one brought up the question of getting the remaining Allied troops out of Germany—a member of the Council with the troops of other members quartered on her soil! This remains a crime.

UNOFFICIAL AMERICANS in China have an instinctive sympathy with the Nationalist uprising of which the officials and newspapermen seem incapable. Hundreds of missionaries have refused to heed the panicky "orders" of their consuls to abandon their posts. Canton Christian College, for instance, has just transformed its constitution and become, essentially, an American-subsidized Chinese university. It will have a Chinese president and a Chinese majority on the board of directors; long before the storm surprised slower-moving bodies it made religious instruction elective. The physical property remains American, rented to the Chinese board at one dollar a year. Mission schools which thus follow the national pulse of China remain open, splendidly useful examples of the best that America can give, when stiffer-backed, more consciously foreign institutions close or even suffer mob violence.

THE WISH IS OBVIOUSLY father to the thought in much of the cabled reports of splits within the Chinese Nationalist Party. It has, of course, factions, as has any party, but there is no such opposition between Bolshevik extremists, led by Eugene Chen and Borodin, and moderates, led by General Chiang Kai-shek, as the correspondents would have us believe. The opposition is rather between military and civilians. But Chiang himself is deeply imbued with Sun Yat-sen's democratic principles, and has always been ready to establish civil rule in the wake of his victories. And Borodin, Communist though he is, understands so thoroughly the importance, from both the Chinese and the Russian points of view, of maintaining the integrity of the Kuomintang and of the Nationalist organization that he would certainly use his influence in behalf of the conservative elements if he thought that necessary to avoid a split. Meanwhile Borodin's wife, returning to Hankow after putting their son in a Shanghai school—presumably an American school; Karakhan sent his children to an American school in Peking, for they are the best in China—has been taken from a Russian ship by the Northern generals and is held prisoner in Tsinanfu. This appears to be the most serious damage yet done to a foreigner by China's civil war—but it has not yet led Soviet Russia into landing a "defense force" of 15,000 men on Chinese territory.

FOR BLAND, SMILING, arrogant let-not-thy-left-hand-know-what-thy-right-hand-doeth business we know of no superiors to the experts in the United States State Department. Mr. Morgan, chief of its Latin-American Division, recently appeared before the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate. He evaded questions as if he were an oil magnate under cross-examination. He behaved as if the people of the United States had no business inquiring how he and others of their hired men did their work. And when facts do leak out the State Department fact-wrecking crew hastily gets into action. Lawrence Dennis, ex-chargé d'affaires of the United States at Managua, is returning aggrieved, it is said, because Mr. Kellogg first instructed him to have Diaz elected President of Nicaragua, and then, after Mr. Dennis had arranged that little matter, declared that the United States was not intervening in Nicaragua and was a non-partisan neutral. The esteemed Washington correspondent of the esteemed New York Herald Tribune thereupon visited the State Department, and filed a dispatch stating first, that the instructions which reached Mr. Dennis must have been forged in Mexico, and second, that "the suggestion that the State Department had unduly interfered in the internal affairs of Nicaragua has caused a sensation in diplomatic quarters." Perhaps it did—when we began large-scale meddling, about 1909. Mr. Dennis, the Times correspondent noted, with, we hope, conscious wit, is of "a forceful type unusual in the diplomatic service." And then, on the heels of this flurry, came the exclusion of Senator King from our own little private republic of Haiti.

HAITI, SOME OF OUR READERS will recall, was occupied by American Marines in 1916, and the marines are still there. Haiti's customs-houses are under American control, her Constitution and budget are American-made, and her President, M. Louis Borno, is a pure American invention. Haiti has not elected so much as a dog-catcher since Smedley Butler, pistol in hand, dissolved her Senate because it refused to sign on the dotted line. Admiral Caperton from his battleship arranged for the election of Sudre Dartiguenave despite the hostility of the Senate which Butler later dissolved; and Dartiguenave's hand-picked Cabinet arranged for Borno to succeed him, without consultation of the Haitian people. When, therefore, "President" Borno announces that Senator King will not be permitted to land in Haiti because of his expressed hostility to the present regime, any informed person, in the language of the street, smells a rat. Mr. Borno does not so much as change his peculiar style of hair-cut without consulting the American High Commissioner, General Russell. He certainly does not bar an American Senator without at least finding out what General Russell would think of such a course. And when the State Department—which instructed Admiral Caperton to have Dartiguenave elected and edited the present Haitian Constitution, which supervises Haiti's finances and instructs General Russell what to do—announces that it could not think of invading Haiti's "national sovereignty" by insisting upon the admission of Senator King—well, again in the language of the street, it is to laugh.

JAPAN IS A VOLCANIC COUNTRY, and some of her philosophers are fond of explaining her history as that of a volcanic people, accustomed to earthquakes and always on the verge of disaster. Tokio averages two perceptible shocks a week, apart from the minor disturbances detected only by a seismograph. The scientific apparatus, indeed, has for several decades recorded an average of more than 3½ shocks every day in the year. The annals of Japan are full of volcanic calamity; the earliest records tell of a great subsidence in the year 684 when the land sank and the sea swallowed up a million acres. There is some reason to believe that Japan is in a period of heightened volcanic activity; certainly there is no record to equal the gigantic disaster of 1923. Perhaps part of the cause of that toll lay in the ghastly congestion of the modern Japanese city, where families are crowded into what seem like doll's houses and at night occupy every square inch of the floor space. At least civilization brings speedy relief. Japan alone could cope with the needs of the 50,000 people made homeless in the recent earthquake; in 1923 America helped substantially; in 684, it is safe to say, no inhabitant either of America or of Europe even knew of Japan's misfortune.

VIOLENCE WALKS AT NIGHT in Georgia. During the last year in Toombs County scores of persons are said to have been taken out by a band of masked men and flogged. At least twenty of these mob outrages are alleged to be common knowledge. County officials are with the mob, members of the marauding bands sit solemnly on juries and fail to return indictments against themselves. Negroes are flogged, of course; an attorney who has dared to attempt prosecution of the lawless ones was severely beaten and threats of a similar fate were offered to a judge and to the Solicitor General. The offenses for which these night-riding gentlemen deem due process of law insufficient include failure to pay a fine for bootlegging, defense of bootlegging, drinking, wife-desertion, and general conduct offensive to a member of a masked band. Intimidated citizens, with threats of floggings and barn-burnings hanging over them, are afraid to press charges, to name names, to speak out. This is the behavior of the frontier; we are still a frontier country, in Georgia and in many other places.

"MISS NEW JERSEY, make the acquaintance of Mr. Jim Crow. Mr. Crow has just come up from the South, where he is well-known as a first-rate go-getter of trouble. Mr. Crow delivers the goods, any day, any way; a hanging, a burning at the stake, a tar-and-feathering if you have a weak heart and don't want too much excitement at once. Mr. Crow will do for you what he has already so abundantly shown himself able to do for Georgia, North Carolina, Texas, Mississippi, Louisiana, and other sections of our great commonwealth. You are on the right track with Mr. Crow; keep Negro children out of the white, Nordic, all-American high school; make them go to school in a church, unheated except by a stove, and with one teacher for all the grades. What matter that white children have a fine, big, steam-heated high-school building? What matter that Negro taxpayers want to send their children to the same building—not just the same sort of building? Mr. Crow, Mr. James Crow of Washington and points South, is just the man to settle everything right. Delegates of Negro parents will protest to you, Miss New Jersey, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People will send telegrams asking that Governor Moore remove Edgar M. Fink from his post of Supervising Principal of Education because he introduced a policy of segregation for Negro high-school children in Toms River. But don't you care; you just stick to Mr. Jim Crow. He's the man to keep things humming in New Jersey."

ALTHOUGH SCHOOL SEGREGATION, such as has just been introduced in southern New Jersey, has not yet been tested in the higher courts, the Supreme Court of the United States in a unanimous decision has just reaffirmed the unconstitutionality of another type of "Jim Crow" law. We have already commented upon its outlawing of the Texas statute which barred Negroes from voting in the Democratic primaries; now a New Orleans ordinance and two laws of Louisiana imposing restrictions on the owning or leasing of property by Negroes have been put under the same ban as the old Louisville attempts at segregation. Slowly but surely the arm of the law is reaching around the Negro to assure him his ordinary civil rights. In time discriminatory school segregation may also fall under the ban. The Constitution of the United States calls the Negro a citizen; the Supreme Court is busy making him one in fact as well as name.

THE GODS DO NOT ALWAYS MAKE MAD those whom they wish to destroy. Sometimes they just make them dumb and stupid. That is what has happened to the Republicans of the State of New York, year after year—and still they learn nothing. Beaten again and again by Governor Smith because they opposed him when he was fighting battles for the people of the State, they once more court destruction at the polls by breaking with the Governor on the question of water-power. He has merely asked of the legislature that it vest the State's natural water resources in a Power Authority, with three commissioners to be appointed by the Governor with the consent of the Senate; nothing is to be done by this Authority until a comprehensive plan of development has been presented to the next legislature for its approval and accepted by it. Instead the Republicans have insisted on another investigating commission. The Governor has flatly told the legislature that such a commission would be "a joke" on the people of the State. Here are his words:

> We have had investigating commissions and debates on water-power since I have been in public life, and most of them have been useless because they usually degenerated into dogmatic statements as to one person's economic views or theories and into generalities and slogans about socialism, predatory interests, etc. I want, if possible, to see this problem solved by lifting it out of political discussion, and I am sure that it cannot be solved by any mere investigating commission.

He declares that he has gone as far in the direction of compromise as he possibly can, and suggests a referendum at the next election so that the people themselves may decide whether they shall have a Power Authority or give way to the private corporations which the Republicans favor.

PULLMAN PORTERS receive from the Pullman Company about $44 a month (plus $34 required for lodging, meals away from home, etc.) and from the public in tips an average of $58.15 per month. It isn't much, even so, for the porter; but the tips save the Pullman Company $7,000,000 a year. Accordingly, the company has just increased its dividend rate from 8 to 10 per cent. As Henry T. Hunt says, "The railroad presidents are a dull lot. They should long ago have introduced the tipping system to pay ticket agents, conductors, and brakemen." What a saving —to the companies—it would be!

THE SITUATION of the textile workers lately on strike in Passaic, New Jersey, is not a happy one, although the companies finally came to terms which seemed a substantial victory for the union. Trade depression is the rule in the Passaic mills as it is generally in the textile industries in the North. It was this that made it possible for the employers to hold out as long as they did; it was no hardship for them to be without workers when they were also without orders for goods. And now, for the same reason, although the mills have signed agreements with the union, the workers are not getting back their jobs. According to recent reports the large Botany mills, normally employing 4,500 persons, have taken back only 400, and it is said that no persons over forty years of age have been reemployed. In all there are some 10,000 former mill hands still unemployed and in want for bare necessities. The General Relief Committee, 743 Main Avenue, Passaic, is appealing to those who so generously supported the strike to help it in relieving somewhat the widespread misery due to unemployment.

BOSTON IS NOW 99 44/100 per cent pure. To be sure, a rash prospective reader can still purchase the Bible, the complete works of William Shakespeare, the "Canterbury Tales" by a man named Chaucer, and a book called "Tom Jones," by Thomas Fields, or Henry Fieldson, or some such name. But aside from these books which the policemen have not yet had time to read, the literature of America's erstwhile Literary Center is fit for any babbling babe. Nine books have been declared unfit for circulation in Boston. The District Attorney has not been able to read all of the nine, but he found an obliging assistant, Mr. William J. Sullivan, who pronounced them impure. "I have entire confidence in Mr. Sullivan's decision," said District Attorney Foley. If the public does not share this confidence, it cannot buy the offending books in Boston, because the booksellers, on the advice of the police, have removed them from their shelves. It remains to be seen whether any publisher whose book is on Boston's index will bring the case to trial as Mr. H. L. Mencken did when his Mercury was suppressed at the instigation of the late Canon Chase. With the exception of Horace Liveright, Thomas Seltzer, and one or two others, members of publishing firms have meekly submitted to the Watch-and-Warders and their kin. It is expensive to be a martyr, it interferes with business, it results in advertising of uncertain value. The publishers, like so many other persons, do not believe in censorship, but ——

WE HEARTILY WELCOME a new publication sent us from the University of Oklahoma. It is a little quarterly called Books Abroad, and the design of its staff, headed by Roy Temple House, is to "distribute really useful information concerning the more important book publications of Germany, France, Italy, Spain, Belgium, Switzerland, the South American republics, and perhaps other countries." The most useful pages among the thirty-two in this first issue are the twenty containing very brief reviews of current books in French, German, Spanish, and Italian; many books are mentioned, and the notices are for the most part pungent as well as informing. But there is also an essay by H. C. Thurnau, advisory editor from the University of Kansas, establishing an analogy between Europe's literary complexity and the confusion in the American intellectual scene recently described by Eliseo Vivas in a Nation article. It behooves all modern-language teachers in America, says Mr. Thurnau, to keep in touch with what is going on in the mind of Europe today. Hence Books Abroad—which will be valuable, however, for editors and general readers as well as for teachers. There was no such magazine before. We greet it not only for that reason but because it comes out of Oklahoma, whose university, at least in this department, is definitely a center of usefulness and light. The price, we might add, is nothing.

The Military Menaces the World

MR. H. G. WELLS did an excellent service by his smashing discussion of the military situation of the world in the New York Times of March 6. The question Are Armies Needed Any Longer? he answers emphatically in the negative. The war of the future, he declares, "is from first to last a job for technicians and artisans. There is no more use for drilled troops in it than there is for the Greek phalanx." The professional military classes, he points out, will everywhere try by treaty to put off the use of the latest chemical methods in order to save themselves from extinction. But the fact to him is clear that "the evolution of war is abolishing the soldier altogether." "All these handsome individuals running about or galloping about in tabs and buttons and gold lace are of no earthly use at all. . . . The soldier in uniform is as out of date today as the man in armor was in 1600." Hence Mr. Wells is grateful to the United States Senate for killing the treaty to end the use of poison gas. He wants the new warfare developed to the fullest extent. He even welcomes the use of deadly bacilli—anything to make war as horrible and as deadly as possible—and he ridicules those who, like The Nation, are trying to stop chemical warfare.

Now as to this, Mr. Wells may be right and we wrong. It depends in some measure on whether you believe in setting afloat, in order to end war, forces which may conceivably wipe out whole populations. The question is whether, after such a struggle, there will be enough left of the world for anybody to care whether war goes on or not. But with his contention that the modern soldier is an utter anachronism we are in entire accord, as we are with his assertion that the desire to retain their profession makes the "professionally belligerent class, officers, their womenkind, and every sort of person who upon occasion wears uniform and a sword, and is entitled to a salute," favor war. The officers often believe that they do not favor it. They sententiously remark that they are the ones who cannot favor war, since it is they who pay the price. But the possibility of war they insist upon; for otherwise they would be kept out of jobs. Hence their bitterness against all pacifists who are bent on eliminating the fighters as well as war. Hence their growing fury because some churches begin to attack war seriously—it was an American Major General who denounced the American churches a couple of months ago in New York because, he said, the churches were becoming pacifist! As Mr. Wells shows, our military believe that they must defend us against the people next door, and the military next door believe that our forces are only waiting to spring upon them. Military men everywhere insist that national honor is in their keeping, and their "dread" of war was well illustrated by a recent dispatch in the militaristic New York Herald Tribune, which reported the army and navy men in Washington as being furious at the inaction of the Government in the Mexican crisis—they wanted to show Mr. Coolidge how to deal with Mexico.

Every thesis Mr. Wells lays down he could prove to the hilt in this country. Many competent witnesses declare that Englishmen do not want war today; that the bands may still play for an expedition to China or some other remote clime, but that England is through for the present with any really first-class war. They may be right; we hope so; but certainly here in America we are more belligerent than ever before, and, as Mr. Coolidge boasted recently, we have 610,000 men under arms annually —nearly as many as the German standing army of 1914— as a result of the war to end war. We now have nearly 100,000 reserve officers, and at least 22,000 active army and navy officers who are propagandizing for war and military training and have adopted the Prussian military ideals for which we once excoriated the Kaiser and his group. An active lieutenant colonel has just been speaking throughout Illinois by order of the War Department, seeking to create an opinion against the Congress—whose creature the army should be—and to develop sentiment in favor of larger war appropriations. Press dispatches have reported the War Department as determined to put a reserve officer in every hamlet and town to create nationalistic and "patriotic," i. e., militaristic, feeling. The army and navy propagandists are everywhere aided by big business men.

Of this there has been a most interesting example in Detroit, where there has been a struggle between the pro-war business men and the churches which would astound Mr. Wells. There the Board of Commerce has compelled the weak-kneed and cowardly Y. M. C. A. to adopt a resolution approving of "the National Defense Act, as amended in 1920, which provides for the voluntary organization of Reserve Officers' Training Corps camps"—a resolution received by the board with "delight and satisfaction." Why was the board so concerned? Not because of any imminent danger of foreign invasion; not because the big business men have the slightest knowledge whether the summer training camps have any military value or not. Their concern was revealed at a meeting between some of the board and a few protesting ministers. According to the Detroit Free Press, "those favoring the Defense Act said that adequate preparation was the bulwark against revolution." There you have it. The United States army from 1866 to 1898 numbered only 25,000. Was big business interested? Not at all. But the situation has changed now. The World War gave a Socialist or Communist government to nearly every country in Europe. It released new ideas which terrify the American business men. Hence they back the training camps and the R. O. T. C., not for the military training given but for "the ideals of citizenship" inculcated there by the military preceptors. General Pershing hardly speaks of military instruction in his appeals for the camps; he calls them a great school of citizenship. Well he may. Blind obedience to the present order is what the business backers of the camps want. No liberal-minded or anti-war person would be allowed to speak at them, nor would anybody be permitted to quote President Coolidge's saying of October 6, 1925, that "we know, and everyone knows, that these old [military] systems, antagonisms, and reliance on force have failed," and that "no nation ever had an army large enough to guarantee it against attack in time of peace or insure it victory in time of war." If General Pershing thinks at all he knows that Mr. Wells is just about correct when he declares that "it is the country which has the courage to scrap its army most completely which may come nearest to winning in the next great war," and that the military training at the camps is worthless.

Poincaré's Achievement

ELECTIONS are coming in France in 1928, and politicians there as elsewhere adjust their actions to such contingencies. Accordingly it is safe to predict that the French Parliament will not again be asked to ratify the Mellon-Bérenger debt agreement until the elections are safely passed. No office-holder who likes his job is going to subject himself to the charge of enslaving his nation to the United States for sixty-two years.

Meanwhile, however, M. Poincaré is performing miracles with French finances, and it is not impossible that he will make a few payments on account without committing himself to the principle of continued payments. No Frenchman believes that France has any clear moral obligation to pay the interallied obligations; but every statesman in office wants to borrow more money, and if by paying a little he can borrow a lot, M. Poincaré is willing to pay a little. The amazing achievement of M. Poincaré is that he is able to pay even a little. His predecessors plunged deeper and deeper into the twin bogs of inflation and depreciation. The 1918 balance-sheet showed a deficit of fifty billion francs, and, while the total declined, even the 1925 record showed more than a billion francs in red ink. The 1926 figures—not the advance predictions but the performance—record a surplus for the first time since the war. Largely by increases in taxation M. Poincaré raised the total revenues of the Government of France from 29 billion francs in 1925 to nearly 43 billions in 1926.

As a result M. Poincaré has held the confidence of the financiers and small investors, both at home and abroad, and has stabilized the franc. His bitterest political enemies admit that his return to office calmed panic-stricken investors. "The crisis of 1926 was primarily a manifestation of internal loss of confidence," says Benjamin M. Anderson, Jr., of the Chase National Bank, "and the extremely low exchange rate of the summer of 1926 reflected the purchases of immense sums in dollars and sterling by the French people themselves." More recently, the French Government has bought back, largely with francs borrowed from the French people, the dollars and sterling in which the same people had invested, and thus accumulated the immense fund of $400,000,000 in foreign exchange which lies behind the recent French shipments of gold to the United States.

Treasury prosperity and industrial prosperity do not always go hand in hand. When the franc was falling there seemed to be work for everybody, and the fundamental impoverishment could be overlooked. Now that M. Poincaré has balanced his budget and first raised and then stabilized the franc—without, however, promising not to raise it still further—business is not so booming. French manufacturers find it more difficult to underbid their competitors across the Rhine and across the Channel. Factories have been closed; unemployment has reached alarming proportions, as was revealed in the International Relations Section of The Nation last week.

It is safe to say that no French Government will wish to raise the franc much higher; that would too disastrously increase the burden of the domestic debt. But will the workers, who bear the load of the present method of retrenchment, be able to persuade Parliament to interfere with M. Poincaré's plans? On the eve of an election, the answer is dubious.

A Survival of Savagery

IT is gratifying that not everybody is a victim of the prevailing hysteria in regard to criminals. The so-called "crime wave" is not nearly so real or serious as the current of atavism which it has set in motion. People all over the country, in a panic over the increase in certain crimes of violence, are forgetting all that science and reason have taught the world in recent centuries, and are blindly accepting the doctrine—discredited by all experience—that brutal punishment prevents crime. There is a general descent upon our State legislatures to induce them to make punishments for crime harsher, in the pitiful hope that thereby the lives and belongings of the community at large will be made safer.

It is good, therefore, that in the face of this hysteria the League for the Abolition of Capital Punishment, not content to hide temporarily in a cellar, has come out on the front doorstep to proclaim more loudly than ever its belief that the death penalty not only does not stop murder but again and again prevents the conviction of the slayer. It is a striking fact that the league, recently organized to prosecute a national campaign against the disgrace and folly of capital punishment, has at its head Lewis E. Lawes, warden of New York's Sing Sing penitentiary, while among its other leaders are George W. Kirchwey, a former warden of Sing Sing; Herman M. Adler, criminologist of the Department of Public Welfare of Illinois; Katharine Bement Davis, formerly Commissioner of Correction of New York City; Franz Boas, the distinguished anthropologist of Columbia University; men prominent in political life, like Governor Hunt of Arizona and Senator Copeland of New York; judges on the bench such as William H. Ellis of California and Carl B. Hyatt and Thomas A. Jones of North Carolina; experienced lawyers of the caliber of Clarence Darrow, Arthur Garfield Hays, Samuel Untermyer, and Frank P. Walsh.

The campaign of the league is especially needed at this time in view of the attempt to restore capital punishment in North and South Dakota, Minnesota, and Michigan. Fortunately the legislatures of the three first-named States have refused to countenance the proposal. In California, Nebraska, Massachusetts, and New York there is a definite effort on foot to obtain the abandonment of the death penalty. Eight States have distinguished themselves already by doing away with this barbarism: Michigan, 1847; Rhode Island, 1852; Wisconsin, 1853; Kansas, 1872; Maine, 1887; Minnesota, 1911; North and South Dakota, 1915. Four other States—Arizona, Missouri, Oregon, and Washington—were formerly on the honor roll but reverted to savagery in the post-war "red" scare of 1919-1920.

The Nation does not believe that Henry Ford, because he is America's richest man, is thereby especially wise on social questions, but it finds itself in hearty agreement with what he says on the subject of capital punishment:

> It is wrong to kill a man—everbody agrees to that. It does no good to the man and it does no good to society. Capital punishment is as fundamentally wrong as a cure for crime as charity is wrong as a cure for poverty. . . .
> I don't see how any one can vote for capital punishment unless he himself were willing to be the executioner. I think there are mighty few citizens who would be willing to take that job. Then why ask the State, through any citizen, to do the killing? . . .

Tyrant's Luck

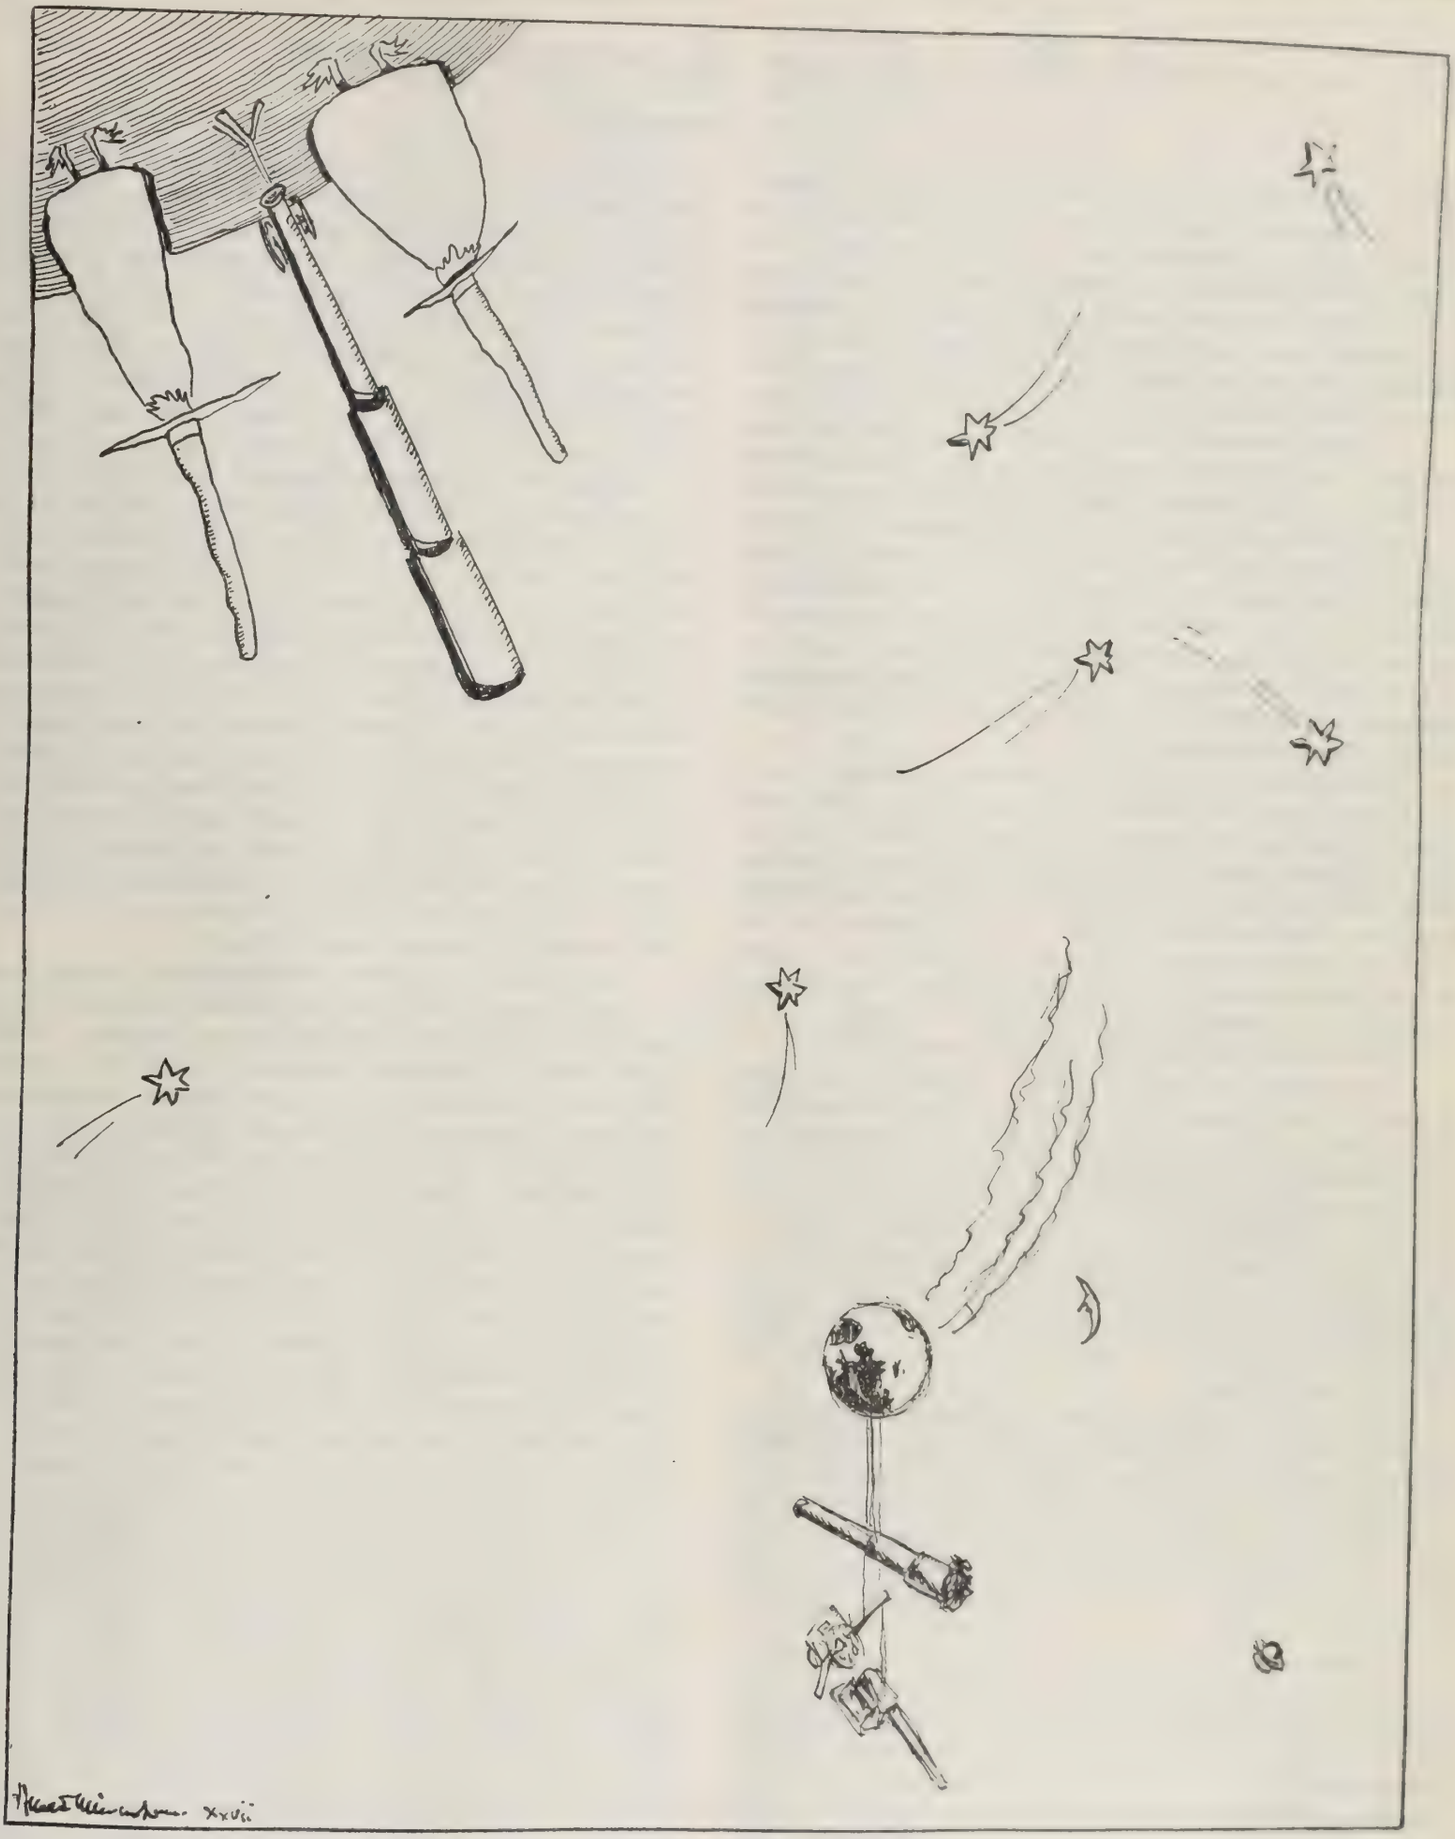
FORTUNE favors Signor Mussolini. He has but to desire a literary festival when, lo and behold, the fates have it already arranged that Publius Virgilius Maro, best and safest of official poets, should have been born two thousand years ago. Almost any other literary anniversary might well have proved a positive embarrassment. What, for example, could any Fascist have said upon the birthday of Horace, who boasted that his prudent heels had carried him swiftly from the field of Philippi; what eulogy could he have uttered upon the memory of Ovid, who was sent by Augustus, the Duce of his age, to ponder his moral and political indiscretions in an exile among the Goths; or how could he have praised the fame and virtue of Tacitus without being reminded how conspicuously the latter was lacking in any enthusiasm for the dictators of Rome? With Virgil, however, it is different. Here was a poet who both served the state and knew his place.

Like Mussolini, Augustus was a man who had set his heart and his will upon the revival of an ancient glory. Under his command Rome glowed with a new prosperity. New buildings rose, new streets spread out, and there is no doubt that the trains would have run once more "on time" if there had been trains to run. And, like Mussolini, too, it was his aim to create a new soul as well as a new body. Rome was to be made heroically race-conscious, sumptuary laws were passed to check the spread of luxurious decadence; and patriotism became obligatory. Nothing more was needed except a national poet and then, behold, the national poet appears. He had spent his early years singing of the bees and flowers in his native province, he had even had an opportunity to observe the summary habits of military saviors when he saw the lands of his neighbors divided among the worthy servants of the great Triumvirate; but he knew his poetic business and the "Æneid" filled the bill. Augustus had his soldiers, his legislators, his administrative officers, and now he had his poet too.

No other great poem was ever so completely built according to specifications. No ambitious American inspired by literary editorials was ever more self-conscious in his determination to write the great American novel. The Greeks had their "Iliad" and so, by Jupiter, the Romans should have their "Æneid." It should be indubitably national, it should be artistically faultless, and it should be patriotically inspiring. No critic should be permitted to raise the slightest cavil, but neither should the solid citizen be called upon to make any allowances for the dubious tendencies of art. The "Æneid" should be "clean," "uplifting," and "inspirational." Moreover, it was, by a miracle, all these things.

Lucky in his anniversary, Mussolini has been less fortunate in the choice of his own laureate. Sometime in April he will betake himself to Mantua and there, before thousands of his loyal subjects, reinforced with a delegation of two hundred scholars from the Sorbonne who have signalized their intention of being present, he will congratulate Augustus upon his good fortune. But the chances are that he will not feel equally inclined to congratulate himself and he may even shake a majestic head, more in sorrow than in anger, in the direction of the bald and petulant d'Annunzio who was to have been his Virgil but who, unfortunately, has not turned out so very well.

Checkers



AT the Hotel Alamac, in New York City, Great Britain and the United States have been locked in deadly combat—and the game has been checkers. Those who class this game with tiddledywinks or "old maid" do not know that men spend years trying to master it, that the volumes on the game run into a library, that matches between experts are played for stakes of $500 and $1,000. Samuel Johnson, responsive to everything having to do with the intellect, wrote the dedication for the first important book on checkers in English—William Payne's "Introduction to the Game of Draughts." (In England checkers is called draughts.) Across the Channel, Diderot and other encyclopedists helped to bring out a French work. Edgar Allan Poe, prefacing "The Murders in the Rue Morgue," compared checkers, chess, and whist, awarding the palm of superiority to checkers. "The higher powers of the reflective intellect," wrote Poe, "are more decidedly and more usefully tasked by the unostentatious game of draughts than by all the elaborate frivolity of chess." The Englishmen this year were surprised to learn that we play checkers better now than in 1905, when last teams from the two countries met; we sent them home this time soundly trounced.

Most men play checkers like a child, trying to keep the opponent from taking two men while losing only one. The expert is busy with different plans. He is looking forty moves ahead; he thinks: "Ha! Let him move there if he wants to. If he does, I'll have 'second position' on him thirty moves from now—and will win in twenty moves more"; or: "In forty moves my king will pin his last two pieces in the upper right-hand corner." Did you ever hear of second position, first position, Bowen's twins, Petterson's drawbridge—all well-known endings?

Who are these British and American experts? It is kindness to them to draw the veil. They do not like to have "the details of their private lives" discussed, as one said when asked what he did for a living. Several of the twelve members of the British team are without visible means of support. James Ferrie, ex-champion of the world, holds a small job with the corporation of Glasgow, Scotland. One is a presser in a London tailor shop, one is satisfied with the description of "laborer," one has collected fares on a Manchester tram. Records of the Americans are similar. One travels with a show, one sells magazines on a crowded corner, one has risen to be clerk in a State office in Lansing, Michigan. Harrah B. Reynolds is a post-office inspector, and T. J. O'Grady is foreman of a large shoe factory.

Checker players do not care what they do, so long as they play checkers. The game is a disease, a passion. It keeps its devotees on the rack, it will not let them sleep, it plays havoc with their efforts to earn livings. Mothers mourn the loss of their sons when they start on checker-playing careers; wives turn prematurely gray. To be a checker-widow is far more pitiable than to be a golf-widow.

What is the secret of its fascination? As well ask why people devote their lives to bridge, to chess, to mountain-climbing, to exploration? It is not a matter of skill. The local champion in the village store plays his game as if he knew all about it. He is absorbed in the game; but if he dreamed of the heights of skill reached by the truly scientific checker-player, he would knock the board off the cracker-barrel in his excitement.

A New Ring Around Russia

By LOUIS FISCHER

THE statesmen of Europe have been meeting in Geneva for their periodic love-fest. Such gatherings are always a matter of sweet words of peace for the public and sordid dickerings and businesslike barter of other people's rights behind the scenes. At this March meeting, however, we have seen some unashamed open diplomacy. The European peacemakers are publicly attempting to forge a ring around the Soviet Republic; to form an anti-Bolshevik bloc.

It is plainly stated in every newspaper. "Berlin Hears Britain Would Encircle Russia" reads a New York Times headline. "Anglo-Russian Relations, Made More Acute by Crisis in China, Will Have Important Bearing on League Council Meeting at Geneva" announces the Herald Tribune. "The forging of a ring of steel around Russia is apparently the object of the determined effort made by the British at the opening of the League of Nations Council today to secure amicable settlement of German-Polish and Rumanian-Hungarian differences." Thus a dispatch from the World correspondent at Geneva.

The instigator is Britain; the reason is China.

China is vital to England in various ways. The great Celestial continent is important enough in itself; but as Soviet influence grows in China, the British become nervous about India and the empire. The Cantonese destroy armies with ideas; against such methods no British arsenal has yet forged an effective weapon. There is no doubt that in addition to undermining British trade in China, the Chinese revolution is undermining British prestige in Asia.

The culprit is Russia; the cure is Geneva.

The British are foolish enough to believe that, were it not for the influence of Moscow, the Chinese would for decades have gone on submitting to foreign oppression, unequal treaties, and other invasions of their rights. Since the tide of Kuomintang progress and Soviet influence cannot be stemmed in the East, the British adopt a policy of provocation in the West. They will force Moscow to concentrate attention and energy on what may occur on her Rumanian, Polish, and Baltic borders. Such tactics, Downing Street and the Indian Office hope, will weaken the Bolshevik hand in China.

The League meeting in Geneva offers the opportunity. As an opening barrage, before the meeting, Chamberlain protests to Moscow against anti-British intrigues. This prepares public opinion in Europe and the United States for concerted action by "civilized" nations against the "Red Menace." Then Briand, Stresemann, Chamberlain, Zaleski, and the ministers of a dozen smaller Powers arrive in Switzerland.

Suddenly Italy recognizes Bessarabia, formerly Russian territory, as a part of Rumania. Now Italy and Jugoslavia, their so-called Neutrality Treaty of 1924 notwithstanding, are rivals for Adriatic supremacy, and the Italo-Albanian pact of last autumn was a thrust against the Serb-Croat-Slovene kingdom. Jugoslavia, accordingly, sought support in Paris, Angora, and Moscow this winter, just as Rushdi Bey, the Turkish Foreign Minister, had signed agreements with Russia and Jugoslavia a year ago when the League awarded Mosul to the British.

Jugoslavia is anti-Hungarian, in fact the mortar of the Little Entente, consisting of Jugoslavia, Czecho-Slovakia, and Rumania, is fear or hatred of Hungary. Italy, on the other hand, sees a possible ally in Hungary, especially if she encourages the monarchists to enthrone a king in Budapest. In the Balkans the only country Italy can hope to win is Rumania, whose chief desire is to confirm her title to Bessarabia, seized from the Bolsheviks. Italy can offer Rumania not only confirmation of her title to Bessarabia (England, France, and Japan gave their assent years ago), but also security in regard to Hungary, hitherto the foe of Rumania.

Mussolini's gesture to Rumania therefore means (1) the alignment of Rumania and Hungary on the side of Italy, (2) the complete paralysis of the Little Entente which has been moribund for many a day, and (3) the emergence of Italy as the outstanding Power on the Balkan Peninsula, at the expense of France and of England as well. London does not object, for the move which weakens her in Southeastern Europe has the same effect on her rival, France, gives international sanction to Rumania's seizure of Bessarabia from Russia, and, most important, definitely places Italy with the anti-Soviet forces. "Britain's Hand Seen in Italy's Bessarabian Act" is the Herald Tribune's correct caption over a message from Rome. To balance the scales, Italy lands troops in Shanghai—to please the British, of course, rather than to protect non-existent Italian interests. Such are the devious ways of international diplomacy.

The British, then, have scored at least a partial victory. But in addition to Italy, they need Poland and Germany, and those of the Baltic states which are not yet won. Hitherto it has been an axiom that the country which enjoys the support of Germany cannot have that of Poland, and vice versa. As long as France was anti-German, Poland was pro-French. After the threat of Thoiry, however, Warsaw began flirting with England. Great Britain's purpose is to bring both Germany and Poland into the anti-Bolshevik bloc, which can only be done by eliminating the factors which make for German-Polish enmity—the Corridor, Danzig, Memel, and questions of German frontier forts. This is the hardest nut Chamberlain has to crack and he may break his teeth on it. At Geneva, nevertheless, Chamberlain and Briand arranged a meeting between Stresemann and Zaleski, the Polish Foreign Secretary. They had not been on speaking terms, and the great problem was whether Stresemann would go to Zaleski or Zaleski to Stresemann. The matter was settled by having Stresemann's assistant visit the Pole, after which the Pole visited Stresemann. Thus was national honor saved. But much more than this is required. The Poles are not likely to give up the Corridor or Danzig or both in exchange for the Baltic port of Memel. (In exchange for Memel the Lithuanians, who have moved closer to the Poles since the Fascist putsch in Kovno last December, are supposed to get Vilna. But will the Poles surrender that prize?) On the other hand, Germany may be willing to come to at least a temporary understanding with Poland—forgetting territorial disputes for a while—if she gets concessions in the Rhineland, if reparation payments are reduced, if Allied troops evacuate Germany, if the Saar coal mines are relinquished, if Eupen and Malmedy are returned, or if she gets an oversea colony. And a British subsidy to Poland, euphemistically styled a loan, may soften Warsaw's heart toward Germany.

This is Chamberlain's trying task: to win both Germany and Poland for the cordon sanitaire around the Soviet Union. Apart from the difficulty of reconciling the nations directly concerned, France presents the chief obstacle. A continental anti-Bolshevik combination under the aegis of Great Britain must ipso facto disturb France. The two Powers bordering on the Channel are again competing for supremacy in Europe, and the anti-Russian cordon sponsored by England is perhaps only another phase of this age-long struggle. It is not clear how France will act. Briand helped Chamberlain to bring Stresemann and Zaleski together. On the other hand, the concessions to Germany in the Rhineland would be at the expense of France and, unless the scheme is very ambitious and includes the floating of the German railway bonds which England blocked after Thoiry, would bring France nothing except the doubtful pleasure of playing second fiddle to London. With Italy in the bloc and Jugoslavia out of it, and with England running it, French adherence seems at least doubtful. Turkey, too, will remain outside. Britain's victory at Geneva in 1925 when she got Mosul has left the Turks in a sour mood; and Italy's ambitions in Asia Minor will tend to throw them into the arms of Russia.

No anti-Bolshevik bloc can be perfect. The men responsible for it do not hope for complete success. Their aim is to harass the Soviet Government and impede its economic advance. They expect, quite fatuously I believe, that the "conservative" Stalin, appalled by the array of Powers against Russia, will capitulate, call off the "offensive" in China, and open the gates to foreign capitalism. This last may be the bait to Germany: German reparations payments and Germany's whole economic structure depend on export markets of which Russia is the most promising. She would hardly risk the loss of Soviet buyers were it not for a hope that opposition to Moscow would be a good investment, forcing the Bolsheviks to be more lenient in dealing with foreign concerns. (I do not take Stresemann's speech to the correspondents, denying British overtures and regretting Russian isolation, as anything more than a bid for better terms. The same day's cables include a dispatch regarding the League's authorization of a loan to Esthonia provided Esthonia gives "a sufficient guaranty that she will not sign a neutrality treaty with Russia.")

The bloc will not mean war. Europe is too exhausted to venture into another period of self-destruction now. But this dress rehearsal at Geneva is an indication of what may happen in the future when Britain and her friends on the Continent are better fixed and more united. The Bolsheviks are not far from the mark when they speak of the danger of capitalist aggression with the League as its spearhead. Russia, however, is a gigantic country. Her strength is her own wealth—natural, human, moral, ideological—and the need which foreign countries have of doing business with her. The concert of some nations against her may retard her economic progress, expose her to financial boycotts and to partial commercial blockades (she has experienced not a few already), but they can hardly interfere with her industrial rise or with her ascendancy in Asia.

Working the Women Workers

By ANN WASHINGTON CRATON

ALTHOUGH there are some eleven million women in industry in the United States, only a small proportion, perhaps 250,000, are in the trade unions. The common attitude of most union leaders is that women cannot be organized. Actually, the problem is a different one: how to fit women into the trade unions. The admission of women involves new policies, new responsibilities, and new difficulties. Rather than face them and make the necessary adjustments, union officials have preferred to "let the women alone."

The life of a union official is hard. The work is discouraging and exhausting. The reward for a man is a higher office, with increasing responsibility. He becomes manager of his local union or joint board. He becomes a national officer. There are no such opportunities for women. Women have successfully held minor offices in their local unions. They have been efficient business agents and organizers. Rarely have they held offices of importance. A few women have been international officers, but no woman has ever been on the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor. Most of the few women who have attained prominence in the trade-union movement have discreetly tried to play the union game as men play it. They have realized that their prestige and position were at stake. On the theory that a poor union is better than no union they have steadily refused to embarrass labor officials by a vigorous protest at the discriminations and inequalities to which women have been subjected in the unions. As a result they have been unable to achieve any outstanding leadership among the rank and file of trade-union women.

When women come into the unions they are, generally speaking, controlled by men officials, particularly when the women in the trade, both organized and unorganized, outnumber the men. I remember one prominent international officer who said, referring to a woman's local which had made remarkable strides under the leadership of women officers: "These women need to be protected. They have a membership now which is ample to pay a good salary to a man official whom we shall appoint. From now on we are going to have iron control over this local." Another official bitterly condemned workers' education classes in his union. The attendance had been largely made up of women. "They have all become lefts," said he indignantly. "That is what education for women does. Now see the trouble they are making us."

The struggles of promising rank-and-file girls for recognition have met not only lack of cooperation but often direct sabotage from their trade-union brothers. The case of Sophie comes to mind. Her life had been full of hardships and deprivations. Insufficient and improper food, too little sleep, exposure to all sorts of weather on the picket line in strikes, work in airless and overheated factories ruined her health. She developed bronchitis and throat trouble, while she wore herself out mentally and spiritually over the injustices and inequalities she experienced in the union. Sophie had been an active trade unionist for ten years, faithfully supporting the machine and loyal to the administration. She was an invaluable lieutenant. A man who had worked as faithfully for his organization would have been taken care of. But Sophie, who had never been allowed to hold a paid job as organizer on the regular staff, had to borrow money and accumulate debts for the vacation she had to take. Instead of returning to her own city, Sophie decided she would work in other clothing centers to obtain first-hand knowledge about the activities of women trade unionists. In Chicago she had been a fast and experienced pocket-maker, earning $50 to $60 a week in the season. To her dismay, in New York union shops, this proved to be a man's job. No woman could be a pocket-maker. No woman had ever been allowed to work at such a well-paid operation, although her international union loudly proclaimed that it stood for "Equal Work, Equal Pay, and Equal Opportunities" for women workers. Sophie could have found work in open or scab shops, where women pocket-makers were preferred to men, as they were paid less wages. She refused this compromise and finally took a job as a corset-worker at $18 a week, an unorganized trade which she had learned as a girl of fourteen. At night the men union officials unhesitatingly called upon her to hold shop-meetings with groups of girls from union shops, who had been forced to accept a severe cut in wages as a concession to the boss, to protect the wages of the men. These angry girls were refusing to pay dues. Sophie, herself bitterly resentful, had to face her furious sister workers and urge them to support their union and not to work in scab shops.

Millinery in its infancy was regarded as exclusively a women's trade. Hats were all hand made, before the comparatively recent machine era, when the men cap-makers saw a chance at employment in their own off-season, and invaded this domain of women. The milliners at that time were largely middle-aged and highly conservative. Accustomed always to working in shops where only women were employed, they believed that it was not "nice" to work with men. It meant that they could no longer allow themselves the comfort of working in old-fashioned "Mother Hubbards." They disliked the idea of sitting by men, who not only worked without collars and ties, but discarded their shirts as well. The women considered it offensive and improper.

When the first men came into the shops and sat down at the machines the women indignantly stood up and marched out. But they had to march back again, quickly, to save their jobs. The union soon organized and supported the men. The women were admitted to the union with an initiation fee $10 lower than that paid by the men and weekly dues 10 cents less. Their wages, however, were between $20 and $30 less than the men's scale. The bitterness occasioned then increased through the years and could never be overcome. The old-timers gradually dropped out, to be replaced by younger women, mostly the new immigrants from Russia who belonged to the generation of the Revolution. They have made an idealistic and enthusiastic fight for their principles and recently have greatly improved their position in the union.

Women coming into the trade-union movement have an optimism and freshness that men officials are likely to resent. They upset the traditional routine. A prominent woman was engaged to direct an organization campaign involving thousands of women. Definite action was imperative in a month, when a wage agreement expired. In twenty-four hours she had appalled the men officials, who had formerly drifted along complacently and casually, with a membership large enough to pay their salaries and with no opposition to reelection. The campaign to them had been merely a gesture to the membership. They had not intended to ask for a wage increase for their women members. It had been tacitly understood between the employers and the union officials that the men's wage increases should be granted.

Miss S., the new organizer, was a shrewd politician. She was determined to maneuver herself and her policies into such a position that her work would not be wasted. She started with a veritable office revolution. Nothing was sacred. She moved the furniture and threw out all the old, broken chairs that had been piled in corners for years. She appropriated an office for herself, a small room long regarded as the exclusive property of a clique that played pinochle. She installed a desk and a telephone. She had an electrician arrange proper lighting for night work. She even had the water cooler moved; it had blocked the hallway, contrary to all fire laws, for a year. Miss S. now turned her energies to the organization campaign. Tons of union literature had to be distributed through the shops. Instead of playing cards, the loungers were forced to fold circulars and lick stamps. Girls from the open shops as well as from the union shops flocked to the office. The men officials were terrified. They were forced into a position where they had to make demands for the women. The employers were furious. Miss S. was triumphant. She now went aggressively around the shops and, as a result, she began to be arrested almost daily. The first time it happened a crowd of excited girls rushed into the office, demanding bail and a lawyer. The men took the situation cheerfully. A group began to play cards. It was Tomasso, the Italian business agent, who mildly voiced the sentiments of all. "Let her stay in jail," said he, persuasively, to the girls. "She's all right. Let her stay until we can have a nice, quiet little executive-board meeting without her. Then we will get her out. Ladies should stay at home. If ladies won't stay at home, let them stay in jail."

In Newark, New Jersey, last summer, a campaign was initiated to try out the American Federation of Labor's Tentative Plan to Organize Women which had been adopted at the 1925 convention. It was the first move on the part of the federation to face the problem of the unorganized women. The plan provided that the various unions in a given locality should make a joint intensive drive to organize women under their jurisdiction. Each union was to supply its own organizers and its own technique and the particular literature necessary for its special trade problems. The impetus given by such systematic and thorough work progressing simultaneously in different industries would create a trade-union consciousness among women workers and have a tremendous educational value in the entire community.

A legislative agent of the federation—Edward F. McGrady—sent from Washington as an "observer," was in charge of the drive. But neither he nor the unions involved cared whether it was successful, and consequently it was a failure. Another woman and myself, both experienced in organization work, made an effort to take part in the Newark campaign. The legislative agent agreed to consider us as organizers and made an appointment to discuss the campaign with us. He took us to lunch at his favorite restaurant in the theatrical district of New York. We selected a modest lunch, appalled at the high prices, while he consumed a most elaborate one. It was apparent that he had repented of his rashness in interviewing us, for now he would not have us. He used all the old arguments to discourage us: women could not be organized; women did not want to be organized; women had been organized, at great trouble and expense, and their unions had not lasted. We countered on every point.

By this time, he was smoking expensive cigars. "You say you want to work with women; I know a good place for you—go work for the Y. W. C. A."

"We want to work with women in the Newark campaign," we answered promptly.

He was much annoyed, but he made another effort: "Why don't you forget all this business and leave the labor movement to men? It's too rough for women. Why don't you get married?"

"Perhaps we are married," we answered cheerfully; "we still want to organize women into trade unions in Newark."

"You are hopeless," he said angrily. He fled from us in a taxi. His parting words were no more encouraging: "If you want to organize women, you'll have to wait until the federation gets around to it. We think the time isn't ripe yet. It will not be for another twenty-five or fifty years. The trouble with you two is that you are ahead of your time."

Must the millions of exploited women, miserably underpaid and overworked, wait until the A. F. of L. gets around to them—in twenty-five or fifty years? The slogan "Organize the Unorganized" was not raised in vain in the Passaic strike. Passaic has proved beyond doubt that the organization of men and women can take place side by side, if the purpose exists and the work is undertaken on a large scale in the basic industries. Let it be upon an equal footing, so that a new spirit and new standards may rebuild the trade unions and create a vigorous, honest, and progressive American labor movement.

Blessed Are the Sons of Ham

By GEORGE S. SCHUYLER

THE machine age is a dull, monotonous age with little adventure, little thrill, little laughter. Man needs these things, so he avidly peruses the so-called funny sheets; goes to the theater, to prize-fights and golf tournaments; reads books; sits in smoky, noisy cabarets; goes hunting, hiking, slumming, or mountain climbing. The thrills and laughs of the average American are sporadic—usually bought and paid for. Such a possibility as an entire lifetime of laughs and thrills is never dreamed of.

Yet there are people in the United States who have the enviable privilege of being continuously entertained. They are always sure of at least one thrill or laugh every day the Lord sends. At least thirty times a month they find opportunities for laughter or experience that skipping-a-beat of the heart, the chilly spasm, the catch at the throat, the loss of speech that accompany the honest-to-goodness thrill. They are used to it now. They couldn't escape it and slip into the bored existence of their fellow-citizens even if they wished to. There are those in this group, of course, who have tired of this life of excitement and fun. Sometimes they would welcome a little of the monotony of which the rest of their fellow-citizens have abundance. But the more intelligent members of the group would not think of relinquishing this gift of the gods.

I refer, of course, to the Aframericans. You are surprised? Of course. You have long looked upon the black citizen as a tragic figure—a pathetic figure—a helpless transplanted child of the jungle caught in the cruel meshes of machine civilization. But usually he isn't that at all. He really enjoys his sojourn in the Land of the Free. Take myself, for instance. I am a black, unadulterated Negro. I do not regret it or go about with mournful countenance bewailing my lot. I do not clamor with the Garveyites for emigration to Africa. On the contrary I enjoy life here in America. I glance at my white brother and sister with amusement tinged with pity. Pathetic figures, I murmur. So industriously and earnestly scampering all over the lot in search of the thrills and laughs which are my birthright. Would I change places with the Nordic? Never!

Take dining or lunching, for instance. Monotonous, uneventful routine for most of you. Just the same old shoveling down of food, paying the check, and tipping the waiter. For me a laugh or a thrill, or both. Probably I am busy in the reference room of the New York public library when the pangs of hunger assail me. Instead of returning to the far-off black ghetto, I stroll into a nearby cafe. I am well dressed and have ample funds. If I were a white man I might be included under that uncertain term "gentleman." Entering, I experience a thrill of anticipation. The customers look up, shocked and annoyed. Eating stops. Breaths are caught. The silence is ominous. A worried waiter steps up with an agitated inquiry. What do I want? (What would a person want in a restaurant?) Sorry, all the tables are reserved. I am the cynosure of all eyes. My presence creates a stir—a problem. I wonder whether I shall be seated or thrown out. If seated, shall I be placed behind a screen or at the last table near the kitchen door? If I seat myself, how long shall I be kept waiting for service? Meanwhile the waiter and manager are conferring. Customers cast baleful or amused glances. There is much whispering. I cannot help but enjoy all this. Over a hundred proud Nordics nonplussed by a lone Negro! It is a fitting climax to a day spent among musty tomes.

Suppose I decide to go to a theater. If it be in the liberal North or East, I approach the ticket-window and ask for orchestra seats. The clerk assumes that look with which I am so familiar. He reaches up and gets the tickets. When seated, I find that all the Negro audience is together. I indulge in a sardonic smile. In addition to his other tasks, this poor clerk must take special precautions lest a black clergyman be seated next to a white crook. That, of course, must never happen. Or, more frequently, I am told that the seats I desire have been reserved or sold. I stand aside but where I can watch the clerk. Soon a white man approaches, buys a seat in the section I asked for, and enters the theater. I glance at the ticket agent. He looks through his grille at me. I smile. He blushes. A look of annoyance comes over his face. That is my reward; it fills me with glee—just that expression.

Perhaps I am in the South. I wish to take a young woman to the theater. She belongs to an old family—seventy-five years of merchants, physicians, teachers. She herself is a college graduate. Ordinarily I would be forced to buy orchestra seats with such a companion. At least good balcony seats. But Negroes can sit only in the gallery in this theater. Thus I am saved money, and what was designed as a humiliation is really a help. I am not a snob. There are sociable souls in the gallery. They laugh and cry with childish frankness. Cold propriety does not inhibit them. I enjoy them as much as I do the performance. Hence I have double the enjoyment at one-third the price I would have paid in New York. The few whites in the gallery look up disdainfully from their seats in the lower portion. All these things used to infuriate me. Now I have a sense of humor.

The street car affords similar amusement. There is an empty seat next to a rather dowdy female of the superior race. She is reading a tabloid newspaper with great interest—spelling out the words under the pictures. I take the empty seat and open my New York Times. She glances disdainfully at me out of the corner of her eye and moves as far away as possible. That tickles me. I smile in my Times. She scowls in her tabloid.

Or I am in Memphis, Tennessee. It is my first visit. I hail a car. The sign says "Front Entrance." I start to climb aboard. Fresh from the North, I do not know that Negroes must enter from the rear as well as sit in the rear. The motorman, a stringy Mississippian, glances at me balefully. "Get in the rear door, boy!", he growls belligerently, and makes a step toward me. My heart leaps to my throat. Negroes have been beaten and jailed for no greater offenses. I go to the rear of the car. The conductor and the white passengers cast dark looks in my direction.

Or I am en route to Muskogee from Fort Smith. A surburban car meets the train. I enter the car and go to the rear. Unthinkingly I sit down. I turn to the unfinished story in my magazine. "Hey there you! Niggers up in front!" thunders the conductor. What a start that gives me! I grip the magazine! I run the gantlet of eyes and find a seat in front. I feel rather bewildered. How was I to know that Negroes sat in front when elsewhere they sit in the rear? I lay awake that night, thinking of it. What prize-fight or baseball game could have given me such excitement? What adventure in the jungles or mountains could have so upset me?

There was the day in Paris, Texas. It was the policy of my paper to send my salary and expenses by telegraph at the end of the week. The clerk at the telegraph office has not sufficient funds to cash the order—a large one. She indorses it and sends me across the street to the largest hotel to get it cashed. All the banks are closed. I must leave for Texarkana that evening. I enter the hotel lobby and march toward the desk. I think only of getting my money and leaving town; Negroes have been burned at the stake here. Everyone looks at me curiously. I, a humble black man, suddenly command the attention of the whole lobby.

"Take off your hat, boy!" The grating voice of the desk clerk sears me through. My heart leaps in my throat. I had entirely forgotten about the hat. Nearly everyone else has on a hat. All the guests and loiterers are waiting to see what I am going to do. Of course I hastily remove my hat. I must avoid trouble and delay. I have a schedule to make. I reach the desk after seeming centuries of travel through the ominously silent lobby. I politely tell the clerk my mission. He cashes the order. Handing me the bills, he asks: "What are you—president of one of those nigger colleges?" thinking, doubtless, of the large sum in my hand.

"No," I reply, "I'm just a newspaperman. It's pretty hard for a boy to get a job as college president." The clerk is nonplussed. He flushes. But I have reached the door by this time. He has not yet found words. His discomfiture amuses me in the midst of my perturbation. I have vanished before he finds himself. A thrill and a laugh to help me on my journey. Both are lasting. It's just as if it happened yesterday. To a white man Paris, Texas, would be just another soon-to-be-forgotten one-horse town. I can never forget it.

I am reading a story about American Negroes. The white author has attempted to catch dialect and convey psychology. He has sketched a racial memory background: jungles, leopards, crocodiles, tom-toms, and all the rest of which American Negroes know nothing. There is much about primal instincts and the veneer of civilization. The author's ignorance and the editor's gullibility are equally refreshing. I laugh as you would laugh at the imaginings of a very small child. I laugh too at the thousands who will devour this trash.

Another source of daily amusement to me is the attitude of my white brethren toward me and my folk. I am acquainted with many Negro poets, contractors, labor leaders, journalists, social workers, physicians, novelists. I know a black telegraph operator and a brown fellow who is superintendent of a brickyard. It does not strike me as strange that Negroes should be doing all sorts of work. But white people continue to be amazed when they hear of Negroes having such vocations. They regard successful Negroes as freaks, along with trained seals and infant chess prodigies. "How wonderful!" they say. Or, "Fancy, a Negro novelist!" Such delicious morsels stay with me for days.

Job-hunting has always been productive of great entertainment. I don't have to do it; I just go around for the fun of it. I inquire about those positions which I know are meant for whites only. I enjoy myself in watching their facial expressions and listening to the often halting prevarications and faltering excuses. Once I was offered a good job in the New York office of a sugar company. The position was secured by a friend over the telephone. The only slip was that my friend neglected to mention that I was a Negro. When I walked into the palatial offices in the Battery Place Building, there was much conferring and studied courtesy. I enjoyed the whole thing hugely. Of course I didn't get the job.

Every night the Negro is in danger. I walk down a dark street or cut across the park. Suddenly, turning a corner, I come face to face with a white woman. Will she get frightened and scream? I never know. There lies the uncertainty. I have had two such experiences. It was many hours before I became normal, yet in both cases the woman had quickly recovered herself. Suppose she hadn't? Such eventualities keep one on the alert, taut, expectant.

In 1912 I was in the 25th Infantry, stationed seven miles outside of Seattle. A white woman, well known to everyone at the post, claimed to have been assaulted by one of the soldiers. Feeling, as the newspapers say, was running high. There was an immediate investigation. Grim white officers diligently sought clues. The stalwart soldiers were lined up. Long rows of black Americans in the blue uniforms of Uncle Sam. The woman, accompanied by the adjutant, marched down the line peering into each man's face. Every once in a while she would pause and scan a scared doughboy. To most white folks "all coons look alike." There was reason to be alarmed. She stopped in front of me! Cold chills ran up my spine; gooseflesh sprouted; my kinky hair rose. She whispered to the company commander and pointed at me. I was taken to the orderly room. There I was accused of guilt. Just as I was about to be led to the guard house, the white first lieutenant came in and testified that I had been doing some work for him at the hour the woman said she was attacked. A narrow escape. It was a long time before I got over that one.

During the war days patriotism was running high. Good Americans were being asked to "give until it hurts." Four-minute men were assuring Negro audiences that the United States was also their country to be defended by bonds and bayonets. I am an officer. I am walking to the railroad station en route to Philadelphia. The camp is near Baltimore. Four white privates meet me face to face. They look me squarely in the eye and then pass without saluting. Many whites and blacks are watching. At that time I had been a soldier for six years. Saluting is neither novel nor onerous. It is just part of the military routine. A real soldier no more objects to it than a civilian does to shaking hands. Besides, it is compulsory on both officer and enlisted man. The plain affront gives me a start. Relations are none too good between the races in this camp. I don't want a scene. I would rather let it pass, marking it down to ignorance. But what will those black soldiers think? Will they continue to respect me? These things flash through my mind. Sharply I call the white privates back. On the way, they pass a white officer and salute him promptly and properly. They return and salute me likewise when I upbraid them. I wonder who feels the more uncomfortable, they or I? Suppose they had not obeyed me? I think about it all the way to Baltimore. Such things upset you as much as being caught in a bar-room brawl. Of course, I smile now at the incongruity of the situation: Four white boys from Dixie, probably, always accustomed to a certain relation between whites and blacks. Suddenly a great war places them in a situation where the tables are turned. It is hard for them to change, even to make the world safe for democracy. Patriotism and prejudice!

And so it goes—day in and day out, year in and year out, for a lifetime. Any Negro in America has similar experiences daily. Most Negroes, of course, are too thin-skinned to delight in many of the situations in which they find themselves. That requires a developed sense of humor. But nearly all of them get the thrills. It is their social heritage. So they love America and are loyal citizens, ever ready to shed their blood to maintain its independence and the liberties vouchsafed every citizen by the Constitution. For my part, I would never be able to stand all this noise and smoke and stone and steel and machinery, if my blackness did not bring diversion and relief. Thrice blessed are we sons of Ham.

Precipitation and Presidents

By ROBERT MARSHALL

A COUPLE of years ago, while engaged in a study of the correlation between hemlock growth and rainfall in northern Massachusetts, I observed a peculiar biological-political relationship in the annual rings of the trees. Three marked periods of retarded growth were manifest, just prior to 1828, 1884, and 1912. These are the years which also represent the three great Republican catastrophes, when the right-wing domination of the White House was broken after protracted periods of power. Now I would gladly credit many obnoxious results to the protective tariff, but it did seem a bit unreasonable to blame it for a stagnation in tree growth. It was necessary to find a more logical explanation, or attribute the observed phenomenon to chance.

Since my study indicated that precipitation did have a marked effect on the hemlock growth, it struck me that possibly the same lack of rainfall which caused the trees to wane also caused the party in power to wane. Several economists have recognized the correlation between rainfall and economic cycles. It is just one step further to carry the economic results to their political conclusion.

We are blessed in these United States with a national baby show and a national beauty contest, a national flag and a national flower, a national game and a national guard, a national song and a national cemetery. Almost everything seems to be nationalized except the weather. That still maintains a complete regional individuality. While the Californian is damning one of the driest summers on record, the New Yorker may be cussing one of the wettest. Therefore, in comparing political results with climatic conditions, it is necessary to choose some specific regional precipitation for the comparison.

The weather data of the twenty-two stations which have continuous records going back as far as the middle of the nineteenth century were carefully analyzed. It was found that the mean annual precipitation in the New England and Middle Atlantic States, for the four years prior to each election, had a distinct bearing on the result of that election. The earliest quadrennial period for which adequate data were available was 1825-1828, while after 1884 the striking correlation between presidential succession and precipitation in the Northeast ceased. But over a sixty-year period, in seven cases out of eight when the rainfall was greater than normal, the party in power, regardless of which one it was, continued to stay in power. On the other hand, in six cases out of seven when the rainfall was less than normal, a new swarm of political parasites descended on Washington. The basic figures for these statements are shown in Table 1.

The data presented are based on the records of the following weather stations: New Bedford, Boston, Waltham, New York, Albany, Troy, Lowell, Providence, Amherst, Newark, Springfield, Lake Cochituate. These are the only Northeastern stations dating back to 1850.

From 1885 to 1924 the seven States which the Bureau of Census designates by the formidable group name of West North Central have proved to be political hygrometers. Their climate, with the exception of those portions lying in the middle Mississippi Valley and in the extreme western part beyond the 100th meridian, has indicated presidential succession just as surely as did the Northeastern weather at an earlier period. The four wetter-than-normal terms were all followed by a continuation of the party in office, while the six drier than normal terms produced five political upheavals. Table 2 gives the specific data.

The data presented are based on the records of the following weather stations: Duluth, Minneapolis, Moorehead, and St. Paul, Minnesota; Des Moines, Iowa; Kansas City, and Oregon, Missouri; Dodge City, Hays, Independence, Manhattan, and Wakeeney, Kansas; Omaha, Nebraska; Huron, South Dakota; Bismarck, North Dakota. These are the only stations within the specified limits of the West North Central region dating back to 1885.

Summing up the records of the two regions over a period of 100 years, in 22 cases out of 25 the quadrennial rainfall predicted the next President. The party in power was victorious after a precipitation greater than normal, and was vanquished after a precipitation less than normal in 88 per cent of the presidential elections. It can be shown statistically that were chance alone operating the probability of coincidence between precipitation and presidential succession in 22 instances out of 25 would be only 1 in 14,603. Consequently it seems almost certain that there is some significance to the observed relationship.

Just what that significance is can be answered less surely. Fundamentally it seems obvious that the effect of rainfall on crops is the predominant factor. To illustrate, H. L. Moore[1] has found in Illinois that "the yield per acre of four representative crops—corn, hay, oats, and potatoes—is associated with the amount of rainfall of their respective critical periods of growth. In three out of the four cases the degree of correlation lies between $r = .589$ and $r = .666$." On the basis of these high correlations he concludes that "the fundamental, persistent cause of the cycles of crops is the rhythmical movement in the conditions of the weather represented by the cycles in the amount of rainfall." And so a natural chain begins to form. Scant rainfall means poor crops, poor crops mean hard times, and hard times mean discontent. On the other hand abundant rains mean relative prosperity, and when the average man is prosperous the higher issues might as well retire gracefully.

There are certain apparent objections to this theory, some of which can be partially met. For instance it may be asked why the correlation between rainfall and political change should suddenly shift from the Northeast to the West North Central region in 1884. The answer possibly lies in the relative agricultural importance of these sections. Until about 1860 the Northeast led the country in acreage of improved farm lands. From 1860 through the 1880 census the Ohio Valley States predominated. But since 1890 the West North Central States have held an ever increasing lead. Consequently it would seem reasonable to assume that when the Northeast no longer maintained an important place in the agriculture of the nation, its rainfall no longer served as a barometer of political results. On the other hand the trans-Mississippi States, assuming for the first time a place of importance in crop production, became an accurate indicator.

Henry Ludwell Moore has shown that while economic cycles follow rainfall tendencies, there is a lag of about four years. One would expect this lag to be even more pronounced in political cycles. In fact, a closer correlation was obtained from the rainfall of the four years immediately preceding the election than from any other period chosen.

It is not the purpose of this paper to set up precipitation as an infallible key to our political history. But historians have so emphasized the petty actions of puny politicians that it seems worth while stressing one factor which even the largest campaign fund cannot alter. The ancient Roman politicians may have been wise when they chose Jupiter as their highest deity.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter's recent ruminations on the beauties of New York City have provoked not only prose protests but also poetical polemics. A communication in verse, signed "Mary Doe et al.," is as unorthodox in its choice of beauty as was the Drifter's list, the citations including an Automat restaurant, the elevated railway station at Eighth Avenue and 110th Street, and Mendel's parcel-room in the Grand Central terminal. The poem, covering several typewritten pages, is too long to reproduce here, as the Drifter has to catch a train at 6:10 p. m., but this is "Canto III":

In this City of sheer beauty, full of sea-shine and of dreams,
There are many things breath-taking—New York's full of gems, it seems.
I'll eliminate the Woolworth Tower and Cleopatra's Needle
And shout of an objet d'art for which e'en babes might wheedle.
There are no doubt finer benches made of marble or of teak
Somewhere in these city limits. Of these I shall not speak.
There are softly tufted cushions in Rolls-Royces you could find,
But give me a less effete small seat of the stimulating kind.
A little seat that's perfect, of which I'll sing to you,
Is in the upper front right corner of a bus of emerald hue.

THIS is the silly season for State legislation, and although our national Congress has quit and gone home, a thousand and one absurdities have been proposed in other quarters. In addition to the perennial proposals for taxing bachelors and spinsters (as if they didn't have troubles enough already), a Chicago clergyman is agitating for a law to create a board of censors in Illinois to regulate dancing, while Tennessee has brought forth a bill to make gossiping a misdemeanor. By way of reprisal several lawmakers have introduced bills intended to spoof their fellow-regulators of manners, morals, and minutiae. At least the Drifter supposes that is the intention, although he can never be sure that a statesman is joking, even when he most ought to be. Nebraska, for instance, was asked to pass a bill limiting damages in suits for alienation of affections or breach of promise to one cent. This bill, its sponsor urged, "would make real romance possible again." Best of all, Senator James W. Finley drafted a bill in Kansas prohibiting the sale of mince pies. "For years," he says, "I have considered the eating of mince pies a national evil. Governor Ben S. Paulen recently was ill after eating mince pie. It is as much the State's business to regulate what we eat as what we smoke and drink."

THE Bisbee (Arizona) Review suggests that after we get these proposals on the statute-books we proceed to pass a law against swatting mosquitoes with the left hand between dawn and dusk; a constitutional amendment making it a felony for golfers to describe a game play by play except to the deaf and dumb; and national legislation protecting motor-car drivers against damage suits by pedestrians. "The troubles of this country," it says, "can be soothed only by legislation, and the sooner we get these laws passed the sooner will the masses rise in indignation and vote a billion dollars for a public incinerator in which to burn the superfluous statutes." Alas, the Drifter has no such confidence in the indignation of the masses. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Christ's Race

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: After two years' residence in Mexico I returned to the United States intending to get myself a position and remain here. In addition to my experience in the States as stenographer, secretary, and office manager, I had acquired in Mexico an adequate knowledge of Spanish, and had become a competent English-Spanish stenographer and correspondent.

One week in New York filled me with pain and loathing for Christian hypocrisy and Jewish ——. I will let you supply the word. One employment agency after another said that much as they would like to send me to any number of available positions for English-Spanish stenographers, they could not do so, because of positive instructions from their clients, Jewish as well as Christian, not to send them any Jews. The feeling of disgust that welled up in me came near to being hatred of my fellow-Jews; if the Christians were known to act any more decently, I would have been willing to change my faith.

I left New York for Boston, my home town. Here too it seems to be taken for granted that even in Jewish business houses a Jewish young man or woman cannot hope to get any high-grade office or executive position. The young Jew is fast acquiring the status of a Negro, with this difference—that the Negro employer never discriminated against members of his own race, whereas Jewish employers are actually doing that.

I may have to return to "barbarous Mexico" to earn a living. There, neither among Jews nor Christians, on the economic field at least, is there the slightest trace of prejudice against anyone on account of race, religion, or color.

Big Brute Men

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have never found in your magazine any sympathy for weak and helpless animals, treated more barbarously than even the weakest and most helpless slaves in the age of despots.

Did it ever occur to you that the man who rushes to save his own life in a lifeboat, crowding out the women and children, is no whit more ignoble than the man who is willing to save his life at the cost of the cruelty and brutality practiced in experimenting on little helpless animals? The animals are smaller and weaker than he, so he uses them to protect himself. Is such a life worth protecting and saving?

"Al" Smith's Weak Knees

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "Al" Smith is undoubtedly a better man for the people than is, say, Calvin Coolidge. But I see no reason why genuine Progressives should go into rhapsodies of praise over him as does Mr. Norman Hapgood in one of your recent issues. Governor Smith is a competent administrator, but he is not a Progressive.

His silence regarding Mexico is extremely ominous. Other Catholics, such as Senator David I. Walsh, have spoken against intervention in vigorous terms. On the power of the courts to issue injunctions against peaceful picketing in labor disputes Governor Smith is silent. Yet a Democratic judge in New York City, without the slightest expression of disapproval from Governor Smith, has recently issued one of the most far-reaching injunctions we have ever had. His progressivism in regard to water-power shows how partial and halting his progress-if-ism is. Of course Progressives believe that the State should develop its own water-power. But why not the water-power of Niagara Falls as well as that of the St. Lawrence? And why should the State generate electric energy and then sell to private companies for distribution, as Smith proposes? The economies to the consumers in public distribution are at least as great as those in public generation. Smith's proposal is only a very weak-kneed and half-hearted progessivism at best.

Blessed Be Democracy

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wonder if a mere proletarian would be permitted the privilege of a voice in your columns. In a recent editorial you name Soviet Russia as a country where democracy is absent. In Soviet Russia every town and village is astir with workers and peasants assembling in spare hours, arguing and deciding on affairs of the land. Moreover, these workers and peasants, men and women, are making their decisions felt.

Pray, what is democracy? I hear of one democratic country where bankers and oil politicians meet in hotel rooms, nominate and practically insure election of public officials. "Russia destroyed private property" Norman Angell said, according to Keith Hutchison, in The Nation of February 16. Soviet Russia confiscated private property and put it to the use of the needy and the nation. By all means let us destroy a nation that dares experiment in mass happiness. What an undemocratic country!

Blasphemy

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Late did I read some smoothly flowing lines,
Wherein a bard not all unknown to fame
Sang well and sweetly of the great god Bacchus.
But as I read how, ere the god was bound,
The bursting grape poured healthful wine, and all
Was bright and beautiful throughout the land,
Before me rose the past that truly was:

Crowding his temples nightly, and by day,
Men worshiped Bacchus (he as yet unbound),
Protected from the view of all profane
Onlookers by the slats of swinging doors,
And windows hung with heavy, opaque curtains.
Such was the nature of this Bacchus-worship
That those who paid him homage bowed them down
In secret holes and corners, whence a stench
Flew out and smote the passer in the face!
They went in men who often came out beasts,
Bereft of reason, and almost of motion.
I turned from jail and pesthouse and from morgue,
Filled with unhappy slaves of smiling Bacchus,
And saw still others bring to squalid sties,
Where dwelt their wives and children, ghastly tidings:
Their all was spent on Bacchus. Nought remained
For food or clothing—nay, none for the landlord!
I saw each temple in the whole broad land
Spread filth, and misery, and wickedness;
And rage possessed me till I stood blaspheming!
I clenched my hands and shook them at his temples,
And in a strangled voice, that could not utter
A thousandth part of my desire, I shouted:
"Perdition seize this Bacchus! Let him perish,
And all his hell-brewed potions perish with him!"

. . . Did we not well to bind that god of madness?

Modern Martin Luther

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Martin Luther was progressive—and modern. On October 20, 1526, Francis Lambert, at the request of Philip of Hesse, drew up an ordinance known as the Reformation of the Churches of Hesse. To that prince Luther wrote a letter dated January 7, 1527, in which he said:

> I know well and have learned that laws passed prematurely are seldom well obeyed as those legislators who sit apart devising laws may think. Making laws and enforcing them are vastly different things. By this ordinance you would change much arbitrarily, but when some of the reforms have already been put into practice it will be easy to pass the law. Legislation is a great, noble, comprehensive thing, and can not be successful without the spirit of God, for which we must humbly pray. Moderation is necessary; after customs are rooted, laws will follow of themselves.

Wanted: Descendants of the Kings

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Can anyone of your readers put me in touch with descendants of Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. King, American residents of Hongkong, China, 1837-1845? King may have been a member of the firm of King and Talbott or of the firm of Talbott Olyphant and Company of New York. In 1837 King aided Dr. Peter Parker, S. Wells Williams, and Dr. Karl Gutzlaff in a voyage in the Morrison from Macao to Tokio, Japan. He probably died on the Indian Ocean September 27, 1845, while on his way home. Because of his interest in early missionary enterprises in the Orient I seek a sketch of his life.

The Corrosive Season

By LYNN RIGGS

We will need even these stumps of cedar,
The harsh fruit of the land.
Our thirst will have to be slaked, if at all, by this thin
Water on the sand.

If we have demanded this corrosive season
Of drought, if we have bent
Backward from the plow, asking
Even less than is sent,

Surely we may be no bitterer
Than the shrunk grape
Clinging to the wasted stem
It cannot escape.

First Glance

THE opinion which any given reader of "Anthony Comstock: Roundsman of the Lord" (A. & C. Boni: $3) forms of the Great Purifier will depend upon that reader's feeling with regard to the spectacle of ignorance. Ignorance can be either pathetic or terrible, either saddening or maddening; and so Comstock must seem. For there can be no doubt as to the depth of his ignorance. The authors of the book, Heywood Broun and Margaret Leech, know and say that he was an old fool but appear at the same time to have developed a sort of sympathy for him as they went along. And I must confess that I too found him touching. I am appalled at the amount of damage he did—and I am not referring to anything so concrete as the fifteen sinners whom he boasted he had driven to suicide, or the three publishers whom he worried to death and of whom he said that "the world is better off without them." I am thinking rather of the awful advantage gained through him by the dogma of purity—the stench of his clean existence is strong in my nostrils. I am appalled. And still I feel for the farmer boy whose grotesque and probably pathological sense of sin stained the pages of his early diary, the grown man who found no outlet for his great energies save in reading bad books and in raiding evil establishments, the crusading censor who kept an uncouth, plaintive record of his deeds in the name of the Lord, the old warrior who discovered that the world had left him a little behind, fumbling with things it had begun to suspect were not so important after all. I am impressed, that is to say, by the reality of the portrait which Mr. Broun and Miss Leech have so excellently and so patiently drawn—and which, incidentally, the Literary Guild of America has chosen to distribute in the first of its books to go forth.

Anthony never knew the difference between an artist and a mad dog; quacks, abortionists, postcard-mongers, socialists, and poets were all alike in his zealous eyes—the zeal was the thing. He never knew that pornography is not important, and that it may be delightful. He never knew the reason for his passion to "protect" the weak and the young from "dangers" his own weakness and incurable infantilism could not help him to dismiss. He never knew what was the matter with him. He never spent a moment in reflection on his brand of Christianity, on his definition of the noble life, on his conception of "the Master's work." Surely he is one of the most ignorant of all men who have become famous; and the authors of the present biography have done well to lay that ignorance bare while they told the story of his rise to power.

The book is so rich in documents that it becomes among other things a piece of American social history. Newspapers and magazines have been searched for cartoons to illustrate and articles to interpret the evolution of public opinion regarding Comstock. He was of course enormously respected by those who also were clean—and these made up the majority. But I am interested to see how often he was understood. He was regularly ridiculed by Life; some one called him "an illiterate puppy"; and many knew him for the agent of indecency he essentially was. Mr. Broun and Miss Leech have managed, too, to sketch rather fully, and often most engagingly, certain contemporaries of Comstock who played principal parts in the drama. The episode of Victoria Woodhull, Tennessee Claflin, and George Francis Train—the work of Miss Leech, who on the whole is better at narrative than her collaborator—is nothing less than a masterpiece. In general the book is complete and penetrating; that it is painful is not the fault of Mr. Broun and Miss Leech.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Business of Books

The Truth About Publishing. By Stanley Unwin. By Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

THERE are few people in the literary world—authors, publishers, booksellers, critics, and their brethren of the magazines and the journals—who should not be interested in Mr. Stanley Unwin's analysis of the business of publishing books. Let us take the authors first, for without them it is unnecessary to state there would be neither booksellers, critics, nor publishers. The immense business of issuing and selling books rests on the industry of this gay and charming group of people who are blankly ignorant, for the most part, of modern publishing practices.

An author who has spent two years in the gestation of his manuscript will abandon it into the hands of a publisher as a foundling is dropped on a doorstep, without knowing what care or brutality will be used toward it afterward. When he (or more often she) uses any apparent discrimination, it is often founded on the flimsiest reason; because he has met an agreeable fellow, a publisher's reader, at a literary tea; because he has recently seen a "best seller" extensively advertised by a certain house; or because he has admired an attractively spaced title page. Mr. Unwin's book should teach him what duties he might reasonably expect from his publisher, and on the other hand it might induce him to believe that the house which he has chosen is not a philanthropic institution or a den of Shylocks, and also that no group of men is endowed with miraculous powers in inducing the public to buy a book it does not want.

Any publisher may read Mr. Unwin's volume with profit, because he will find the chapters on the financial end of his business sound and it will stimulate his imagination, if he has any, in the discovery of new ways to sell his books. It will present to him in concrete form every detail of his business which time and success have made almost a reflex action in the processes of his work. The book certainly will not lessen the flood of young men and women who, having edited or written for college papers, turn every spring toward the publishing houses of New York, Boston, or Philadelphia in the hope of being allowed to read unsolicited manuscripts at twenty dollars a week, since Mr. Unwin proves over and over again the great fascination of a business which is founded on the distribution of ideas and of culture, on romance, and on what art may lie in the printed word.

Obviously, since this is an English work, there are many passages which do not refer to America or which need more elaboration than the American editor's footnotes permit. The art of advertising books is far more highly developed in this country, as anyone can see who compares the London Times Literary Supplement with the Book Review of the New York Times. There is likewise in England no parallel for the immense concern with the reviewing of books which is displayed by the newspapers and magazines of this country, what with the syndicated reviews of metropolitan critics, the publishers' canned "blurbs," and the thousand columns of space devoted to books every week. Nor does the book take into sufficient account for an American audience the smaller overhead and selling costs of the English publisher, which circumstance enables him to make a slight profit with books which the publisher on this side of the Atlantic could bring out only at a loss.

It is to be regretted that Mr. Unwin has not added a chapter on the public, which is, after all, the most direct concern of any publisher; the freakish, miserly, and often absurdly generous public that in this country will refuse its dollars for a book that half the critics from the Golden Gate to the East River have lauded as a masterpiece, while for no logical reason it rushes to buy a book that is in no critic's good repute. Its whims can be charted, nevertheless, and it is too bad that Mr. Unwin has not done so for the benefit of American merchants of book publicity. In England the circulating library has a far greater hold on the reading public than it has here, which necessarily limits the sale of new books; there is also little hope over there of reaching, with an extremely intelligent book, the broader public which enables the author to buy country houses and motor cars. Everyone knows that Mr. Wells and Mr. Bennett make most of their money in America; on the other hand, it is not conceivable that in England a "Story of Philosophy" could sell one hundred thousand copies, or that Mr. E. M. Forster's admirable "A Passage to India" could find half as many buyers there as it attained over here.

If an American publisher of the same ability as Mr. Unwin were to try the same experiment, he would agree with him, I am sure, in every important particular. But I doubt if he would leave the reader with the feeling that a publishing business can ever be as standardized as the processes of a factory devoted to biscuits or automobiles. There are more chances for more profit in this buoyant land, more reverses, more delightful surprises, more people pathetically anxious to acquire the knowledge and culture that may be packed in the pages of a book.

OLIVER HARRISON

The Last of the Puritans

The Rebellious Puritan: Portrait of Mr. Hawthorne. By Lloyd Morris. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

HAVING had access to the voluminous unpublished portions of Hawthorne's journals and to a series of important letters known only in very small privately printed editions, Mr. Morris has made Hawthorne's own voluminous records of his life the chief materials for the present study. He has intruded himself as little as possible, he has skilfully worked his own comments into the stream of what seems to be Hawthorne's own confessions, and the result is something which gives the effect of an unusually intimate and revealing journal. "The Rebellious Puritan" is not only a fascinating and eminently readable book but probably the most illuminating study of Hawthorne the man which has yet been made.

Hawthorne was not, as the letters written to his future wife and here made public for the first time reveal, by any means incapable of passion. These letters, written to her during the course of a long engagement, glow with an intense desire, yet even that desire, the strongest of his life, was held sternly in check, and the general effect of Mr. Morris's book is to intensify the impression which Hawthorne has always given of a man whose impulses were frozen at their source. Whatever the cause of this paralysis of the will—and Mr. Morris hints that it was some phenomenon of morbid psychology—it set him definitely apart from his race. His ancestors had all played active and appropriate parts in the life of their time. One had come to New England with Winthrop in 1630, another had condemned a Quaker woman to be whipped through the streets, another had pronounced the judgment of death upon a witch, and still another had sailed the sea in a Yankee ship. But this gift for whole-hearted participation had died out in Nathaniel. Though literature and reform had in his time replaced witch-burning and seafaring as the characteristic activities of New England, he could not give himself enthusiastically to either. In the literary society of London and the studios of Rome he was perhaps understandably an outsider, but he was hardly more a part of Concord or Salem. He looked on at Brook Farm, looked on at Abolition, and looked on at the whole Transcendental movement. Frigidly, not aggressively, skeptical there was no world to which he felt that he "belonged," and though he was no longer a Puritan he was not quite anything else.

To the very end he remained moralist enough to fulminate with what was for him a wholly unwonted heat against the indecency of the nude art which he saw in Italy, and he never could bring himself to that trustful acceptance of merely sensuous beauty which is necessary to the formation of any spiritual world not essentially Puritan. For this incapacity the society of New England was no doubt itself partly to blame. The culture which sprang up there was completely without any expression in sensuous forms. It had no experience with any beauty but the beauty of the mind; it transcended the world, the flesh, and the devil without ever having had any traffic with any of them, even in its history, except under those merely ugly forms which a sternly repressed society permits. One and all, from mere eccentrics like Ripley through Margaret Fuller and even Emerson himself, there was something abstract and attenuated about the wisdom of the New England sages because they were so terribly intimate with God and the universe without knowing much of either man or the world. Emerson boasted that he was capable of all sins, but (as has been said before) he flattered himself. And the proof that all New England was like him is to be found in the fact that the doctrines which they heard preached had singularly little effect upon their conduct. Thoreau disseminated anarchy and Emerson preached that complete antinomianism which in other countries has been the occasion of the wildest license, but New England was no less orderly or virtuous than before. Inherent in the injunction to express one's nature is an invitation to all lusts, but though firebrands were scattered indiscriminately in every corner, New England proved singularly incombustible; its apostles of nihilism lived exactly like the Congregational ministers from whom they had sprung. Not a few were aghast at Margaret's rash marriage, and Nathaniel, sympathetic analyst of the dark places of the soul, was shocked by a naked woman in marble.

Of all the group only Melville—and Melville as well as the rest appears briefly but vividly in Mr. Morris's pages—was other than essentially innocent. He had been to the South Seas, he knew more than the rest about certain aspects of that nature concerning which they talked so glibly, and he alone seemed ever to feel in himself the explosive force of the ideas which were so innocently bandied about. In all New England Hawthorne's was the soul most nearly akin to his, but even Hawthorne shook his head, puzzled and distressed by the spectacle of so active a tumult. Sin was his own chosen subject, but he did not wish to come to as close a grip with it as Melville had done. It appealed to his fancy but not to his imagination; in his treatment of it there was always present an element of the fantastic, a suggestion of the arabesque, a playfulness which belongs to the danse macabre rather than to the mightier works of the imagination. His works represent, in a measure, an escape from reality into the world of fancy, and that is at once their charm and their limitation. Hawthorne was himself never near enough to sin to understand it completely.

When he had reached the last period of productive activity he asked, apropos of "The Marble Faun": "Is sin then . . . merely an element of human education, through which we struggle to a higher and purer state than we could otherwise have attained? Did Adam fall that we might ultimately rise to a far loftier paradise than his?" The very form of the question is still Puritan; another might have asked simply if any life to which no experience not innocent had ever made any contribution could be other than lacking in a certain richness and a certain resonance; but Hawthorne was getting close to the secret of his own sense of isolation and sterility. The Puritan discipline had provided him with a heavier armor against sin than he ever had occasion to need. Life did not even tempt him.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Hungarian Rhapsody

Alpha. By Emery Balint. Translated from the Hungarian by Louis Rittenberg. Macy-Masius, Publishers. $2.

THERE is no more dangerous, and—if successful—profitable venture for a novelist than a foray into that hinterland of the mind of which our consciousness is merely the capital. Not an officially conducted tour with some psychological Baedeker in hand, nor a feverish gallop on the nightmare of fancy, but a relaxed stroll through the byways of a realm with which we are in daily contact. Apparently this is a difficult feat. We have plenty of convincing portraits and landscapes of consciousness; but when it comes to the unconscious there is either the most unrestrained romanticism or a set of clinical blue-prints which are as individualized as anatomical manikins. Of the former De Maupassant is a fair example. So inbred is this literary attitude in him that on the brink of insanity he produces a piece of romanticism like "The Horla." There are of course notable exceptions—artists like Dostoevsky and Hamsun (to whose "Hunger" Emery Balint's novel might pertinently be compared), who are at home in both worlds, and can steer their characters back and forth from the conscious to the unconscious without reducing them to phantoms or symbols. But reminder seems to be needed now that "the unconscious" is not a void to be filled in as one likes with the shards of shattered syntax.

In view of this fact, and apart from its other merits, "Alpha," the first of Emery Balint's trilogy (the succeeding volumes are Beta and Gamma), is a creditable achievement. Balint has succeeded in tracing the complex flux of thought under the cracked crust of consciousness, and coming out with sentences intact except for a liberal scattering of dots. He has kept in sight that insanity is not a disintegration of the mind but rather a reintegration in a looser, more complicated form than the conventionalized pattern called sanity. Steadily the porous exterior of Alpha, the young painter, is broken in by the contradictions of a civilization which his easy-going nature is too weak to force into arbitrary unity. Thereafter his raw uncovered soul drifts helplessly against the jagged realities of life which the conventions of sanity soften for most of us. Love, sex, art, religion, war are swallowed whole, and vomited forth again in one strange spew which is an unanalyzed but faithful specimen of the post-war nausea of Europe. But it is a work not without its beauty. Balint has caught the caprice of dreams, and the coordinated chaos of his book is largely woven together with their fluctuating, colored strands. Buoyed up by them for a while, the soul of Alpha flows back and forth between two inimical realities—the reality of his inner world and the reality of the world without—until he is crushed between the two. The final touch of the imaginary Christ, who comes down from the cross to save the paranoic Alpha from the pitchforks of the peasants whose barns he has fired, feels too much like a tacked-on "happy ending"; but it is to be forgiven in a work which is otherwise so uniformly convincing.

ALTER BRODY

Something New in Outlines

The New Universe. An Outline of the Worlds in Which We Live. By Baker Brownell. D. Van Nostrand Company. $4.

THE sub-title of this book is misleading. It is not just another "outline" like those sometimes brilliant, but almost always futile, stories of everything that assume an ignorant reader at the beginning and make him feel kicked and spit upon at the end. It is true that it has been built out of the material of a survey course for upper-classmen at Northwestern University, but it is, in spite of that, "a tune for the universe . . . a poem on things in general," and there is light and humor in its pages. It is something new both in literature and in college instruction.

A poem, regardless of its subject matter, ought to disclose two things at least, an idea and a person that loves and respects the idea. But when the subject is "the new universe" and the writer a university professor, disappointment would not be surprising. The idea will somehow have to be exorcised from the body or bodies of science, or possibly caught on the wing and delicately attached to it. The professor will have to be careful not to sit too complacently in his chair; he will have to be just a little mad. This book fulfils these criteria to a degree and the result is a not impossible Weltanschauung.

The idea is a happy one, taken from the oldest lore in the world and revived in surprisingly modern costumes. It is the idea of fire, the fire that moves in the vibrating atom, the fire that burns in the living organism, fire that flashes out in the values we call spiritual. These are Mr. Brownell's decent translations of the "electricity," "metabolism," and "consciousness" of college classroom discourse, and he uses them without succumbing with the emergent evolutionists to the temptation of seeing some scientific god in the burning bush. Fire always has expressed more adequately than most metaphors the poetic aspect of scientific objects, and Mr. Brownell has used it without self-conscious affectation. He may not even know that he has used it.

There are weak places in the book, especially when it deals with man's social life; the account then drops to the level of a series of newspaper editorials on current problems. It is interesting to note that the fire metaphor disappears in these places. One can hardly blame the writer for not being able to carry it through these shadowy realms, but a mediating term might be suggested. The anthropological theory of mores, social rituals, and customs with their invention and diffusion suggests the secret start and relentless devouring of forest and prairie fires. One does well to omit the torch of civilization, it seems.

But in spite of shortcomings of this sort, there is here the beginning of a literary job that will surely be continued, that is, the poetic assimilation of our raw scientific culture. It needs the philosophic detachment and sophistication expressed in the last chapters of this book to carry it through. This is another way of saying that Mr. Brownell is not a philosopher of the professorial chair, at any rate as he writes. He himself has some of the flare and whimsicality of his beloved fire. One would like to know him.

Some scientifically minded people will be shocked at this book and at any approval of it. Let them be warned that it is not a textbook on science, nor a popularization, in the ordinary sense, of laboratory rituals. Nevertheless it does no harm in ignoring the cause of culture and civilization and talking to the individual interestingly—sometimes beautifully, with humor rather than sentimentality—about things in general. It is not a great poem, but I think I can see some of Walt Whitman and a great deal of Carl Sandburg in it, and there are suggestions for some aspiring young Lucretius who wants to see in one clear vision this sorry scheme of things entire that we call the universe.

SCOTT BUCHANAN

A Good Book on Newspapers

Main Currents in the History of American Journalism. By Willard Grosvenor Bleyer. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

DR. BLEYER has written an excellent book, one of the very best on modern journalism. It stands out amid the never-ending flood of newspaper books by reason of its thoroughness, its worth-while and sound judgments. It does not pretend to be a history of American journalism, but it is a better, and in some respects more comprehensive, volume than others that claim to cover the whole field. Anyone who has read Dr. Bleyer's book will not only have the background which the author supplies by his chapter on early English journalism but a clear-cut picture of the rise of the metropolitan daily from its colonial beginnings to the great organization of today. The chapter on the rise of the political-party press from 1800-1833 is exceptionally comprehensive, while Dr. Bleyer's sketches of Godkin (and the story of The Nation), Greeley, the Bennetts, Raymond, Bowles, Dana, Nelson, Pulitzer, and Hearst are remarkably accurate and judicial. If the author rarely gives his own opinions, he cites critics and admirers alike of those of whom he treats.

As is plain from the above Dr. Bleyer confines himself chiefly to New York City journalists. One misses the story of Joseph Medill and Henry Watterson, for example, and one regrets that so discriminating an historian has not included a chapter on the Abolition press, or touched on the great part played by the weekly newspaper. Perhaps these will be forthcoming in a future volume.

An Old Man's Folly. By Floyd Dell. George H. Doran Company. $2.

Nathaniel Windle was born in the fifties, married unromantically, and lived conventionally, and did not taste adventure until his declining years brought him in contact with radicals, peace societies, and protestors against the established social order. Mr. Dell admits to a "preoccupation with Mr. Windle's soul," and hastens over the early stages of his history in order to "get to his great adventure." Somehow one is led to suspect that the novelist knew this Mr. Windle in actual life, and has relied too greatly upon that fact. He is an unconvincing figure superimposed bodily upon a novel, by a process somewhat like that of the "transfer pictures" with which schoolboys decorate the backs of their hands. Most of the characters partake of the same unreality, and while one does not actively disbelieve in them, they are only remotely alive, like persons whose names are frequently in the newspapers.

A Man Could Stand Up. By Ford Madox Ford. Charles and Albert Boni. $2.50.

The third volume of what will eventually be a tetralogy. The account of the last few tense weeks of the war, as they react on the tory detachments of Tietjens, Mr. Ford's well-known hero, are inferior in power to similar war scenes in "No More Parades"; but in suggesting the almost horrifying psychology of relief which accompanied the eleventh of November, 1918, Mr. Ford is finely effective. The general importance of Mr. Ford's books (which have been much overrated by ex-

THE ANCIENT LOWLY

By C. OSBORNE WARD

A History of the Ancient Working People from the Earliest Known Period to the Adoption of Christianity by Constantine.

Unique in that it deals not with kings and battles, but with the life of the obscure millions who did the work of the world while ancient empires rose and fell. THE ANCIENT LOWLY is the result of a life-time of research; it is a pioneer history of labor. The author's conclusions are startling, but they are supported by an imposing mass of evidence. citable reviewers) is that his dryly intellectual method of conveying the horror (and boredom) of warfare brings home that horror and that boredom to those highly intelligent people who remain unmoved before the agonizings of Latzko and the romantic shrillness of Barbusse. Perhaps this is merely equivalent to saying that Mr. Ford is a belated but valuable propagandist.

Kyra Kyralina. By Panait Istrati. With an Introduction by Romain Rolland. Translated from the French by James Whitall. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Panait Istrati is the son of a Greek smuggler and a Rumanian peasant woman. Five years ago he tried to kill himself. On his recovery he was urged by Romain Rolland to write stories. In 1917 he knew no French, but on excellent authority it is said that he writes good French. In this book he tells three adventures from the life of Stavro, rogue, vagabond, and poet. The background is the Balkans and Asia Minor. Certainly in these years it is a relief to read stories which involve no aspect of modern psychology and present no system of curing human motives. M. Istrati has not written another "Arabian Nights." He has color and life and rhythm and tragic drama, yet it is all too thin and sketchy.

Shadows Waiting. By Eleanor Carroll Chilton. The John Day Company. $2.50.

Dealing with the subtly fatal influence dead ancestors can exert on a pair of star-crossed lovers, "Shadows Waiting" is called by the author a melodrama of the intellect; and, whether or not the designation is accurate, it is undeniable that the story has hardly a trace of action. The tempo, in fact, has been retarded almost to the point of sluggishness. The tale develops in a half-lit world of mental fantasy, sown thickly with a thousand shadows, in which memories of the dead are meant to be as potent and actual as the figures of the living lovers. Many readers will find this novel quite beautiful; to others it may appear beautiful but dull.

Moving Pictures

"Metropolis"

HOLLYWOOD lives for money and sex. It borrows or buys its art. It is the Germans who are the perpetual adventurers in the cinema. They gave the camera its stripling mobility, its restless imagination. They played with lights in the studio and achieved innumerable subtleties in the use of black and white as a medium. Even in their scientific miniatures they have worked with a virtuoso camera. And it was the Germans who injected fantasy into the cinema.

"Metropolis" (Rialto Theater), for all its thesis and its subtitular dialectic compounded for American comprehension by the enlightened Channing Pollock, is much more akin to the romantic vagaries of "Siegfried" than to the realities of "The Last Laugh." For Fritz Lang, who directed both "Siegfried" and "Metropolis," is not a cinema radical. Like Murnau in "Faust" he thinks in terms of sheer visual beauty, composition, and group rhythms rather than of dynamics. He is still of the theater of Reinhardt in the fluency of his groups and the rhythmic progression of his pageant. Although Carl Freund, the camera man for "The Last Laugh" and "Variety," has worked here in the same capacity, "Metropolis" lacks cinematic subtlety. It is only in the "shots" of machinery in motion and in the surge of the revolutionists that it is dynamic. The camera is too often immobile, the technique that of the stylized theater.

Yet here for the first time the chill mechanized world of the future, which only barely revealed itself in "R. U. R.," has been given reality. Here is the city, that tormented circus of buildings which touch the sky, of tunnels that disrupt the places under the earth. Through the air man has hurled his

RHAPSODY

A Dream Novel—by

SCHNITZLER

Schnitzler

AFTER a ball a Viennese physician lives over again the whole circle of the loves he might have had. Women lure him with the intoxication of adventure, so that he almost forfeits his own wife because of an infidelity she herself had dreamed. "Readers of the novelettes of Arthur Schnitzler, such as 'Beatrice', 'Fraulein Else' and 'None But The Brave', will expect much from this new 'Rhapsody' and will not be disappointed. Its subtitle is 'a Dream Novel' and it is a story wherein reality and dream are so subtly blended that one is never certain which is which."

Schnitzler's novels, tales and dramas are so many boxes containing a fragrant, delicately bitter compound which is three parts charm and two parts disillusioned romanticism. This most recent story is no exception.

obstructions, his bridges and traffic ways. Yet only the machines seem real; gigantic purring gods grinding down life. Machines, machines, machines, sliding through the earth, challenging the cosmos, pounding out human resistance as they set the awful tempo of life.

There is no loveliness here, except in the gardens of the rich, high above the levels of the city, where space and light are not mortified for efficiency. Below the surface of the earth the workers and their children crawl through a timed eternity, strapped to the dynamos like so many numbered robots. There is no rest, no beauty, no life below the gardens of the higher levels. Man is inanimate. Life is metronomic. It is only the machines that are alive. The machines and the careless children of "Brains."

As Lang has directed it, "Metropolis" is more stylized fantasy than realism. Even in the torrentous revolt of the workers as they pour through the machine-rooms, alive, demoniacal, there is an air of unreality. This is not revolution as the Russians stage it. It has neither taste nor smell. Yet it is magnificent. Even the most careless groupings are beautifully composed. Lang is too much the artist to deny the imagination.

"R. U. R." was a satire, but "Metropolis" is utterly devoid of humor. Thea von Harbou, its author, wrote it originally as a novel and then adapted it to the screen. Only her concept of Metropolis itself is intellectual. The rest is sentimental symbolism. There is no individualization within the type. Her persons are puppets. There is the Capitalist, his Son, Mary the spiritual leader of the workers, et al. The Son is the eternal mediator who, with the help of the woman Mary, although only after a revolution intervenes, brings "brains" and "brawn" together for the final fade-out.

Perhaps it is because of its original form that "Metropolis" lacks concision. One of the most interesting episodes of the entire film is that in which the inventor transmits the shape and likeness of Mary to the woman of his creation by encircling bands of electricity, yet it is only partially developed. The robotess, or creature of human invention, breeds revolution and is stoned by the mob, but the formula which gave her life is never mentioned again. The inventor is himself hurled from the cathedral roof by the blond and shining John, the hero; but what of the formula?

It is Metropolis itself, the city of domed basements and curving machine-rooms, of massed buildings that conceal the sky, of aeroplanes that ply their corner-to-corner traffic, of trains that seem to shoot into unmeasured and untracked space, that makes Fritz Lang's film so significant.

EVELYN GERSTEIN

Drama

Harlequinade

IT is, I think, a sound principle of aesthetics that though old forms are never successfully revived they are often rediscovered. The spirit of even the aesthetic antiquarian is fatally remote from the spirit of the artist, and he never succeeds in doing more than galvanizing into a ghastly semblance of life the dead body of an art form. With the genuine artist, however, it is different. In search of the new he not infrequently reevolves the old, and though he is often scornfully indifferent to traditions he unwillingly illustrates their valid persistence.

These somewhat solemn reflections are suggested by Mr. John Howard Lawson's modernistic farce "Loud Speaker" (Fifty-second Street Theater), and suggested not at all because it is a solemn work but because he has reached by a devious route leading through Berlin and Moscow the nearest approximation yet seen in New York of the spirit of the Commedia dell' Arte. Hundreds of solemn pages have been written about the gaiety of the Harlequinade and not a few solemn attempts have been made to revive it. We have been enjoined to laugh recklessly at the reckless pranks of Renaissance buffoons and we have been asked to admire the dramatic virtues of the fixed comic type who disports himself in an improvised play; yet no performances have been more "literary" in the worst sense of the word and none further removed from any genuine spontaneity. Now comes Mr. Lawson, whose name has been associated with the most revolutionary type of drama and who undoubtedly thinks of himself far more as an interpreter of the "machine age" than as in any way connected with the aspirations of the more gently aesthetic prophets of the theater, but who nevertheless conceives a completely modern and yet completely genuine Commedia dell' Arte. He constructs upon the stage a maze of elevated platforms and a dizzy series of stairways, he plants a jazz band upon one airy platform, and he sets a number of fantastic caricatures of modern types—the politician, the flapper, the tabloid reporter, etc.—to chasing one another upstairs and down through the course of an all but plotless fantasia. What could be more desperately modern and what could be at the same time nearer to the spirit of the Commedia dell' Arte, not as that spirit is seen by wistful aesthetes through the mists of time but as it was seen by those to whom it was merely popular entertainment?

Mr. Lawson's characters are not in the ordinary sense of the word characters at all. To anyone not familiar with modern life and modern satire his politician, for example, would be as meaningless as Punch. Neither is his plot in an ordinary sense a plot. When, for example, his flapper takes a few jazz steps with one of the men-servants and when the politician goes into conference with two papier-maché dummies, neither action has any meaning except in connection with a definite stage tradition. Yet exactly the same thing was true in the case of the Commedia dell' Arte. A long tradition of satire had established certain comic types, the general nature of their exploits was fixed in the spectator's mind, and the problem of the performer was to put the character through amusing variations upon his regular routine. "Loud Speaker" is probably the first play to take advantage of the fact that certain characters like the flapper and the politician have reached the point where they may be successfully stylicized and used as puppets.

No hocus-pocus surrounds the play. It was not, I take it, intended to be profound or particularly significant of any esoteric thing. It is, however, intended to be amusing, and amusing it will be to any person who has the simplicity of mind to enjoy it simply. It is no more intellectual than a vaudeville act, and yet a considerable number of the same people who are highly entertained by the antics of the tramp comedian in a burlesque show who is invited to the duchess's house party will object to the comedy of "Loud Speaker" because the action is so fantastic and so improbable.

Zoe Akins's "Thou Desperate Pilot" (Morosco Theater) contains one shrewdly drawn character—that of the hard-headed little adventuress—but the play as a whole is absurdly high-hat. The scene is "a casino in France," the people all either frightfully rich or frightfully aristocratic, and everybody comports himself as if he were trying to live up to a movie-director's ideal of the haut-monde. "Crime" (Eltinge Theater) is a crook play with some unusually ingenious thrills.

International Relations Section

A Soviet Rebuke to England

THE Soviet note to Great Britain in reply to the British note of February 23 threatening to break off relations with the Soviet Union was handed to the British Chargé d'Affaires in Moscow on February 26. While the British note was printed in full in many American papers, only garbled summaries of the Russian reply were cabled. We reprint it from the London Times of February 28.

SIR: The Soviet Chargé d'Affaires ad interim in Great Britain has transmitted to me telegraphically the note signed by Sir Austen Chamberlain, the Foreign Secretary, which was handed to him on the 23rd instant and published on the same day in the British press.

The note begins by stating the quite unquestionable fact of the existing unsatisfactory relations between Soviet Russia and Great Britain. The unsatisfactory character of these relations Sir Austen Chamberlain attempts to explain in his note, as he so often did in public speeches in Parliament and outside, by alleged infringements on the part of the Soviet Government of obligations undertaken regarding Great Britain in the domain of propaganda. The note cites textually the agreement signed by the Soviet Government on June 4, 1923, to the effect that the Soviet Government undertakes not to support with funds or in any other form persons or bodies or agencies or institutions whose aim is to spread discontent or foment rebellion in any part of the British Empire, and to impress upon its officers and officials the full and continuous observance of these conditions.

During the three and a half years which have elapsed since the signing of the said agreement the British Government has repeatedly addressed to the Soviet Government directly and through public statements reproaches of alleged infringements of the said agreement. Rejecting these charges, the Soviet Government has always demanded that they should be based on some definite instances. In violation of the obligation undertaken in the same year, 1923, on behalf of the British Government by Lord Curzon, the then Foreign Secretary, immediately to bring to the cognizance of the Soviet Government supposed instances of infringement of obligations, not allowing such cases to accumulate without making charges (Lord Curzon's telegram of May 29, No. 127), the British Government has heretofore preferred to make general wholesale reproaches to the Soviet Government, never giving details, except in one case, when, during the general election in Great Britain in 1924, there was made an unsuccessful attempt to corroborate an accusation by reference to the well-known and so-called "Zinoviev letter" of the then president of the Executive Committee of the Communist International.

The Soviet Government, though immediately declaring that it could not assume responsibility for the actions of an international organization which was directed and controlled by delegates of the Communist parties of various countries, in view of the special political role which the latter might play, agreed to submit it to any expert examination and accept the decision of any arbiter. The fact that the British Government declined the proposal of the Soviet Government could not be understood otherwise than as the withdrawal of the accusation, and since then the forgery of the letter has evoked no more doubts from anyone, including Labor circles, holding power in England when the accusation was proffered.

Thus, the only definite charge was based on a faked document, the so-called "Zinoviev letter." At the same time none of the persons who misinformed the British Government was punished, although that forged letter at one time created a threat to peace and strained to the utmost the relations of the two states and left its mark on the whole subsequent development of Anglo-Soviet relations.

With reference to the agreement of June 4, 1923, Sir Austen Chamberlain, in the entire text of the note, does not adduce a single instance of the infringement by the Soviet Government of this agreement—namely, there was not a single instance of "spreading discontent or fomenting rebellion in any part of the British Empire."

The British Government's note only enumerates a series of public utterances by Soviet leaders in Russia and newspaper articles in the Soviet press. I must, therefore, mention the fact that between the Soviet Government and Great Britain there exist no agreements limiting the freedom of speech or of the press within the frontiers of the two countries. Just as the British Government did not undertake the obligation on behalf of its citizens to praise or not to criticize the social and political order of the Soviet state, so the Soviet Government undertook no obligation on behalf of its citizens that they should praise or not criticize the social and political order of Great Britain and the capitalist countries generally.

The Trade Agreement of 1921, of the infringement of which the Soviet Government has also been repeatedly and without foundation accused, a clause dealing with propaganda binds the two parties only to "refrain from hostile actions or undertakings against the other party, and from conducting outside its own borders any official propaganda, direct or indirect, against the institutions of the British Empire or the Russian Soviet Republic."

To bring published or verbal utterances made within Soviet Russia within the scope of the agreement of 1923 or the agreement of 1921 is an arbitrary extension of the limits of these agreements.

I could produce numerous examples of the wide use and, unfortunately, most immoderate abuse of the right to engage in propaganda within Great Britain against the Soviet Government by members of the British Government. I will strictly limit myself to but a few examples. In his speech at Watford on June 20 Lord Birkenhead, Secretary of State for India, referred to the Soviet Government as "a gang of assassins and robbers" (the Morning Post, June 22, 1925). At a Conservative meeting at Tunbridge Wells, Mr. Churchill, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, attacking the British Socialists, declared: "Behind all this sinister and unwholesome movement stood the dark power of Moscow. There we had what we had never before, a band of cosmopolitan conspirators gathered from the underworld of the great cities of Europe and America in despotic possession of the still great resources of what was once a mighty and famous empire, Russia" (the Morning Post, November 30, 1925). At Bolton Mr. Churchill spoke of the Soviet Government as "dark conspirators in the Kremlin in Moscow" (the Daily Telegraph, June 22, 1926).

Similar attacks can be found in the utterances of Mr. Amery, the Colonial Secretary; Sir Samuel Hoare, Secretary for Air; Sir Laming Worthington-Evans, Secretary for War, and others, not to mention their supporters in the Conservative Party, such as Mr. A. T. Cook, who at the Conservative Conference at Scarborough on October 7, 1926, called the Soviet Government "a group of international murderers" (the Morning Post, October 8, 1926), Commander Locker-Lampson, Sir William Davison, and others.

Still sharper attacks against the Soviet Union abound in the press of the ruling Conservative Party every day, abusing Soviet institutions, the Soviet Government and its representatives in London, and spreading incredible and fantastic lies about the Soviet Union.

It must at the same time be observed that the British representatives in Moscow are enjoying the same diplomatic privileges as the representatives of other countries, and have never been subjected to insults or abuse on the part of the Soviet press, as were the representatives of the Soviet Government in London on the part of the British Conservative press. It is impossible to find either in the Soviet press generally or in the articles and speeches to which the British Government refers in its note any sharp attacks against Great Britain similar to those mentioned above. It is impossible to regard as anti-British propaganda such things as an analysis or estimate of the foreign policy of the British Government and its attitude toward the Soviet Union, or arguments by the principal party leaders about the inevitability of world revolution and the importance of the national revolutionary movement in the East, still less the ideas expressed by the People's Commissary of Public Health concerning the significance of physical culture from the viewpoint of the revolutionary labor movement or the appointment of Kamenev as Ambassador to Italy, which has nothing to do with Anglo-Soviet relations and was agreed to by the Italian Government. Within the limits of his party activity Kamenev has voiced his opinions concerning the tasks of his party.

Regarding the Izvestia, which is considered as the official organ of the Central Executive Committee, since in it all the decrees and decisions of the Government must be published, it may be said that this paper has one of the largest circulations and caters for hundreds of thousands of readers, who must be given all the information interesting to them, including manifestos and resolutions of the Soviet, as well as of party institutions. The office publishing this paper can no more accept responsibility for the contents of such kind of manifestos and resolutions than it can for reports which it prints of utterances and statements made against the Soviet Government, including the above-quoted speeches by British Ministers. Here again it must be repeated that the publishing within the Soviet Union of any reports of any verbal statement does not infringe any obligation undertaken by the Soviet Government whatsoever.

Particular dissatisfaction has apparently been caused the British Government by the opinions expressed by Soviet leaders concerning the anti-Soviet course of British policy in third countries. But with no less justification and foundation could be characterized as delusions the constant references made by the politicians and members of the British Government to the alleged omnipresence and omnipotence of so-called "Soviet agents," who are represented as being responsible for all or any difficulties in the British Empire in all parts of the world.

The Soviet Government deplores the unsatisfactory condition of the relations between Russia and Great Britain indicated in the British Government's note. It believes, however, that to explain these regrettable circumstances by mutual accusations and an unfriendly tone in the press of the two countries would be to take cause for effect and vice versa

The Soviet Government would likewise consider it incorrect and undignified to seek an explanation of these conditions in physiological or psychological characteristics of these or other British statesmen. It is inclined to believe that the abnormality of these relations consists not only in the fact that the representations made by the two countries do not correspond with the interests of the development of relations between Great Britain and the Soviet Government.

What also matters is that in its relations with the Soviet Union the British Government consciously infringes the usual international customs and even elementary decency. It periodically thrusts in the face of the Soviet Government indefinite and unfounded accusations, refusing even to discuss them; it avoids settling mutual claims and complaints either diplomatically or through special conferences, committees, or delegations; declining the usual diplomatic ways of settling conflicts, it permits itself to talk to the Soviet Government in the tone of threats and ultimatums; and lastly, it ignores the constitution of the Union of Soviet Republics, making insistent attempts in its notes to substitute party or even international institutions for the formal Government of the Union.

The same abnormality of relations is also expressed by the fact that the British Government in its note permitted itself an unheard-of and unprecedented tone toward M. Chicherin, the Soviet People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs. The position which the British Government has established with regard to the Soviet state encourages the hostile campaign which finds expression and the coarsely abusive statements in the British Parliament on the part of members of Parliament and even members of the Government and in the British press.

It must be added that the constant attempts by the British Government to minimize and even annul the importance of the fact of the restoration of diplomatic relations, together with the authoritative information possessed by the Soviet Government regarding the continued attempts by individual members of the British Government to come to an understanding with ex-Czarist diplomats and counter-revolutionary representatives working in favor of another insurrection will not allow public opinion in the Soviet Union to forget the role played by Great Britain in the first insurrection.

At the conclusion of his note, Sir Austen Chamberlain deemed it timely and fit to advance the threat of a complete rupture in commercial and diplomatic relations in the event of the Soviet Government not complying with the new demands which do not arise from the existing Anglo-Soviet agreements and the mutual formal obligations. In declaring that threats against the Soviet Government will have no intimidating effect upon anyone in the Soviet Union, the Soviet Government takes the liberty to express its firm conviction that the conclusion of the Trade Agreement in 1921 and the subsequent restoration of diplomatic relations corresponded to interests and necessities of the peoples of the Soviet Union as well as those of the British Empire. If the present British Government believes that the rupture of Anglo-Soviet trade and all other relations is called for by the needs of the British people and will serve the British Empire and cause general peace, then, of course, it will act in a suitable manner, assuming full responsibility for the consequences.

On its part, the Soviet Government confirms that the statements of the late M. Krassin, quoted in the note of the British Government, concerning the desirability of removing all difficulties existing between the two countries and everything giving ground for mutual complaint and of establishing quite normal relations actually correspond to the immutable and sincere wishes of the Soviet Government. In accordance with the decision for peace of the toiling masses of the Soviet Union, which are in entire conformity with the same aspirations of the popular masses of Great Britain, the Soviet Government will in future also pursue its peace-loving policy, which excludes all aggressiveness toward other countries. It will welcome the British Government sincerely if it will go to meet it on this path.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

"GOD HAS MADE US NEIGHBORS, let justice make us friends. The first step toward justice is to stop making false and unfair statements about Mexico." Thus spoke William E. Borah, Senator from Idaho, to a gathering of 5,000 people under the auspices of the New Haven Trades Council. When Professor Jerome Davis of Yale declared that "he deserves the highest office which is in the power of the American people to grant" the audience cheered him to the echo—so the dispatches report. Borah's was a noble and stirring address, an appeal for righteousness toward our neighbors and a thorough smashing of the Bolshevist bogy. He told the exact truth when he said that if there had never been a Bolshevist revolution there would still have been the agrarian revolution and radical land laws in Mexico, and the great and increasingly successful Nationalist movement in China. He reminded his auditors that the revolution in Mexico began seven years before the collapse of the Czar's regime in Russia, and he was extremely sarcastic in his references to the use by strong governments of their armies and navies on the pretense of assisting weaker ones "to maintain free governments." We hope that this is the opening gun of a carefully planned campaign, and that Senator Borah will speak along similar lines in every State in the Union. Someone with intellectual standards, with a statesmanlike vision should puncture the follies of the Coolidge-Kellogg administration of our foreign affairs every day that Congress is out of session.

WHAT NEXT IN CHINA? The collapse of the Northern armies at Shanghai and Nanking marks a greater triumph for the South than any Chinese faction has won since the early days of Yuan Shih-kai's power. All China south of the Yangtze has fallen to the Nationalists, and unless they lapse into dissension at the peak of victory the other provinces of the great Eastern plain are sure to follow. The dying Northern capital, Peking, must in a few months follow the Yangtze cities. With new power come new problems. First, will the Nationalists, hitherto inspired by a gospel, be able to digest the mere militarists who will join them because of their victories? There are reports of an anti-Russian party within the Kuomintang—which means a party favoring the old kind of personal military dictatorship as opposed to group civilian rule. Second, what about the foreign settlements of Shanghai, which 20,000 fully equipped foreign soldiers defend from fortified positions well outside the foreign territory? There will, of course, be strikes and demonstrations within the settlements; there must be protests and negotiations for a change in the system of foreign autocratic government—but can they be carried to success without bloodshed? And, finally, with the British strongholds in China weakened, the Nationalists will have to turn new attention to the problem of Japanese domination of Manchuria.

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT read and debated in the House of Commons? Yes, that actually happened on March 17. The issue, so the dispatches read, was squarely presented whether Great Britain should not disarm altogether "and become the first real Christian nation." Arthur Ponsonby, admirable fighter for peace that he is, initiated the debate by moving that the British air force be done away with. The effect was remarkable. Although it was a private member's motion and not a government one, it took an entire day's debate to dispose of it. That only twenty-four members voted for it is no reason for discouragement. How many great and successful causes have polled fewer votes at the beginning? Even the Air Minister felt compelled to speak to the motion seriously and to bring up the old argument that one must first convert one's neighbors to good-will and peace. Incidentally a Labor member, William Shepheard, himself a veteran, who read the Sermon on the Mount in the historic precincts in which it has usually been flouted, dwelt upon the interesting fact that the foreigners who have been safest in China during all these troubles have been the Germans. The reason, he explained, was that Germany has no troops and no gunboats in China to "protect" her nationals and anger the Chinese.

STILL ANOTHER REMARKABLE SIGN of the growth of pacifist sentiment in England appears from the great victory won by Wilfred Wellock in the Stourbridge division by-election. This Labor candidate won his seat by a majority of 3,099 over his Conservative opponent. Mr. Wellock was a conscientious objector during the war and was imprisoned for his refusal to serve. His pacifist views were by no means hidden from the electorate; indeed, his opponent constantly stressed the fact that he refused to fight for his country during the World War. So far from hurting him this helped him and, in striking contrast to the attitude of most ex-service men in this country, his strongest supporters were veterans of the war. At one of his biggest meetings there were fifty former soldiers on his platform wearing their medals, and the presiding officer was a man who had won distinction at the front. The Chinese issue Mr. Wellock put squarely to the front and he denounced the Government for sending troops to China. Thereupon the opposition press declared that anyone who voted for Wellock would vote to leave British citizens unprotected in China. The vote showed clearly how eager the people are for brave anti-war leadership. In the previous election Wellock lost by 1,910 votes to his Conservative opponent. There was therefore a turn-about of just 5,000 votes in a single constituency. That speaks for itself and so does the fact that the town of Oldbury, the largest town in this constituency, has just done away with a tank and two German guns that were given to the city as souvenirs of the war. The citizens, it is explained, did not want to have them in sight.

MUSSOLINI CONTINUES TO PLAY the old diplomatic role with considerable skill. To solidify Italy's control of Southeastern Europe and checkmate the ambitions of Jugoslavia, he signed in December—with the apparent connivance of Great Britain—a treaty with Albania which guaranteed the "independence" of Albania and established in power his tool, Ahmed Zogu, under Italian protection. Since then Mussolini has won Rumanian support by confirming its seizure of Bessarabia, and has made friendly advances to Hungary and Bulgaria. Zogu is as unpopular as a despot and a puppet of a foreign "protector" is likely to be. A revolt against him was scheduled for April, but, according to a special dispatch in the New York Times, it is thought probable "that an early spring has advanced the date." The plot to oust him may have been hatching in Jugoslavia, just as the plot that put Zogu in power was hatched in Rome. Mussolini accuses Jugoslavia not only of encouraging revolution but of massing troops and making military preparations to assist the overthrow of Zogu and attack Italy's influence in Albania. Jugoslavia's counter-charges of Italian military activity are better supported. However much Jugoslavia might like to substitute a tool of its own for the Italian-made Zogu its chances would be slim in the face of Italy's power. Jugoslavia can only hope that its loud denial of aggressive intentions will persuade the world and the diplomats gathered at Geneva of its innocence and thus prevent Mussolini from intensifying his efforts in behalf of the "independence" of Albania and the Balkans.

FEDERAL COURTS are without funds to pay witness fees and jurors' expenses; veterans go without their pensions; alien property remains untangled—a thousand and one things go undone because David Reed of Pennsylvania, afraid of a continued investigation of Pennsylvania election scandals, filibustered in the dying days of Congress and defeated not only the investigation resolution but the Second Deficiency Bill and other pending legislation as well. We are likely to be reminded of this filibuster by other shortages of funds in the nine months of the Congressional recess; and it will be well if the country should recall that the cause is the fear of the Pennsylvania machine. The whole Administration machine is still loyally fighting to save his seat for William F. Vare. Senator Keyes of New Hampshire refused to authorize payment of expenses for transporting the ballot boxes from four disputed counties to Washington; and when Senator "Jim" Reed obtained private funds to pay expenses the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate refused to accept them. There is no method too petty for these Republican henchmen. And if it were not pathetic it would be amusing to recall that in the pre-primary campaign Senator David Reed, then opposed to Vare, denounced that gentleman almost as vigorously as Governor Pinchot, who declared that "the stealing of votes for Mr. Vare, and the amount and the sources of the money spent in his behalf make it clear to me that the election returns do not in fact correctly represent the will of the sovereign voters of Pennsylvania."

HISTORY IS SOMETIMES MADE when the reporters aren't looking. In those last frenzied days of the filibuster some bills did slip through. For instance:

> The bill (H. R. 10662) authorizing an appropriation for the construction of a roadway and walk leading to and around the Chalmette Monument, Chalmette, Louisiana.
> The bill (H. R. 3791) to purchase a painting of the several ships of the United States Navy in 1891 and entitled "Peace."

HARD ON TOP of the report of the Federal Trade Commission urging Congressional study of water-power and electrical combinations comes an appeal from Gifford Pinchot to the governors of all the States for the support of a movement to insure State and federal regulation of the operations of power corporations. In his letter Mr. Pinchot declares that the power trusts blocked the Boulder Dam and Muscle Shoals bills in the last Congress and warns the public against the domination of American life that would come with an uncontrolled monopoly of electric power. He dwells upon the fact that he is not an advocate of government ownership but adds that he favors both State and federal regulation since, as he puts it, electricity will soon count more in the life of the average man or woman than anything else except food or clothing. As we have regulated the railroads and the trusts, so we are called upon to regulate the great power companies. Well, there will be vital disagreements with him but it is a fine thing to have Gifford Pinchot devoting himself to that cause. The ex-Governor of Pennsylvania now has the opportunity, as an unofficial champion of such causes, to repeat his great services in the preserving of our natural resources.

THE EXHAUSTIVE REPORT of the Federal Trade Commission comes in response to the Norris resolution asking investigation of the power trust's interest in Muscle Shoals. The commission declares that

> In one instance less than a million-dollar investment in the majority of the voting stock of the apex holding company gave in 1925 full control of the entire organization of the group, having scores of underlying companies and several hundred million dollars of investment. Such pyramiding not only affects the financial stability of the electric-power industry but also has a potential relation to the more general question of an undue concentration of control of the electric-power industry.

The report deals extensively with the Electric Bond & Share Company, the General Electric Company group, the North American and Insull companies, the Stone & Webster, the Byllesby, the Hodenpyl & Hardy groups, the Doherty companies, the J. G. White group, and others. The power output has doubled every five years since 1902, the commission finds, and the total investment has grown from four and a half billion dollars in 1922 to eight and a half billions at the end of 1926. The commission does not find that there is yet a complete power trust, but it is obvious from its report that if these great groups or a majority of them should come together the country would be face to face with a financial combination of tremendous power and of great potential danger. As it is, the Federal Trade Commission, despite the fact that it is a Coolidge-dominated body, recommends the situation to Congress for immediate legislative consideration.

WATER-POWER SEEMS to make trouble even in unsettled regions. The hinterland of Labrador has for centuries been a mosquito-infested land which only salmon fishermen cared to investigate. Then the American Sunday papers began to exhaust more southern pulpwood forests, and water-power began to scramble into the troublesome place in public attention hitherto occupied by coal. Labrador's hinterland became a prize. The maps have always shown the up-country of Labrador as part of Quebec, while the documents declare that the "coast" is part of Newfoundland. But what is a "coast"? Newfoundland and Quebec began to dispute. And, apparently, others were interested. According to the perspicacious Canadian correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, the Liberal Government of Quebec has long been friendly to a group of power and pulp and paper interests in which the Mellon companies and the International Paper Company play a part, while a group of British capitalists, equally interested in pulp and power, found a warmer reception in Newfoundland than in Quebec. Hence, perhaps, the anger roused in Canada by the recent decision of the Judicature Committee of the Privy Council, the final court of appeal for the British Commonwealth. French Canadian papers do not hesitate to assert that the decision of this body, that the "coast" is the entire watershed east of the divide, was affected by the interest of "a few British magnates hungry for timber concessions"—chiefly the Rothermere interests.

NEVER, WE ARE SURE, has a greater compliment been paid to The Nation in the sixty-two years of this periodical's existence than that bestowed upon us by the faculty and students of Harvard University. The Crimson, having made a canvass within that institution, has discovered that The Nation ranks third on the list of weekly magazines in popularity among the Harvard students and faculty. Only the Saturday Evening Post and Liberty surpassed us in the esteem of the thinkers in our oldest American university. Advertising agencies and national advertisers will please take notice that in esteem, if not in circulation, we outrank the Ladies' Home Journal, the Pictorial Review, Vanity Fair, Judge, Life, and the Police Gazette. Who shall say hereafter that the highbrow student does not turn to highbrow publications? Henceforth we shall have no doubts as to the progress of the intellectual life among the Harvard undergraduates—not even when they call Princeton rough, decline to sing at glee-club contests, assault and are assaulted by the police, and generally act as a mysterious law unto themselves.

THE PERSISTENT MISREPORTING of the Chinese situation by Frederick Moore, correspondent of the New York Times, deserves notice. He did not like the Cantonese; therefore he announced that they were split by internal dissensions, and militarily weak. Here are samples from his Shanghai dispatches:

> March 1. There is no evidence of a prospective battle, and it is confidently believed in well-informed quarters that the customary negotiations have already begun.
> March 5. Continued reliable reports . . . support other indications that the Southerners have reached the end of their military capacities.
> March 6. Chang Tsung-chang's army is considered the best in China, excluding Chang Tso-lin's.
> March 7. Marshal Chang Tsung-chang, by movements of troops along the railways south of the Yangtze in Kiangsu Province, makes daily more secure the North's retention of Shanghai. . . . The Northern position militarily is incalculably the stronger and the Northern armies are regarded by foreign military attachés as indefinitely better than the Southern.
> March 9. Further facts and statements bear out the report that Chiang Kai-shek . . . the Southern commander-in-chief . . . does not intend to push military operations against Marshal Chang Tsung-chang's Nanking and Shanghai defenses.
> March 17. The coolest and best-informed foreigners still agree that Shanghai is unlikely to be taken by the Southern armies for many weeks, possibly months.

A cub reporter could hardly have been more brilliantly and consistently mistaken. About midnight on March 20 the Southern armies entered the native city of Shanghai.

"ELMER GANTRY" HAS BEEN BANNED from the Kansas City Public Library, which is not surprising in view of the fact that somehow the ministers of Kansas City, who trustingly lunched with Mr. Lewis every Wednesday and poured out their souls and creeds to his friendly ears, never suspected his fell purpose in questioning them. Now that the world knows all about it, they are properly shocked and surprised. Professor William Lyon Phelps of Yale is quoted as saying that there never was a minister like Elmer Gantry: "I know something of Baptist ministers. My grandfather and father were [and] . . . all my living brothers are Baptist ministers, and there has been a constant string of Baptist ministers walking through my house for years, and I have never known one like Elmer Gantry." Nobody doubts for a minute that this statement is true. But in order to keep Elmer Gantry, the character in fiction, quite separate and distinct from his brothers in life, the ministers in Kansas City ought to be careful not to copy Mr. Lewis's style of writing. Harcourt, Brace and Company quote advertisements from Kansas City papers last Sunday: "Sinclair Lewis's Vile Preacher Book"—this in bold black type. As an added attraction Grand Avenue Temple offered "Bob White—Big Basso; Ronald Ashburne—Little Boy Soprano." "Elmer Gantry was Drunk" was the headline of the announcement of the Linwood Methodist Church. How closely Mr. Lewis caught Kansas City's voice can be judged by Dr. Hargett's "Lenten Suggestions": "The old-timers say that both our morning and evening congregations are record-breaking. There must be a real reason for this. Wonder if it isn't to be found in the fact, not only of a growing city, but of a growing church in the heart of this growing city."

The British-American Alliance

THE Cantonese have taken the native city of Shanghai, and the Guaranty Trust Co., together with J. and W. Seligman & Co., have made a one-year million-dollar loan to the little Diaz "Government" in Nicaragua. As we write, fifteen hundred American marines in full war regalia, tin hats included, are policing the tumultuous streets of far-off Shanghai, and 5,000 more are on duty maintaining "neutral zones" in Nicaragua. Relations between the United States and Mexico are strained, and Mr. Kellogg is solemnly debating with himself and his cronies the advisability of lifting the arms embargo and inviting another revolution as a means of imposing our oleaginous will upon the Calles Government.

Shanghai is a long way from Mexico City or Managua, but a spark of sympathy binds the remote cities. Bolshevism? No, it is not Bolshevism which is making the whole world kin, but a common sense of the oppression of Anglo-American imperialism. As Senator Borah said in his New Haven speech: "Communism and Russian influence have no more to do with either the origin or execution of [Mexico's] policies than they have to do with the policies of our own government." Nor is there Bolshevism, in any special Russian sense, in China. There is, of course, a determination to break the ancient bonds which have fettered China's youth to a dead past, and a special passion to do away with those shackles which foreign nations have imposed upon China. But to assume that a few Russian agents with a few thousand dollars could turn the course of history is puerile. The Bolsheviks have undoubtedly sought to stir up revolution in a dozen different countries, but they have never yet made a revolution which would not have occurred without them. In Germany, Bulgaria, Poland, Esthonia they have failed. In China the revolution is still a rising tide, and the Russians have won prestige because instead of seeking to dam the rising tide of Nationalism they have swum with the current. Some of us regret that America did not have the vision to act as aid and abettor to a movement so like the struggle which gave our own country birth as a nation.

But there is a kinship between what is happening in China and what is happening in Nicaragua and Mexico, and it will be a pity if our statesmen and business men do not read the lesson. China has reached a riper stage in the history of empire. Time was—and not so long ago—when foreign nations could do in China what America is doing in Nicaragua today. They intervened, they lent money, they carved out spheres of influence, and took over the customs. We are but repeating the ancient story of imperialism. Encouraged by the State Department, a group of New York bankers are providing the funds to aid one party in Nicaragua to defeat the other. Diaz has been beaten in battle after battle. By his own admission he was unable to hold his post without aid from the American Government. He was without prestige and without funds; now our bankers give him the money with which to win prestige. Presumably the bankers' money will pay the DuPonts and the Remingtons and the others who will supply Diaz with guns and gunpowder. And when the shooting is over, what then? Diaz will still be incompetent; we shall have to help him hold power. The Marine Corps publicity department, which floods the country with stories of our beneficent rule in Haiti, will flood the country with feature picture-stories of our success in Nicaragua. A decade ago similar stories of the virtues of foreign "aid" to China still flooded the press of the entire Western world. Then—something happened in China. It will happen in the Caribbean, too. These people seem to us incompetent today—able only to eat bananas and write poetry. We will teach them, as we have taught the Chinese, how to organize, how to equip armies, how to fight. And in time they will turn our lessons against us.

It is natural that the British should be eager to help us embark upon the course of empire. Their great empire, stretched across the Seven Seas, is in process of disintegration. What is happening in China is the greatest blow which British prestige has suffered since the American Revolution. It shakes India; it imperils Hongkong, Singapore, Aden, Egypt, the Sudan and the Suez, Cyprus, Malta, Gibraltar—that entire chain of foreign fortresses over which the British imperial flag flies. If one colored people can throw the British out of its territory, cannot another? Perhaps, after all, there is nothing supernatural about the people of that little island off the West coast of Europe. But if the great young empire of the Western Hemisphere, rich America, the new marvel, the traditional friend of democracy and of oppressed peoples, can be brought to act like Britain and with Britain, a new prestige comes to the relief of the British Empire. No wonder, indeed, if the British are willing to send a warship to Nicaragua to help bolster up the Coolidge-Kellogg policy of aping British imperialism; no wonder if the British in China ask that we stand shoulder to shoulder to them in defense of white prestige.

Of course, the program is not set forth in such crass terms. The American people, dulled as they are today, would not permit so gross a betrayal of their ideals. So we are presented with the camouflaged scarecrow of world-wide Bolshevism. Wherever a people dares demand its freedom from foreign interference, that is Bolshevism. Wherever the universality of white empire is threatened, the threat is Bolshevism. Of course, we are all against Bolshevism. Thus the British-American alliance is cemented.

There is, as yet, no formal treaty of alliance. There are, probably, no documents recording the intimate collaboration. But the habit of cooperation with Great Britain has grown mightily since the days of the Washington Conference, when Britain, at our behest, denounced the British-Japanese alliance, assuredly not without expecting from America a quid pro quo. Joint action is not, necessarily, a bad habit; more than once in recent years British-American cooperation has been a force for sanity in European affairs (although today England is, unfortunately, acting as aide to Mussolini). Both nations want above all that peace without which profitable, orderly trade seems difficult. But collaboration, when it takes the form of aggressive imperialism, may be dangerous. America does not need to set herself against the new tides of national and race liberation. We do not believe that she wants to lead in that direction. Under the cloak of anti-Bolshevism, she is being pushed.

Students and Teachers

THE most interesting questions in education are questions as to the relation which shall exist between teacher and student. What shall be the attitude of the one to the other, and, once this has been decided, how shall the attitude be fostered? The best conception of the relationship has always been one which saw the instructor and the instructed as partners in a common enterprise—the benefits of the cooperation going chiefly, perhaps, to the younger partner, but going not altogether that way. In any wise scheme of education no teacher will ever be a positive sacrifice to the generation he is helping to bring up. He, too, will have his fun and his reward—and his education.

The Committee on Instruction at Harvard has made a recommendation to the several departments of the university which ought to mean much to students and faculty there. The plan—which incidentally is not compulsory, each department being free to ignore it—provides for a material shortening of the time in each term devoted to formal teaching. The committee has thought it inadvisable to reduce the term itself; but hereafter, in departments which accept the plan, "Instructors in charge of courses shall discontinue lectures, or other classroom exercises conducted by the instructor who is in charge of the course, during the interval between the Christmas recess (approximately two and a half weeks) and the mid-year examination period and during the interval between the second lecture period and the final examination period (approximately three and a half weeks)." Thus the lecturing year will be effectively reduced by six weeks for everybody except freshmen. Freshmen are not to be intrusted with this freedom.

The committee in its commentary upon the plan in a recent issue of the Harvard Alumni Bulletin emphasizes the advantages, to all good students at least, of the greater liberty, joined with a sense of greater responsibility to themselves, which they will now enjoy. We heartily agree. The tendency of the best modern education, not only at Harvard but elsewhere, has been for years to stimulate the undergraduate to independent thought and investigation. But these are luxuries, and like all luxuries they require leisure. The average institution, even where the stimulus has been provided and received, has by no means allowed the letter of its law to keep pace with the spirit. There have continued to be regulations, duties, schedules in excess of the intellectual need. At Harvard, as this committee points out, the new education by the very nature of its demand has led to a desire on the part of students for leisure in which to do the original and extended work their partners in the educational enterprise naturally expect of them. The present plan, which follows logically in the wake of the elective systems, the concentration requirements, the general examinations, and the tutorial system, is intended to grant that leisure; and we hope it will.

Equal emphasis, however, should be placed upon the leisure which the faculty itself will gain. The new education, which no doubt once seemed to many persons to be merely a dodge away from discipline, has actually added to the burdens of teachers. For the number of good students has increased, and everyone knows that, whatever else can be done with a live student, he cannot be dismissed with a gesture. "As the number and percentage of candidates for honors grows," writes Professor H. A. Yeomans, "alert undergraduates, in greater numbers and more eagerly, demand individual explanations from their course instructors and refuse to acquiesce unless convinced that the explanations are sound." So that professors have begun to need breathing space no less than students—and in this case will get it. One of the rules in the perfect university, whenever and wherever it is established, will provide for an abundance of empty space between the teacher and the taught. The two can never be bound together without great harm all around; it is not necessary, perhaps, to insist once more that a teacher can remain a good teacher only so long as he has time to read and think for himself. The company of even the best students will not be good enough for him always, since they are irremediably young.

The company of students has been well if excitedly characterized by President Wriston of Lawrence College, Wisconsin, in an address to the teachers of his State:

> There is danger in perpetual contact with immature minds. There is a tendency to lazy mental habits, a tendency to bluff, and a tendency to underpreparation. Your mind is not being stretched in discussion. People going into dangerous professions must develop their powers of resistance. So with the teacher. The teacher must develop his resistance by setting for himself intellectual tasks which demand all of his powers, by the development of a strong professional interest.

This is well put, and quite true. The only thing remaining to be said is that students such as Professor Yeomans has described cannot be so bad—indeed can be very good as intellectual company—and that it behooves the administrators of most colleges to give their teachers more free time than at present they have.

The Press and the Individual

WE sincerely trust that Mr. David Lawrence was incorrectly reported when he spoke to a group of school editors at a recent gathering at Columbia University. He was made to say that the American press was the best in the world and that none of its faults were of its own creation. So able a journalist as the head of the Consolidated Press Association, and the founder of that extremely useful publication, the United States Daily, can hardly have maintained the second thesis even if he uttered the first. Every tyro in the trade and every intelligent reader of dailies knows better. It is, of course, to be said that if the public would not buy low-grade newspapers they could not exist. But that the public supports the debased and debasing tabloids of New York City, for instance, is no excuse whatever for the degeneracy of their conductors in offering the matter that they print; nor does it relieve them from the responsibility for their acts. And when it comes to the exploiting of the misfortunes of the individual who happens to get into the limelight, there is no press on earth as cruel, as cowardly, as low, or as brutal, and none which goes to such lengths. Can Mr. Lawrence or anyone else maintain that this is due to the public and not to the publishers?

At about the time that Mr. Lawrence was addressing the editors-in-embryo, all but one of the defendants in the recent Hall-Mills murder trial were suing the New York Mirror, a Hearst publication, for $1,500,000 for libel and calumny. Their trial, in which they were unanimously acquitted, was brought about by the Mirror according to its own assertions, and it stopped at little to blacken their characters. On one occasion it printed a cover-page picture of Mr. Stevens, one of the defendants, deliberately placing a visiting card at the feet of the two murdered persons—"a Mirror staff artist has constructed this scene," the caption read, "from the records of the Somerville, N. J., trial." The records of the trial showed, incidentally, nothing of the kind. For years these people were hounded from pillar to post. Nothing was too villainous to write about them; nothing in their private lives was held sacred. What sentence could inflict the torture daily administered by the newspapers?

Now, if it be objected that after all these people were drawn into a murder trial, the answer is that, granted this fact, the press of no other country in the world would have gone as far or stooped to such depths. Possibly a few of the worst English dailies might have approximated this exploitation of the morbid, the prurient, and the sensational, but no others. Leaving aside the question of murder trials, we would remind our readers of the treatment given to the late Dr. Percy Stickney Grant by the press of the city to which he for decades gave the most useful service. Neither his cloth, nor his courage, nor his unquestionable integrity shielded him. He was a liberal in the church; he was in conflict with about the worst bishop the Episcopal church has ever been burdened with hereabouts; he ran a radical forum—a most desirable public safety valve—and he was engaged to a woman he could not marry by reason of a long outworn church ordinance. That was enough for the hounds of the lowest part of the press, and even the high-class dailies joined in the hue and cry. This exhibition by the "best press in the world" ought to make Mr. Lawrence and every other reputable journalist hang his head in shame. Whether there was a foundation of truth in the scandals or not—we do not believe that there was—the point is that no dailies in any other country would have exploited what was after all a private affair. Outside of the professionally blackmailing press, there are no such journalistic ghouls anywhere as in our own newspaper world, and no better service could have been done for these schoolboy editors than to have instilled into their youthful hearts a deep detestation of this form of journalistic crime.

Measured by the misery that this sort of wrong-doing causes, the offenses of some of the men who are going to prison for life in New York State as fourth offenders seem trivial, indeed. Even where there is guilt this exploitation of the individual almost invariably puts to the rack a group of innocent persons, dragged into the case by the mere accident of relationship. Personal stories sell best. The fake "true confessions" and "true story" magazines prove that. So every editor gets all the personality—in and out of one-piece bathing suits—into his publication that he can. It never occurs to him that there is such a thing as charity and kindliness and good-will, or that he should draw the mantle of charity about an unfortunate and wrong-doer—unless he happens to be a big advertiser, or one of the "sacred cows" of the office. Then, as when a Philadelphia drygoods merchant was caught in flagrante delicto, every local newspaper is apt to be strangely silent. Only one or two newspapers touched upon the facts of a transgression of one of the big newspaper proprietors that came out a year or so ago in a lawsuit. What if it had been a Percy Stickney Grant? Why, the best press in the world would have blazoned it on their own first pages for weeks and weeks.

A Forward Step

TEN years ago this spring the United States purchased from Denmark three specks of land in the Caribbean just east of Porto Rico, then known as the Danish West Indies and renamed by us the Virgin Islands. Probably it was the intention of the treaty of cession to confer American citizenship upon the islanders, but the document was ambiguous. One sentence seemed to grant citizenship, but another said: "The civil rights and political status of the inhabitants of the islands shall be determined by Congress." The Navy Department held that the islanders were American citizens, but the Department of State—possibly after it realized that the population was nine-tenths Negro—ruled otherwise. In the circumstances it was obviously for Congress to take action. Well, it has done so—after ten years.

For ten years the Virgin Islanders have been men and women without a country. They have been neither Americans nor Danes, nor could they be naturalized. In the final days of the last Congress a general citizenship act was passed for the islands. All former Danish citizens who have continued to reside in the Virgin Islands or in the United States—who did not preserve their allegiance to Denmark under the terms of the treaty—are made Americans; also all natives of the islands who were temporarily absent and children born to islanders of any of these classifications in the last ten years. Aliens residing in the Virgin Islands have access to naturalization through the United States District Court in Porto Rico.

The granting of citizenship to the Virgin Islanders is good but only a first step toward the justice which we owe to them. For ten years they have not only been without any kind of citizenship but they have existed under a "temporary government" established by Congress in 1917 and carried on by the navy ever since. The consequences of this naval regime have been unhappy and the economic distress of the islands is now acute. Although naval rule is not primarily responsible for this, it is true that business will fight shy of the islands as long as such a regime continues. It is also true that political dissatisfaction will be keen until this arbitrary government, with its censorship of the press and its rigid insistence upon a "color line," is withdrawn. Bills have been before Congress for a number of years to establish a civilian government similar to that of Porto Rico—without success. But sentiment for such action is growing. The House Committee on Insular Affairs has just made a brief visit to the islands, and it is to be hoped that next winter will see adequate legislation. Incidentally the citizenship act will help. For by it a large block of Virgin Islanders in New York City have been enfranchised—enough in one congressional district so that they probably hold the balance of power.

In connection with the good news in regard to citizenship for the Virgin Islanders it is pleasant to record also that Bishop Reginald Grant Barrow of the Christ African Church of Long Island, New York, has won his long contest against deportation from the United States. He had the assistance of the American Civil Liberties Union. Bishop Barrow, a British subject, was arbitrarily deported from the Virgin Islands in 1922. When he landed in New York City a year later the naval regime in the Virgin Islands attempted to have him deported from the United States also on grounds now adjudged false and insufficient.

Settling Down to "Al" and "Cal"

By FRANK R. KENT

Washington, D. C., March 19

IT does not do to ascribe too much intelligence to the average professional politician. On the whole they are a stupid lot—particularly the small group customarily referred to in the newspapers as "party managers." Even the best of these are overrated and their reputation for political astuteness is hardly ever well based. Usually it is the result of three things—first, an uninformed, indifferent, and politically inert public, easily pleased and more easily fooled; second, an enlarged and inaccurate reflection of political figures and facts through a partisan press and propaganda agencies; third, the curious glamor that, reaching its climax in the Presidency, envelops the higher public offices and so often keeps a dough-head from seeming a dough-head when once through machine support, political luck, or an act of God he succeeds in attaining a position of prestige and power. In Washington as far as the more important political figures are concerned there should be added another factor—the necessity that forces newspaper correspondents to seek the views on public questions of small machine politicians and reflect these in print as seriously as if they sprang spontaneously from the well-furnished minds of real men. Through such a combination many a numskull has held on to high office for years.

However, despite these indisputable facts, two things have occurred in the field of politics since the adjournment of Congress which, it must be admitted, are evidence of a political shrewdness for which credit should be given. One of these is the plan evolved at a recent conference in Washington of Democratic Senators, aided and advised by one of the three leading Democratic angels, to avoid another head-on convention collision as a result of which the party would again be so split and twisted as to preclude the presentation of an effective fighting front in the next campaign. To this end it has been determined to play the time-honored "favorite son" game to the limit. In every State where it is at all possible a "favorite son" candidate for the Presidency will be encouraged and the delegation tied to him. Thus the bitterness, annoyance, and expense of Presidential primary contests will be largely eliminated.

It is argued that last time the two irreconcilable elements were permitted to fly at each other's throats and fight to the death while party leaders easily controlling more than a majority of the delegates stood by helplessly, bound by primary instructions, wholly out of sympathy with the man to whom they were tied, fully aware of the blasting effect of the fight on party chances. This time these leaders are not going to find themselves in any such position if they can help it—and they think they can. The way out, they agree, is the favorite-son method, and already it is assured that there will be at least sixteen names presented for the nomination on the first ballot. This really means the elimination of McAdoo and the nomination of Smith. It breaks up anything like organized, concentrated, and centralized opposition to the Smith candidacy. It scatters the forces of his foes and leaves him with the largest block of votes, an outstanding convention figure with approximately 300 delegates behind him. Most favorite sons will take votes from McAdoo States. The whole scheme greatly lessens the chances of Mr. McAdoo becoming again an active candidate with headquarters, press agents, and a flaming sword as he was in 1924. The only way to avoid the head-on collision is to make of Mr. McAdoo such a diminished and discouraged political figure that no one who looks for a winner will tie to him. That it means the nomination of Smith fits in with the views of practically every detached and clear-headed Democratic leader. They want him.

The other piece of political shrewdness mentioned above is the notion of having the good Calvin spend his summer vacation in the West. I do not know whence the idea came, but it is a good one. Apparently, too, there was back of it a well-thought-out bit of strategy not all of which has yet been revealed either by the White House Spokesman or the Administration organs, which sometimes get ahead of the Spokesman. It may be disclosing a secret, but the fact is that the agricultural advisers of the President, the chief of whom is in the Cabinet, but not as Secretary of Agriculture, are at work right now evolving another farm-relief measure, which is to be devoid of the economic heresies so shocking to Mr. Mellon in the McNary-Haugen bill and which will still appeal to the inflamed and aggrieved farmer as adequate and hopeful. It sounds impossible and absurd and, of course, it is, but such is to be the claim made. The general lines of the measure are being carefully guarded and are in fact not all yet laid down, but they are being got into shape. The plan is for Mr. Coolidge to take west with him a rough draft of the new bill. As soon as he is comfortably installed the farm leaders and farm-journal editors from the surrounding States will be separately and individually invited to the summer White House, separately and individually conferred with, asked for suggestions, and entertained as is the Presidential habit. There will be resulting from all this perfectly splendid publicity. The farm leaders and farm-journal editors—carefully selected and absolutely hand-picked—will, following their visit to the President, explain to the hungry correspondents as they leave that Mr. Coolidge is the real friend of the farmer, that his ideas on the subject of farm relief are essentially sound and sane, and that in the next session of Congress Mr. Coolidge will take the lead in the fight. They will add that the people in their States have full confidence in the President and that his renomination and reelection are assured. It is all bunk, of course, but it is impossible to exaggerate the political value of that sort of publicity, and no one knows its value better than the little Massachusetts politician now in the White House. It was to get this publicity that the Western trip was planned and it will certainly succeed. Before the summer is half over the Republican papers all over the country will break out in a perfect rash of headlines about "Winning the West"—and such is the power of publicity that it may be more or less true. Mr. Coolidge will not, of course, have any real legislative solution for the farm situation, but he does not need one. All he needs is something over which he can be sufficiently solemn and around which the propaganda can be draped. This he expects to take west with him.

The Miners Tighten Their Belts

By TOM TIPPETT

THE inability of the coal operators and the union mine-workers to reach an agreement at Miami makes a suspension of work on April 1 appear inevitable. This means that the "Jacksonville agreement," devised in 1924 by the Government, the operators, and the miners to stabilize the soft-coal industry, has failed. The ills of the industry still exist, with additional complications.

During the war the miners' wages were raised by a federal coal commission from a basic wage of $5 for an eight-hour day to $7.50. That agreement expired in 1923. The operators refused to meet the miners to negotiate a new agreement, and a national strike was called which ended after four months' duration with the war-time wages intact. The new contract, made at Jacksonville for a period of three years, expires on March 31 this year. The Miami conference, which has recently gone on the rocks, failed because the miners refused to accept a cut in the present wage scale. The Jacksonville agreement calls for a basic wage of $7.50 a day, but the miner gets in a year far less than that would suggest. Because of the over-development of the industry the miners work about 140 days a year (counting only those lucky enough to be employed at all), which makes their yearly wage approximately $1,050. When a cut in wages is considered it must be deducted from a yearly maximum that is already far below anything like a living-wage standard.

The operators proposed at Miami to lower the union scale to 10 per cent above that paid in the non-union districts, to scrap the union machinery that has been evolved in the industry, and set up in its stead compulsory arbitration to settle future labor disputes. The mine-workers proposed to maintain the present wage rate but also to appoint a permanent committee to work toward lower production costs by means of scientific management, better marketing, and collaboration between workers and owners for elimination of waste.

Competition in the bituminous industry has shifted; the former leading competing districts of Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, and western Pennsylvania have yielded place to States further south such as Kentucky, Tennessee, and the Virginias. These new competitors are largely non-union and pay a much lower wage scale than the Northern States. This fact, the operators declare, has enabled the Southern operators to undersell union coal to such an extent that the Northern fields are losing the markets; an agreement which prevents cheaper production in the union fields, they say, would mean economic suicide. Cheaper production means to the coal operators, in common with all other captains of industry, a reduction of wages for the workers. A reduction of dividends, more efficient management, elimination of waste—such expedients do not occur to them.

The union, never strong in the South, has lost much ground. The non-union States produce more coal than the organized districts do and they can supply the country with its normal demand for coal. The disadvantage of higher freights for the longer haulage to Northern industrial centers has been eliminated since the Interstate Commerce Commission voted discriminatory rates favorable to the non-union fields. New methods of mechanized mining have made production in the South largely independent of skilled miners, who naturally refuse to put up with non-union conditions. Mine-workers in the South, for the most part, are serfs attached to the property of the coal barons. The rate of pay is whatever the company thinks proper; the miner is compelled to buy in company stores and is perpetually in debt to his boss. The pressure of the low standards enforced in these Southern coal baronies makes doubly hard the struggle of the union miner to hold his own even in the organized districts.

Suppose the union did agree to a sliding scale, kept 10 per cent above the non-union level. What would prevent the non-union operator from lowering the wages of his helpless workers still further, bringing about another cut for the union men? The miners cannot accept a wage scale competitive with that of the Southern miners. To them this is undebatable.

The future of the miners depends largely on the ability of the union to gather in the unorganized workers of the South. Its failure to do so or even to hold its membership in the Southern field is due to several factors. The South still maintains a pre-Civil War attitude toward its industrial workers—as well as toward other questions. The miners there live in company-owned towns; the minute they are suspected of union sympathies they are not only discharged and black-listed but their families are summarily dumped out of the company houses and, since there are no other houses in the vicinity, are forced to live in tent colonies or barracks set up by the union on the side of some stream or public highway.

Injunction judges flourish in New England, I know, but there is a peculiarly vicious type rampant in the South. Unashamed they sign all orders enjoining the miners from doing anything that the operators wish them not to do. The miners are hedged in by a thousand so-called legal decrees. And to enforce such orders the operators openly maintain a private standing army that does not hesitate to shoot the orders of the coal companies into effect. I was once caught in Mingo County, West Virginia, with a letter from a union official in my pocket. On that evidence alone I was clapped into a company jail. A journalist's credential got me my freedom but I was forced to walk over a mountain trail for twenty-five miles to a railroad because I was not permitted to ride on the company-owned train that had carried me into the camp.

To organize the South the United Mine Workers of America has spent energy and millions of dollars. The famous "armed march" in West Virginia was a proof of the local miners' opposition to their oppressors. All the forces of the federal government were used against them in that crisis and a promise was made to remove the gunmen. The promise has not been kept. Take away the gunmen in the South, give the union an even chance with the operators to appeal to the miners, and the organization will be established within a month. The operators know this and pursue a stubborn course of resistance.

But there are other problems to settle, too. Unemployment stalks through the industry. There are enough mines and miners to produce a billion tons of coal in a year, which is just twice as much as is ever produced. Engineers say there are 200,000 superfluous miners. But these engineers do not suggest reducing the eight-hour day to four or six.

Then there is the question of blood on coal. Every year 2,500 miners are killed outright in our coal mines (there were 2,510 killed in 1926), thousands are crippled and die, and thousands more die from occupational disease. The Bureau of Mines, as well as private investigators, agrees that all coal-mine accidents are preventable. Recently I discussed mine fatalities with an official of the coal operators in Illinois; he said: "If we could have the bankers who lend us money or the persons who own the stock on hand when the roof falls in on a miner; if they could see it happen, they would forfeit all the profit for one year and throw their fortunes in besides to save the life of one coal digger. But we don't have them there and we must run the mines cheaply—and there you are." I asked him how many mines in Illinois tried to apply the State mining-safety laws and he said there were less than a dozen that "could afford to." There are 387 shipping mines in Illinois, about one-half of which are now closed.

Scientific men have raised the issue of waste; they pointed out that 50 per cent or more of all the coal deposits is left irrecoverably in the ground by our present mining methods—left there because it is "unprofitable" to take it out. That is important when one considers what may happen when the contemplated shortage of power occurs.

The obstacle that stands in the way of any permanent improvement is private ownership, dominated as it is by the profit motive. Overproduction, sectional competition, low wages, unemployment, accidents, waste—the whole train of evils in the coal industry springs from that one source. This accounts for the union's demand for government ownership with the miners' voice recognized in the management of the mines. The union has been accused of keeping its demand on paper and actually doing little to bring nationalization about. The accusation, I think, is true. But those responsible for the union's policy have at least an excuse. The job of convincing Uncle Sam that he ought to own and operate his own coal mines is a big one—smug Uncle Sam who neither knows nor cares how industry runs so long as his favorite sons come out ahead, as they are doing at present—even in coal. The weight of inertia against such an effort is disheartening.

What are the alternatives? Private trustification would probably stabilize the industry—but for whose benefit? We already have enough trusts to answer that. As for class collaboration—an effort on the part of operators and miners to get together and save their own necks—Mr. Lewis proposed such a plan at Miami. He suggested that the Miami conference remain in existence as the cooperating machinery; and that there be added to it "legal counsel, rate experts, engineers, and such outside advisers as may be required for the competent execution of this program." The expense of the machinery would be borne by the operators and miners jointly, and the benefits derived would go to miners as well as to the coal-owners. The operators refused even to discuss the Lewis proposal.

With the cards stacked against the union the outcome of the present controversy is still in doubt. The four-competing-State machinery has broken down. That has happened before, in 1910, 1912, 1914, 1916, and 1922. District settlements were made in each case and the inter-State machinery reassembled. And district settlements are now being made. Montana and the Far West have signed. Iowa will probably reach an agreement before the scheduled shut-down. Other outlying districts are signing by groups or single companies. By this means the union hopes to compel the big four competing States to come to time. But they are balking. Ohio and western Pennsylvania, harder hit by their nearness to the non-union area, are adamant and propose to hold out for the open shop. The Illinois and Indiana operators have also decided against an agreement. State settlements may yet be made. There is, however, a huge reserve store of coal above ground, and the operators are not likely to settle so long as this strike coal holds out. While the miners tighten their belts the operators will increase their profits, but when the reserve is gone the operators will sign with the union rather than lose their old customers to non-union or signed-up fields.

When the settlement does come it will not end the coal problem because, whether or not the miners are forced to take a cut, the settlement will be superficial and temporary. In the end the Government will have to take over the mines. The miners will be forced to take their nationalization demand off paper and fight for it. The union must also penetrate through armed enemy lines into the South. These are terrific tasks, but the miners realize what they are facing. Their union was not handed to them on a silver platter. They gave their blood, went to jail, and starved their families through endless strikes for every inch of ground they won. They know that the greater part of the distance still lies ahead.

Men Who Dig Coal

By ROBERT RAYNOLDS

I

THE mine office is a square frame house, three rooms and a front porch, with a broad view of the mountains from three sides; in front are the tipple, the cars being loaded with coal, the shops, the men about their work. One might see Jim Pasko out there, a huge man, walking with a certain jerkiness toward the shaft to be let down into the pit to work.

He is an Austrian. In boyhood his eyes must have been blue like the sky; but now they are shaded with gray. His nose marks a straight line on his earnest face; his small mouth smiles. His whole physiognomy—stalwart chin, wide cheek-bones, tough cheeks—is suffused with a warm red glow, as friendly as his voice.

Standing not quite six feet, shoulders bowed, big hands hanging on long arms, he gives an impression of prodigious strength. It is a little shocking to find him, on a bright idle day, seated on a bench outside his tar-paper bunk-house, showing Leo the intricacies of one of the wooden legs he has fashioned for himself. Leo, who has escaped for a moment the tyranny of his beastly father, is fascinated.

After that you detect by the slight halt in Jim's gait that both his legs below the knee are of some unliving material. Nonetheless, he loads more coal than the average miner, and in addition works down in the south entry, where there is a great deal of water. . . .

Mike Monarch, one of Jim's buddies, came into the office this morning and borrowed ten dollars from the Super. Mike is a stout Bulgarian who has worked here off and on for a decade. Deep lines in his cheeks and the sharp twist of his mustache, together with the gleam in his small eyes, give him a devilish look. But he's a good fellow.

"I tell you why I want money," he explained. "I buy four pints. You know. I get drunk! One day, he not 'nuff. Give me a week."

"Where do you get it, Mike?" the Super asked.

"Frederick! I go there, and every fool in town whisper me, 'Mike, you want buy some?' I no ask, they ask me."

Mike now and then goes on good old-fashioned drunks. He has been twenty years in America and has not saved a cent. He does not care to start saving up now; he only wants to maintain a pleasurable balance between work on the one hand and whiskey and women on the other. . . .

John Roman, with heavy breath, drew some of his pay today so that he could go in town and bail Mike Monarch and Jim Pasko out of the cooler.

II

"Is the Superintendent in?" asked a man who came into the office.

He was an Austrian, six feet tall, heavy-boned, sandy-haired, the face rather a brick color than pink, the eyes steel-blue, the mustache no small foppish affair. His voice, flowing through heavy lips, struck one by its sincerity.

"No. He's down at the tipple. You find him a short man with glasses, wearing a cap and an army coat. What is it you want?" I queried needlessly, for a man who comes hesitatingly through the door and after a few moments of patient waiting and silence inquires for the Super is a man after a job.

"Well, I want a job. Do you think I can get one?"

"I don't know. There was a fellow quit yesterday; you might get his job loading."

"I do anything. I'm a practical miner, twenty-three years' practical experience. I have loaded, worked a machine for undercutting, a motor, mules—every job in a mine. I've a family down in Denver. If a man can't support himself, how can he a family? That's the way it is now. I had a farm, too."

"Where was your farm?" I was interested in this man, talking to me informally through the wicket, yet forever turning to look out of the windows through which he could see on the upward slope of a gentle hill to the east five blown columns of smoke hurried away from the earth toward the gray sky. At times, as the smoke shifted, red flames would leap out. It was as if a dead race had come back to light ritual fires on the drab hillside—though of course they were really strawstacks being burned by some farmer.

"I had a farm down at Rocky Ford. I saved $4,500—do you know how much that is?—to put in it. Now I owe $5,000 and interest. I had it two years. I quit mining for it. But I get my crops nice both years, and in June come hail, and I lose all. Only the alfalfa, which pays a bare living; but no interest on a debt.

"Then I came to Denver and got a job in the iron- and steel-works. Forty cents an hour. Now, that's good pay, if you can work nine hours a day steady. But I only got six hours three days a week. That won't keep a family. Here I'm back for a mining job."

He didn't get a job; the mine is over-manned as it is, an easy winter making the demand for coal light.

III

The coal was not coming up from below very fast today. The half-hearted strike being carried on by some of the men is slowing production a bit. The strike is not effective because the field is non-union. During one of the intervals between hoisting periods Leo and I went out to the rock track, that rickety old affair over which we occasionally push a car filled with stone out to the smoldering rock pile. Fred was down below leaning against a box car, idle as we. He began to talk up to us, and presently fell to describing "pot-rocks"—which are like boulders frozen in the rock strata which ceil a seam of coal—and the way they have of coming loose and falling all of a sudden on the head of any one below.

"I saw a man killed by one of 'em once, down South," Fred said. "We were cutting in a place, and saw the edge of this rock. We cut again, and it was about half out of the rib. The loader came to us pretty soon, and said he'd blasted and loaded this second cutting, and asked us to undercut his coal again. We told him he'd better fix that rock.

" 'All right, I fix him. I know.'

"We cut the place again for him. He said he'd fix it. The next time we went around, the rock was two-thirds exposed beyond the rib. You could see its outline in the roof plain. The Hunkie had one prop about the size of a toothpick under it.

" 'You prop that up good now before you shoot, see?' we warned him.

" 'Sure. I fix all right.'

"Well, the coal's high down there, thick seam. Takes a couple of Hunks about two or three days to clean up a room.

"About three days later fellow came running down the entry like wild.

" 'Man killed, man dead!' he was screaming.

"We hurried into the room where the pot-rock was. There was one digger leaning up against a prop, holding his arm and moaning like a coyote. 'Ah, I goin' die! I know I goin' die!"

" 'Where's your buddy?'

" 'Oh, he there,' pointing at the huge rock which had dropped from the roof, snapping the one little timber. We could see half of the man's body—full length. Just his legs and up to the waist sticking out like a stuffed pair of pants.

"We got a stretcher and fetched the live one out—carried him all the way—a hard job. Doc came, looked him over. The moaning devil had his skin scraped till it was sort of pink.

" 'Get the hell out of here!' Doc says to him. And, boy, that Hunkie didn't even stop for his pay. Plumb scared to death.

"But we went back down in the pit with jacks, cut notches in the big rock—it must have weighed near thirty tons—and got the dead fellow out. Half of him was flat. We dumped him in a basket and carried him out. That's all there was to him."

IV

Though he was only seventeen, I don't understand why Leo had not run away. Perhaps his hatred of his father was a morbid fascination which held him at home.

I believe no one actually worked harder than Leo; and no one got less pay. Early in the morning, on the way to breakfast, I would see him going down to the stables with that peculiar shuffle of his, thrusting his rat-like face forward at each step. Once in a long while a cramp would shoot through his fallen arches, and he would crumple to the ground.

"Hi, Bob!" he would shout upon seeing me. "Hi!" to this person, to that person, every time he passed them throughout his long day.

Sometimes when he overslept his father awakened him with a piece of harness strap. Then Leo would go feed the mules, and bring them to the tipple—a job the father was paid for. He would come up on the tipple later to help me with the coal; and whenever I could I had a bag of cookies there, for I knew he got little to eat at home.

"Gee," he would say, "the old man won't let me have five dollars out of my pay to buy arch supports. He says that's too much. He gives my brother half of his pay, but I get only five dollars a month of mine. That ain't much."

He was so undernourished that on bitter cold days his face turned a bluish color. I hated to have him work with me. But he accepted it all with only the complaint of a deep hatred of his father, "that ol' devil."

And after the day's work on the tipple, while his father, with fat paunch and mealy toothless mouth, ambled around the property, Leo would take the mules as they were brought up from the mine, lead them to the stable, feed them, and finish his day twelve hours after it had begun.

"Hi, Bob!" "Hi, Jim!" I recall his high, thin voice ringing in the pleasant evening air.

These Modern Women

Staying Free

ANONYMOUS

[We print herewith the eleventh of a series of anonymous articles giving the personal backgrounds of a group of distinguished women with a modern point of view. The next article will appear in The Nation for April 13.]

I CANNOT explain my life without taking into account the free atmosphere which pervaded our home under the influence of my father's genuinely libertarian nature. Our home had in it absolutely no verbotens and our family grammar contained no imperative. We five boisterous children absorbed the spirit of mutual consideration without injunctions or commands.

Father's large library was open to us all at any age. We were never ordered to bed in the middle of an engrossing book but could read all night long if we wished. Dickens, Browning, and Parkman were in his library, of course, but so were Boccaccio, Rabelais, and Gulliver unabridged. And so was Lena Rivers. When we wanted the Elsie books, we got them. If my brother brought home Nick Carter and Diamond Dick they were not thrown out of the window but went the critical round of the family. When Frank Merriwell's weeklies were discovered lying about the house, my father read them aloud to us, laughing over their super-heroism but thoroughly enjoying the thrilling accounts of those olympic baseball games won by Frank and his peerless knights. When the village Comstocks were publicly condemning and secretly devouring Sappho and Camille we all read them with frank appreciation.

We always lived where there was a fireplace and almost every night found us gathered around it, listening to Grimm and the Arabian Nights, Jules Verne, Rider Haggard, Mark Twain. Father loved to read aloud, and through the long evenings in those dull, back-country places we would hear these favorites over and over. At other times he would read to us from his idols—Tom Paine, Ingersoll, Voltaire.

Early in our lives we got accustomed to being unlike other people. To be an atheist in a small town in those days was not unlike what it was to be a pacifist in 1917.

Educational opportunities in the back-water communities where we were obliged to live were so slim that our parents were deeply absorbed in the problem of our education. Various female seminaries were tried for my sisters. By the time I, the youngest, came along, my father was disgusted with the education the others had received. He hated the airs and graces taught them, the artificialities and stupidities which seemed to him so flagrant each time they came back from one of those institutions.

He took upon himself the task of my education and carried it through the grammar grades. He had many a struggle with local school boards and truant officers but always won his point by various methods of delay until his business made it necessary to move to a new community. His work was mining engineering, and he was obliged to go to any place where the company wished a mine developed. Every few years we piled everything we possessed into a freight car and away we trekked a few hundred miles into another little American wilderness. The job of carting five children and a car-load of goods across Ohio, Kentucky, and Missouri did not interrupt my father's enthusiastic direction of my studies of arithmetic and grammar or his interest in my endless adventures into history and geography.

But this delightful, home-made education had its drawbacks. As I approached high-school age I began to realize this. A Christmas visit to an aunt living in a large Middle Western city, with high schools and a university, gave me the idea of going to a real school as soon as possible and then to college. This idea grew into a fixed determination. Although my desire met with no encouragement at home, I never thought of giving it up. I borrowed the railroad fare from my brother, dressed one of our fattest turkeys, packed it into an old-fashioned telescope with a bottle of home-made elder-flower wine and a jar of sausage cakes, and took a train for the city, six hundred miles away.

Although my father was hurt by my going away he was remarkably generous about it; in later years he even enjoyed saying that he was a victim of his own educational methods.

During my senior year of high school, when the time came in our upper-class literary society to select from the junior class the members for the following year, I was thunderstruck to find that a colored girl, one of the most brilliant students of the school, was not even being considered. When I proposed her name the entire group disapproved violently. My chum and I made so much commotion among both students and teachers, with the staunch backing of our courageous principal, that the girl was finally admitted and proved to be one of the most popular members and an asset to the organization.

From high school I went to the university. There the sorority system struck me as being not only silly but harmful to the spirit of the institution. Jewish girls were not admitted. Poor girls needed exceptional qualities in order to run any chance of election. On the other hand, "dumb-bells" were fought over if their fathers were wealthy or their mothers socially prominent. When rushing time came I turned down the bids I received, to the astonishment of the whole student body, even those most discriminated against.

Women at that time were not allowed to take courses in the medical school of the university—a holy place, sacred to the male students. My high-school chum and I were especially interested in biology and we wished to supplement our studies with a course in bacteriology given only in the medical school. We tried to register for this course but were diplomatically refused. We insisted upon the right to take any course offered by the university. The authorities put us off with that paternal condescension with which the requests of women used to be disposed of. We tried to get other girls in the biology course to back us. They laughed at us. We took it up with some of the men in the bacteriological class. They welcomed us and supported our demand. In the end we marched triumphantly into the bacteria laboratory, and since then courses in that medical school have been open to all students.

Suffrage, at that time, had emerged from the stage of ignorant misrepresentation but was going through a period in some ways more discouraging—supercilious toleration. Most of our classmates were bored by the subject and ignored it. My chum's mother had been a pioneer with Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Anna Shaw and had passed on the enthusiasm of that experience to her daughter. One memorable day we learned that Mrs. Pankhurst had come to America. Eagerly we telegraphed the great militant, asking if she would speak at our college. Nothing can ever match the exhilaration of arranging the meeting for our heroine, advertising it among the students, and making her stay among us count to the utmost for the cause. It was then that I had my first sense of being a part of something fine moving in the world.

On leaving the university, the natural step in those days for a self-supporting woman was into social work. There, even more than in school and college, the frank and free home atmosphere which had been my luck proved its worth. Brought face to face with the ugliest facts of life as a case worker in the red-light district of a cosmopolitan city, the callow college graduate was able to maintain a scientific attitude tempered with human sympathy. It was not long before I became the executive head of one of the many charities of the city, all federated and super-federated into one great philanthropic whole. I was the angel child of a charming group of elderly Lady Bountifuls who adored my dramatic reports of the misery among the special type of poor they had elected to help. But the mitigation of suffering, even under such delightful auspices, began to pall. Like so many others, I wanted to go deeper.

There was probably never a time when the air was so charged with social currents. Civic-reform leagues were active. Muckraking and trust-busting had not gone out of fashion. Single tax held a serious place in the discussions of thoughtful students of society. Prison reform had been given great impetus by the exposures of Thomas Mott Osborne, and the probation system was being widely adopted. Sex hygiene had graduated from the stage of a hobby, and birth control was a question to be courageous about. In this ferment of ideas my well-established habit of intellectual hospitality led me step by step to more fundamental philosophies. The entrance to this new world was through the home of a strong but gentle anarchist woman, whose two children pluckily bore her name amid the ignorant jeers of their schoolmates. My thinking was profoundly affected by those evenings at her home with a group of choice souls out of that smug, crass, over-uplifted, over-settlement-housed city—a printer who would handle only beautiful, intelligent things, using none but the finest paper and the most artistic type faces; a bookseller whose shop was the only place where one could buy the Masses, Freedom, Bruno's Weekly; a few foreign-born workers from the local steel mills, vibrant, earnest idealists of the type who would neither scab in a strike nor take part in a war; a dancing teacher, fresh from the influence of Isadora Duncan, making a daring struggle for beauty and self-expression. I joined her class and wrote indignant letters to the local papers defending her work when the Purity League and the Daisy Chainers would have driven her out of town.

At this stimulating stage Lochinvar arrived, not out of the West but from my own immediate milieu—the executive head of one of the leading philanthropic organizations of the city. He also was realizing the futility of social palliatives and was having difficulties with his directors because of his too frank exposure of local industrial and housing conditions and his ardent interest in the anti-preparedness agitation. About this time I was warned by my lady managers that my enthusiasms were carrying me too far. These official mutterings, however, did not deter either of us.

Lochinvar's difficulties inevitably increased. He finally received an abrupt notice of dismissal and we decided to go to New York to live. We have never regretted giving up the secure life of the social worker for the rough and tumble struggle for existence which is the lot of most self-supporting people. My real life seemed only then to begin. It was entirely honest, it was a full life, and it was my own.

The country was then wallowing in the war orgy. There were raids, arrests, imprisonment. Radical leaders were being tried for publishing a magazine, writing a book, or making a speech. Employers' associations, with the aid of complaisant district attorneys, were squaring old accounts with union organizers. Whether it was building up a defense organization, preparing a gigantic protest meeting against conscription, or attempting to elect Morris Hillquit mayor of New York, I was there.

It was the most logical thing in the world that I should join in the militant suffrage activity at Washington, do my time in jail, and win my badge of honor. What a glorious company of emancipated women they were! There was not one of us who did not come out of that experience with less awe of policeman, judge, and established ideas and with a clearer understanding of the true nature of authority.

I did not tarry long in the doctrinaire stage of those who "belong" to this or that. After the tumult and the shouting of 1916-1920 died down, it was possible to think out the fundamentals. I understood better what the printer and the bookseller and those steel-workers were aiming at. The utmost measure of freedom—economic, intellectual, emotional—is the sine qua non of the good life.

In the more intimate application of this philosophy, eleven years of a free and uninterruptedly happy association surely prove something. We have never felt the need to sanctify our union with lay or clerical formalities. There is a rare spiritual value in the consciousness that mutual desire is the only tie that binds. Nor have we been willing to cut down our freedom in order to increase the census figures. With "childless old age" not so very far away, we still maintain that there is more genuine companionship to be had with chosen friends of similar age and experience than with immature fledglings of another generation.

As I look back over our eleven happy years I feel sure that our relationship would not have been so harmonious or complete if either of us had stressed the conventional idea of exclusive mutual possession. As my own thinking grows I am finding it quite conceivable that there may be room in my life for other close relationships. Deep human affection is a rich source of happiness in this drab world. Women are finding out this great truth and are accepting it.

Christian Schools in China

By EDWARD H. HUME

FIVE years ago the late President Ernest Burton of Chicago went to China as chairman of a Christian educational commission. With unerring instinct he foresaw—and foretold—that the Christian colleges there would come on days of difficulty with the educational forces of the land. He recognized that there might be a sharp division between those who felt that in institutions set up under church boards Christian services and Christian teaching should be required and those who believed that a more spiritual religion might be imparted if option were permitted in these matters. His deepest belief on the subject was stated in the last address he ever made concerning Christian education in China, at a conference in New York two years ago. It is a memorable credo:

> I believe that we ought to be ready to make any adjustment whatever in order to achieve the fundamental purpose for which we are maintaining Christian education in China. . . . I hope the time will never come when we shall have to face the question of conducting schools in which no religion can be taught. But if we should have to face that question, what would be our answer? My answer would be that I would stay in China; that I would stay and seek to express the Christian spirit by giving the most helpful service I could render to the Chinese, even if they refused to let me give them in words what they cannot and will not refuse me the opportunity of expressing in life. . . . Even if we are forbidden to give any direct Christian teaching, I, therefore, plead that we may be ready to make any adjustments which may seem necessary, in order that we may continue to be able to make our contribution—as large a contribution as possible—to the welfare of China.

Within a year after these words were uttered, the Ministry of Education in Peking issued new "Regulations Governing the Recognition of Educational Institutions Established by Funds Contributed from Foreigners"; and in November, 1926, the Kuomintang, or Nationalist Government in Canton, issued "Regulations for Private Schools," which apply to Christian schools as well as to private Chinese institutions. In their essence, these two sets of regulations are identical. Six points are covered:

1. Christian institutions can no longer be recognized as in a special class, but are given the status of "private" schools and must be so designated. This status has been desired by a majority of Christian educators for some time past.
2. The administration must be in the hands of Chinese. According to the Peking regulations of 1925 a foreign principal may continue in schools where one is already functioning, but in such cases a Chinese vice-principal shall be appointed and shall have charge of dealings with the government in educational matters. The majority of the members of the managing board, wherever there is one, shall be Chinese. The Nationalist requirements are that the principal must be a Chinese, that there must be a local managing board, and that its chairman, as well as a majority of the members, must be Chinese. A foreigner may, in special cases, be invited to act as adviser to the administration.
3. Both sets of regulations insist that the curriculum, inspection, etc., shall be the same as in other private schools, the Nationalists requiring closer control of the institution by the educational authorities.
4. The Peking regulations insist that religious propaganda shall not be introduced into the teaching of other subjects, but do not interfere with the freedom to teach religion and hold religious services. The Nationalists forbid "religious propaganda in class teaching."
5. While freedom to teach religion and to conduct religious exercises is permitted in both sets of regulations, both state clearly that "students cannot be required to attend classes in religion or required to participate in religious exercises."
6. The Peking authorities have not announced any intention of compelling schools to register. The Nationalists announce that "all private schools not yet registered shall apply for registration within the prescribed period." For Kwantung and Hunan provinces the period ends April 1, 1928.

When the Peking regulations were issued, opinion was divided among the administrators of Christian colleges. This was made very evident at a Conference of Christian Colleges held in Shanghai in February, 1926. Some of the educators regarded the terms offered as reasonable, perhaps the best that could be looked for; and they urged acceptance. Others demurred. They felt that the Christian purpose for which the institutions were established would fail of fulfilment if it was not permitted to require Christian teaching and attendance at Christian services. They believed that the regulations deprived private schools of the liberty that should be theirs, and, in particular, of the religious liberty assured by the new constitution of the republic. They feared also that American Christians might withhold their subscriptions from institutions established under church boards.

Few realized at that time how rapid was to be the advance of the Nationalist cause. As the year wore on, however, and it became apparent that severer, rather than more lenient, terms were likely to be required in those regions where the Nationalist party gained control, opinion veered. By the first of the present year only five of the seventeen Christian colleges remained unwilling to register on the terms proposed, that is, on the official terms set down by both governments. It is essential to bear in mind that local provincial committees, in the area controlled by the Nationalist Government, have taken the reins into their own hands and have announced, in a few places, supplementary rules of a drastic sort. In the province of Hunan, for instance, where the extreme left wing of the Nationalists is in power, the added rules state that history, economics, sociology, etc., may only be taught by teachers who are members of the Nationalist Party; that the character of the teaching in these subjects shall conform to the program laid down by the extremist section; that fees be lowered to a point which will permit the children of the masses to have the education they desire, etc. It becomes evident that in such an area education is designed to become nothing more than a political instrument. For the time being, Christian schools and colleges in Hunan have ceased to function; but no one who knows the innate tendency of the Chinese to moderation can believe that a storm of this sort will last for long.

Chinese educational authorities, then, propose to insist on four things: (1) All private institutions, including the Christian schools and colleges, must come under government regulation; (2) all schools shall be administered by Chinese; (3) true religious freedom must be permitted; religious teaching and religious services will be allowed, but may not be required of any student; (4) in general, the school curriculum shall follow the regulations of the government authorities; in areas controlled by the Nationalists, this is summed up in the statement that "nothing destructive of the principles of the revolution as embodied in Dr. Sun's 'Three Principles of the People' can be permitted."

In a time of crisis, each college must determine its own course of action. Taking a long look, however, there can be no two opinions. Christian colleges must accept a place as part of the Chinese educational system. There is no reason to fear that the investment made in Christian education in the past will be destroyed. The time is clearly here when those who have the care of Christian colleges must put into the hands of Chinese leaders the work begun by foreigners. The colleges have supposedly existed to train Chinese leadership for just such a time as this, and today they are challenged to demonstrate their sincerity. In some places, as in Hunan Province, the storm of extremism may make it wise to keep all Christian institutions closed for a time. In some places it may be felt that Chinese leadership is not yet ripe. The call is sounding, however, for the transfer to that leadership, letting it find its way, by trial and error. For those who hear the call, and who have the daring to attempt the new program, greater things than ever lie ahead for Christian education in China.

In the Driftway

THE editors of the Delineator have caused a great to-do among writers by the announcement that they do not wish any more unsolicited contributions. They obtain so little from this source, they say, that it doesn't pay for the reading; they can get all the material they want by applying to authors known to them, or through literary agents. The Drifter can't recall any writing of his own that he ever sent to the Delineator, and certainly doesn't remember any that he ever read in it. So he can approach the controversy with his usual absence of bias—which is not saying much. He surmises that what riles the writers—and rightly—is not so much the decision to read no more unsolicited manuscript as the gratuitous advice to authors that they should market their merchandise through literary agents.

* * * * *

FOR where are all these literary agents, eager and competent to help the author? The new writer, or the old one either for that matter, knows less about literary agents than about the magazines. And a good many literary agents know less about the magazines than the newest writer. A good many don't care a hoot in the hot place about either. They subsist on the reading fees which are asked of all authors unknown to them—not quite the same as unknown authors—before any effort is made to place the manuscript. And supposing that a reliable and competent literary agent is found—for there are such—it is still necessary to pay a commission, averaging about 10 per cent, on all sales. Probably this is not excessive. In fact from his observation of miscellaneous manuscripts the Drifter would say that the authors of most such screeds should be happy to pay a 99 per cent commission to anybody who could find a home for them. But the literary agent is a middleman, and middlemen are parasites and the curse of our age—at least so the Drifter hears it said by other types of parasites and curses of a different sort.

BUT, as usual, in the controversy over editors, authors, and literary agents we have lost sight of the reader. He is the real sufferer. Magazine-making has vastly changed in twenty-five years. The editor used to depend upon the whole field of writers for ideas and information. His work was primarily selective—his notion of the best that was submitted. The magazine, in a sense, was cooperatively edited. It had the individuality, the variability inherent in such a method. The modern magazine is office-made. Its contents and ideas are determined by from one to half a dozen editors, who send the work out to be done according to specifications, sometimes in Fifth Avenue hotels, sometimes in Harlem sweatshops. Such a magazine has more drive as a propaganda power and probably more scope as a circulation getter than its predecessor. Obviously it has come to stay—for a while. But it has less range and less flavor than the older type of periodical. Necessarily so. For its editors almost always live in New York City and are inoculated with the prejudices of the class that earns and spends there from $5,000 to $25,000 a year. All they see is what goes on in the subway between their apartments and their offices; all they know is what they read in the other editors' magazines.

* * * * *

IF the Drifter were an editor under such handicaps, he would welcome the chance of a new idea, even at the cost of reading unsolicited manuscripts. Of course it involves a lot of work for a small return. But to be a good editor is a lot of work. Possibly that's why there are so few of them—and so many Delineators. THE DRIFTER

Some Love Prize Poems—Some Do Not

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have just read for the third time your prize poem, This Foreman. It is with a sensation not unlike a thrill of joy that I find at last a publication with the vision and daring to award a prize to so distinctively and beautifully modern a piece of work.

Boston, Massachusetts, February 12 D. F. ROBINSON

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Our interest in American poetry and our great admiration for the distinction, courageous idealism, and social vision of your magazine compel us to protest against the selection of This Foreman as your prize poem for 1927. This artificial mixture of realism and phantasy is inchoate and absurd. It is, however, decidedly in line with the series of sterilely intellectual, emotionally impotent, essentially unpoetic tours de force which have been selected as your prize poems in the past. Incidentally neither of us submitted a poem in this contest.

Norwalk, Conn., February 13 LUCIA TRENT,
RALPH CHEYNEY,
Editors of Contemporary Verse

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am very fond of poetry. I read all kinds, the good with the awful. Perhaps of all living poets I love and enjoy the slender output of A. E. Housman the most. Now, I have just read The Nation's prize poem for 1927, This Foreman. Does This Foreman portray, possibly in the guise of Satan, the relentless fate that dogs the calling of our iron-workers, or does it tell in lyric form a story of Capital taking another swipe at Labor? I'm not knocking the poem, you understand—I simply don't know what it's all about, and I really would like to know.

Oradell, New Jersey, February 20 HENRY T. BELLEW

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I read your prize poem, This Foreman, by Thomas H. Ferril, to a roomful of people—lawyers and merchants—and the effect was electric. Not one of these men practiced poetry, but they had keen senses and lively imaginations; and it affected them to a man. One friend, who has had a lifelong interest in the arts, said that This Foreman stands up. Indeed it does; and it cuts into new frontiers of emotion.

Mr. Ferril has managed to fuse into a whole an emotion which others have attempted to convey by tricks of style: his reaction to the modes of modern life, their starkness and sudden melodrama, catapulted from darkness and destroying mind and body of the victim. He does it in the spare and direct way of steel, symbol of the essential attitudes supporting our civilization. Steel and industrial life have power over us; and the very web of steel we are building may be our doom. Mr. Ferril, without trickery, has caught the swing and broad-backed rhythms of this life as Marin has caught them in his etchings and water-colors—with sudden truncated rhythms and restrained but profound lyrical exaltation. In this poem is contained a hint of the music that will unfold with increasing power and passion in the future.

Why Cars Kill

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In a letter to you Bertrand Shadwell says: "If Mr. Ford really objects to capital punishment he should reduce the speed of his automobiles to a safe and reasonable limit, and induce other manufacturers to do the same."

If Mr. Ford should reduce the speed of his cars, competitors would eat right into his business. If Mr. Ford should induce the leading automobile men of this country to set a speed limit—what would stop those who want speed from buying fast foreign cars? Not Mr. Ford but the buying public is responsible for accidents that result from fast driving. When people demand a car with moderate speed the manufacturers will compete to please them.

A Fair-Minded Catholic Asks Fairness of Us

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your correspondent Charles W. Ervin asks questions irrelevant to the main point at issue. All I intended to show was that the Catholics in this country understand the present situation in Mexico. True, the official announcement of the Episcopate came only in December, but such a document is not written overnight. The present trouble in Mexico started in February, 1926, and the hierarchy did not meet until September. A consideration of the scholarship of the pastoral letter should induce my critic to concede that no time was lost in getting it out.

We are not afraid to call a spade a spade. The human element in the church very many times seems to have gotten the best of the divine. The sad case of Fathers Hidalgo and Morelos and the Spanish Inquisition in Mexico my critic will find fully discussed in the Catholic Encyclopedia. I am fully in sympathy with Dr. Carlton H. J. Hayes, who in the Commonweal writes: "If the hierarchy had been closer to the masses they would themselves have been real leaders of a truly popular movement, and of a movement which, under the actual leadership of Fathers Hidalgo, Morelos, Torres, and dozens of other Mexican priests, was as Christian and Catholic as it was patriotic. The subsequent history of independent Mexico might have been better and happier." No doubt, serious mistakes were made by members of the church in Mexico in the fields of economics and social welfare, and obviously the present rulers of that unhappy country are taking the fullest advantage of those mistakes. Yet no finer type of people could be found than among the poor and hard-working Mexicans even in this country. I had the privilege to labor among them in Texas for more than twelve years, and although they lacked many of the modern conveniences, they were a noble, chivalrous, and, above all, a happy people; and this in the main owing to their deep religious faith. The padres did their work well. Judge Talley's opinion as to the embargo is entirely his own; others, whose opinions carry more weight with Catholics, want the embargo upheld.

In conclusion, let me add a word of advice to some of my coreligionists. The stand The Nation is taking today in regard to the Mexican trouble is a matter of bitter criticism among us, and I myself cannot see how it is doing justice to both sides.

But let us not forget that there was a day in the not very distant past when we rightly deserved the same criticism we are heaping today on the head of The Nation. At a moment when, as seldom before in the history of the world, brute force reigned supreme and the dictates of Christian morality and plain decency were laughed to scorn, when the Christian civilization of a whole continent hung in the balance, when the Osservatore Romano spoke of the most cruel and diabolical peace ever imposed upon a conquered foe, when the Holy Father pleaded for sanity and charity and justice among nations, we were either silent or drunk with mad nationalism. In the deep silence (or worse) of pulpit and press it was The Nation that stood out as the intrepid advocate of the outcast and the under-dog and called victor and vanquished alike back to their senses in burning words which deserve to ring down through the ages. Courage and consistency are some of the indispensable qualities of true moral leadership.

Who Chooses Your Books?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the United States today between 50 and 75 per cent of the population live from fifty to a thousand miles from anything like adequate bookstores. In the large cities where there are good bookstores, many people who like to read good new books have not the leisure to wade through reviews or spend the time in bookshops to find them. Actually both the reader in the country and the busy reader in the city rely largely on the recommendation of bookstore clerks. All large bookstores have hundreds of customers on their books who have left carte blanche orders for new books to be sent them at stated intervals—these books to be chosen by the booksellers' assistants.

Anyone who has listened to bookstore conversations can realize what a large number of readers depart carrying volumes that have been bought solely on the clerk's recommendation. The careful judgment of a group of eminent critics and writers should prove quite as valuable to the public as the haphazard selections of bookstore clerks, who often make a point of pushing a book for no other reason than that the store is overstocked.

The Literary Guild is as opposed to "literary goosestepping" as your correspondent, Mr. Blumenberg; when he charges it with making for standardization, he is confusing numbers with quality. And the guild offers but one book a month. Anyone who cares for reading at all is able to assimilate more than one good book a month, and subscribers to the guild can still find time to do their own adventuring among books.

The guild makes no claim of being the Joan of Arc of literature, but it does offer a simple means of obtaining twelve good new books easily and economically. In this age of magazines running into millions of copies, which all print notoriously standardized material, any person who stops to consider the matter dispassionately will welcome the guild as a step away from standardization.

Well, Maybe

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Any intelligent boy who has had compulsory military drill for four years in high school has thereby been vaccinated against war hysteria. The dulness and complete absence of any mental stimulus in the whole process make it the most perfect pacifist argument ever devised. It does so much to puncture the hollow words of our junkers that it is difficult to see why pacifists keep up such a din against a system which serves them so well.

After 90 Years

FOR ninety years people have held meetings to talk about housing conditions, and now something is being done about it.

The City Housing Corporation is a limited dividend company, formed in 1924 to build good houses and sell them to people of limited incomes on terms they could meet. It has already built at Sunnyside Gardens homes for 650 families, and is now building for 250 more. It has earned and paid 6% on its stock from the beginning and has demonstrated that its method of operation is thoroughly sound from the standpoints of investor and house buyer.

Its present stock outstanding is $2,000,000, and it can immediately use $3,000,000 more to good advantage. Large scale operations, sound management (its officers and directors serve without pay), and lack of speculative profit are the essentials of its success.

Will you give us a chance to tell you and show you more about it with a view to interesting you in an investment in its stock? Use the coupon below.

When Women Talk

By MARCIA NARDI

When women talk,
A flower is robbed of loam;
When men converse,
A fruit is basketed.
The latter is fulfilment,
But the first,
A desecrance like ravaging the dead.

A plum or grape that's left upon the ground
To rot untasted
Is partly wasted . . .
Its sweetness never being known.
But strewn upon the grass,
What beauty petals have
May, better than in vases,
Be computed.

Say silence then is loam,
From which a woman's soul
Need never be uprooted.

First Glance

ELIZABETH SHEPLEY SERGEANT introduces the fourteen portraits of contemporary Americans which she has included in "Fire Under the Andes" (Knopf: $4) with the warning that they are not in keeping with "the sharp biographical method now in fashion." As a matter of fact they are—the quotation as it stands applies perfectly to Miss Sergeant's book. I think no sharper eye has looked at people in our time. Miss Sergeant, presumably, had Lytton Strachey in mind; but the difference between the two is not a difference of method. Both essayists are brilliantly selective in their use of details; and Miss Sergeant, when she says with reference to her people that she has been, "through a sort of identification with them that is, perhaps, more common in a fiction writer than in a biographer, seeking to understand and to present what they were doing and wishing to do on this planet," is only describing the process of Mr. Strachey in "Eminent Victorians." Both essayists too are interested exclusively in persons who have fire burning within or beneath them. The difference, which is of course important, is that whereas Mr. Strachey, by treating his people as fanatics, implied a criticism of their aims, Miss Sergeant, by treating hers as merely inspired, accepts their aims without cavil. She frankly admires, even adores, all of her fourteen Americans; she has understood them in order to recommend them. The difference, then, is one not of method but of attitude.

Miss Sergeant runs to authors and to New Englanders, but she does not stop there. Authors predominate—Amy Lowell, Eugene O'Neill, Elinor Wylie, H. L. Mencken, Willa Cather, and Robert Frost. There are, however, two scientists (William Alanson White and Alice Hamilton), one artist of the stage (Robert Edmond Jones), one professor (Charles Townsend Copeland), one journalist (William Allen White), one actress (Pauline Lord), one actor (Paul Robeson), and one jurist (Oliver Wendell Holmes). Justice Holmes, whose portrait is a particularly fine one, appeals to Miss Sergeant in his capacity of author too; and incidentally he has furnished her with a quotation which I imagine illuminates her attitude toward all of the other thirteen. "'It cost me some years of doubt and unhappiness,' the Justice has avowed, 'before I could say to myself: "The law is part of the universe—if the universe can be thought about, one part must reveal it as much as another to one who can see that part. It is only a question if you have the eyes."'" Miss Sergeant has seen all of her people in the light of some universal vision in their eyes of which their artistic or professional activities are only shadows. She could not have become interested, it seems, in an actress who was merely an actress; the actress must be an artist, the artist must be adjusted to the universe and important in it.

Paradoxically, and quite naturally, it is because of her intense occupation with universals that Miss Sergeant can be so effectively particular in her portraits. That is why she makes us see Amy Lowell, for instance, so clearly—both as a body and as a mind. The detail of William Alanson White's half-hour alone each day, or of Elinor Wylie's silver pen, or of Pauline Lord's frightened voice, or of H. L. Mencken's baby-blue eyes, or of Robert Frost's gray skin, or of Justice Holmes's Harvard secretary—any one of these is more than picturesque. It is revealing. Miss Sergeant reminds us that good biographers, like other good artists, are possessed of a metaphysic and an imagination.

Turkey, Egypt, India

The Changing East. By J. A. Spender. Frederick A. Stokes. $4.

IN this record of recent journeys to Turkey, Egypt, and India by one of the ablest journalists of our time liberals will find much to interest and encourage them. For Mr. Spender is a political investigator of no ordinary competence. He brought with him not only a wide range of political experience but special knowledge gained from earlier visits to two of these three lands of unrest. Egypt he had studied in 1919-1920, as a member of the Milner Mission, and he had spent several months in India fourteen years ago. Turkey was new to him, as it is new to everyone, even to the Turks themselves, for the present Turkey is a post-war transformation scene.

Though we have vivid travel pictures in all his chapters, it is the political enigmas presented by these countries that are his absorbing topics. The Turkish situation he presents in Constantinople and Angora. "Constantinople is the unsolved problem of the New Turkey. Kemal has deliberately turned his back on Constantinople and taken his Government into the wilds of Asia Minor"—a feat of almost incredible difficulty and daring, undertaken to escape the paralyzing influence of the West. No man of less personality than Kemal, the all-potent statesman of the New Turkey, could have attempted this task. Its success remains doubtful. For the politically enfeebled Constantinople remains a chief gateway to the East, a coveted object to its European neighbors. Mr. Spender takes for granted the wisdom of the enforced breakup of pre-war Turkey, though regretting the mishandling of the Mosul affairs by Britain.

Frankly admitting "the series of blunders which has produced the present situation" in Egypt, he sees no final and immediate remedy. For he firmly indorses the imperialist thesis that complete independence cannot be accorded to Egypt either in her own interest or in Britain's. For Egypt lies so directly along the highway to India that we cannot "let her go" entirely. "So long as we have an Eastern empire, we and the Egyptians must live together. Our partnership may take different forms, but it cannot be dissolved." Indeed, the educated Egyptians do not seriously desire our exodus, notwithstanding their agitating propaganda. For they know that the choice is "between one kind of patron and another—the British patron, the French patron, the Italian patron." In other words, we must safeguard by what force is necessary "the security of the Suez Canal, the status quo in the Sudan, the maintenance of order and solvency in Egypt proper." With these simple provisos we are willing to give sovereignty and independence! It is fair, however, to insist, as Mr. Spender does, upon the real services, economic and political, that the British occupation has rendered to the Egyptian people.

The Indian problem is more entangled, but Mr. Spender does his best to straighten out the main issues. He shows us the new spirit of unrest, partly as an industrial and religious reaction against the West, partly as the expression of a new and fervent patriotism. American readers will find a clearer and more compact presentment of the situation than they can elsewhere in the same compass. Mr. Spender is far from despondent. He detects an improved state of feeling since his last visit. The British officials are abandoning what he terms the "Peter Pan theory" under which the competent Indian civil servant was the ideal permanent guardian for a child never destined to grow up. On the other hand, he thinks that India is far too deeply committed to Western ways to wish to revert to her old life—social, economic, or political. Mr. Spender gives life and reality to his study by accounts of his visits to three famous Indians—the poet Tagore, the saint Gandhi, and the cricketer-prince Ranjitsinhjo, who administers patriarchal justice in the little state of Nawanager. A most informing and delightful book.

The Eighteenth-Century South

Two Gentlemen in Bonds. By John Crowe Ransom. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

THE fourth volume of John Crowe Ransom's poetry is not the equal in brilliant variety of technical effect or in range of subject-matter of "Chills and Fever," issued in 1924. But on the whole it is nevertheless the qualitative equal of anything else he has done. And to one who has followed the growth of Mr. Ransom's art from the beginning—a privilege only a few had, and one not so widely coveted, by the method of belated recovery, as it should be—the present collection precipitates the particular essence which is Ransom. The essence is here stripped of the equivocating decoration and virtuosity which have given his art much of its charm yet concealed its chief intentions from all but the most curious and unwearying eyes. It may be, of course, that further additions to the testament complete now with this volume would cry out redundancy—that Mr. Ransom had overwritten himself. However that may be, there would seem to be some profit in the attempt to isolate his motives and qualities, now that they are, from the artistic point of view, fully delineated; and this inquiry entails some comment upon his position in space and time, and upon his origins in that continuum.

In this connection it is worth recalling to mind that certain of Mr. Robert Graves's remarks on Mr. Ransom's English publication, "Grace After Meat," constitute one of the most astonishing criticisms of American poetry, among many astonishing criticisms, that we have yet heard. Mr. Graves, in effect, announced to the British public that here was a poet giving utterance to the illiterates and poor white of Tennessee, erroneously connecting Mr. Ransom with the Middle West revival then in progress for some years. Involved in Mr. Graves's assertion were two mistakes—a mistake in identifying Ransom's subject-matter (and this it would be impossible to condone even in Professor Phelps) and a mistaken analysis of the quality of intellect controlling and illuminating the material. For Mr. Ransom is the last pure manifestation of the culture of the eighteenth-century South; the moral issues which emerge transfigured in his poetry are the moral issues of his section, class, culture, referred to their simple, fundamental properties. It is a great error to attribute the Southern quality to post-bellum sentimentalism alone, and to repudiate it at its best. The mistake must be charged to that corruption in the critical mind which supposes the vulgar fripperies and superior rudenesses of Mr. James Branch Cabell to be representative of his culture.

Two of Mr. Ransom's qualities in especial connect him with the culture which in its prime registered its genius in politics and law: rationalism and the code of noblesse oblige. These qualities, informing every poem, dictate the direction of his artistic vision from all starting-points whatever. Rationalism, not in the sense popularized by the philosophes, but in the older and purer sense of the humane tradition, a tradition lying at the very core of the old Southern order, stiffens his poetry with an irony and lucidity, and a subtlety, which elevate it with a unique distinction in the present American scene. His rationalism is the evaluating instrument of the code of honor; it gives the code profundity and edge; it is the weapon of casuistry. The system of casuistry appears in a kind of solemn dandyism, but back of the dandyism lurks a profound stoicism, and an immovable detachment which feeds upon an intellect always sufficient unto itself. All the emotional crises of Mr. Ransom's poems, even of the occasional essays into sheer lyricism like Vision by Sweetwater, hinge upon the single conviction—noblesse oblige. There are, of course, two sides to the medallion; in poems like The Equilibrists and Dead Boy, more vaguely if more subtly in the sonnets Two Gentlemen in Bonds, Mr. Ransom can render a beautiful commentary upon his tragic personal vision because he accepts the code within which the characters struggle; elsewhere, when he cannot accept their code, as in Amphibious Crocodile, he pours out the meager yet venomous acid of his satire. In every poem he is either the satirist or the ironist; and as a fine minor artist he has always the same thing to say, in new and unpredictable images.

Fresh and Sophisticated

One Crystal and a Mother. By Ellen DuPois Taylor. Harper and Brothers. $2.

ELLEN DuPOIS TAYLOR first crossed my path in the remarkable short story "Calico" reprinted in "Transatlantic Stories." That was the drama of a Dakota farm and village, as stark as the treeless Dakota plains on which Mrs. Taylor spent her own childhood. This new book, her first novel, tells in the first person the story of a hard-boiled virgin of thirty who comes to Chicago from the prairies to seek adventure and finds it as a sob-sister on the Times.

Here is the swift flow of a city seen through a fresh though sophisticated gaze. The "I" by whom the story is told had spent long nights and days on that Dakota farm with Madame de Sévigné and Ninon de Lenclos. She had yearned to be kissed by a clean-shaven young man "who did not think Verlaine a new kind of horse liniment," and wondered, in wistful cosmopolitan dreams, how absinthe would taste in the company of George Moore. It was with discrimination as well as avidity that she watched the motley reel of rich man, poor man, beggar man, and thief which is the peculiar spectacle of the reporter on a big city daily.

Now that John Gunther is being hailed as a young Aldous Huxley come out of the Middle West because of the alleged sophistication and erudition of his Chicago story, "The Red Pavilion," I am afraid that a like superficiality will bracket the names of Mrs. Taylor and Carl Van Vechten—afraid because Mrs. Taylor has powerful qualities of her own which might be obscured by offhand comparisons. Certainly to my way of thinking, Mr. Van Vechten might have been proud to have created the fabulous Clementes, Crystal and her mother, who give the book its title; or the hemi-plegic Baron Liebenhofen, Dr. George Barbe Bleu, Miss Towerhight of Virginia, Grigio, and the rest. They are as gorgeous and as erudite as the companions of Campaspe. Yet behind the fun and the fable there lies a hard, clear depth of wisdom which gives them a vitality more resistant than the silken cushions against which Mr. Van Vechten's folk lie.

The explanation lies, I fancy, in that Dakota background, in the fact that Mrs. Taylor had learned to see and accept kitchen chairs before she stepped into an environment of chaises longues. She had mastered a realistic corner of the universe before she embarked in this wise and poetic extravaganza; it forms not a smart escape, but a further elucidation of processes of life which must always remain mysterious to those who are sensitive and intelligent. Perhaps most of the best nonsense grows out of learning and sober experience in a world which is here and now. "Thomas Ingoldsby" (Richard Harris Barham) was a deeply respected clergyman and a learned antiquarian; Lewis Carroll, a mathematician and an ordained deacon; W. S. Gilbert, magistrate for Middlesex; and Stephen Leacock is a professor of political economy.

MARY ROSS

Women at Work

Occupations for Women. Edited by O. Latham Hatcher. Richmond, Virginia: Southern Woman's Educational Alliance. $3.50.

Fields of Work for Women. By Miriam Simons Leuck. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

THE object of the editors of "Occupations for Women," one of the few interesting books in its field, has been to give as human and as social an interpretation of the various occupations open for women as is consistent with the mass of information to be included. The book is intended as an aid to all those called upon to advise girls in the choice of an occupation and for the use of the girls themselves. It is based upon interviews with 1,173 men and women from whom schedules were filed, upon correspondence with various specialists, and upon compilations from printed sources. Specialists consulted under the head of writing include James Branch Cabell and Ellen Glasgow. After each of the twenty-eight chapters on the leading occupations a report is made on women engaged in that occupation in the two cities of Richmond, Virginia, and Atlanta, Georgia. Thus the flavor of actuality is secured, as it was in Filene's "Careers for Women," while the choppy presentation of the Filene book has been avoided. Most of all, "Occupations for Women" benefits from the calm and unified approach which makes each topic studied appear as an integrated part of the division of social labor. There is no prating about the dignity of work, but the entire book has been conceived in a manner for which the word dignity is the only one suitable.

Dr. Hatcher feels that Southern women, coming late to the world of the occupations, may catch the stimulus from women in the other parts of the country and move forward in some cases more rapidly because of this late entrance. Occupations in which women are engaged are classified under three heads: those which the public considers especially suited to women, such as nursing and teaching of children; those usually accepted as suitable for both men and women, such as creative arts and social work; and those accepted as primarily for men, such as medicine, law, and engineering. More important even than the general low grading of women within any occupational field open to both sexes there is found to be "a sub-zone of activity, one usually down below the level where the business or profession as such begins, and in which the work is entirely performed by women. To this zone, by the working of an apparently unerring instinct, the routine and mechanical detail, stripped of real initiative, is relegated as rapidly as it can be analyzed and segregated. It is one which the masculine sex enters only to decide what is to be done." Thus in thousands of organizations women are found to have become the mental hewers of wood and drawers of water. This is partly ascribed to the prevalent business conception of women as "detail-minded," although no psychological evidence exists of this, and partly, among other things, to the spirit of compromise and discouragement which often grows upon the pioneer woman professional worker. Further handicaps are found in the lack of vocational information open to women and the fact that most women grope their way into an occupation, and in the meagerness of education of many women workers.

Miriam Simons Leuck's book is written in simpler fashion, and is addressed primarily to girls and women who have completed at least one or two years of high-school work. It makes the very excellent point that girls must begin to gain an acquaintance with the occupational world in the same fashion as their brothers—by odd jobs, summer work, etc. On a larger scale this idea has been put into practice at Goucher College and at Antioch, where the attempt is made to combine academic work with the gaining of experience in the occupations. After several brief preliminary chapters some twenty chapters are devoted to an analysis of occupations open to women. In the discussion of "why women fail" Mrs. Leuck's emphasis on tardiness and conversation during office hours as causes of women's failure seems a bit naive, while the assertion made here and later that the married woman is a more desirable employee than the unmarried can only be regarded as a wish-fulfilment. She declares that the married woman is usually better disciplined; that the department store welcomes a married woman because she can better appreciate the point of view of the buyer for the family; and that in general the married woman has an advantage in competing for such posts as dean of women. All of which is apple-sauce. However, the point of view is optimistic and sane, and much practical advice is given from which a young girl worker might profit—if she could be induced to read the book.

LORINE PRUETTE

A Chastened Tabby

Doomsday. By Warwick Deeping. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THIS new novel by the author of "Sorrell and Son" is a study of a shallow woman. The first of the three parts, Bean Flower and Hay Time, is a fragrant cinema of the English soil and of the man, the farmer, who is responsible for its successful processes. Arnold Furze, a gentleman and not a peasant, does not permit the land to brutalize him, although at times it comes perilously near doing so. The descriptions of Mary Viner and of spring in the Sussex meadows are the truly lovable portion.

A strong contrast to this Arcady from which a discontented and ambitious girl escapes is furnished in the section called Orchid House. It is an artificial episode and it glides by us surface deep, for the author has not soaked up Wayfleet as he has Sussex, although Clare the sister is admirable—a transparent miniature done in hard lines. So also are Hesketh Viner and his wife, pathetic counter-portraits drooping in a corner. With their death the story goes on the down grade. Mary's matrimonial venture is a failure, the millionaire, Percival Fream, a strange incoherent machine which stalls heavily at the last. After he is disposed of Mary reappears, poverty stricken, to assume avidly the tasks she shirked before in careful preparation for life with her neglected farmer.

We wish that Arnold of the despised country mud had shaken her off forever. But Arnold, as big, gruff, and aloof as a Scotch sheep-dog and a trifle too atmospheric, though very, very consistent, is tired, abominably lonely, and sensitive to repeated onslaughts. Mary comes after him bodily and there is the inevitable conclusion. We are left with no feeling of intense interest in Mary, for she is not built on large enough lines to be a Joanna Godden; her final surrender is too abject. How different is the figure of Joanna, who could take or leave with sincerity and nobility because she is of the earth, from that of Mary Viner, a comfortable little pussy cat, a chastened tabby who has learned her lesson by having her cream snatched away!

LAURA BENÉT

Jazz, That Ubiquitous Spirit!

So This is Jazz! By Henry O. Osgood. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

"JAZZ: (orig. Africa) v. to enliven; pop. to pep up; adj. jazzy, applied to manners, morals, and especially music; n. jazz, pepped-up music—or pepped-up most anything else." Mr. Osgood's definition embraces his own book, which is most concisely described as a small amount of desired information, a greater amount of undesired opinion, and an overabundance of undesirable pepping-up (the effort for color and smartness in the manner is undesirable when it causes a writer to look less steadfastly at the matter, and when the result is color and smartness in statements but contradiction between them. Mr. Osgood's third chapter is an awful example of the power of words to obscure and corrupt thought. In it the confused reasoning that follows is further confused by the manner of the expression).

It is clear enough that when we use the word jazz we mean not any pepped-up music but one type; and this must be clear to Mr. Osgood, for he begins the chapter by accepting as correct the musical definition of Mr. Virgil Thomson: "Jazz, in brief, is a compound of (a) the fox-trot rhythm . . . and (b) a syncopated melody over this rhythm." But his attention is distracted by the subject of jazzing serious music; and when he resumes after three pages it is to reject both the syncopation and the fox-trot rhythm he had accepted (and other supposed characteristics as well) and to insist upon the "unbuttoned" spirit as alone essential. He points to the "Volga Boat Song" and Tchaikovsky's "Andante Cantabile": they are perfect jazz when played as fox-trots; and since the Tchaikovsky can be jazzed with profit to itself (a judgment that shall not pass) it must have the jazz spirit within it. And since jazz is an expression of a lively spirit, any expression of this lively spirit —e.g., Schubert's "Deutsche Tänze"—is jazz. This is just verbal trickery and a waste of time: Mr. Osgood wants to confound us with his cleverness and superior knowledge; and also to show his good sense in a matter in which others are silly prudes or self-righteous hypocrites, the matter of jazzing serious music. For if serious composers have written jazz then writers of jazz may jazz serious music.

That is the argument of the intervening three-page discussion of the subject. It is by the use he makes of the stolen theme that the thief must be judged, says Mr. Osgood correctly. Reger's cumbersome variations on Mozart's dainty theme are, then, an outrage; those of Beethoven on a waltz of Diabelli, or of Brahms on a serious theme of Haydn, justify themselves. And having justified Brahms's procedure by the quality of its result, Mr. Osgood insists that it amounts to jazzing (livening up) Haydn's theme, so that now Harry Carroll is justified in jazzing a theme of Chopin! But he is further justified by the quality of the result; and I shall not comment on the taste and judgment of a man who holds that Carroll did not spoil the melody of Chopin's "Fantasie-Impromptu" when he removed from it every trace of rhythmic subtlety and reduced it to the inane sing-song of "I'm Always Chasing Rainbows"; and who offers this perversion to the multitude as evidence that Chopin's originals are catchy tunes.

A Memoir of Alexander Gordon Cummins Harvey. Edited with an Introduction by Francis W. Hirst. London: R. Cobden-Sanderson. 5/.

During the past century Lancashire has produced a small but serviceable stock of shrewd public-spirited Liberal politicians who have striven, not always successfully, to keep their country in the safe path of peace and economy. Alexander Gordon Cummins Harvey was of this stock, and the "Memoir" shows him to have been a business man who took public duties seriously. He combined the principles of the Manchester school with certain elements of the new radicalism expounded by the early Joseph Chamberlain, including advanced land reforms, local option, and reform of the House of Lords. Sitting in the House of Commons from 1906 to 1917 he strove to preserve Liberal principles in war time, opposing conscription and protection and supporting the attempt of Lord Lansdowne to bring about a peace by negotiation in 1917. As an employer he was a pioneer in "welfare work" and an energetic supporter of schemes for efficient popular education.

Tom-Tom. By John W. Vandercook. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

Studies of the Bush Negroes of Suriname, Dutch Guiana, are not numerous, and they are, except for this book, nonexistent in English. Mr. Vandercook is not an ethnologist, and he exhibits some tendency to be mystical about the adaptation of black folk to the jungles in which they live, but he is a shrewd observer of the life of the people whom he and his wife visited, and the telling of it all is vivid. It is to be hoped that the work he plans to do in Liberia will contain all the desirable qualities of this work, not the least being its readableness.

Which Way Parnassus? By Percy Marks. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

"Which Way Parnassus?" may prove a safe guidebook to the realm of higher education for those not booked to make the journey. It repeats certain popular indictments against the management of American colleges, but throws no new light on a problem that merits intelligent attack. Discriminating readers will be disappointed in this performance by one who boasts about his opportunities for observation. It is especially rich in misinterpretations of phases of college life which the author has observed and now undertakes to ridicule.

Cargoes and Harvests. By Donald Culross Peattie. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

It requires ten times as much acreage to grow cattle as it does to grow a corresponding food value of wheat, and more for game than for cattle—which is one reason why our ancestors gave up hunting in favor of herding, and herding in favor of agriculture. But despite the venerability of the spice trade, 90 per cent of the tropics is still virgin jungle—the richest soil in the world. Mr. Peattie sketches the romantic history of the trade in tropical products—quinine, tea, camphor; potato, cotton, and tobacco from the New World; poppy; and chaulmoogra, which has doomed leprosy. It is an exciting, neglected chapter of history.

Social Progress. By Ulysses G. Weatherly. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.

The author of this volume in analyzing the dynamics of change propounds his personal predilections and learned prejudices in the fields of biology, anthropology, and sociology. The book is replete with specious generalizations which include such old chestnuts as "the natural conservatism of women" and "without a radical metamorphosis of men's minds no fundamental change in institutions or laws would very much alter the real situation." As a college text, the book will do little to stimulate the spirit of intellectual adventure, the absence of Lincoln's Parentage and Childhood. By Louis A. Warren. The Century Company. $3.50.

When Miss Tarbell and Mr. Barton published the results of their independent investigations into Lincoln's ancestry there was some reason to believe that this phase of Lincoln history had been brought to the point of saturation. Mr. Warren, following up with researches on his own account, reveals the existence of many additional official references to the Lincoln and Hanks families in Kentucky, and quotes from records previously unpublished to show the good character and public spirit of Lincoln's immediate forebears. The book is carefully and cautiously written, and is a worth-while addition to the ever growing library of Lincolniana.

Land Planning in the United States for the City, State, and Nation. By Harlean James. The Macmillan Company. $5.

Had the author's critical discussion of the moot points of land planning been as complete as his scholarly account of the history of the movement in America, he would have made a remarkable contribution to the literature of the subject. Even as it is, the book offers a mass of information that is obtainable in such concise form nowhere else, and its valuable bibliographies make it an excellent book of reference. Yet one misses in it the touch of criticism or creative imagination; one misses any complete consideration of the revolutionary economic implications of the subject.

Drama

On Makebelieve and Acting

DESPITE the vigorous propaganda which has been carried on in its favor the Russian conception of the actor's art has had no great influence upon the American theater. Though the visits of the Moscow company awakened appropriate enthusiasm, and though both Ouspenskaya the player and Boleslavsky the director remained among us, our actors have for the most part been content to remain what they always were—more or less clever improvisers who may not inappropriately be compared to those musicians who play by ear.

Temperament and imagination—the native endowments of the good amateur—are the qualities upon which they chiefly rely, and they achieve the majority of their effects by following their instincts. At their worst they are the mere types whose peculiarities are recorded on the alphabetized cards in the casting-director's office and who, having been selected as costumes are selected, are turned loose to "behave" upon the stage. At their best they are petted and not infrequently spoiled children with a child's gift for ingenuous makebelieve. Provided with a part—preferably one which affords them some of the emotional satisfactions of the fantasy, one in which, as they put it, they can "see" themselves—they proceed to imagine that they are the person represented and they play the part as a child would play it.

Sometimes the result is effective enough—witness for example the crisp cynical old men of George Arliss or the bright epigrammatic ladies frequently impersonated by Mrs. Fiske. But sometimes it is no less than distressing, as it is, for example, when Mrs. Fiske tries to imagine herself Mrs. Alving or when some spoiled darling lets herself go in a part which she likes too well. Moreover the whole method is, as a method, open at least to the theoretical objection that the thing which it leads to is not an art at all but merely a temperamental indulgence. Like the fine frenzy and the native wood notes wild of the poet as he is popularly conceived, it is something in which intelligence and technique play a much smaller part than they do in the finest achievements of genuine art.

Now doubtless some exaggeration is involved in this statement and some injustice done to many of our actors who have added unto themselves, to a greater or less degree, some skill in the art of consciously controlled portraiture. It does, however, serve to define the essential feature of the American method and to contrast it with that of the Russians who regard temperament and imagination as aids to perception but who make expression a matter of considered effects planned by the intelligence and executed by a body trained to respond to the mind which manipulates it. And it will explain also why most American acting, being as it is hardly art at all, defies any attempt to criticize it. What we see generally upon the stage is a sort of monstrum ingens, something which is half the actor himself and half the character he is supposed to be playing. The nearer the two happen in a particular case to be identical or the nearer the actor comes to a mastery of his art the less insistent is the effect of two superimposed images; but it is rare indeed that this effect is entirely lost and that one does not have the impulse to say, as one would say to a friend at a costume ball: "Not half bad, old man, but I can see you behind your false whiskers nevertheless."

Mr. Boleslavsky, who has labored for some time now with his pupils at the American Laboratory Theater, has at last brought one of the school experiments to Broadway and gives us an opportunity to study his method in his production of Clemence Dane's "Granite" (Mayfair Theater). Something of a triumph for the director though it is, it is not wholly fortunate as an educational exhibit, for the simple reason that all the skill which has been lavished upon the direction cannot make it other than a rather unsatisfactory play. The scene is laid upon a lonely island off the English coast, the characters are a set of strange wild people, and the action is rather childishly weird and violent. Acted in any simple and straightforward manner it would seem only rather frantic and unconvincing; acted as Mr. Boleslavsky has caused it to be acted it captures the spectator in spite of himself and leaves him with the feeling that he has been tricked into a momentary suspension of his disbelief which was hardly worth his while. Artificial in every detail, the production takes on that sort of credibility which complete consistency always has. Every moment, every accent, and every stage picture has been deliberately planned with reference to a total effect and in harmony with a predetermined style. A tense and ominous expectancy governs each gesture and fills the scene. As a result, artifice triumphs, and one surrenders oneself to something which, however unreal and without significance, undoubtedly has an existence of its own. Between such a production and a first-rate play acted in the ordinary hit-or-miss American fashion I should have no hesitance in choosing the first-rate play, but even in "Granite" is illustrated the nature of a genuine theatrical art capable, when applied to better material, of achieving effects which we are seldom fortunate enough to see upon our stage.

"Earth" (Fifty-second Street Theater) is the second production of the new Playwrights' Theater and is to alternate with "Loud Speaker." A play dealing imaginatively with the struggle between Christianity and Voodooism among the Negroes, it achieves, in spite of certain crudities, some effective assaults upon emotion in the scenes which employ the songs and shouts characteristic of the Negro's religious ecstasies. "The Mystery Ship" (Garrick Theater) is a play in which the terrifying effects failed lamentably to terrify its audience; "Menace" (Forty-ninth Street Theater) is a melodrama with the scene laid on one of the small islands of Japan and composed for the most part of familiar melodramatic cliches—the murderer who killed to protect a woman's honor, the artlessly ardent and artless ferocious native girl, and the American virgin who successfully appeals to all a white man's better nature. At the Civic Repertory Theater a well-played revival of Susan Glaspell's "Inheritors" has been added to the already rich list of current offerings.

The Bulgarian Worker

THE representatives of the Independent Council of Labor Unions recently met with Prime Minister Liaptcheff and presented the following report:

The conditions of the working class in Bulgaria are very bad. The industrial, economic, and financial crisis has reached a perilous stage.

The social-welfare laws, which are a vital necessity for the workers and which are so frequently praised, are not in force.

The buildings in which the laborers work lack the most elementary hygienic requirements. No sanitary control is exercised and the worker's family receives no medical care. The workshops, the factories, the offices, the stores, and other public institutions are filled with working children of both sexes. No restriction whatsoever is placed upon child labor. In factories and workshops the working women are subjected to vulgar insults.

The eight-hour working day was long ago discarded.

The textile workers in Sliven and Gabrovo, the workers in the sugar factories in Gorna Orechovitza, Philippopolis, Rustchuk, and Kayalee, the tanneries in Gabrovo and Sofia, the miners in Pernik and Plackalnitza as well as in other state and private mines have long forgotten that there was a time when they worked only eight hours. The bakers and waiters work fourteen hours a day. The printers work more than nine hours daily. The employers are trying to replace the seven-hour Saturday with one of eight. The workers in the little workshops of the artisans—the shoemakers and the tailors—because of the system of piece-work that has been introduced work more than twelve hours daily. The barbers' helpers work without any definite time limit. Carpenters and iron laborers also work more than ten hours a day. Farm laborers and lumbermen work from thirteen to fifteen hours a day. Generally speaking the working classes have been deprived of holidays and Sundays.

Besides all this there are a great number of persons without work. Thousands of tobacco workers, especially in Philippopolis, Haskovo, Stanimaka, Dubnitza, and Sofia are perishing because of lack of work; their days are full of tragedy and misery. Thousands of builders wander from town to town, throughout the whole country, looking for a chance to sell their labor. There are also many thousands of workers from the mines, sugar factories, cloth, leather, and metal factories without work.

The terrible poverty of the workers who are without jobs has driven multitudes to desperation and many have committed suicide. There are at present in Bulgaria not fewer than 300,000 workers and their dependents who have no means of livelihood whatsoever. This is a monstrous evil for Bulgaria. To this we must add the appallingly small daily wages received in Bulgaria, which average only a little over a shilling a day.

But this is not the worst. Not only is the working class crushed economically but it is also deprived of the right of organizing in professional organizations and of struggling in a legal way for better living conditions. The workers in the state mine at Pernik are most brutally treated whenever they try to form an organization. The tobacco laborers in Philippopolis, Stanimaka, Dubnitza, and in other places have been prevented from forming labor unions. The city authorities at Lom prohibited the dock workers from forming a union.

The sheriffs in Dubnitza, Keustendil, Vratsa, Lom, Eski-Djumia, Etropole, Pleven, Tatar-Pazardjik, Stanimaka, Nova Zagora, Yambol, Troyan, and other places have deprived the workers of the right to carry on labor propaganda and to organize independent labor and professional unions.

Inasmuch as no labor union can be formed until the Ministry of the Interior officially approves its constitution and by-laws the whole labor movement is held up in the offices of the Ministry. Requests for the ratification of the constitution of certain unions have gone unanswered for months and even years. The Independent Council of Labor Unions has already waited more than five months for the ratification of its constitution. The Labor Union of Tobacco Workers in Philippopolis has waited more than a year to be legalized. At Pernik the local authorities even refuse to forward the constitution of the union to the Ministry for ratification. The Sofia shoemakers have waited more than a year for their constitution to be ratified. The authorities at Tatar-Pazardjik, Stanimaka, Nova Zagora, Yambol, Lom, and other places also refuse to send the constitutions of labor unions to Sofia for ratification. The mayor of the village Orechovitza in the district of Stara Zagora has declared that if the farm laborers dare to meet to form a union they will all be interned. Certain persons who tried to form a labor union in Etropole were arrested as though they were the vilest criminals. . . .

The police crushed the strike of the laborers in the car factory at Drenovo. The same thing happened in the strike of the tobacco workers at Vratsa. The police dispersed a meeting of the striking shoemakers in Sofia last year and several days ago some of the printers, who had been locked out of the largest printing office in Sofia on January 6 and who are now struggling to compel the management to take them back on the same working conditions that existed before the lockout, were arrested. . . .

Local authorities in Lom, Dubnitza, Keustendil, Stanimaka, Etropole, and other places have forbidden the workers to receive the absolutely legal and law-abiding paper of the Labor Union Council, Edinstvo (Unity).

In view of all this the Independent Council of Labor Unions asks the Bulgarian Government to secure to the laborer his right to create and develop his labor union without hindrance.

We also ask that we be allowed to form unions without waiting for a ratification of our constitutions by the Ministry of the Interior.

We request the Government to give material aid to the people without work, to enforce the social-welfare laws, to limit the speculation with food products by fixing maximum prices, and to give its attention to the housing crisis.

In his reply Prime Minister Liaptcheff said:

Industrial crises often occur. Sometimes they become so severe that they threaten the existence of a social class and so jeopardize public safety. No such crisis exists in Bulgaria. Crises are not overcome by laws. There is speculation, but we cannot do away with it by means of maximum prices. In the opinion of the Government there is no housing crisis. The state does not intend to build houses. There are many laborers out of work. We are trying to do away with that by developing our industry, especially by giving concessions to foreign capital. In every social conflict the Government defends the weaker side; that is why it has created social-welfare laws. I shall do what I can to have them strictly enforced.

You complain of our administration. The police authorities are afraid that, as ex-Communists, when you organize in labor unions you may later become the tools of political organizations with alien ideals. I do not share this fear. Act within the limits of the law, work for the interests of the laboring classes in Bulgaria, and I shall do what I can to bring about a change in the treatment accorded you.

I shall take your report under consideration and do whatever I can to satisfy your demands. I shall endeavor to see that freedom is given every labor union which acts within the limits of the law, and shall do what is necessary to have your constitutions ratified.

The ancient battle cry of FREEDOM

Rings from this novel. From coast to coast Sinclair Lewis's ELMER GANTRY is delivering its blow against the tyranny of organized puritanism, against religious hypocrisy.

"The possible effects of 'Elmer Gantry' are incalculable. Like 'Main Street' and 'Babbitt' before it, it may give the language a new term of opprobrium, and so color the whole stream of the national thought."
—H. L. MENCKEN

Violence in Bulgaria

THE document printed below came from a wholly trustworthy source in Bulgaria to the International Committee for Political Prisoners.

Sofia, February 8

On June 9, 1923, a group of conspirators made up of officers, reserve officers, and professors in Bulgaria overthrew the Agrarian government which was in power at that time, arrested hundreds of prominent Agrarians, killed many others including the Prime Minister, Stambouliisky, and formed a Cabinet of self-appointed ministers who ruled the country for two and a half years. During that time a great deal of violence occurred and many victims fell on both sides, the adherents of the conspirators' Government losing about 300 people, including 160 killed by the setting off of a bomb in a church, and the people's parties losing a number estimated at between 6,000 to 18,000 people. Most of the peasants and Communists who fell were killed after an abortive, utterly ineffectual and not very dangerous uprising in September, 1923, and after the terrible church explosion in April, 1925.

During this bloody period the conspiratory Government was in strict control of the press and by the application of a stringent law for the defense of the state prevented any one from speaking or writing about the victims.

At last, however, the question of atrocities has been opened by the whole Sofia press and now the attacks on the Government are being made not by "destructive" left-wing Communists and Agrarians but by perfectly patriotic Nationalists, Democrats, and Socialists. The police cannot throttle all these people without utterly compromising the Government, so during the last few days much has been written about atrocities.

The Socialist paper for several days ferociously denounced the Government for the outrages and massacres which occurred between September, 1923, and December, 1925. The Government papers answered in a painfully self-righteous and solemn way: "Yes, there were excesses, but we saved the state and it was justifiable to resort to any kind of measures to save Bulgaria; besides it was not the army but the militia which committed the atrocities, and furthermore, all the bourgeois parties and even the Socialists had a hand in the slaughtering of Communists and peasants." In a word, there was a great slaughter of the people, but it was necessary for the salvation of the state. And besides, it was the open season for killing Communists and Agrarians, and everybody was taking a hand in it.

Concerning the atrocities the Banner, which is the organ of an irreproachably bourgeois party, asks: "Is it not true that various gangs, 'black-hand' groups, and secret societies were permitted to operate in the name of the state and even to place themselves above the state, and did they not cover the name of Bulgaria with shame?"

The Narod, the organ of the Socialist Party, writes: "It is not a question of the people who fell during the actual skirmishes between two armed groups. We are speaking of the atrocities which have since occurred, even up to the present time. Municipal councils are dissolved by force; innocent citizens are arrested, the meetings of political opponents are prohibited; secret societies attack, beat, and torment the opponents of the Government.

"We are raising a question about all those people who were taken from the jails and the Bureaus of Public Safety in order to be murdered while they were in the hands of the authorities. We are speaking of that great mass of people butchered without trial and without sentence.

"The responsibility for the atrocities and the murders committed upon imprisoned citizens by the servants of the state does not fall upon any one but the state authorities. And a list of these atrocities is a terrible judgment upon the present Government.

"This list was enlarged during the months of September and August, 1926. At that time in an effort to stamp out brigandage in the counties of Troyan and Lovetch masses of people were killed, in one bunch 11, in another 9, in a third 8, another 4, and so on. (It is reported that not fewer than 120 people were massacred altogether.) . . ."

On January 4, 1926, the conspiratory Government fell from power and was succeeded by the Cabinet of Andrew Liaptcheff, who, though supported by the same parliamentary group which legalized the Government of the conspirators, has governed the country vastly better than his predecessors. Nevertheless, as the Narod says, violence continues.

For example, the Radical, the organ of a small but very scrupulous bourgeois party, writes in a leading article on February 2:

"Arrests, torture in the prisons, assault, and threats are the commonest government practices. The facts which we have been publishing from day to day show how the Government is preparing for the coming election. The party in power is determined to regain the sinister reputation it had before the advent of Mr. Liaptcheff, during January of last year. On the evening of January 26 in the town of Kazanluk our friend, the universally esteemed citizen Mr. Andrew Ovcharoff, a member of our supreme Party Council, was seized by the police and taken to the Bureau of Public Safety where he had to spend twelve hours in an unheated, bare, and dirty cell, although he was guilty of no crime of any sort. Mr. Ovcharoff was treated by the police like an ordinary criminal on the pretext that he did not happen to have his identification card with him. The outrage was perpetrated not on a member of the Agrarian League in an out of the way village but on an exemplary citizen, a member of the bourgeois party in one of Bulgaria's most cultured centers.

"Here is another case. The mayor of the village of Vulchidrum, our friend Kiril Lazaroff, called a meeting of the municipal councilors, the school inspectors, and several other prominent villagers to discuss important matters concerning the whole village. They had barely begun their meeting before they were attacked by armed secret police, who arrested them and took them to jail. After that they were taken under guard twenty miles from the village and at that time the village councilor, John Mihailoff, was beaten; the president of the school board was beaten; and another councilor, Todor Ovcharoff, was almost choked to death. And all this was done for the purpose of compelling the village councilors to resign so that a committee of three might be appointed by the authorities to govern the village. . . ."

WE CONGRATULATE MR. BORAH that one of his colleagues has discovered an almost forgotten resolution of the Senate, adopted in 1921, providing that the regular standing committees "shall continue and have power to act until their successors are appointed." If the joke is rather on the Senate that its members could not recollect a resolution as important as this six years after it was passed, it is none the less gratifying to learn that Senator Borah can go ahead, call his Foreign Relations Committee together, and appoint a subcommittee to sit during the entire recess and deal with the China, Nicaraguan, and Mexican situations, and with any others which may arise. If there ever was a time when the State Department needed supervision and watching it is at present. As Walter Lippmann clearly demonstrated to the Foreign Policy Association in New York City on March 26, the Department has been guilty of falsification and misrepresentation. It has nobody to thank but itself if the public begins to feel that it is no longer to be trusted. Particularly is it necessary that the events in China be watched. Senator Borah voiced the feelings of multitudes of Americans when he pub licly thanked God that the Nationalists had entered Shanghai. Panicky admirals may injure our standing with the Chinese to an extent that will take us decades to overcome.

WE HOPE that Mr. Kellogg's office soviet read their Sunday papers carefully on March 27. For if they did they may have noticed small items reporting five intercollegiate debates on the question: Resolved, that this house approves the policy of the Coolidge Administration in Nicaragua. In the Wesleyan-Williams, Brown-Dartmouth, and Harvard-Princeton debates the judges were unanimous for the negative, and in each case the audience agreed with them. The judges, voting two to one, gave Yale, supporting the affirmative, the victory in the Yale-Princeton debate, but the audience disagreed; by a similar three-to-two vote the judges gave Harvard the victory over Yale at New Haven, and there again the audience voted in the negative. We doubt if any red-blooded American audience aware of the facts would vote support of the Coolidge-Kellogg policy of browbeating Nicaragua and Mexico. Unfortunately, not all Americans know the facts, and some Americans do not want other Americans to know them. The American Legion has appointed a committee to "investigate" the State Normal School of West Chester, Pa., charging it with "creating disrespect to the President and the Government" by questioning their Nicaraguan policy. Major John A. Farrell declared that there was no justification for students in a tax-supported institution to criticize the government that gives them an education. Major Farrell seems never to have heard of the theory, once current even in America, that the government was the servant of the people, not their boss.

LITTLE BROTHER DIAZ, "president" of Nicaragua by grace of the United States marines who uphold him—eight for every civilian American being protected—is to have another chance to kill his enemies. They have beaten him in battle after battle; and now the United States War Department has sold him 3,000 Krag rifles, 200 Browning machine-guns with accessories, and 3,000,000 rounds of ammunition, on credit. This matter of selling arms to defeated dictators might be criticized as poor business for the American Treasury; but for Nicaragua it has a double sting. The first of the notes given by Mr. Diaz in exchange for the guns comes due just after the expiration of his supposed term as president!

POOR GOVERNOR SMITH! A deadly blow was struck at his candidacy when President Wilson's Postmaster General, the Hon. A. S. Burleson of Texas, with his accustomed solemnity revealed his readiness to climb aboard the Smith band-wagon, and it was announced that T. W. Gregory, lately Attorney General in the same Cabinet, would soon follow suit. If "Al" Smith is wise he will stand on the running-board of his motorized Presidential band-wagon and beat off both of these Texas luminaries with the jack, or the tire-pump, or starter-crank, or any other implement that happens to be in the tool-box. No reader of The Nation needs to be reminded of the malodorous record of Burleson, the Wilsonian censor who was so busy destroying the little publications which refused to swallow the Wilsonian bunk about the war, or fail to remember Mr. Gregory's connection with the "Cheka" that sought to railroad to jail everyone who dared to exercise his historic American privilege to dissent in time of war. That such men as these are seeking to ally themselves with Governor Smith proves not only that his prospects are hourly becoming more assured, but also that his candidacy has reached that stage when the political humbugs and scalawags are rushing to be among the "original Smith men."

AT LAST A GERMAN COURT has found guilty some of the men of the former Black Reichswehr who amused themselves in 1922 and 1923 by murdering any members of their secret monarchist organization whom they suspected of betraying it. One trial after another has taken place with as disheartening results as our own efforts to put members of the Harding Cabinet into jail. One man, Lieutenant Schultz, was tried several times, and each time until now the court acquitted him. As he was charged with having directed no less than twelve assassinations the prosecuting authorities kept on trying him until he was finally convicted, with three officers who threw a sergeant major, whom they had beaten into unconsciousness, into the Havel River. When his body came to the surface they emptied their revolvers into it. No worse gang of official assassins ever operated. It must be a great relief to all decent Germans that at last there is evidence that they will meet with their just deserts. There is great difference of opinion as to the effectiveness of the remaining secret military organizations in Germany. The conviction of these men ought to help on their disintegration.

IN ONE CORNER of the British Empire the ancient conflict between East and West has reached an at least temporary solution. Relations between East Indian and white man in South Africa have been a problem ever since the planters of Natal induced their Governor to bring in cheap Indian agricultural laborers more than half a century ago. Mahatma Gandhi's name first became known in his home country when he gave up his law practice to defend the cause of his fellow-countrymen in South Africa twenty years ago. He preached and organized, and was imprisoned, and won the Smuts-Gandhi pact, which quieted agitation until after the war. When the empire was talking loudly of the equal rights of the Dominions, the Indians claimed equal citizenship in other parts of the empire. South Africa replied by imposing more restrictions upon her 160,000 Indian residents, and recently proposed still further restrictions, especially in the Areas Registration Bill. But whereas Indian delegations in other years have met with South African refusal to so much as sit down together, this year's delegation met a finer spirit. The result is a compromise agreement which promises equal privileges for Indians "prepared to conform to Western standards of life." The Areas Registration Bill will be dropped; Indians who wish to emigrate will be assisted by the South African Government; equal pay for equal work is assured; but South Africa's right to maintain "Western standards" in her own territory is reaffirmed. There are vague clauses in this agreement, which may lead to trouble. Everything depends upon the manner of its execution; but the facts that Gandhi indorses it and General Hertzog sponsors it are reasons for hope. Meanwhile the problem of the Blacks remains.

THREE GHASTLY HARBOR DISASTERS occurred within two months last winter, in which sixty-seven men lost their lives and more than a hundred were seriously injured. In November a series of explosions tore the oil tanker Mantilla to pieces in the harbor of Baltimore. Eighteen men engaged in reconditioning the vessel were killed and sixty-two were badly hurt. A few weeks later, in the same harbor, the barkentine Richelieu was loading explosives when a roar and a shock told the waterfront of another accident. Nine longshoremen perished and forty were severely burned. On December 20 the motor launch Linseed King was crossing the Hudson from New York City when a cake of floating ice battered a huge hole in the bow and the vessel plunged to the river's bottom, carrying forty longshoremen to their death, while many others suffered seriously from exposure in the icy water. It is not expected that the families of any of these victims will ever be able to collect a cent in recompense, because existing law limits liability to the value of the ship where the accident happened, and in all three cases the vessel was a total loss. No help can be had from State workmen's compensation acts, for in 1917 the federal Supreme Court ruled that the moment a man walks up a ship's gangplank he becomes a maritime worker and steps out from the protection of State legislation.

HAPPILY AFTER NEXT JULY this cruel situation will exist no longer. The tragedy of these victims and their dependents was not wholly in vain. It was the spur which made it possible for the American Association for Labor Legislation to push through Congress, in the very last hour of the last session—when a filibuster was holding up nearly all other legislation—a federal longshoremen's accident-compensation bill remedying the injustices and inadequacies of the old maritime law. The act will bring protection to a third of a million of workers in twenty-two different crafts. It includes not only men aboard a vessel engaged in loading and unloading, but also mechanics who are making changes or repairs, thus bringing protection to a large group of men who are subject to greater hazards than most factory workers. The benefits are based on the scale of the New York workmen's compensation act, but the government bears none of the cost. Employers are to provide compensation by the usual methods of insurance. Incidentally, the law will introduce workers' accident compensation in a limited way to the five States which afford no such protection: North and South Carolina, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Florida.

FORTY RELIGIOUS LEADERS of the South, including ten bishops, have interrupted the hallelujah chorus of Southern industrial expansion. In a public letter to industrial captains of the region, they question the moral validity of the mill village, of the sixty-hour week in cotton mills, of the employment of women and children, of the absence of labor representation, and of the low wages. The letter is full of placating phrases, but it will undoubtedly come as a shock to Southern mill-owners, because it is the first all-Southern indictment coming from so respectable a source. It cannot be brushed aside as red propaganda or sectional spite. It describes as "desirable and right that [labor] should have a proper share in making and enforcing the regulations by which industrial plants are controlled. . . . Higher wages, better schools, shorter hours of labor, and the independence of the worker tend to enrich life and to develop a stronger type of citizenship." While the letter is addressed to employers, it should encourage the mill-workers and their sympathizers to continue the battle against the ghastly labor standards of Southern cotton mills.

WITCH HUNTING and kindred occupations continue to be our favorite national pastime. On March 8 Clarence Darrow was forced to leave Mobile, Alabama, after being threatened with lynching because in a speech to Negroes in a school building he deplored lynching and Southern justice. Police with drawn revolvers guarded Mr. Darrow out of town; Ku Klux Klan handbills denouncing him were passed around to the crowd that pursued him. In California, where the infamous criminal-syndicalism law has been extended for two years, the Burlingame Advance-Star has these thoughts on the subject:

> Thanks to the efforts of that splendid organization, the American Legion, California's criminal-syndicalism law will remain safe upon the statute-books for another two years. . . . It is the fellow who mistakes license for liberty who wants the law . . . stricken from the statute-books. . . . They want to slander, to libel, and to traduce . . . they want to practice free love and destroy religion and because they can't they rail about the lack of freedom of action.

In California also Leland Stanford University has officially withdrawn from a national oratorical contest held under the Better America Federation, the subject to be some aspect of the Constitution of the United States. The students' executive committee said:

> . . . We feel that the purpose and conduct of the contest is not in accordance with our ideals of free thinking. The contest is arranged as propaganda for the unchanging permanence of the Constitution and not in the spirit of unbiased liberty. . . . At a previous contest a Stanford student presented what he believed to be honest criticism of the Constitution and one of the judges left the platform during the speech. We do not care to participate under these conditions.

NOR IS THE HOME OF THE FREE the only country in which free speech is under a cloud. Our neighbor on the north, Canada, has just sentenced to sixty days in jail a Toronto editor judged to have published blasphemous utterances in his paper, the Christian Inquirer. The judge in the case was a Sunday-school superintendent and his charge to the jury was not a marvel of unbiased open-mindedness:

> Our conception of God is so much a part of every life that it is an integral part of our national life. The Bible, the Holy Scriptures, are to us as the revelation of God's will concerning us and all His people. . . .

After this identification of church, state, and people, the words of the court to the effect that disbelief in these universally held doctrines was pardonable if uttered in "respectful terms" naturally fell on the deaf ears of the jury. The blasphemer, Ernest V. Sterry, was found guilty forthwith for referring to God as "this touchy Jehovah" and "an irate old party." His sentence carries with it a recommendation for deportation to England at the end of the two months. Time was when Hyde Park in London would have been sanctuary for even this amount of unbridled license. But England is learning fast from us, and the soap-boxers even there are all too often hauled down from their thrones by irate policemen.

GOOD NEWS ONCE MORE from the Tariff Commission! Here comes the startling information that this ever-vigilant body has ordered an investigation into the costs of producing cherries. Shall a Canadian-fed cherry undersell the American? Never! Every drop of patriotic blood in the bodies of the commissioners, we are sure, revolts against the idea. Hence we are willing to bet that the existing duty of two cents a pound will go up to three cents a pound, or ten cents a pound if necessary. No more deadly blow than this competition from Canada has been offered to our infant cherry industry since George Washington cut down his cherry tree—to curtail the crop, according to the latest historians. On the other side of the globe American ships may be saving Americans in China, but the Tariff Commission is going to prevent the American cherry's rotting on the bough because of the competition of cherries raised by underpaid foreign labor. In the face of this what protectionist can possibly care that Germany has now joined France in raising the tariff barriers against the United States? Germany, it seems, is driving American automobile-assembling plants out of Germany, and there are those who say that this is an answer to the recent increase of duties on pig iron entering American ports. All right, but just let them threaten our cherries!

LADIES OF LEISURE are becoming as extinct as dodos. Yet, with this fact well recognized, it comes somewhat as a pleasurable shock to read that of the 140 young women comprising the Barnard College class of 1926, every last one is either continuing her studies or engaged in some gainful occupation. No longer does the woman with a college education languish unhappily at home or spend her time in desultory volunteer "social" work. These Barnard girls are teachers, clerks, statisticians, secretaries, laboratory assistants, and publicity agents. They are reporters, proofreaders, costume designers, decorators, advertisers. They count among their number an assistant probation officer in a juvenile court, a speaker and organizer for the League of Nations Non-Partisan Organization, an Egyptologist, a college registrar, and a house painter. The twenty-one students who are doing graduate work will be variously doctors, nurses, lawyers, journalists, scientists. The old rhyme about "richman, poorman, beggarman, thief, doctor, lawyer, Indian chief" is going to need revising in the near future. If there are no female Indian chieftains—and this paper is not going to be caught saying there are not—it is because no woman has decided to follow that calling. It may be worth noting that of the 140 busy Barnard graduates of a year ago, not one is yet married. Statistics tell us that ten years hence half of them will no longer be single; it will be interesting to see how many will still be at work outside the home.

YADDO IS THE COUNTRY ESTATE of the late Mr. and Mrs. Spencer Trask near Saratoga Springs, New York. Late in her life Mrs. Trask, then Mrs. George Foster Peabody, who dedicated the house and its many acres of hills to discussion and art, conceived the idea of leaving behind her a retreat to which artists could come and be comfortable while they worked. Now Yaddo is available each year between June and October to persons—no more than ten at a time—who have something to say but no place to say it in. From the reports which come to us we are convinced that the opportunity offered by Mrs. Trask's bequest is a valuable one. We are particularly interested in the restriction to ten residents per summer, each to have a separate studio in the great house and, presumably, all of the Adirondacks outside to think about. Any poet, musician, painter, or economist would be happy to find himself one of the ten to profit by Mrs. Peabody's wise generosity.

TEN years ago the American people reversed its national tradition against entangling alliances and participation in the political struggles of Europe in order, as it fondly believed, to make the world safe for democracy, safeguard the rights of small nations and the principle of self-determination, and establish the reign of law by waging a war to end all war. Had our entrance into the war been excused upon the ground that as guardians of the rights of neutrals we could not permit international law to be violated, it would have been necessary to defend these rights against the equally grievous and ultimately more serious violation of neutral rights by the British Orders in Council. Sagacious minds in 1917, familiar with the development of European struggles for political and economic supremacy, were loath to permit the United States to throw itself into the cauldron merely to aid one party to a traditional European war. They were unconvinced that the grounds of intervention alleged were sustainable by the evidence involved in the issue, or achievable by war.

In November, 1916, the American people had fairly well recorded its insistence on non-intervention. President Wilson in December, 1916, had declared that the struggle involved no moral issues and ought, therefore, to be brought to a sensible close. Unfortunately, by his condonation of Allied violations of the rights of neutrals he had so weakened the force of his proposals for peace that Mr. Lloyd George felt no need for heeding them and demanded a knock-out. Lloyd George ultimately got it with our help, and future generations of Europeans, and of Americans as well, must pay the penalty for the mistake.

From January to April, 1917, a press campaign, the like of which has never been witnessed in the United States, wrought the East into a state of mind where the Wilsonian formula of the moral issues seemed to be accepted by a considerable number of our people. A show of unity was achieved; but it was always a show only. Actually, the country was divided, and while opposition was suppressed in the way that governments can suppress it, the opposition was silenced rather than convinced. The mob spirit, an artificial exultation, ruled supreme, and that is good neither for leaders nor for led.

If the causes and justifications for our intervention were based on facts, some evidence of their truth ought now, after ten years, to be apparent. At least, we have now, in the calmness of reflection, an opportunity to take stock and to determine whether the policy of intervention was wise or not. What do we see? By abandoning the rights of neutrals we threw international law into chaos; the refusal of our State Department to press our neutrality claims against Great Britain was a further blow at international law. The theory of the League of Nations, that neutrality is an undesirable and improper status, is likely to find support in the fact that neutral rights have been put at the mercy of any powerful belligerent. Another most effective blow on behalf of anarchy was given by the Treaty of Versailles, in which the trustees of civilization began a raid on some of the most fundamental principles of international law because they saw in it a momentary gain. We refer, primarily, to the confiscation of private property under Article 297, a precedent which may be dangerously extended. This example, destroying what little progress international law had made, has thrown us back toward the days of anarchic barbarism.

The disarmament of Germany was to have been the first step in general disarmament. Who can read the news of the Geneva "Disarmament Conference" with any belief that the Allied Powers, masters of Europe's fate, have any serious intention of disarming? They have made such a mess of European political and economic conditions that even with the best intentions the problem is one of enormous difficulty. In the course of our quixotic intervention, we contracted a national war debt of twenty-five billions, and have apparently incurred, in addition, the enmity of our European debtors, notwithstanding the cancelation of billions, for continuing to suppose that their signatures were genuine.

In our own administration of the war policy we debauched the national traditions. We are now among the most distinguished confiscators of private property of which history has any record, notwithstanding President Coolidge's unctuous remark that we have "scrupulously observed" the principle of international law that private property is immune from violation or confiscation. Someone should call the President's attention to the Chemical Foundation case before he makes further charges against Mexico. Public and private morality seem to have gone into eclipse; after the emotional debauch of war days we are no longer capable of rousing ourselves to end real evils at home. We smile at corruption in high places; we are content to see the government become the tool of those who least need its aid; we sneer at every effort at reform as an outbreak of "bolshevism." We, who preached so nobly about "the rights of small nations" ten years ago, pay no attention to them in our own back yard but play the strutting bully ourselves.

And Europe? Well, look at it. Is there any sign there that the last war is over, that the next is not on its way? Have the trustees of civilization made an arrangement under which Europe can live in peace? We doubt it. At the moment, we see the most dangerous diplomatic struggles in Italy, Jugoslavia, France, England, Poland, Russia. Have they promoted democracy or the will to peace? The predictions and promises of 1917 are sad reading today. The United States might have led in liquidating the war had our leaders seen and understood it in the light of past history. Instead they greeted it as a "different" war, a holy crusade, prolonged it to its bitter conclusion, and made inevitable a treaty of peace as sadistic as any treaty that has disgraced the pages of recorded history. Our President and our people were betrayed by that treaty, but, unhappily, not many have yet realized the fact. It dashed every hope of a regenerated world, and not even the League of Nations can make much impression on the forces which it set in motion. It is not unfair to say that American intervention in the war made possible the Treaty of Versailles and its horrible consequences. The lapse of ten years can hardly give a thrill of satisfaction to those who brought us into the war, who commemorate it with pride while handing its bleak heritage of burdens and hates to the generations coming after.

An Asiatic World-War?

ON the tenth anniversary of America's entrance into the World War she hovers on the brink of an Asiatic World-War. The headlines flare; the rumors fly, burst sensationally, and fall like dead skyrockets; the atrocity stories have begun. "Heroism" stories fill the columns; hysterical women refugees are quoted as impartial witnesses; and when other devices fail, the correspondents fill their space with imaginative accounts of what might have happened if this warship had not laid down a barrage, that admiral had not threatened a bombardment, or if the foreign fleet in the river had not made an impressive show of force. The stage is set; the mob spirit is being invoked.

What has happened? In the headlines two hundred Americans were imperiled; in the early dispatches—even in one of Admiral Williams's reports—"a number of American civilians were killed." Admiral Hough, the hot-headed seaman who bombarded Nanking once and wanted to bombard it again, reported his fear "that the number of dead is large." In the end, it turns out that one American man was killed, one woman missionary was twice wounded, a sailor was also wounded, and a Standard Oil official sprained his ankle. Three or four other foreigners were killed; several buildings were burned, and more were looted. Some of the American men were forced to give up their outer clothes; some of the women had their clothes torn by jostling crowds.

Who was responsible? Some say that the American refugees were caught between cross fires when the Cantonese soldiers were entering the city; others that Northern refugees were responsible; others insist that the looting and shooting was an "obviously predetermined attack," and still other reports agree that it was the work of undisciplined Cantonese soldiers and sympathizers who arrived ahead of their officers. The last party of one hundred and twenty American missionaries to escape declares that "the [Chinese] students at the university had procured the protection of this building [their refuge at Nanking University] by the attendance of an officer and a group of soldiers." These refugees, whom Admiral Hough insisted could be saved only by bombarding Nanking, reached the warships escorted by a Nationalist guard! They say:

> A Kuomintang military detachment was sent to the university, and in carriages, rickshas, and on foot the caravan of the foreigners made its way without molestation to the riverfront at Hsiakwan and were there turned over to foreign marines. . . . The help rendered by the Red Swastika Society in securing and paying for carriages and rickshas and the kindness of its officers greatly aided the evacuation.

When the Cantonese general reached the city the looting stopped. We have not seen an iota of evidence that higher Nationalist officers had anything to do with the looting and shooting except to stop it. Why, then, the atmosphere of military hysteria?

Is not the real peril in the foreigners' own state of mind? To them every foreign life is sacred; Chinese lives do not matter at all. China's civil war, Chinese Nationalism are, to the foreign business men in China, mere interruptions of trade, and should be repressed. The correspondents, unfortunately, reflect this blindness; the ghastly inability to comprehend a world crisis could hardly be more patent than in the reports of Admiral Hough's bombardment of Nanking. It is safe to say that the ordinary American newspaper reader does not yet know that Admiral Hough's guns killed scores, perhaps hundreds, or even thousands of Chinese. Mr. Moore reported inconspicuously on March 27 that "by the British barrage and American fusillade scores, maybe hundreds, of Chinese are believed to have been killed. The Chinese newspapers at Shanghai state thousands." Yet all we hear of is that one American was killed, and the American Government has the effrontery to talk of protesting to the Chinese!

Was the barrage necessary to save the American lives? At this distance we cannot tell; nor can we trust the guesses of excited refugees. One may, however, note that the Japanese laid down no barrage and made no ultimatums. It is instructive to compare these dispatches:

> TOKIO, March 26 (Special to the New York Times).—According to information reaching the Navy Department from Nanking, the commander of a Japanese destroyer went ashore there yesterday, purposely going unarmed so as to avoid the appearance of provocation, and successfully conducted the evacuation of about 150 Japanese. The party reached the river without serious molestation and safely embarked aboard the Japanese craft. The incident illustrates the care the Japanese are taking to avoid a quarrel with the Southerners.

> SHANGHAI, March 25 (Associated Press).—The vigorous threat by the American and British naval command that Cantonese positions at Nanking would be bombarded unless foreigners still beleaguered in the city were escorted to safety, tonight was followed by the safe appearance of the first of the Americans on the waterfront.
> SHANGHAI, March 25 (By Cable to the New York Herald Tribune).—China continued its mad rampage against foreigners today with murderous attacks upon missionaries at Nanking. . . . It was a saturnalia of Oriental crime . . . and would have resulted in the massacre of all foreigners had it not been for the presence of foreign war vessels.

The Japanese seem wiser. They have learned that ultimatums merely inflame the Chinese; that friendship pays. Even England's restraint in this crisis has been in notable contrast to the appeals for "action" by the hotbloods of the Shanghai community. And America? Where does she stand? Today, up and down the Yangtze Valley, she is blamed for that murderous barrage which may have saved the lives of the little group of Americans who had taken refuge in the Standard Oil buildings in Nanking, but which certainly snuffed out the lives of an unknown number of Chinese. Will Washington continue to leave decisions to the judgment of naval officers on the spot; or will it insist on the more cautious and wiser course followed by Japan?

The evil of the present crisis lies not alone in the ugly spirit of the foreign community and newspapermen in China. It lies partly in the cruel sensationalism of our own daily press, which plays up the war stories as it played up German "atrocities" in the days of that other world war, with an appalling and callous lack of proportion.

One American was killed in Nanking, and the admiral bombarded the city. Why not send the marines to Chicago, where killings are more frequent?

Padlocks for Plays

THE Jenks bill, which provided for a political censor of the New York stage, has apparently died in committee, and for the moment the threatened danger has been averted, but at the eleventh hour the Senate indulged in a gesture of moral indignation and passed the so-called padlock law. The Wales Stage Regulation bill, in which it is embodied, empowers the Municipal Licensing Commissioner to close for as long as one year any theater found guilty of housing an indecent play and also extends the responsibility for the production of such a play so as to include virtually everybody in any way concerned with it. Moreover, it specifically prohibits any dramatic performance which is concerned with sex perversion or degeneracy. This clause seems to aim at "The Captive."

One may well question the wisdom of any law which excludes the serious dramatic treatment of any significant social phenomenon, but even more obviously unfair is the padlock provision, which is, in effect, a retroactive law since the producer of a play has no way of knowing whether or not a jury will declare it indecent until after it has been brought to trial. Whatever one may think of the superficially similar practice as used against violators of the national prohibition act, there is no real parallel between the two kinds of padlocks. The manager of a hotel or restaurant which sells liquor is guilty of conscious and deliberate violation of the law; he knows that he is technically guilty, and he is merely taking a chance that he will not be caught. Indecency is, on the other hand, a matter of opinion; no legal definition has ever been framed which makes possible any objective test. The opinion of one set of twelve jurors may very well be different from that of another set, and so, even though indecency upon the stage be a recognized crime, no crime has been committed until a court has decided that a given performance is indeed indecent. Under the padlock law, the owner of a theater may be heavily penalized for housing a performance which both he and the majority of his patrons sincerely believe to be both elevating and beautiful. With some show of reason, the law may require him promptly to withdraw a play which has been legally declared indecent, but it cannot, without running the risk of inflicting a grave injustice, punish him for a crime which he had no way of knowing to be one. It is an elementary principle of criminal law that the crimes against which it is directed shall be clearly defined, and in the present case no agreement upon the necessary definitions is possible.

One may hope that the Commissioner of Licenses will use judgment in employing the powers which this bill vests in him. Knowledge of the past does not, however, lend much support to this latter hope, for legal authority has tended to be most lenient toward frivolous impropriety and most vindictive toward serious and powerful expression. In England it has winked at the French farce and the novels of Elinor Glyn while forbidding "Ghosts" and prosecuting the publishers of Havelock Ellis; in New York the district attorney declared two years ago that he considered "Desire Under the Elms" the most objectionable of the plays then being attacked. We may yet see a theater closed for a year because it dared to house some play by O'Neill or another which dramatic history will regard as the masterpiece of our generation.

Beethoven

TRUE internationalism had its innings on March 26 the world over. In every musical center the centennial of the death of the greatest of composers, Ludwig van Beethoven, was celebrated. Before the World War no one ever dreamed that anything could interfere with the reverence paid to the great masters of music; it remained for the people of the United States to bar the works of men dead nearly a century, stopping the divine task of assuaging spiritual suffering, elevating the spirit, and fortifying the souls of all to whom music ministers. Fortunately, only the memory of this shame persists. Nothing marred the celebrations due to the great soul who ended his life in Vienna a century ago. They have been going on for months; they have brought out again some of the lesser-known works—all of which have once more proved the power of the Beethoven appeal. He remains one of the three composers whose symphonies invariably increase the box-office receipts; it is a case where the best draws the crowd.

Writing in the New York World H. L. Mencken says that Beethoven's greatness has never been questioned by any reputable body of opinion since his death. The composer who bridges the way from classicism to romanticism had, however, to bear the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune in the form of bitter attacks upon him while he lived. He was a musical radical, they said, a dangerous and unworthy innovator; his symphonies were trash; each composition showed a progressive deterioration. They gave him hard days, these critics.

Nor did his masterpieces flow into Beethoven's mind full-formed, without all the agonies of study and creation. In his early days and work this greatest of composers lacked technical skill and knowledge. He had to hammer away at his melodies; his tunes did not come readily to him. He was a genius when he had got through with his forging, the stupendous work of art was there—all the melodies that anyone could ask, exuberant in their joy, profound in their melancholy, stupendous in their majesty. They are deathless, if there is anything that is deathless on earth; as long as there are symphonies his will be played. Others besides Mr. Mencken—himself an excellent musician in addition to all his other talents—feel that some of the symphonies could be rescored for the great orchestra of today—how stunned and thrilled Beethoven would be could he hear a modern performance of his Eroica!—which is so much richer in instruments than that with which he worked. But whether some of his compositions do or do not sound thin in places to experts, their appeal is unending. Familiarity with them, so far from breeding contempt, breeds here its exact opposite: new joys, new sadnesses, new inspirations.

So Beethoven, the Shakespeare of composers, ranks with the greatest of the great. His fame increases out of all proportion to the lapse of years as the appreciation of music grows—especially in America, where new orchestras spring up overnight and the love of chamber music steadily increases. The force of his knobby character, the magnitude of his thoughts, the power of his imagination could not be denied, and the outpouring of that spirit is one of the greatest heritages of the entire world. As to this the celebrations have just testified, leveling every barrier of geography and nationality. What dead statesman could command a similar tribute?

The Balance Sheet

By one World War	50,510 Americans dead, 193,663 wounded. War Debt January 1, 1927, $19,300,000,000.
By one War to End War "National armaments should be limited to the necessities of national order and domestic safety."—Woodrow Wilson, Second Inaugural.	American forces increased by 95,000 Reserve Officers; R. O. T. C. in colleges and universities; annual force in training increased to 610,000 men (statement of President Coolidge); "army and navy never before so large and efficient in peace time." Seventy cents of every dollar raised by taxation go to wars past and future.—Secretary Mellon in his Annual Report for 1925.
By one war to make the world safe for democracy "Our object now, as then, is to vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the life of the world, as against selfish and autocratic power."—Woodrow Wilson, April 2, 1917.	Democracy never in such disfavor, even in America. Despotic governments in Italy, Portugal, Spain, Russia, Hungary, Lithuania, Poland, Rumania, Albania, Bulgaria, and Turkey.
By one promise of absolute freedom of the seas in peace and in war.	No additional freedom; the whole body of international law of war time a heap of ruins.
By one promise of the removal as far as possible of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace.—Woodrow Wilson, Fourteen Peace Points.	Higher and more effective tariffs everywhere, especially between France and the United States. Every new country encircled by tariff barriers, declared by the world's leading bankers to be a chief obstacle to the economic recovery of Europe.
By one promise of "a settlement of all questions affecting Russia as will secure the best and freest cooperation of the other nations of the world . . . for the independent determination of her own political development and national policy."—Fourteen Peace Points.	Russia ostracized among the nations. Recognition still refused by the United States. A policy of hostile encirclement under way. War made upon her in 1918-20 by America without authority of Congress; Russia attacked from within and without by foreign troops and White Russians aided by American and other money.
By one promise of a General Association of Nations.—Fourteen Peace Points.	Promise largely redeemed; a league formed, still dominated by the victors and intertwined with the Treaty of Versailles.
By one promise of a "peace which should be founded on certain clearly defined principles which set up a new order of right and justice. . . . Upon these principles it will be executed."—Woodrow Wilson at Paris, April 23, 1919.	The Treaty of Versailles: "In the whole history of diplomacy there is no treaty more properly to be regarded as an international crime."—The Nation, May 17, 1919.
By one war to establish the rights of small nations and the "privileges of men everywhere to choose their way of life and obedience."—Woodrow Wilson, April 2, 1917.	Haiti subjugated; Mexico threatened by the United States; Nicaragua overrun by United States Marines; Panama a tool; Santo Domingo, Honduras, etc., in grip of American bankers and State Department. The white Powers holding Shanghai against its Chinese residents. France strangling Syria, Morocco subjugated, etc., etc.

Ten Years After

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

TEN years only since 1917. Yet a lifetime of dramatic events to which there is no end has been crowded into them. Is not Shanghai just proclaimed by its conquerors as a base for that world revolt which The Nation declared inevitable when the infamous treaty of peace was published in May, 1919? Shanghai is, indeed, as long a way from Paris as 1927 is from 1917; it is merely another proof that if you go to war you cannot tell where the war will end any more than you can prophesy the date of its conclusion. Its ramifications are endless; its reverberations carry to the ends of the earth. Because of it men may die in furthermost isles; you begin war in Cuba and you complete it among Malays on the other side of the globe. Only one thing is certain: Wherever war, there liberty shrivels, lies insensate—dies. You may glorify the struggle as you will, and supply it, if you please, with aims as lofty as you can possibly portray by pen or voice; you may attribute to yourself and your allies the purest motives, the noblest objectives, the most humanitarian desires. You will inevitably fail to achieve those ends, and your beautifully cadenced words will turn to ashes because it is ordained by the way of the world that goodness and virtue, the safeguarding of human rights and what is called civilization can never be achieved by letting loose hell upon earth.

Why We Went to War

We shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts, for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free.—From Wilson's War Address to Congress, April 2, 1917.

So after ten years the picture is clearly drawn for everyone who cares to see, whose eyes are not wilfully blind. Woodrow Wilson himself declared that the "full price of peace" would be "full, impartial justice—justice done at every point and to every nation . . ." What a mockery, what a still-born judgment! To what deliberate violations of this sacred pledge did he not sign his name and put his country's honor in trust at Paris! Each passing year has made plainer that democracy was never so unsafe, that the rights of small nations were never so jeopardized—those small nations to whom Mr. Wilson pledged the victory, and "the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience." His own nation still subjugates Haiti, to the conquest of which he personally sent our troops to take a toll of 3,500 Haitians officially reported dead; it still overruns Nicaragua with marines, and threatens Mexico because its people demand the "privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience." To Russians we deny this same privilege because we hate the form their revolution has taken, and think infinitely more of our individual properties than of their human rights.

In Europe the crass and cruel injustices of the peace treaty still cry to high Heaven for redress. In the Tyrol as in other states they curse the name of Wilson, the author of their misery. There is evidence that today the Germans are more popular in France than the Americans; that the acclaim which greeted our plunge into the war has turned to envy, bitterness, and open revolt at what they call their bond-slavery to our Treasury. Everywhere in Europe the tide of hatred against America rises. Before he died Woodrow Wilson himself said: "I would like to see Germany clean up France"—adding, "I would like to meet Jusserand and tell him that to his face"; the French invasion of the Ruhr was for him the last straw, the climax of "French bad faith, ingratitude, and avarice," the final pricking of his self-blown bubble that the peace would spell "justice done at every point to every nation." Yet he died still blind to the fact that he chose the worst method in the world to achieve his purposes; the method that made success impossible.

With the menace of a new war in the Balkans hanging over Europe, on this tenth anniversary of our joining the war to end war; with more, and more dangerous, treaties of offense and defense in effect than ever before; with probably as many men under arms in time of peace as bore them in July, 1914; with all Europe headed straight toward an economic alliance against their "saviors" of 1917, only a man with superb indifference to truth and the realities can assert that the Americans who fell in France did not die in vain; that the world is better off for the blood-bath from which it emerged in 1918 with all its evil passions unleashed. To scan extracts from Mr. Wilson's utterances made when war began is to read the proof of the total failure of the United States to achieve a single one of its major objectives. True, the Hohenzollern fell, but the system of which they were but a revolting product remains. The virus of it has entered our own American veins. Moreover, most of our Allies in the war to banish war are today busily engaged in placing every obstacle in the way of disarmament. In eleven European countries despots wipe their feet upon the prostrate bodies of Liberty and Democracy, though none but Mussolini dares to avow it and to boast of profaning the twin goddesses in behalf of whom Woodrow Wilson summoned this country to war.

Force—force without stint—Wilson called for and used, and two million Americans made the great parade across the Atlantic. True, we kept faith with the war-makers' promises that we sought and would take no recompense for ourselves—no land, no booty, no indemnity. But the parade lies nine years to the rear of us and the world is unchanged; the great objectives unachieved. Hate, bitterness, tariff hostilities, the lust for power, for more places in the sun, for more colonies, for the domination of this sea and that littoral—these are our daily grist of news. The ideals of 1917, the hopes, the ambitions, the pictures painted by the smoothest of orators—where are they now? Based on lies, buttressed by endless hypocrisies, fortified by tales of crimes that were never committed, championed by ignorance of what it was all about and of the historical background and implications, the victory was gained only to be utterly lost.

Ever since it has seemed as if America had lost its soul. There are voices heard in every direction, nothing clear and nothing definite; no leadership, no guidance, no appeal to our nobler selves. We lost the war and we are drunk by a prosperity which has made us so indifferent that, the gates being left unguarded, the domestic enemy has entered and taken every salient and every trench. What has the country gained at home? Where are the causes that Woodrow Wilson and Theodore Roosevelt championed in 1912 and until we went into the war? Has the nation found spiritual peace and content? Does it face the future united, unafraid, resolute to progress, to continue the development of a sound democracy devoted to justice, jealous of the rights of each and every one? Read the platform and speeches of Woodrow Wilson when he first sought the Presidency and you read of things as remote as the days of Lincoln. There lie promises unfulfilled, a program shattered; a new way of life unchampioned today, yes forgotten. The crassest of materialism reigns in Washington by grace of Woodrow Wilson's plunge into the war, and where materialism is there sits corruption. The Denbys, the Falls, the Daughertys, the Dohenys, now all condemned by one court or another, are some of the responses to the appeals for war, to the setting free of the passions that war spells. These are some of the most striking results of the effort to achieve righteousness at home and abroad by unparalleled blood-letting.

Who speaks now of the referendum, recall, and initiative, of the popular control of our natural resources? Who demands that the people shall master their government? Who denounces monopoly? How few excoriate, as did Mr. Wilson, the situation under which, to use his words, "a comparatively small number of men control the water-powers" and the railroads; yes, "control prices" and "the larger credits of the country." "There is hardly a part of the United States where men are not aware," Mr. Wilson declared unchallenged, "that secret private purposes and interests have been running the government." Today—1927? Why, we have thrown wide open the doors and invited in these same few dominating men and their followers and turned over the government to them—and the man who opened those doors was Woodrow Wilson himself. It is now a government by, for, and of Big Business, with its completely subservient employee in the White House.

"His master's voice has spoken," said Woodrow Wilson on reading President Coolidge's message to Congress in December, 1921. It did not breathe, he declared, one single human hope; but he still could not see that he himself had foreordained the election of Calvin Coolidge on that fateful April morning in 1917 when he threw every liberal cause overboard in favor of force without stint, in favor of our intercession in an Old World quarrel as hoary as the ages. History would have told him that, if he had listened to it, and human experience could have proved to him that no war but brings in its train the triumph of conservatism, of reaction, with corruption unending. So it has been with us. The business world we were to have rendered untrammeled, with special regard for the little man, is more than ever trammeled by greed and privilege; the industry we must humanize is still not humanized. The plain people for all their movies and motors and radios are neither "cheered nor inspirited" with prospects of social justice and due reward. The mockery of the courts, the failure of justice, the lawlessness of constituted authorities—these still face us and were abated not a whit by all the high-sounding phrases by which we were lured to wholesale murder just ten years ago.

Of course the contrary is today being written. We are told that the country was united by the war as never before. Yes, united by conscription, united by the terror of an inquisition, united by the padlock and the jail, united by the mob! What specious falsifying of history! Woodrow Wilson himself said in 1915 to the newly naturalized citizens he was so soon to persecute and prosecute: "Humanity can be welded together only by love, by sympathy, by justice, not by jealousy and hatred." Well might he have added: "And not by vilification, not by discrimination, not by the compulsion of consciences, not by the dashing under foot of the inviolable rights of peoples and mankind, not by the murder of millions." The scars of these ten years cut deep; they are not expunged; they are not forgotten; they were not given new cuticle by the Armistice nor by the Treaty of Versailles. Everywhere sections pull against each other, bloc works against bloc, and the bulk of the men who fought in France are today the least liberal, the most immune from all the ideas of social justice and human rights which Wilson preached—until April 6, 1917.

Politically the country lies dead. Between the parties there are no issues, no fundamental differences. It now appears as if the question in 1928 would be: Shall we have a Protestant or a Catholic, a Wet or a Dry? The choice will be between two men who have not as yet glimpsed the possibilities of the leadership this, our America, might exercise beyond all the seas. The one in power mocks our democracy and our humanity in Nicaragua, in Mexico, in China. Bullets, bullets, bullets—these are his threats, these his remedies—ten years after we were told that justice alone was thereafter to rule the world and that strong nations should not be "free to wrong weak nations and make them subject to their purpose and their intent." Ten years after the utter futility of force was proved to all mankind!

Woodrow Wilson's Wisest Words

They imply, first of all, that it must be a peace without victory. . . . Only a peace between equals can last. Only a peace the very principle of which is equality and a common participation in a common benefit. The right state of mind, the right feeling between nations, is as necessary for a lasting peace as is the just settlement of vexed questions of territory or of racial and national allegiance. . . . I am proposing, as it were, that the nations should with one accord adopt the doctrine of President Monroe as the doctrine of the world: that no nation should seek to extend its polity over any other nation or people, but that every people should be left free to determine its own polity, its own way of development, unhindered, unthreatened, unafraid, the little along with the great and powerful.

—From Woodrow Wilson's Address to the Senate, January 22, 1917.

No, the America of 1927 is materially great and rich and prosperous; it is not generous and not just. It is without tolerance and has so little confidence in its ideals and its governmental structure that it is ready to jail one and all who dissent. The mere mention of a new social order, the preaching of a new economic dogma, sends thrills of fear down the spines of our masters in Wall Street and Washington. We have barred our doors to the immigrants we once invited so cordially. We are no longer an asylum to those who flee for the sake of their consciences and their beliefs; to London and to Paris go the victims of oppression and tyranny in search of liberty—not to New York. Behind every action of life in America lies the menace of force, of uncontrolled power; of the small all-powerful number who would padlock and banish and regiment precisely as did the Kaiser. Nowhere is the individual free to his own way of life; free speech is a joke, the right of assembly no longer a right, but the gift of a mayor or a chief of police—in a country protected from the Hun and made safe for democracy.

But why go on? The hands of time were turned back, not advanced by the war. Old battlegrounds once gained have been lost, one by one, and are now to be re-won. The whole liberal movement scarcely breathes; the labor giant prefers to lie bound by the threads of Lilliputians, the politicians. The day of awakening is postponed by the very war that was to have made men free. But only postponed. The streams of conscience and of liberty can be dammed, not dried. They may shrink to rivulets. They will again be rivers. Only, however, if the determination to be free remains in men's hearts. Only if they will see the truth that there is no enemy of mankind like the sword. Woodrow Wilson took it up. It seemed to exalt and then—so fell the angels! By the sword he perished. By it will perish all liberty, all progress, humanity itself, if it be not forever sheathed.

America's War-Time Socialism

By REXFORD G. TUGWELL

Building a National Industrial Machine

A YEAR before we went to war, industry began to get ready. The Naval Consulting Board and the army's Kernan Board were making industrial surveys early in 1916; and in the summer the Council of National Defense was set up. In the first months of 1917 the Munitions Standards Board and later the General Munitions Board came into existence. Out of the problems met by these early industrial bodies arose the demand for coordination which resulted in a unique economic experiment—the War Industries Board. President Wilson may have conceived the function of this body in military terms, as issuing orders and penalizing their non-fulfilment. If he did, Mr. Bernard Baruch, the chairman, had a different idea. To him the enterprise of war was a vast cooperation. The industrial system was to run as one well-oiled machine, but it was to run on a volunteer basis with plenty of play for individuality.

To understand why he succeeded, it is necessary to appreciate the situation into which he stepped. American industry, by 1917, had had the three swiftest years of its history. Greatest activity, greatest price changes, greatest profits, greatest building programs, greatest internal changes set these three years apart. Cautious attitudes toward over-equipment, customary wage-levels, trade secrecy, and hallowed management practices had all been modified. There was an ever-expanding demand; no one needed to worry about markets. Profits were high and certain. All that had to be done was to make the wheels go round and the product come out, faster and faster and faster. If there was any difficulty about technique technicians, workmen, and plans were provided. On the whole, the war was an industrial engineer's Utopia.

Each of the great industries formed a committee with headquarters in Washington. Here they were brought into contact with the source of orders—for soon all the Allies' buying was concentrated and apportioned. Needs were classified. Each unit of industry was given the work which it could do best. Industries which furnished raw or semi-finished goods to finishing industries were gradually brought in. Industries which made goods for civilian consumption had also to become part of the system, since, in so many ways, they were linked to the ones which were doing outright war work. Before the Armistice, the system was nearly perfected and a mission had gone abroad to tie up our national system with that of the Allies. We were on the verge of having an international industrial machine when peace broke.

The Railway, Food, and Fuel administrations had been functioning throughout almost this same period. In many ways their work closely paralleled that of the War Industries Board, with jointures here and there. For the railways needed cars, locomotives, and rails; food is a factory product; and fuel is raw factory power. The organizations came closer and closer administratively until a productive coordination was effected.

It would be a mistake to assume that this revolution took place without costly errors, some recalcitrance, even some dishonesty; but a ten-year perspective makes it more impressive, to me at least, than it seemed when we were in the midst of it. Then all seemed disorder and meaningless change; now, across the gulf of post-war chaos, there appears to have been a remarkable industrial achievement. For the thing worked. Goods were produced. An army of two million was carried across the sea, well fed and well clothed, the civil population was so prosperous that it disgusted the soldiers, and to the Allies were sent some billions of dollars' worth of materials.

Competition Abandoned

This achievement required a revolution in our customary arrangements. The essence of our economic theory had been distilled into the Sherman Act, with later additions in the Clayton and Federal Trade Commission acts. We conceived voluntary activity and free competition as guardian angels which hovered over business everywhere, adjusting functions to one another, protecting individuals and groups in their mutual dealings, and stimulating all concerned to the requisite enterprise. This ideal sought to dominate a rebellious reality; and, having its source in the authoritative texts of the economists and in the minds of statesmen, its existence had been secured even down through "the new freedom" of the pre-war Wilson. Most of the work of the Department of Justice and of the Federal Trade Commission had, until 1917, consisted in breaking up the "trusts." It was about the most consistent single governmental policy we had. But this whole ideology had to be modified if industry was to accomplish more in war than it had in peace.

So it was that the old system melted away in the fierce new heat of nationalistic vision. The Government now, so far as industry was concerned, was staffed by big-business men who had few hampering ideas but a singular flair for administration. There were none who thought the competitive system sufficient for war. The industries, drawn together in the various committees of the War Industries Board, discovered that they had most of their affairs in common. There ensued an era of combination such as put the pale efforts of the nineties to shame. And where outright combination did not develop, trade associations, under various names, perfected working organizations and began to exchange information of all kinds, including the most jealously guarded of trade secrets. So far as operations were concerned they were as close-coupled as the units of a single organization. There came to be a free reservoir of technical knowledge which even yet has not been drained. And where the various units of industry held back from this new intimacy the new government officials—not the Department of Justice, which was hunting first spies and later reds—found ways, sometimes gentle, sometimes a little rough, of forcing the very combinations which had always been thought to be unholy.

It soon became apparent that industry under its coordinated guidance and with its new cooperative efficiency possessed not only an enhanced power to produce but a dangerous advantage in the markets. The strength developed for the sake of production could be used—and was—for the purpose of exploiting the buyers of its products. Part of this difficulty was met by the consolidation of all government buying in the coordinated subsections of the War Industries Board. This was not enough. The Government bought enormously; but private buying was always much greater. In order to keep down the price of steel, it was necessary to do more than fix a price for what the Government required. Much steel was going into machines, automobiles, building construction, and other industries which, although only indirectly connected with the war, were none the less essential. Nor could wages be kept down on government contracts, many of which were of the "cost plus" variety, if food prices kept rising. These new problems were met quite calmly. The same group which had set out so unheroically to create a productive machine determined to keep it from clogging its own progress with prohibitory prices.

If they ever meant to abolish profits, they were unsuccessful. But there is nothing to show that they meant to do this. They intended rather to set a price high enough to include the producers who made the "marginal goods"—in the economists' phrase—those produced under conditions of greatest expense, which it was nevertheless necessary to have. That there would still be profits—large ones—for those concerns whose costs of production were low was obvious. But if the old competition for prices in the market could be transformed into a competition for lowered costs, that would be a valuable service. So the big profits were in a sense a sign of efficiency rather than of gouging consumers. This system developed gradually. Part of it had to wait for the organization of statistical staffs and the collection of hitherto non-existent data. Part of it came directly under the board; part was assimilated more nearly to the Food and Fuel administrations. It got under way in 1918; and only the Armistice prevented a great experiment in control of production, control of price, and control of consumption. As it was, the whole process was left at a somewhat inconclusive stage when demobilization began.

Control of production and price proved easier than control of consumption. Ordinarily, rising prices could be trusted to act as a check as goods grew scarcer. With prices held down, some other method had to be devised. The priorities system regulated the flow of goods. But it was different when it came to persuading workmen not to buy pianos or silk shirts with their much-advertised high wages—which some, at least, were getting. We never reached the stage of allotment by a rationing system, such as the other nations used; or of forbidding the manufacture of silk shirts. We depended upon publicity campaigns—for low-milled bread, for resoling old shoes, and for gasolineless Sundays. Old clothes became, for a time, almost fashionable; and one went motoring with a guilty conscience. It was costly, but effective. Perhaps it would not have survived years of struggle; certainly it depended considerably upon emotional response to the heavy odor of melodrama in the Wilsonian phrase. And it was always more effective among those with a typical middle-class stake in events than among the workers, who were surprised and pleased by their new access to hitherto unattainable goods.

The one thing in this elaborate system of control which was never seen clearly was the financial policy it called for. It seems to me that we should have paid for the war out of taxation as we went along and that we should never have made governmental loans to our Allies. This would have been possible. The process of producing goods engenders the income to buy them. It was only a question of getting the income into the Treasury. We could have got it there as well by taxation as by liberty loans; the same funds were available for either use. But we were afraid to tap the obvious sources of surplus—corporation profits. We preferred to dally with taxes on ice-cream cones and movie tickets.

We did issue loans and we permitted them—through the rediscounting machinery of the new and untried Federal Reserve System—to add to an already alarming inflation. Workers—and manufacturers too—suffered from the price-vagaries to which this inflation contributed throughout the war and post-war periods. It was the great element of uncertainty in the whole system of control. And if we had never made loans to our Allies but had frankly presented them with war-materials we should not have been under the still present illusion that we were carrying on purely commercial transactions with them for which we should eventually be paid. The need for financial administration failed to call forth the organizing genius which built up the other controls which were on the whole so successfully devised.

Internal Changes in Industry

This system of coordinations and voluntary controls, it must be remembered, was imposed upon an industry which had, for several years, been producing war goods at the height of its haphazard capacity. There was a jumble of orders and prices, the Eastern industrial region was more crowded with war orders than other regions, the Allies competed with each other to place contracts, manufacturers bought where they could in the quantities they could get regardless of others' requirements; all this it was the function of an industrial general staff to straighten out. Gradually, plants for making gas-holders were converted into airplane factories; carpet manufacturers began to make blankets and duck; automobile-makers produced airplane parts; lumber mills cut and shaped ship-timbers and airplane spruce; refrigerator factories made field-hospital tables; furniture-plants made ammunition-boxes; shirt-factories made mosquito-nets and signal flags.

The normal progress of a decade was compressed into every year. Much of the accumulated technical knowledge which had been piling up from the time of Frederick W. Taylor's first inventions suddenly became accessible through the opportunity to rebuild plant, replan processes, and introduce a completed serialization. These impulses to change ran like a regenerative flame through the old industrial structure. Progress was accelerated by a number of factors: (1) The certainty of demand and of profits; (2) the ease of obtaining funds; (3) the pooling of trade secrets; (4) the simplification and standardization of materials and processes; and (5) the coordinations of war-time control.

"The profits of all corporations in the United States," David Friday says in his "Profits, Wages and Prices," "had never exceeded $4,000,000,000 until 1913. Under the stimulus of war demand, with its high prices and increased production, profits reached the astounding figure of $10,700,000,000 in 1917." Not all kinds of industry participated, of course, in this prosperity. It was concentrated mostly in the mining and manufacturing industries; but for these "the earnings in 1917 were almost exactly 330 per cent of those of 1913, the highest pre-war year."

With profits on this scale rolling in, and with price levels always rising and thus promising higher ones, it is no wonder that some voluntary reorganization of industry took place through the efforts to expand for greater volume of production. When there was superposed on this mighty drift a concerted effort toward internal technical efficiency and a subordination of formerly independent units to a coordinated plan, a new industrial revolution could be said to be well under way.

Industries which did not readily respond to an invitation to combine were actually called together in Washington and read curtain lectures by officials of the Government for not doing what they would have been punished for a few months earlier. Each industry pooled its techniques, standardized its tools, machines, styles, qualities, and processes on the best, took its orders, and proceeded to make goods as they were never made before—or since.

Demobilization

It must have been sheer momentum which carried us into the middle of 1920. For as soon after the Armistice as they could get away, the dollar-a-year men drifted out of Washington. The control staffs were broken up, price and consumption restraints were removed, and the railways were handed back to their owners. There was, of course, need for abnormal amounts of peace goods to repair war-time loss or neglect, and there were shortages because of the time involved in shifting productive processes again. But before long the inevitable headache began. Prices had risen in crescendo after the controls were abandoned; the European market was cut off because buyers there lacked the wherewithal to pay, except with goods, and these we banned by tariffs. Suddenly we discovered that our tremendous productive power was flooding the markets with goods which could not be sold with any profit. And so we proceeded into several years of depression.

Under war-pressure industry had experimented with a kind of voluntary socialism—and liked it. It liked the substitution of solidarity for suspicion, of unity for compelled disunion, of cooperation for competition, of a common purpose for haphazard growth. But when the war was over, old ideas which had been in suspension again stirred in politicians' minds, the Department of Justice turned from hunting Reds to hunting trusts, tariffs were raised. The Supreme Court drew a long breath and eyed the war powers arrogated by the Administration with the chilly disfavor which recently found expression in the Tyson case, decisively turning back legislative efforts to regulate prices, excusing its former complaisance in such cases as the New York rent laws by using the phrase "controlling emergency."

As a result of this post-war lassitude and the recrudescence of old ideas, we have returned—as far as the Government can effect it—to the days of 1910. But industry, in spite of obvious handicaps, has not slipped all the way. It finds itself with an overcapacity caused by faulty coordination and restricted demand, and with other maladjustments. And it has frankly gone back to its policy of price-competition, which is so wasteful and so damaging to consumers' interests. But its internal operating technique, as contrasted with the technique of its organization, improves steadily. Research, standardization, machinization, serialization, personnel administration—all have continued to go forward since the war.

Among other conspicuous developments there is the fact that some 30,000 men, in some 500 research laboratories, established as adjuncts of business, are at work on these problems of technique. The per-man-hour productivity index has as a result of this and other causes had the most startling rise in all industrial history. For the automotive industry this rise actually amounts to a change from an index of 100 in 1914 to 310 in 1925, one hundred points of that gain being since the war.

A recent report of the National Bureau of Economic Research carries our annual income for 1926 up to the staggering figure of nearly 90 billion dollars, which is an increase of 36 per cent in five years—since 1921. And this was for a period of general price decline! This report says that "incomes of the gainfully occupied in 1926 averaged $2,010 as compared with $1,537 in 1921. In terms of money of constant purchasing power the gainfully occupied person received one-fourth more than in 1917, and about 44 per cent more than in 1919."

Yet there is something wrong somewhere. For in spite of these great advances, the per-man-hour index of productivity in most industries would have led any one who depended upon them alone to the conclusion that we should have registered a greater increase in income. And the Census Bureau's general physical volume index of production registers only a 19 per cent increase since 1923 instead of the 100 or more per cent which might have been expected. We ought to have done better, even taking productive technique as it is. It seems plain that our social arrangements are managing to dissipate about half of our manifest power. The leakage cannot be measured exactly or the responsibility accurately assigned, but I believe that the kind of system we started to develop during the war would have reduced this friction immensely, and that in going back to the old haphazard, unregulated competition we chose the worst among the alternatives for general organization.

The sole representative of the War Industries idea in Washington today is Mr. Hoover, and the contrast between the activities of his Department and the attitude of President Coolidge and his Department of Justice is amusing and instructive.

When Adam Smith, in 1776, wrote the words which destroyed mercantilism and started laissez-faire on a career of a century and a half, he established himself as the "father of political economy." Mr. Baruch, who bearded that system in Washington, its holy of holies, and set a superior system in its place, deserves a title too. His valedictory as war-time chief of staff for industry was a message to Americans in time of peace:

> We continue to argue . . . that the principles of competition can be preserved to protect the interests of the public and insure efficiency. The Sherman and Clayton acts represent little more than moderately ambitious efforts to reduce by government interference the processes of business so as to make them conform to the simpler principles sufficient for the conditions of a bygone day.

In a paragraph or two he sketched the fostering of combination and association during the war and the technical results which followed the dual policy of encouraging large-scale operations and controlling prices to consumers, drawing the clear inference that if this was a good policy for war, it must be as good for peace. He asked for a positive rather than a negative program and recommended the experience of the Industries Board as throwing light on these possibilities. He asked, in fact, for a > governmental agency, with constructive as well as inquisitorial powers—an agency whose duty it should be to encourage such cooperation and coordination in industry as should tend to increase production, eliminate waste, conserve resources, improve the quality of products, promote efficiency in operation . . . and should, at the same time, be clothed with the power and charged with the responsibility of standing watch against and preventing abuses.

Perhaps we shall turn back to these pages some time for a reformulation of industrial policy, but not while Calvin Coolidge and his confreres can thrust back the tides of progress. Mr. Coolidge, vetoing the McNary-Haugen bill said it was "an entire reversal of what has been heretofore thought to be sound. . . . It runs counter to the well-considered principle that a healthy economic condition is best maintained through a free play of competition." I think that most of the bigger business men would stand witness that the earnest pursuit of that principle would have lost us the war. But then war is war; and peace is only peace.

A'wa Tseighe Comes Home from the War

By MARY AUSTIN

HOW come I going to this war? Well, sir, me an this San Juan Pueblo boy, name Onorio Sotero, we been going to Santa Fe Indian School, U. S. Government, ever since we been kids, learnen good educashun. We got geogafy and fractions an the capitals of Europe, an readen Hiawatha, an all that. But when we get back to our Pueblo we not knowen what to do with all this good educashun. Cause all them old back numbers at my Pueblo, they aint care bout nothing but maken good corn crop like they been doing ever since they come out of the ground, an menden the irrigating ditch, an maybe stealen a little grass for the cattle off government land. Well, this San Juan boy write me there aint nothing doing for good educashuned boy in his Pueblo, so I going up there to visit him, an see what we going do with all this lotsa educashun we got.

Thass in 1917 right after first corn hoeing; an long come one U. S. government moving picture, all about this war, an those German Kaisers, an everything. An they say all Mericans got a right to enlist. This San Juan boy, name Sotero, he sayen to me, "By Golly!" he says, "we otto go over there an put those Kaisers in hell." Thass what he sayen; and I say "What I caren who's in hell. I'm no Christian."

"Well," he say, "we got all this good educashun; we got the biggest country an the best army, an everything. We gotta go over there an show 'em." Thass how.

All people ver' pleased in my Pueblo when they hear I enlist. My mother she kine scare I be killed, but my father, hees Priest of the Bow, an he getten all those other priest, an that Sun priest, all those officiales, an they worken in the kiva—thass all same Indian church—four days they work, maken all kine medicine from old days. Course I know thass all foolishness, but I didden hurt their feelings, on account my father he think thass going make so nothing hurt me all time that war last. Sotero, hees old men they worken for him. But those San Juan Pueblaños, they aint maken good medicine no more. They quarrellen all time in that Pueblo on account they got political fractions. Sotero he getten little piece of shrapnel in hees shoulder. Well, sir, I aint sayen anything cause hees my friend, an hees maken like he is some soldier on account that wound stripe hees getten. An no feller can't help it if his people got political fractions, but maybe if they didden got those politics like they got in San Juan, he been come home like me without nothing happen to him.

But we aint neither of us sorry we went to that war. I tell you, I been thinken lots more better bout Mericans since I been belongen to that Merican army. All time in my Pueblo those caciques been tellen us, "Merican boys too soft; can't fight, can't run, can't do nothing like us Indians." Well, sir, I aint believen that no more. I tell you, if some those Merican Doughboys aint got Indian blood in 'em, they got a right to. They're sure 'nough scrappers! Nother thing like Indians, those Doughboys always changen everybody's name; more like what they are. That San Juan boy, name Onorio Sotero, they callen Brown-bread, an me they callen Hot-Biscuit. Thass Merican joke. Then me an Sotero name one officer Turtle-top. You know that mountain by Albuquerque, name Sandia—Watermelon, only the Tewas callen it Oku—Turtle? Well, sir, if that officer sleep on hees back he look like that Watermelon Mountain; an when he saluten, or anything, he moven hees head round inside his collar. Well, sir, he aint call nothing after that but Old Turtle-top. Sure! Those Merican Doughboys an those Indians they understanden each another first rate.

When we come along by those Italy boys—yeh, thass where we been fighten in my company—some little fellers, kinda sawed off, like they been livin' at Walapi or maybe Acoma. We callen them Roosters on account they got bunches of rooster's feathers on their hats. We liken them, too. Thass where we meet that Oglalla Sioux, name McKinley Two-Elk. Hees one fine feller.

Me an that McKinley Two-Elk, we teachen those soldiers all kinsa Indian dances, only all those Mericans an those Roosters call all our dances scalp dances. Seem like they don't like no other kine dances only scalp dances. Thass what I'm tellen you. What for you all time asken bout those Oklahoma dances when I all time showen you better: Corn dance, Basket dance, and lotsa other kine?

Well, sir, I don' understand them things. Like I don' understand why you wanten to know bout those Oklahoma dance. But I tellen you just the same. Anyway those Oklahoma Indians, they likely to do most anything, so when I hear they going to have scalp dance, I aint surprise. Thass long bout five–six months after I come home from this war. Sotero he writes me a letter, tellen me that. Then a bunch of Navahoes come through my Pueblo, they tellen. An some Santo Domingo boys, they say maybe they go over to Oklahoma for little trip soon as they get their corn in. So I write Sotero to meet me at Albuquerque an bring money—cause he getten money from the U. S. Government on account that piece shrapnel in hees shoulder—an I say "Less go see old soldier friends an hear some news."

Well, sir, when we get off the train where we going, there's some boys from Taos on horseback, and some Navahoes with team an wagon. So we going along together, an bymby we meet some Jicarilla Apaches driven some of their cattle. One of those boys he been in my company, an I asken him, "Where you going with them steers?" an he asken me, "Where you think you be when I get there, Doughboy?"

Every day we meet more Indians, an plenty Indian sign tellen which trail to take for the reunion. All kindsa Indians, Mescaleros and White Mountain Apaches, Papagoes, an Pimos, they didden have no scalps, they didden do those kine things; an those Apaches say they didden, and those Navahoes. Only Navahoes, they mostly liars. Well, by golly, when we got to that place, they got maybe three–four hundred Indians; Sioux an Blackfeet an Comanches, Utes an Paiutes, an Cherokees an Creeks, an lots kine I didden never know before. Maybe sixty or eighty got uniforms, like me an Sotero. One feller he got Corporal's stripes; some got wound stripes, some got medals, an some got crutches. One feller he got a bugle. If anybody got scalps he aint showen 'em. Me an Sotero, we give one look round an we start yellen like we been scalp oursels when we see that McKinley Two-Elk. Hees been getten one artifishul arm since Italy, he showen to those old bucks from away back, make their eyes stick out. I tellen the world we glad to see each another again! Lotsa other Doughboys, too, that we been knowen in that war! we all hit each another on the back, just like Mericans, an talken Merican war language, cause we didden know each another's, an Indian sign language, an all kine things.

Well, sir, that was one swell reunion! Everybody feel good; lotsa eats; whole steers they roasten, an frijoles an coffee; an those Oklahoma Indians that belong to those oil lands, bringen their ottomobiles full all kine grub like what we have in the army, white bread, an cakes, an canned pineapple, an cigarettes, an chewing gum. Swell! An not a white man on the place. Not a damn one! All that day we eaten, an visiten each another, an that night we have speeches. All those old war chiefs and big men from different tribes, they speaken to us Doughboys. Me, I one interpreter, on account I got all this lotsa educashun, an McKinley Two-Elk he interpreten Sioux an Cheyenne an Blackfeet, an two–three other languages, an four–five other interpreters, so every feller he hear what they sayen in his own language. Cause those old men that speaken, they kinda ignorant, they don't speak Merican, only those language what they got. Next day we dance.

Well, now, I going tell you bout those scalp dance. White people seem like they didden understand scalp dance. They think scalp dance is all on account they given those ennemy hell. But Indians didden have no hell in their religion. When they killen those ennemy, they didden go off to heaven an hell, they stay right round old home place maken all kine trouble. Cause they mad they been scalp. If you don' want no trouble with ennemy after they been kill you gotta take those scalp an have dance to make friends with 'em right away. Huh! I been hearen Mexican soldiers talken at that Merican Legion, Montoya y Montoya Post No. 1, how everything been happen pretty darn bad to those Europe Peoples since that war been finished. That didden surprise no Indian soldiers. Indians know since long time back, that soon as they killen those ennemy they gotta have scalp dance, adopten those ennemy in their tribe so they don't make no more trouble for 'em. Sposen we got some German scalps at those reunion? Well, those Germans, all what got kill in that war, they pretty good Indians by this time. Then we ain't sayen no more bad bout those Germans, sayen everything good, like they damn good fighters an much brave. Cause they belongen to Merican tribe now, on account those scalp dance.

Well, sir, I guess my father been round when my mother packen my suit case. What you think? When I get to that place I find all my father's dance clothes; moccasins, feathers, paint; every darn thing. An my grandfather's shield like he usen when he fighten those Navaho long time back. Thass one swell shield; buffalo hide, with long hair all round—Navaho hair—an rattlesnake an thunderbird painted on it. My grandfather he been one sure'nough fighter. So I sayen, "well, I got all these swell clothes; I might as well dance."

McKinley Two-Elk, he got one first-class Sioux war suit an bonnet. One White River Ute, he got one dance suit all solid bead work, all colors. Swell! Lotsa other fellers, they dancen too, but we three the best looken. An one old chief I bet hees a hundred years old, they callen Pottowatomie—though I didden know where that tribe been liven—he aint hardly got no clothes, only paint an deer skin, like old times, an he so weak he gotta be held up at first. But soon as he get warmed up, by golly! you otta see that old feller dance! An that McKinley Two-Elk! I bet you could see daylight under that feller's feet every minute.

Well, we dancen, an those medicine men an Sun priests, they worken round that Medicine Lodge. All those other old chiefs singen, an the drums going. Bymby everybody singen an dancen, like they do in their own place. Every tribe Indians, they got scalp dance, only they all different. Like Christians. So every tribe getten together with their own, dancen and singen, like they been Baptists, or maybe Presbyterians. Two–three hours they going like that, not thinken bout no Germans nor no white men, nor nothing, only feelen good in their heart. An all at once that bugler boy he blowen like hell, "Lights Out," an all those three–four hundred Indians an twenty drums, they stop like they been shot. I didden see nothing, only the sun going down, an I thinken thass what he blowen for; an then I hearen whisper, "White man, white man" like a wind in four hundred trees, an all those Indians turnen one way, like the wind blowen 'em. Sure'nough, there was one white officer man sittin on one horse like he been there long time.

Well, I don' know how that was, only somebody give one war whoop, an all those soldier boys been runnen an whoopen like hell. Me, I runnen an yellen, with my grandfather's shield and war club, an all those old men looken scare, but yellen like the rest. Well, sir, that officer man he sitten there kinda grinnen, an I thinken thass funny, an hearen myself yell like one wild Indian, an not knowen what I going do. All at once I see that McKinley Two-Elk grab that horse's bridle an shouten, "Three cheers for old Turtle-top." Well, sir, if you think they yell before that, you oughtta heard 'em then!

Well, we all showen Old Turtle-top round that camp, an feeden him, an putten war bonnet on him, an teachen him scalp dance.

Well after supper we dance some more, an Turtle-top he dancen. Everybody dance. All those drums been going, an those camp fires, an that bugler he sitten off on one hill playen all old songs like we learnen in that war. Bymby I don't remember bout Turtle-top, nor that U. S. Government School where I been going all those years. I thinken bout my grandfather, an all old time Indians. Seem like they all comen back, dancen with us, all just Indians, an not no white men. Like all those old peopels comen on that Spirit Road going across the sky, touchen those Oklahoma hills, an be-en happy with us. An I ain't tired nor nothing, only maybe like I been drunk, an dancen all that night. Well, sir, when I waken up bout 10 o'clock next morning, all those Indians been pull their freight. Only just Navahoes an some Utes an Paiutes what live long way off, an those Oklahoma that taken away that Medicine Lodge. Turtle-top gone, an that Oglalla Sioux name McKinley Two-Elk. So me an that San Juan boy, name Onorio Sotero, we fixen to ride back with those White River Utes what have some friends in Taos, and show them the way. Thass all.

The Moral Losses of the War

By JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

"HE is a bold man," says Judge Bausman, in his latest book, "Facing Europe," "who will say that, if the United States had known in 1917 what we know now about the origins of the war and the purposes of the Allies, we would ever have gone into the conflict." Had we known, in other words, that the origins of the war were primarily Russian and French instead of German, and that the purposes of the Allies were not to save civilization and make the world safe for democracy, but to advance their own imperialistic interests at the expense of the Central Empires, we would in all probability not have joined in the fight.

It is still more doubtful that we would have gone to war in 1917 had we been able to foresee what the struggle was to cost us in men, money, and morals. No loss would be lamented, perhaps, if the European conflict had been what it was represented to be, or had ended in the great achievements of democracy and peace which were promised as the reward of sacrifice. But when we discover, as we have now discovered, that the war was dishonest from the beginning, and that we were enticed into the conflict by devices of deceit to ends of betrayal both of ourselves and of humanity, it may be well to ask what we have paid for our mess of pottage.

We began to pay within a few weeks after President Wilson issued his proclamation declaring "that a state of war exists between the United States and the Imperial German Government." At that time nobody imagined that we would contribute to the conflict anything more than money, supplies, ships, and a part of our navy. But soon it began to be whispered about that the Allies needed troops, and before we realized what it all meant, the manhood of the nation was drafted for service overseas. There was placed upon the federal statute-books a Conscription Act which outdid the Prussian system in sweep and rigor, and established forever in this country the legal and moral precedent of compulsory military service in foreign wars. Moreover, a militaristic spirit was conjured up like a demonic presence to plague the nation for generations to come. It lives today in such organizations as the American Legion and the R. O. T. C. It shows its ugly and malign head in impudent demands for control of public policy and expenditure of public funds. It undertakes to use education for its own ends, to subdue religion to its own purposes, and, by arrogating to itself all virtue, to impose its own brutish standards upon the public life. The United States is not militarized yet by any means; the innate common sense of the people still stands as a barrier against the flood. But the dikes were weakened by the war, and another swollen torrent of arms may carry them away.

The price for our indulgence in the European orgy took a big leap upward with the passage of the so-called Espionage Act. This law did not violate the Constitution in any technical legal sense, if we are to trust the decision of the Supreme Court; but pragmatically speaking, it destroyed the First Amendment, corner-stone of our Bill of Rights, which specifically forbids the making of any federal law "abridging the freedom of speech or of the press," with (curiously enough!) no exceptions or reservations for war time! Administered by vigorous and unscrupulous officials of the Gregory and Palmer type, this Espionage Act was straightway utilized as a first-class weapon of political tyranny. Dissenting opinion of every kind was drastically suppressed. Clergymen in their pulpits, editors at their printing-presses, political and labor leaders on their platforms and in their offices, all who dared to oppose or even criticize the dicta of government, were promptly arrested and thrust into jail. For the first time the political offender became a conspicuous figure in American life. But the Government was not content to hunt individuals merely. Whole minority groups, such as the I. W. W. during the war and the Communists after the war, were pursued by practices of persecution hitherto unknown in this country. The Terror appeared among us—first as a weapon directed against aliens and outlaws, then as a scourge laid upon the backs of the public in the appropriately named "drives" for Liberty loans, Red Cross subscriptions, and support of other enterprises pertaining to the war. Suddenly no man was safe. Letters were opened, telephone wires tapped, "undercover" men planted, agents provocateurs distributed, homes raided, and families seized or scattered. By every device known to autocrats from the days of Rome down, the Government hunted and herded the people till they became a mob, driven by fear almost to panic. Madness everywhere possessed us; and this madness endures today in forms of intolerance and hate which make our American life one of the ugliest spectacles of the contemporary world. Taught to test loyalty by submission and character by conformity, we rage against the heresy of disagreement. Having lost our practice of freedom, we have, of course, lost with it our reverence for freedom. The hardy temper of independent manhood, the fine, free spirit of enlightened liberalism, has disappeared. Free thought was never so hazardous, free speech never so difficult, in America as it is today. And lest we falter in our new-won Toryism, and revert to happier days, the Espionage Act remains upon the statute-book, like a death's head at a feast, to remind us of our doom when Government betrays us into another war.

The Conscription Act and the Espionage Act were but the opening of the play. Soon political corruption entered into the drama! This started with the familiar scandals of the Shipping Board and the Alien Property Custodian, and mounted at last to the climax of Fall, Daugherty, Doheny, and other familiar figures of the Harding Administration, who, to quote the unforgettable if inelegant phrase of the plain-speaking John Randolph, "shine and stink, and stink and shine, like mackerel rotting in the moonlight." Nobody knows, nobody dares even to imagine, the extent of the corruption which spread from Washington out through the length and breadth of the land, in political and commercial channels without number, as the direct consequence of the demoralization incident to war. For every dollar honestly spent there were several lost, and several more misappropriated and stolen. It was an orgy which made the misdoings of the Grant Administration after the Civil War look like the innocent pranks of a children's party. And worst of all, people knew about it, or learned about it, and didn't care. Scandals a hundred times more disgraceful than those which shook the nation in other days have stirred scarcely a ripple in our time. The Presidential candidate of the party involved in the worst corruptions known to American history, himself and his cabinet officers directly or indirectly involved in the shame, was reelected by the largest majority ever received by a contestant for the highest office in the land. What had happened was that the war had sapped, as war always saps, the foundations of conscience. As disease destroys the bodies, so war destroys the souls of men. We talk loudly of the purging influences of war, of the quickening of moral ideals, of the exalting influence of service and sacrifice for the larger interests of the state. But our talk is but the babble of ignorance and superstition. As a matter of fact, war is the most corrupting influence that can be let loose in human society. Its destruction of lives and property is only the outward and visible sign of its equal destruction of the inner values of the spirit. From 1917 on, the level of life in America has steadily tended downward. Lawlessness, loose morals, gross materialism, social irresponsibility, out and out corruption are the outstanding characteristics of the time.

What has happened during the last ten years is best indicated by the sudden ending of that movement of social idealism which was the outstanding feature of American life before the war. Everywhere in those distant and happy days we were engaged in great works of social liberation. We had won political victories in the popular election of Senators, the establishment of direct primaries, the enfranchisement of women. We had made progress in the economic field in the restriction of child labor, the shortening of hours of labor for women, the establishment of collective bargaining in industry. We were making progress in what was intended to be a complete and final victory for social democracy. It was an age of brave and cheerful idealism. We did not worry, we were confident; much could delay, but nothing stay, our triumph. But the war stayed it! In a night we were flung back into savagery and the base struggle for elemental things. And now, ten years after the war, we have not recovered, save to struggle against war itself as a drowning man struggles against the waves which would devour him.

Our present situation in this country, ten years after our plunge into the European cataclysm, is not difficult to define. Through the disintegration of Europe, we have become the political and financial center of the Western world. We have also for the same reason, and because of our own inherent strength, become the potential military master of this same world. Our destined day is come—a day of empire, and wealth, and glory! And our souls are being fashioned for this day. Shown "the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them," we are turning not away. Rather are we preparing to "fall down and worship," that "all these things" may be given unto us.

The Turnip Year in Germany

By AN ENGLISHWOMAN

MID-WINTER, 1917

A DARK, cold night. Sleet falling. A little country station, dimly lighted, bare, cold. A little group of women are waiting for the train; queer figures they look, so shapeless in their old ulsters and faded hats, loaded down with bundles and baskets, old suitcases and handbags, some even with sacks. Patiently they stand there like old packhorses in the rain. They rest their bundles carefully on the ground and endeavor to straighten their backs beneath the heavy rucksack. Now and again one stoops and tries to repack a bag, looking around furtively for fear someone has seen that precious little packet of butter which must be kept out of sight.

My own suitcase lies on the bench. How heavy it is! I shudder, thinking of the long way home, but smile when I remember my loot—seven pounds of rye to roast and use for coffee; one whole pound of butter—never have I had so much, and three whole liters of milk for my baby. Heaps of apples, a small loaf of black bread, and some eggs. I walked ten miles in cold and sleet to outlying farms to secure it. If only it is not taken away from me, as it was last time. Carefully I rearrange my purchases: one bottle of milk in my great-coat pocket—that will pass I am sure; one in the suitcase among some innocent-looking apples, and one in the basket. I'll get through the inspection at S. with one bottle anyway, and if I get more through, I'll sterilize it and baby will have some milk next week.

A far-away whistle. Here comes the train. Quickly I gather up my load. I shall have to fight to get a seat. The little engine staggers into the station, puffing and snorting. We used to poke fun at the little railway, its noise, its slowness, its stuffiness. Now we are too accustomed to its discomfort to find it funny. There is never enough coal, it is never heated or cleaned, it is always full and always late. I stagger up the steps with my load and see one seat in the middle of the car, but every available space is filled with bags and baskets and sacks. Despairingly I look round and the sad faces smile me a greeting; we are all sisters in distress. "Here on top of mine," one working woman says, and gratefully I pile it up and sink down exhausted on the hard bench. No one speaks. There are six more stations to the terminus where we take the train back to the city.

"They say the inspection is getting more severe than ever. They stopped a friend of mine with apples last week," one woman says.

We are all indignant. Fruit has always been free, we protest. Another speaks: "The conductor has just told us that the gendarme struck at a woman's skirts with his saber yesterday to find out if she had any eggs in inside pockets." We all look self-conscious.

"He'd better try that on me," answered another. "He'd get mine in his face, that's all."

The working woman next me shakes with fear. "My God," she says, "I am so afraid. They say they are going to punish food hoarding with imprisonment. If only I can get through with the bit I've got. There are so many children at home."

"You mustn't be so frightened," I tell her irritably. "He can only take away the food. They can't start putting us in prison, there'd be no end to it. We all do it."

"I know," she answers sullenly, "but you perhaps can afford to lose the food; I can't. After giving up a day's work to go on this trip, and trudging about all day in the cold with scarcely anything to eat, spending all my money, and then to have it taken away——" She begins to cry. "I didn't get any milk this time either and I have a baby a year old. I've been giving her rye-coffee in her bottle."

I have a short, sharp struggle with myself, then I say: "Here, take this bottle quick; hide it! We shall be there soon."

She doesn't hesitate. "I'll pay for it," she says. As if I wanted her money. I can only see my own baby's pinched face reproaching me. Well, perhaps the gendarme would have taken it anyway. We trundle on in the darkness. It is raining now and freezing on the train windows as it falls. We are nearing S. and all of us are nervous. The woman next me begins again, "Haven't you got a bread card to spare?"

"I can let you have a half a card," I answer, remembering the small black bread the farmer's wife had given me. She takes it apologetically: "My little Johann is always so hungry."

I make a rapid survey of my load. Let me see: the umbrella and pocket-book can hang on my wrist, one hand for the suitcase that weighs at least twenty pounds with those apples in it, and in the other the basket.

"All change!" shouts the conductor. Out we get on the ice-covered steps. There in the station doorway through which we must file I catch a glimpse of a green uniform. Now for it! Is it any good lying? He won't find my butter I feel sure. I have rolled it out flat with the farmwife's rolling pin, and put it at the bottom of the suitcase with an innocent piece of cardboard on top. My turn is coming. I chide myself for shaking.

"Any butter?" the gendarme roars at me. "No." "Any eggs?" "No." "Open up your things," he shouts. Meekly I open them. "Milk is not allowed," he says. "Have you any?" "Only one bottle for my baby," I answer. He grunts. "What's this?" "Rye," I answer. "How much?" "Three pounds," I lie again cheerfully. He puts his hand among the apples. "Nothing else?" "No," I say, trying to look frank. "Pass," he growls. Trying not to seem in too much of a hurry I close my things.

I am cold and hungry but the restaurant in the big waiting-room across the way has nothing for sale except coffee-substitute; not even rye, which we are becoming quite fond of. I order some; it will be hot anyway. We have an hour to wait for the connection. We huddle in our coats and doze. The express rattles in. Full! People standing in every carriage. With my last remaining strength I fight for standing room. Some get left behind. I sway back and forth for over an hour holding to the baggage rack, my suitcase resting on my icy feet. Endless the journey, and shuddering, I think of the trolley ride yet before me. If only the last car hasn't left the station before the train gets in. If only someone were there to meet me; but my husband is at the front. We are there. Once more we shoulder our loads. The last car is just leaving and I have to run. It is midnight when I let myself into my flat. I had started out at six in the morning.

The Creche

My friend had just had a baby. The whole nine months of her pregnancy she had lain on a couch too weak to get up, scarcely speaking, scarcely making any attempt to eat. We all remonstrated with her; she must make an effort for her baby's sake. All she answered, whispering, was: "I can't eat any more turnips." We had them for breakfast, dinner, and supper; we made them into jam to spread on sticky, heavy black bread that was already full of carrots and potato peelings. My gorge rises now when I think of it. We cooked them with our weekly quarter-pound ration of meat for dinner, we tried to disguise them as soup.

The baby, when it came, like so many others at that time, was not normal. Unfortunately it lived. The doctor insisted on a visit to the North Sea. It would brace my friend up—give her an appetite. I shuddered. Who wanted an appetite? But she had another child of three or four years and the doctor said she hadn't strength enough to take care of two. Someone suggested a creche. There was one near me where the child could stay. I promised to visit the little one and report to her mother.

It was a lovely summer day when I went there. Blue sky and roses in bloom everywhere. I found the place set in a lovely garden, everything spotless and beautiful. I inquired for my friend's little girl.

"They are all out in the garden eating up the sun," said the friendly matron. I passed through spotless corridors out to the sunny lawn. Rows and rows of cots stood under the trees. A nurse came toward me: "The bigger children are on the other side," she said. "Wouldn't you like to see our babies?" I shall never forget that sight.

"Sister," I gasped, "for God's sake, what's the matter with them all? They don't look human. They—they look like little old monkeys." The sister was surprised that I did not know. "Oh they've all got rickets, of course. Look at their wrists and ankles and their little screwed-up faces."

"Yes, rickets!" she repeated, "the English disease! Most of them won't live, and the others will never be strong. The old and the young are all going; perhaps we middle-aged will survive." I turned away and sought the little girl I had come to see. She looked at me with big, sad eyes. "Want my Mutti," she said hopefully at sight of my familiar face.

NOVEMBER, 1918

We stand and look at one another. My husband has the paper in his hands. Armistice! No more fighting. The guns have stopped on every front.

"Is it true?" I ask. He nods. I begin to cry for joy. Gradually I begin to realize all it means. "How soon shall we get some food through?" I ask eagerly.

There is a pause.

"They have decided to keep up the blockade till the peace is actually signed," he answers gruffly.

"Who has decided!" I ask.

"Your countrymen," he answers bitterly.

The First "Boiled" Surgeon

By EDYTHE HELEN BROWNE

SIR JOSEPH LISTER, eminent English surgeon, the hundredth anniversary of whose birth occurs April 5, 1927, can fitly be called "the first 'boiled' surgeon" because by introducing white-winged, surgical cleanliness he routed the "good, old surgical stink" in hospitals. He changed the order for soap from guest size to a charwoman's chunk; at an operation he used a pyramid of clean towels instead of the allotted "one"; he goaded the infirmary plumber to renovate the water pipes so the faucets gave pure gushes of water instead of cloudy trickles. This much and more Lister did in the name of ordinary cleanness. But to insure aseptic cleanliness, to fortify tattered flesh and mangled bone against infection he applied carbolic acid, used heretofore only as a scavenger for Carlisle sewers.

European hospitals have spotty pasts. Overcrowding led to complications in disease. In Lister's day infirmary patients were tumbled together, sometimes two and more in one bed. A man with a gangrene stump clutched in death agony at his convalescent bedfellow, and an erysipelas victim shared the same pillow with a fractured skull damp in bloody bandage. In the ironically named Hôtel Dieu in Paris 1,200 beds accommodated (?) 3,000 patients. The cholera epidemic in 1849 and the butchering Crimean War covered all available floor-space with lumpy mattresses. So "hospital gangrene," or Gray Death, as it was called from the cancerous gray lace fluted around a decaying wound, stalked through the wards, smiting by contagion.

To overcrowding was added septic contacts. A nurse might raise a window a few inches to shake out a duster; but otherwise windows were dangerous portholes through which fresh air might slip. Consequently the patient sniffed sewery air stirring from a hundred wounds. While house-surgeon at Glasgow Infirmary Lister traced a fetid odor to a cholera catacomb, a dead city of loaded coffins under the building.

During the first week in April, when wards underwent spring cleanings, families of germs that had tenanted infirmaries fifty-one weeks of the year formed a grand departing caravan along the superintendent's broom. It was Lister's specially sterilized ward of which one superintendent said, "there was nothing dirty in its appearance so it seemed unnecessary to disturb it." In Glasgow Infirmary hot water was precious; floor mops and soap never got very far beyond the vestibule. Only those hospitals brushed by the immaculate skirt of Florence Nightingale were "fairly clean." The operating room or "theater" in the University College Hospital, where Lister studied, was a stuffy cabin with a wooden table, a greasy gas jet, and one basin.

Surgical instruments were kept no cleaner than household scissors. The surgeon dashed his lance in soapsuds, thrust it into a crummy pocket while preparing the patient, and then proceeded to operate. One probe explored the ulcer, the tuberculous wrist of a laborer, the wound of a tetanus sufferer. The surgeon's wife made sure the buttons on her husband's operating jacket were secure—for they were the pegs upon which hung the silk threads used for stitches. The surgeon himself used his teeth to hold the operating knife, pirate fashion, during a lull. He wore a coat variegated with stains and blood spatters. As every stain attested to the wearer's advance in surgery the coat covered proud shoulders.

The modern hospital rises on a foundation of scrubbing brushes. Walls and ceilings and corridors gleam with purifying whiteness; beds are skeleton clean between crevices; stone stairways are almost blistered from frequent irrigation with scalding water; doors open and close without creating dusty draughts. The operating "theater" is so situated that a bleaching north light intensifies the general cleanliness. Corners are rounded and walls are bare to keep out lurking dirt. Forceps, tweezers, scalpels are immersed in sterilizing solution. Towels are plucked from a chest with tongs. The operator is "boiled" into scientific cleanliness.

Permeating the entire hospital, like incense rising in tribute to the great Lister, floats the stinging fume of carbolic acid.

Lister began by clarifying the wards of Glasgow Infirmary with fresh air and to make sure demurring nurses would keep the windows open he insisted on fires in July. He fumigated lavishly with Condy's deodorant. He trained his assistants to wash their hands thoroughly and often, not mere tidal marking at the wrists but up to the elbow with a final dip in carbolic solution. He ordered clean towels until he was accused by the lay committee of the hospital of "extravagant cleanliness." Instruments swam in carbolic acid. This germ-scourging chemical, appropriated by Lister after he realized some agent was needed to kill microbes breeding putrefaction in a wound, finally became the universally accepted surgical cleanser.

Lister's efforts at the seat of disease, at the crater of "hospital gangrene" for instance, were expedient applications of carbolic. The poisonous area about a wound, resulting from pus and collective uncleanliness, and spreading from bed to bed, recovered under the caustic action of the acid. Gray Death subsided; during Lister's first eighteen months' experience with carbolic as an antiseptic wound buffer only two cases out of thirteen died. Heretofore the patient with compound fracture and broken skin, "the portal of death" through which bacteria marched like invisible undertakers to claim the victim, resigned himself to hospital fate. Lister and his simple swab of carbolized lint now set the patient on the little-traveled highway to recovery.

In the Driftway

ANYTHING which throws light on the ideas and ideals current in American colleges attracts the notice of the Drifter. He isn't especially interested in curricula, in which regard he understands that he shares the feelings of some of the students. But he is always on the alert for indications of how the young men and women of our campuses are thinking, and about what. Thus he pounced the other day on a newspaper item relating that the senior class of Columbia University had held an election in which a majority had voted for one of their mates as

(1) The man who had done most for his class.
(2) The man who had done most for Columbia.
(3) The most reliable man.
(4) The best athlete.
(5) The best all around man.
(6) The most typical Columbia man.
(7) The man most likely to succeed in life.

* * * * *

THE young man who received this tribute must be a fellow of parts, but the Drifter is not concerned with him or with the justness of the verdict. The Drifter is interested in the questions voted upon as a revelation of the class mind. He thinks that only the third and fourth are of consequence. The third is a definite expression in regard to character and the fourth in respect to ability; anyone might well be proud to have such verdicts cast in his favor. The fifth judgment is indefinite and presumably a summary of all the others; hence it doesn't count for much. The sixth is equivalent to saying that the young man in question is like his mates; as an expression of opinion by them it is more of a vote for themselves than for him. The seventh is a prediction and practically the same as the fifth.

* * * * *

THE first two judgments are the most illuminative of the class mind, and the fact that they stand at the head of the list adds to their importance. Obviously the students are in no doubt that a young man ought to come to college to do something for it and for his class. This seems to be a cardinal belief throughout all our colleges, one of the marks which distinguish American universities from similar institutions abroad. This theory is held by faculty as well as students. College life revolves around it. And, the Drifter surmises, the comparative sterility of our campuses as intellectual centers is in no small degree due to the prevalence of this odd misconception. For the Drifter doesn't accept the idea at all. He thinks that if there is any period in life when one has a right to be selfish of time and energy it is in college. If one isn't there primarily for self-improvement, one oughtn't to be there at all. For a young man to squander his energies "for the honor of Old Princevard," or to sacrifice his time "for the sake of dear old '28" is fiddlesticks. If the Drifter believed in endowments, and if he had the money—neither of which is the case—he would establish a prize in every American college to be awarded annually to the student judged to have "done most for himself" in the previous year. "Al" Smith, Progressive?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Alfred Baker Lewis criticizes the progressivism of Al Smith, saying that he has remained silent on Mexico, whereas Catholics like Senator David I. Walsh have spoken against intervention; he has remained silent on the question of labor-union injunctions, and has not disapproved of the issuance of drastic injunctions by Democratic judges; his water-power program is not extensive enough.

Except for prohibition—which has become a State issue—Governor Smith has not expressed himself on any national issues. In his last inaugural address he said he would make no other attempt to gain the Presidential nomination than to give New York the best administration of which he is capable. He has remained true to that pledge.

In the Governor's last annual message he said:

> Legislation should be enacted providing that before injunctions are issued in labor disputes a preliminary hearing should be held at which the parties in interest would be afforded an opportunity of presenting the facts to the court. The present practice of issuing injunctions in labor disputes on affidavits has brought about a growing disrespect for the courts and for judicial process and a bitter feeling between labor and capital. There is no reason why on important applications of this character the parties should not have the fullest opportunity to present all of the facts to the court at an open hearing held for that purpose before any judicial action is taken.

On water-power most of us would be happy if the Republican legislature would accept at least the Governor's proposal, but at this moment even that seems hopeless.

"Al" Smith is certainly the best fitted Progressive who has any chance whatever of reaching the White House.

Contacts Correspondence Club

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Judging from the many letters that are written to newspapers and magazines by readers who are not professional writers, there seems to be a need for a suitable outlet for private opinion. Only a small fraction of these communications are published, yet they mean a great deal to the persons who write them. Often it is the only method of self-expression to advanced thinkers who find themselves isolated in small towns.

To meet this need I have organized a Contacts Correspondence Club. There are no dues, no rules, no admission fees, no officers. Anyone can become a member who wants to engage in active correspondence with the other members of the club. I will send a membership list to any one that applies to me at P. O. Box 375, Ford City, Pa.

What Is a "Modern Woman"?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I confess it seems to me that your These Modern Women series should bear the title Female Survivors from the Victorian Era. I do not mean this as an unfavorable criticism of The Nation. There is no publication that I think more of.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I consider it perfectly outrageous for you to print a confession of a woman who actually likes her parents.

First Glance

IT is perhaps unnecessary to remind anyone who remembers the war of the things done by Colonel T. E. Lawrence in Arabia—his rather sudden transformation from student to soldier, his disappearance into the heart of the peninsula with a plan for uniting the disaffected tribes in a solid front against Turkey, his unbelievable success as inspirer of a great and complicated national movement, and his emergence from many bloody, sandy episodes as the fanatically revered leader whose name had become "Wrecker of Engines." All this was immediately legend; and so has been the career of Colonel Lawrence since he came back to England with the intention of resuming his quiet life; so has been his almost fabulous book of 400,000 words, written, lost, rewritten from memory, published first in eight copies, published again in a few hundred copies, and now at last made available, in greatly reduced form, to as many people as want to read it. Many, indeed, should want to read "Revolt in the Desert" (Doran: $3), and many I am sure will find it among the most beautiful and interesting books of their experience. It is not another "Arabia Deserta" by any means, as of course it was never intended to be. It could have been written a little more slowly than it was. And readers of the abridgment, I am told, miss much when they miss the first six chapters, ruthlessly cut away in spite of the fact that they contain the best of Lawrence's writing—among other things the wonderful paragraph with which John Buchan opens his introduction. But "Revolt in the Desert" is precious as it stands, not only for the story it tells and for the way it tells it but for the revelation it gives of a most curious and subtle personality.

What interested me most in the book, outside of the hundreds of episodes and the dozens of character sketches which by their merit stand alone, was its picture of a man who mingled in himself the qualities of a poet and a scholar with those of an inspired executive. The remarkable thing is not that Colonel Lawrence managed in spite of his quietness to rally passionate Arabs and blow up concrete bridges loaded with Turks, but that in his quietness he did these things and got satisfaction from them. Not the glee, naturally, of an average unimaginative general; but the unspeakable pleasure of a short, mild, blue-eyed scholar who by some miracle suddenly found himself desiring to get physical things done. Colonel Lawrence, who at Gadara remembered Meleager and in a moment of extreme discomfort took out of his saddle-bags a copy of the "Morte d'Arthur," whose favorite adverbs, repeated I know not how many times, are "softly" and "swiftly," and who took time on the busiest of bloody days to make delicate notes on the way of his senses in the presence of mountains and the dawn—this man can speak coolly of sixty wounded Turks blown to crimson bits by the action of his own hand.

Yet Colonel Lawrence preserved in himself throughout that detachment of the intellect and the senses which we should expect of him as poet and philosopher. And in the end he saw the whole episode dwindling, dwindling. After one of the battles he writes: "We were subject to the physical shame of success, a reaction of victory, when it became clear that nothing was worth doing, and that nothing worthy had been done." This I am sure is the key to his mysterious career since the war. As a philosopher he knows that what he did was no more worth doing than anything is; as the one who did it he has been willing to write a record for those who think it important; as a man of imagination he must want to go on now with his life—if life has not been spoiled for him, as it may be, through its having reached a peak too soon.

The book, in only a lesser degree than Doughty's, is full of details which any reader must remember. I have already forgotten some of the battles; I shall not forget Ghazala.

> I was on my Ghazala, the old grandmother camel, now again magnificently fit. Her foal had lately died, and Abdulla, who rode next me, had skinned the little carcass, and carried the dry pelt behind his saddle, like a crupper piece. We started well, thanks to the Zaagi's chanting, but after an hour Ghazala lifted her head high and began to pace uneasily, picking up her feet like a sword-dancer.
> I tried to urge her; but Abdulla dashed alongside me, swept his cloak about him, and sprang from his saddle, calf's skin in hand. He lighted with a splash of gravel in front of Ghazala, who had come to a standstill, gently moaning. On the ground before her he spread the little hide, and drew her head down to it. She stopped crying, snuffled its dryness thrice with her lips; then again lifted her head and, with a whimper, strode forward. Several times in the day this happened; but afterwards she seemed to forget.

Understanding Mexico

Aspects of Mexican Civilization. By José Vasconcelos and Manuel Gamio. University of Chicago Press. $2.

Some Mexican Problems. By Moises Saenz and Herbert I. Priestly. University of Chicago Press. $2.

IN the heart of the upland valley of San Juan Teotihuacán you will find the great ancient City of the Dead, among others the Toltec fortress (Ciudadela), and behind it the Pyramid of Quetzalcoatl with its imposing staircase flanked by snarling stone serpent-heads, erected to the worship of the white god, the Plumed Serpent. This majestic monument was excavated by Dr. Gamio with a persistence that outlived the marching and counter-marching of revolutions, but not in an idle or merely scientific spirit—rather as part of a noble project of racial and social regeneration. At the foot of this pyramid you will find, not entirely misemployed by his successors, a native theater, schools, handicraft shops, and, scattered over the adjacent llano, the homes of the descendants of the ancient pyramid builders, clean and more hygienic, thanks to Dr. Gamio, than those of many other localities.

In Mexico City you will find, on the edge of the Colonia Roma, a vast stadium devoted to athletic contests, school festivals, and other activities, not including bull-fights, built by Vasconcelos when he was Minister of Education. In the heart of the city rises the new Secretariat of Education, also built by him, where he set Diego Rivera, the painter, to decorating the patios and stairways, and started the most original development of painting in the modern world. You will come across new open-air experimental schools, and in the capitals of the various states, as a proper example to provincial education, model schools maintained by the central government in charge of men well versed in the latest educational theories and to whom John Dewey takes on god-like proportions. These efforts are largely due to the initiative of the actual Subsecretary of Education, Moises Saenz.

In these two volumes, the record of the Harris lectures for 1926, is to be found much of the experience and wisdom of these three Mexican educators; and in addition there are included three lectures by Professor Priestly of the University of California, a man devoted to things Mexican for many years. As a result, here is preserved a record—suffering, it is true, from some of the defects of printed lectures, but at least readable where it is not profound—of modern Mexico; its background, its international difficulties, its revolution, its problems, its achievements, and, above all, its hopes—if sometimes a pathetic picture yet nearly always inspiring.

The lectures of Vasconcelos are undoubtedly the most brilliant and commanding. His vision comprehends the potentialities material, racial, and spiritual of two continents. He is not blind to the defects of his own people; he is interested in explaining them. He asks the pertinent question: "Why is it that the English, the Dutch, and the French, three first-class races, have had such slight success in their sleepy old colonies of the three Guianas?" And further on he asks if it may not happen that when electrical energy supersedes coal and petroleum as the motor force of modern industry, Mexico, home of heat and mountains, will not be in a favored economic situation which will lead to a new and beautiful flowering of its culture.

Both Gamio and Saenz are more interested in actual proximate problems: the first, above all, in the incorporation of the Indian into the modern milieu—and no one understands this question more profoundly than does Dr. Gamio, as both his work in Teotihuacán and his interrupted work in Oaxaca vividly attest, not to mention his monumental three-volume study of the Valley of Teotihuacán and its inhabitants. Señor Saenz is more concerned with the Mexican revolution face to face with foreign invasion and the domestic necessity of rapid reconstruction; and he traces out the emergence of Mexican nationalism, reinvigorated during the past fifteen years by the rise of the labor movement and the extension of education—all in all, a problem of integration, of the creation of firmer racial and social bonds. Professor Priestly's lectures are perhaps the weakest in the book, yet as an outsider, not a Mexican, he approaches the subject from a different angle and realizes more keenly that Mexico has an obligation to itself to meet the demands of modern industrialization and population pressure on its borders in some efficient manner consonant with its culture and institutions —and this before the end of the present century, or all national and international "protective devices . . . will bend like reeds in a flood" and Mexico will be overwhelmed.

Workhorse and Thoroughbred

Henry James: Man and Author. By Pelham Edgar. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

Anthony Trollope: A Commentary. By Michael Sadleir. With an Introduction by A. Edward Newton. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

LIKE all the other minor glories of a past generation, its writers of secondary importance tend to lose their luster, value, and desirability. To resurrect them from their works as one drags forth an Egyptian mummy from its telltale tomb is, at best, a task of ironic inconsistency, since the less a subject deserves of his biographer's enthusiasm the more of it he needs —and usually gets. And yet, again as in the case of the Egyptian dead, the curiosity and human interest of the general is aroused—if at all—not by the mummy but by the contents of its pyramid.

Certainly this holds true for both James and Trollope, neither of whom had that inner and independent flame of personality which, while it radiates through the work of the author, still sheds its keenest brilliance in the living man. For James deliberately made his work the best expression of himself and Trollope unconsciously but wholly expressed himself in his work.

Both biographers admit as much, and Mr. Edgar even bases his book on this thesis. He seeks to interpret James simply by a minute examination of his writings. This method may have virtues not apparent to the reviewer, but its palpable and disqualifying fault lies in that it is, despite the running commentary of Mr. Edgar, merely the means of obtaining the groundwork for a biographical study. The task of synthesizing these notes and reflections into a distinguishable portrait or conception still remains to be done. Moreover, while a few of these comments are astute and penetrating, most of them are obvious and unnecessary, and a good many are downright silly. The latter are born of Mr. Edgar's adulation of James, his insensibility to good prose, and his utter failure to realize that his hero had but a modicum of the fundamental elements of the great artist's endowment. In his vision of the world, in his conception of character, in his understanding of emotional conflict Henry James was distinctly mediocre; only in his scrupulous reporting of that upper segment of society, who seem to have been born simply to illustrate Lincoln's contention that wealth is a superfluity of things we don't need, lies an element of genius. James himself, conscious of these deficiencies in his later years, put all the emphasis on his precious prose so that like a trained thoroughbred he moved proud of his gait and indifferent to his principal purpose, the swift communication of ideas.

There is a pathetic irony, then, in the fact that of these biographies it is the study of James which is written in the most ordinary of journalistic prose, whereas Trollope's portrait is drawn by an artist whose every stroke of the pen betrays a cunning, conscious craftsmanship. All sense of James, the stylist, "the votary and victim of the single impression" as he characterized himself, is lost somewhere in the clutter of loose pronouns and modifiers by which Mr. Edgar gives an air of careless confusion to the most regular ideas. On the other hand, the glittering trappings of Mr. Sadleir almost disguise that popular workhorse of an author, who serially dragged thousands of useless words through the magazines, as a victorious—one might even say mid-Victorious—charger galloping to the defense of the "acquiescent but scrupulous section of his countrymen."

To achieve this impression the biographer covers up more than he discloses. Mr. Sadleir seeks to explain away the "Autobiography" as the least reliable of Trollope's works, characterizing his statement about the purpose of his writing as "merely another example of the influence of his period on his method of self-expression," rejecting his confession of profligacy as "illogical and false," and ignoring all the plain evidence of hack work. Having built up a defense in the "pure fiction" theory—"the genuine novel-writer should be an artist, and not a governess, a parson, or an agitator"—Mr. Sadleir is sorely puzzled and disturbed by his hero's few ventures into the realm of ideas, by "his insistence on actual political happening"; and he can barely forgive Ireland because the terrible conditions Trollope witnessed there inspired him to utilize the medium of fiction for their amelioration. "Ireland," he writes almost humorously, "came near by her insane absorption in her own wrongs and thwarted hopes to choke the very genius that she had vitalized."

We are made to realize even more acutely the exceptional viewpoint of Mr. Sadleir in comparing his praise of "The Belton Estate"—"in no other novel is the essence of Trollope so concentrated"—with the opinion expressed by Henry James when he reviewed the book for The Nation.

> Our great objection to "The Belton Estate" [wrote James] is that we seem to be reading a work written for children, a work prepared for minds unable to think, a work below the apprehension of the average man or woman. "The Belton Estate" is a stupid book . . . essentially, organically stupid. It is without a single idea. It is utterly incompetent to the primary function of a book of whatever nature—namely, to suggest thought.

Admitting this, Mr. Sadleir writes: "Nevertheless, to a reader in sympathy with the Trollopian method and mentality, the book is a delight for its smoothness, its subtlety, and its faultless adjustment of character and circumstance."

With such an uncompromising bias as this, it is a miracle of good writing that the special pleader's most grievous faults are avoided by the author. He withholds the purple passages of encomium, though the violet tints of sentimentalism color the book sufficiently. He is never dull in his arguments though often redundant. If one but divorce Trollope, the author, from the subject of this book, it will become a fascinating narrative of a fictitious personage of great charm and wisdom and genius. It bristles with phrases that "suggest thought"; it presents an original interpretation of the mid-Victorian era; and in Fanny Trollope it introduces a character who will far better repay study than her son. Contrasted with this work, Mr. Edgar's volume reads like the tedious discourse of an honest, well-informed, but uninspired lecturer. JOHAN SMERTENKO

Passion for the Unpassionate

The Old Countess. By Anne Douglas Sedgwick. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

IN her latest novel Anne Douglas Sedgwick, acute analyst of international manners and delicate observer of the politer aspects of human nature, has been carried beyond her emotional depths and written a story of passion which can hardly be convincing to any save unpassionate people. Beginning with a thoroughly Jamesean situation, which concerns itself with a handsome and happily married young English artist who finds himself unexpectedly involved in the affairs of an aging French noble woman and her mysteriously saint-like young protegee, she gradually allows herself to abandon her own metier and attempts, for her, the impossible task of describing directly the passion which springs up between the young people. As a result she succeeds only in casting over the whole story an air of persistent unreality which gradually passes from the rather agreeably romantic into sheer melodramatic pomposity and which makes the catastrophe—brought about by a convenient flood introduced for the sole purpose of drowning the young woman—seem appropriately mechanical.

Miss Sedgwick's characters feel all the emotions and suffer from all the perplexities that a thorough knowledge of the politer sort of fiction dealing with problems of adultery would suggest. Hovering over her puppets with an air of professional sympathy which suggests nothing so much as the dutiful compassion of a trained nurse who has never been ill, Miss Sedgwick puts them through all the spiritual contortions conventionally appropriate to the situation. Her hero, for example, does not want to destroy his ideal of the heroine's purity by physical possession, and she does not want to hurt his wife. He is tortured by the suspicion that she has had lovers before; she is afraid that he will think her cheap; there are unexpected meetings, soul conflicts, and eternal farewells; but there is nothing which is not part of a now completely stale tradition. Never for a moment is the wax-like saint alive and never for a moment does one feel the slightest heat in the supposed passion of the lovers. Thoroughly competent and acute in describing the background of her action and in suggesting the national characteristics of her incidental characters, Miss Sedgwick is totally at a loss in her effort to picture a passionate situation which is obviously outside the range of what her temperament can comprehend.

Doubtless there is no necessity for an artist to experience that which he would describe, but one can never describe a thing for which one has not a certain potentiality, and it is here that Miss Sedgwick is found wanting. Even in her happiest efforts it has been evident that she is a sheltered and all but too fastidious novelist—one who has found her spiritual home behind the hedgerows of England and who surveys the world from a tea-table's coign of vantage. Internationalist though she strives to be, and eager though she is not only to understand and compare the social traditions of three countries but to penetrate as well those passions which lead men to smash whatever traditions may be theirs, she is too calm and too secure to be more than a wondering spectator of whatever is not as decorous and orderly as her own soul. Like her master, Henry James, she is happiest when she is concerned with the nuances of social intercourse or when, concerned with passions, sins, and crimes, she studies them not directly but in the ripples which spread from them to disturb the placid surface of orderly society. Such was the task which she set herself in her two best novels, "Adrienne Toner" and "The Little French Girl," and when in the present instance she turns aside from it the effect is only to demonstrate how incapable she is of making passion convincing. Fastidiously, almost priggishly correct in every taste and feeling, no amount of good-will can enable her to comprehend any action not either gentlemanly or ladylike. In the presence of anything indecorous one can see her gathering her skirts carefully about her ankles, and when she sets out upon any adventure which leads her into unsalubrious regions she reminds one of James's unforgettable description of the English tourist in Paris whose wraps and bundles suggest that he is anxiously prepared against any inclemency, physical or moral, of the weather. Every scene and every comment doubtless does credit to the purity of her heart and the refinement of her manners; but many of both inspire little confidence in her capacity to describe the less decorous aspects of human nature and conduct. She has confessed a mild surprise that she should be considered a disciple of Henry James and she has said that her favorite novelists were the Russians, but surely nothing could be less Russian than her infinite incapacity for the emotional understanding of any form of unconventionality.

The EVOLUTION of WAR

A new and original study by Emanuel Kanter, author of THE AMAZONS. It explains in a novel fashion the economic and social causes that produce war. It points out the weakness of present-day pacifism, and shows the social changes that must precede the complete elimination of war. Ample historical data are cited to support the author's theories.

A Liberal Looks at the Empire

The Third British Empire. By Alfred Zimmern. Oxford University Press. $2.

IN what sense is Canada less an independent nation than the United States? It would take a metaphysician to answer this question with any satisfaction to himself. It is true that Canadians regard the king of England as their "sovereign," but that is merely a figment of their political imagination. The king has no more authority in Canada than he has in the United States. The British Commonwealth of Nations is a unique instance in history of a world-wide political community united by ties that are invisible and by forces that are intangible. It is without a constitution as it is without a philosophy, and yet it exists. In the realm of politics existence is of itself a matter of great significance.

Mr. Zimmern's little volume discusses the political and economic problems of what he calls the Third British Empire. The first was the authoritative empire that came to an end in 1776; the second, the loosely hung empire that came to an end in 1914; and the third, the one that emerged from the World War as the British Commonwealth of Nations. Mr. Zimmern writes with both knowledge and ease. A scholar by temperament and training, a former official in the British Foreign Office, a promoter of liberal causes, a writer of charm and lucidity, he is indeed well qualified to interpret the British Empire to the educated public.

Mr. Zimmern is both a Liberal and an imperialist. At first championed only by the Conservatives imperialism became so popular that it captured the Liberals and even the Laborites. The dualism existing in the empire, with autocratically governed India and the democratically governed Dominions, appeals to the special traditions of each party. To the Conservatives India is the empire, and the Dominions only a sentimental addition. But to the Liberals the Dominions are the empire, and India an awkward embarrassment which they would remove by granting home rule. When they became converts to imperialism the Liberals had to create an imperialist ideology in harmony with their pacific and democratic traditions. The British Empire, declares Mr. Zimmern, guar-

by

Alexandra Kollontay

"RED LOVE" is not merely a story of sex-relations in post-war Russia. The canvas against which Mme. Kollontay has painted the epic of the new woman transcends the borders of Soviet Russia. The eternal triangle is depicted in its most tragic, yet realistic, form: the man, flanked by the woman of yesterday and the woman of tomorrow, struggling to understand his tormented self, yet never succeeding.

"Red Love" is the story of free marriage—the standards of morals—career vs. love—motherhood—free divorce—in the country where the theoretic aspects of these problems have been tested by life.

antees the peace of the world, and "survives as one of the world's guardians of liberty." India is not really held by autocratic rule but "by the double bond of science and character." The imperial official is an "unrivaled primary teacher of peoples," unequaled for "courage, for honor and loyalty, for tolerance, for wisdom and calm judgment, for self-control in emergencies." What are these sentiments but a variation of Kipling's "white man's burden"? Imperialist Liberalism is another instance of the remarkable power of English political genius to reconcile opposing traditions in the interest of practical policy.

As a result of the World War the Dominions reached the final goal in what the author aptly calls "the procession" of the colonies, moving in stages from autocratic rule to complete democratic self-government. The Dominions are now equal with the mother country in foreign affairs, which gives them international status. Is not this change a "concealed process of disintegration"? Did not the British Empire, in effect, suffer "the same fate as that which overtook its rivals"? asks Mr. Zimmern. His answer is so interesting and so original that it merits careful consideration. Mr. Zimmern believes that the League of Nations insures the existence of the British Commonwealth of Nations. An enthusiastic supporter of the League, he rejoices in the fact that it introduced an "age of integration" by establishing, for the first time, a regular system of international cooperation. The pioneer of this great change, in his view, was the British Empire, which established peace and cooperation among one-quarter of the world's inhabitants, scattered in every continent. It anticipated the League by recognizing the principle of nationality within its territories, by the flexibility of its policy, and by its trusteeship of backward peoples. The League therefore found in the empire a pattern and an inspiration for its activities. And the empire found in the League a world-wide protector. The latter would come to its support against an aggressive attack from without. Attempts from within to disintegrate the empire would receive little encouragement because the Dominions would be loath to lose the double advantage of having the protection of London and Geneva. If Mr. Zimmern is right the League of Nations is safe.

Black and White Love

Latterday Symphony. By Romer Wilson. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

POLISHED, almost perfumed, is this little story of the bootless love of a young Englishman and an American Negro singer for a beautiful girl. The scene opens when Stephen Russell steps into a Mayfair party where Lindsay Jackson is singing spirituals and there again meets Mary, whose memory he has been trying to blot out in the sharp sunlight of Spain. To Jackson also Mary suddenly shines forth as all that is desirable, if unattainable, on this earth. The story follows the two men through this polite party and a studio rout afterwards; through the interminable afternoon of the next day until they can see Mary again; and through the tea-party at Stephen's house at which each in turn tempts his fate and loses. The subtleties and sophistications of the cultured young Englishman form one set of minor chords, the gentle simplicity of the American another. Both break unavailing against the melody which is Mary. Their turbulencies can touch her, move her, even hurt her, without disturbing profoundly her clear depths. The book is delicately lovely, occasionally skirting narrowly, but safely, the edges of prettiness or ultra-refinement.

There is a special interest to Americans in Miss Wilson's portrayal of Jackson, the Negro. She is able to see and to imagine the tragedy of color which hangs like a veil between him and many of his desires, to trace the rending conflicts of the black and the white strains which produced him. Yet he appears not as a type or a museum piece, but as an artist who happens to be a colored man, an individual struggling with one set of opposing forces as all of us must struggle with one condition or another in ourselves. At a time when Negro art and Negro characteristics are in danger of being as slavishly lauded as they have been anathematized in the past, it is refreshing that someone should penetrate beyond the clamor and depict a Negro as primarily a human being.

Books in Brief

The Philippines: A Treasure and a Problem. By Nicholas Roosevelt. J. H. Sears and Company. $3.50.

Mr. Roosevelt thinks that President Wilson advocated Philippine independence "for purely political purposes"; that "no American ever better understood the difficult task of dealing with a sensitive alien race" than Leonard Wood; that "the idea of fair play is as alien to the Filipino as to all other Orientals"; that "the Oriental's idea of government is one in which the dominating group exercises power ruthlessly"; that, therefore, we should behave as Oriental rulers and keep the Philippines—partly because "we have a responsibility toward the hundreds of thousands of Christian converts made in China by American missionaries," partly to save the white man's prestige, partly to keep the price of rubber and quinine down, partly to keep up roads the Filipinos do not want; and in general for the sake of the stupidly unwilling Filipinos themselves. He quotes Kipling in every chapter head, and urges Congress to give more power to Leonard Wood so that "misapplied altruism can be succeeded by efficiency."

The Architectural League Exhibition

FOR somebody this chaotic show was a success. Crowds pushed their half dollars through the wickets and surged past the close-packed exhibits. One wonders whether they attached the idea of architecture most strongly to the rainstorm, sunset, night, and dawn of a theatrical lighting equipment company, to the beruffed pillows and coverlets of another booth, or to the delights of metal beds finished to look just like wood. Or perhaps they were more interested in refrigerators or furnaces or a set dinner table or kitchen stoves. Or even in the clattering machines of the Western Union Telegraph Company's display. The Architectural League—or the good business agent who arranged it all—aimed to please all tastes—particularly those of all possible advertisers. Occasionally an organ from a hidden room boomed out over all like that of a movie house when the villain drives up in his car, or purred gently like the accompaniment of the garden reconciliation scene at the end of the last reel. It was very bustling and confused. It breathed—it shouted—success. It was all rather exciting and very modern.

The architecture? Oh, one almost forgot the architecture. Around nooks and corners, and in a few of the more important spaces that the entrepreneur had forgotten to sell, they did have some photographs, a few models, and a great deal of sculpture and decorative painting. It took one's attention away from the fascinating rubber tiles made to look like marble, and the pseudo-Pompeiian bathroom. More important still, so confused was the hanging of it, with churches elbowing houses and gardens next to office buildings, that it almost took attention away from itself. Perhaps the rent of the enormous exhibition hall was too high for the league to afford time to hang the show intelligently. Perhaps the unintelligent hanging was one reason why nothing in it stood out as supremely interesting, why it was so difficult to get from it any coherent idea. Even gorgeous pictures of the magnificent Barclay-Vesey

by LEWIS S. GANNETT
Associate Editor of The Nation

Published by THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York

Single copies, 25c.
In bundles of 10 or more, 15c.

Gives in fifty pages the background against which China's historic struggle is being enacted. Contains interviews with the Cantonese General, and with Soviet agents in North and South China; conversations with American and British officials, missionaries, and the student leaders of the Nationalist movement fresh from American universities.

Telephone Building by McKenzie, Voorhees, and Gmelin—now, through the lamented death of Mr. McKenzie, Voorhees, Gmelin, and Walker—which received the medal of honor, were hidden away in an alcove.

In general it seemed that houses were growing simpler, less theatrical, more direct and human, that all too few designers of city buildings have learned that setbacks per se do not create beauty and that a genius for mass creation is still rare, that the Goodhue Associates continue masters of the field in fresh and modern adaptation of the Gothic style. One could not help noticing the models of the daring colored pediments of the Philadelphia Museum, by Jennewein and Gregory, or speculating on how their colors, garish in the artificial light, would soften in the sun outdoors. One saw the large murals of Eugene Savage for the Elks Memorial by Egerton Swartout, powerfully drawn, but seeming rather drab in color; one might see the cartoons of Hildreth Meiere's decorations for the Nebraska Capitol, interesting attempts in a sort of large-scale simplified mosaic in tile; and there was more if you were curious enough—painting galore, and all sorts of sculpture, good, bad, and indifferent—even down to a colossal figure from a War Memorial—such a nice boy he was—that was the direct lineal descendant of the cast-iron Civil War soldier of 1870 brought up to date.

But why should the visitors take the trouble to search for anything so stupid as real creative art? The advertisers had such amusing wares displayed. One could stand for hours and watch the toy lighting changes of the stage people, or listen to the organ, or watch miniature figures dart through miniature revolving doors. And occasionally one would come suddenly upon a set of carved wood doors of vivid beauty, or iron work strong and lovely, or mosaic that was new and vital, to show that craftsmanship and the ideal of beauty in manufacturing still lives on. And then, if that was too great a shock, one could walk upstairs and see how to build practically anything out of practically nothing.

We architects have now to congratulate ourselves; we are quite up to date. The Architectural League exhibition is at last completely and comfortably commercialized; it was as hard to find the architecture sandwiched between its advertising booths as to find a verse in the back pages of the New Yorker, news on any but the front page of an evening paper, or the final columns of a story in the Saturday Evening Post.

TALBOT FAULKNER HAMLIN

Drama

Two Successes

AFTER keeping her for more than four years in a golden bondage to the role of Sadie Thompson in "Rain," the managers of Miss Jeanne Eagels have allowed her to return to New York in a conventional French farce which is raised somewhat above the level of its kind by a certain brisk humor and excellent acting. Without ceasing to wonder that so bright a young man as M. Jacques Deval, its author, should be content to restrict himself within the narrow limits set by the genre he has adopted, one may nevertheless admit that "Her Cardboard Lover" (Empire Theater) is more amusing than one would expect it to be.

For years the French farce has been threatening to die of anemia. Not only have the theme and the characters been completely standardized but convention has demanded as well that the action should take place in a vacuum. It is very seldom, indeed, that the personages concerned have any occupations or any opinions. All the incidental circumstances which give even a superficial variety to amorous complications are omitted, and generally the characterization does not advance in complexity beyond the point where the dramatis personae can be described adequately as "a jealous husband" and "a debonair lover." A set of men, absolutely alike in having no occupation except love-making and quite indistinguishable from one another in the matter of manners and morals, compete for the favors of a set of women who seem so exactly alike as to make promiscuity monotonous. No type of American play, with the possible exception of the mystery melodrama, has been quite so thoroughly drained of content. Even our farceurs are aware of the existence of those different levels of society, those different types of temperament, and those different occupations which give variety to contemporary life, and they do suggest that their material, however much it has been distorted, has been drawn from that life. But French farces are as artificial as pastoral poetry. Not for years has anyone introduced a new character or allowed himself to be influenced by contemporary manners or contemporary preoccupations. He has inherited a set of puppets and a set of situations and he seems determined to hand them on unchanged to his children.

It is obvious that M. Deval's temperament is neither bold nor revolutionary. It can hardly have struck him as an original idea to lay the scene of his first act in the salon of a gambling casino and the other two scenes in a bedroom. Neither is his story—which concerns the efforts of a too devoted divorcée to get rid of the young man whom she has hired to pose as her lover in order to prevent her from obeying an impulse to return to her husband—very startlingly new. Yet M. Deval, far from being depressed by the conventionality of his material, seems to bubble with all the enthusiasm of a man with a brand new idea. He acts as though writing farces of this kind were the most joyful business in the world, and without being the author of any memorable witticism he has both a keen sense of the ridiculous and infectious high spirits. Moreover an admirable company, in which Mr. Leslie Howard is quite as conspicuous as Jeanne Eagels, goes far to supply his deficiencies and in the second act Miss Eagels succeeds, by more or less illegitimate means, in saving the play from the doldrums into which it is threatening to fall. Observing, perhaps, a certain lack of light in the piece, she determined that it should have a little heat at least, and she gives an almost embarrassingly convincing representation of the heroine's ardent impatience when she believes that the husband is soon to arrive. All in all "Her Cardboard Lover" is a sufficiently amusing piece which, though it will not enrich dramatic literature, seems to promise to do a good deal toward enriching the particular managers responsible for its American production.

Even less important as literature and even more certainly destined to resounding commercial success is "The Spider" (Chanin's Forty-sixth Street Theater), which comes to rescue the mystery melodrama at the moment when in it, too, every possibility for novelty seemed to be exhausted. A good many plays before this have experimented with the "plant" in the audience and the characters who enter via the aisles, but no other has so ingeniously made the audience a part of the action. The scene is supposed to be laid in a vaudeville theater and the play begins as a conventional vaudeville performance. Then, in the course of the third turn, an altercation arises between a mind-reader and a member of the audience. Suddenly the lights of the theater are extinguished, a shot is fired from the auditorium, and when the lights have been turned on again a man has been murdered. A doctor is called from the audience, police arrive, the manager of the house apologizes, the spectators are forbidden to leave the theater, and the rest of the play proceeds upon the assumptions there established. The story is of conventional pattern but the technical difficulties involved are worked out with great ingenuity, completeness, and verisimilitude. Even the spectator who would now find himself blasé at "The Bat" will be kept agreeably upon the verge of hysteria by "The Spider." "Lally" (Morosco) is an amazingly obvious plagiarism of the Sanger Circus theme, with none of the sparkle and ingenuity of Miss Kennedy's conversation. It is difficult indeed to swallow the poor imitation with the original so accessible.

"VOTES FOR FLAPPERS" is the proposed reform which is now dividing England. Votes for women, that is, after they have attained their legal majority, instead of at thirty years of age. The Labor Party sponsors the measure, but even Mrs. Pankhurst has admitted that to extend the franchise to the twenty-one-year-old female is "a very serious step to take." And the members of the Tory Party, who bitterly oppose the proposal, are advancing all the old arguments that once rent the atmosphere when "Votes for Women-who-have-reached-the-ripe-age-of-thirty" was the question at issue. There is something infinitely humorous and also infinitely irritating about the contention that while the male, on turning the calendar from twenty to twenty-one, attains the sound and cautious judgment of maturity necessary for the casting of the momentous ballot, the historical knowledge and the statesmanlike acumen requisite for a subject of the world's largest empire—that while the male, we repeat, dons these worthy attributes like a cloak at 21, the female requires nine more years to rise to these heights. Of course, everyone knows that this is intrinsically nonsense; of course, also, the fact that to permit women of 21 to vote would create more women than there are men voters in the country is of much more importance. Women in politics are still more or less of an unknown quantity, and Tory statesmen are traditionally unwilling to take a chance.

THE PRICE THAT THE BRITISH PAY for the folly of the British mine-owners and their Conservative support is shown by the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Winston Churchill, has had to report a deficit of £36,693,784, sixteen millions larger than had been expected, and more than double the deficit of last year, which was £14,000,000. Had the cost of the Government stayed at last year's figure of £800,000,000 there would have been a small surplus. It was the rise in government expenses which is responsible for this unpleasant showing. No less than £42,000,000 were added to the Government's expenditures, while the income failed to reach the estimated amount chiefly because of the coal strike. This is shown by the fact that in three months since January 1 the deficit was cut from £146,000,000 to the figure given above—the strike ended in November. In the face of this a wise and sensible British Government would avoid military entanglement in China with the inevitable loss of British trade in that country, and the winning of the enduring hatred of the Chinese people, and would seek instead to diminish its outlays in every direction. But the minds of Baldwin, Chamberlain, and Winston Churchill in such matters as China are the minds of 1900; they still live in the era of punitive expeditions and quick revenge for any injury to an Anglo-Saxon.

WINNIPEG OPENED A COMPETITION for a design for a cenotaph to commemorate the Winnipeg men who died in the war. Thirty men competed; the judges unanimously decided that Emanuel Hahn's design was best. But someone discovered that Mr. Hahn had been born in Germany. He had come to Canada in 1888, at the age of seven; he had become a Canadian citizen as soon as he was of age; he had married a Canadian girl and lived nearly forty years in Canada; he had designed other war memorials, and his brother had done the decorative work for the Ontario Parliament Building. But he was born in Reutlingen, Württemberg, Germany. A group of super-Winnipegians pulled the squeaky organ stops of the war-time hymns of hate; some of the veterans pleaded that to build a cenotaph designed by a man who lived his first seven years under a German kaiser would be a desecration of the dead. The men's and women's Canadian clubs, even the Winnipeg branch of the Canadian Navy League, spoke up for British fair play; they said that to reject Mr. Hahn's design would be to insult all the naturalized citizens of Canada. But the hate-hawkers won; Mr. Hahn's design was dropped; he receives merely a consolation prize. Winnipeg might have remembered the example of Manchester, England. Its best site is occupied by the Albert Memorial, commemorating a German-born Briton. When Manchester's cenotaph was unveiled, the Guardian said:

> Our Manchester war memorial has been given a secondary site in the city, the best one being still dedicated to the memory of an estimable German, who had the good fortune to marry a young English queen.

THAT IS AN INTERESTING ANNOUNCEMENT of Senator George W. Norris of Nebraska that he will retire from the Senate at the end of the present term and become a candidate for Governor. He wishes to round out a public service which already runs to thirty years by making over the government of his State and giving it an administration totally free from politics. He even hopes to reduce the legislature to a single legislative body of not more than twenty-five members elected on a non-partisan basis. He would next seek the elimination of a large percentage of the present body of State officials, and he would try to have the State develop its own electric power for distribution at cost. This is so attractive and so original a program that we are almost tempted to wish that his term in the Senate expired at once instead of in 1931. We cannot, however, yield to that temptation, because the fact is that Senator Norris is one of the great figures of the Senate, and in several respects the most useful legislator we have in Congress. As our readers will remember, he tried to refuse another Senatorial term in 1924, but was not allowed to do so. Whether public opinion will permit him to leave the Senate in 1931 is open to question. No one can doubt, however, that he would perform a service of inestimable value to the entire United States if he could carry out the experiment upon which he is reported to be bent. The modern State legislature, usually a sink-hole of corruption, certainly needs to be cut down and placed on a non-partisan basis. If there ever was a time when the affairs of an American State should be conducted upon partisan lines it has long since passed.

OF EXTRAORDINARY IMPORTANCE is the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission on March 3, by a vote of 6 to 4, that the federal valuation of railroads for rate-making and other purposes must be based upon costs, prices, and wages of 1914, instead of upon the higher levels of subsequent years. This opinion disposes of the railroads' contention that valuations should be in accord with what it would cost to rebuild at the present time. The commission holds that the 1914 prices, plus what has been invested in the railroads since, less depreciation, shall be the standard hereafter—provided, of course, that the Supreme Court concurs. The latter has so far refused to pass upon any phase of this problem, awaiting a clear-cut decision of the commission. As it is, this verdict is probably the most important ever made by the Interstate Commerce Commission. A contrary opinion would have added eleven billions of dollars to the valuation of the railways and presumably additional freight and passenger rates of $600,000,000 annually. When one recalls the growing conviction that one of the chief sources of the farmer's troubles is the high carrying rates paid on his market-bound products, it is plain that so heavy an additional burden would have been a genuine blow to all forms of industry. Incidentally, this decision entirely vindicates the contentions of the Progressive forces and especially of the late Senator Robert M. La Follette, who never ceased championing this valuation theory; that he stood for such a dangerous policy was one of the most frequent reasons given by the business world for opposing his Presidential candidacy.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE HAS APPOINTED five men of distinction to represent the United States at the Economic Conference to be held in Geneva early in May. They are Henry M. Robinson of Los Angeles, a member of the Dawes Commission; Norman H. Davis, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and of State in the Wilson Administration; John W. O'Leary, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States; Professor Alonzo E. Taylor of Stanford University, an agricultural expert who was closely associated with Secretary Hoover during the war; and Dr. Julius Klein, director of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce. Each and every one is unexceptionable in his record, and nearly all have nation-wide reputations. The country is, therefore, assured of a powerful delegation. We cannot, however, fail to voice our regret that not a single labor man was chosen—if we are rightly informed, every other delegation has labor representation. It is noticeable, too, that the five appointees unanimously represent the big-business point of view. In that respect it is characteristic of most of Mr. Coolidge's appointments.

THE BITTEREST MAYORALTY CAMPAIGN ever waged in Chicago ends as we go to press, with the forces which believe in progress and civic decency doing their utmost to reelect Mayor Dever—not that his administration has been ideal but that it is far superior to ex-Mayor Thompson's and far ahead of anything the latter now has to offer. But great classes in the community have not forgotten that Mr. Thompson did not lose his head during the war; that he personally stood for tolerance and for decency toward the Scandinavians and German-Americans, who, elsewhere in the Middle West, were often so abominably treated. The Negroes, too, are his fast friends because he has dealt with them with justice and consideration; and there are from 160,000 to 200,000 of them in Chicago today. So conspicuous is their support of the ex-Mayor that there has been a most unfortunate development of race prejudice. At its close, the campaign has deteriorated into a mere calling of names, in which Mr. Thompson distinguishes himself by vilifying Professor Merriam and some of the other men who have for years fought the battle of decent government in Chicago.

WITH PLENTY OF COAL above ground the soft-coal strike that began on April 1 seems like a calm and peaceful vacation. Summer is coming; 80,000,000 surplus tons are on hand; no one need worry. No one, that is, except the miners in the union fields. They have long been working short days and short weeks; now they are asked to take short wages even for the hours they do work. And they have gone on strike. In some of the fields the operators will settle, nominally at the union wage-scale; in others the miners' families will go hungry. The union is at a loss: two-thirds of the country's soft coal is now dug by non-union miners, and unless it can organize them or control their production the work of decades in building up decent conditions in the coal-fields will slip away. Unrestricted competition, leading to overproduction, seems to have ruined the coal industry, and to have sapped the lives of the men who work in it. Advocates of unrestricted laissez-faire should keep their eyes on it.

ON THE "FERRY TO EUROPE," described on another page of this issue, will be found this summer, in addition to Mr. and Mrs. George F. Babbitt, an amazing number of American delegations, missions, tours, and pilgrimages. Students particularly have, largely on their own initiative and through their own associations, organized travel groups and laid out tours over the face of Europe. Many of them are managed by The Open Road, Inc., under the auspices of the International Confederation of Students and the National Student Federation of America. These associations have arranged every detail of a score or more trips at low cost, providing accommodations, entertainments, lectures, and an opportunity to touch superficially at least the native life of the people of other countries. Some groups will hike and camp with "youth" organizations in Germany, others will be taken into the homes of European students. Associations of young people in every country of Europe are preparing to welcome them. Such organized fraternization cannot but create a healthy sense of international fellowship. It is particularly fortunate that the movement is spreading to Russia, which this summer will entertain four groups of students sent by the Open Road and several more organized by the Student Council of New York—totaling perhaps a hundred and fifty young men and women. In small groups they will spread over Russia from Leningrad to the Black Sea and east to the Urals, and will everywhere be welcomed and guided by the students of the workers' republic.

NOT ONLY COLLEGE STUDENTS but their elders as well are seeking through travel and study to achieve a deeper understanding of world problems. Several groups of progressive teachers are visiting the new schools of Europe and attending the Locarno World Conference on New Education. For the seventh year Sherwood Eddy is leading a party of "educators, ministers, editors, and men in public life" on a study tour which will include lectures by and meetings with leading men in various countries. The members of the group will be rigidly limited to persons "who will actively promote better international relations upon their return, and who, through editorial responsibility, public speaking, and writing, will be able to exert wide influence on American public opinion." Although a bit pompous, this dictum indicates the serious purpose of the pilgrimage. For obvious economic reasons, fewer travelers come the other way, but one group of selected students from England, Sweden, Switzerland, and Germany will visit the United States this summer under the auspices of the International Confederation of Students. At the same time the Workers' Travel Association, a British organization, is arranging holidays in other countries for English workingmen and visits to England by workers from America and the Continent. Its purpose is the large one of insuring "world peace" by establishing living personal contacts between the working people of all countries; and certainly there could be no more fundamental and democratic path to international good will.

CONLEY DABNEY, a Kentuckian, was sentenced to the penitentiary for life in 1925 because he had been found guilty of the murder of May Vickery. A woman testified that she saw Dabney commit the deed. A body found in the shaft of an abandoned mine was identified by its clothes by Mary Vickery's father as that of his child. The evidence seemed complete; everyone was satisfied that justice had been done—until, the other day, Mary Vickery herself walked in and announced that she was alive; that she had been working in a mill in Cincinnati; that she had disappeared because of unhappiness in her home life. So Conley Dabney was immediately pardoned after more than a year in jail. There being no restitution in such cases, he will have no redress whatever for his long stay in durance vile. He is, in fact, lucky to be alive. Suppose he had been given the death sentence—Mary Vickery could only have visited his grave. Here lies the strongest argument against capital punishment—its finality and irrevocability. Conley Dabney's case is not a rare one. Men are constantly being condemned to death on far more flimsy evidence than that which put Dabney behind the bars.

THE DEATH OF EX-SENATOR JAMES SMITH, JR., of New Jersey, recalls his remarkable but sinister career in New Jersey politics. Smith was the typical corporation-created boss, the pet of the railroads and of all those who profited by special privileges or sought them. His election by the legislature to the United States Senate was accompanied by the usual features of preprimary days —plentiful money on all sides and a State House crowded by railroad and other lobbyists. In the Senate, Smith earned denunciation by President Cleveland for being one of three Democratic Senators who so altered the Wilson Tariff Bill in the Senate as to make it almost unrecognizable, a mere fraudulent piece of tariff reform. His own moral standards may be judged from the fact—admitted under oath—that he bought one thousand shares of sugar-trust stock when he and others were writing the Senate sugar schedule. But when Woodrow Wilson entered politics, he had no objection to working with Smith. Smith took Colonel George Harvey's word for it that Wilson would be all right and made the nominating speech. For his nomination Woodrow Wilson thanked Smith handsomely; his election he also owed to Smith and Smith's fellow-boss, Nugent. The break came when Mr. Wilson refused to further Smith's renewed ambitions for the Senate. Then Nugent became the good boss and Smith the bad one. As James Kerney of the Trenton Evening Times has pointed out in his "Political Education of Woodrow Wilson," between the time of his election in November, 1910, and the following January, Wilson not only broke with the powers that had made him Governor, but shifted from a right-wing conservative to an advocate of radical political theories.

EIGHT MILLION WORDS on "the various disciplines that constitute the science of society"—this is the stint set for themselves by the editors of a projected "Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences" to be complete six years from now. Seven of the learned societies in the United States—those concerned with economics, history, politics, sociology, statistical science, anthropology, and social work—have created an executive committee to see that the work is done, and the chairman of the committee, Edwin R. A. Seligman of Columbia University, will be editor-in-chief. Hope is expressed that the encyclopedia will produce an effect somewhat analogous to that produced in the eighteenth century by the great and original "Encyclopédie." That remains to be seen; but the hope is not unjustified. If it is our tragedy today that we have social problems, at least it should be our desire to make a comprehensive and truly interrelated study of them. The proposed encyclopedia can do much to relieve the very term "social science" of the horrible dryness it now suggests to many minds, and by making good its promise to avoid scientific jargon it can prove of value to any educated person who wants to read it. The project, which is put forward by the best scholars available in all the fields, deserves every encouragement.

The Nicaragua Canal Bobs Up Once More

DISPATCHES from Washington represent Mr. Coolidge as being profoundly impressed by a talk he has had with Senator Edge of New Jersey, who has just returned from the Panama Canal. Senator Edge reports that in the short space of from eight to ten years the Panama Canal will be crowded to capacity if traffic continues to increase as it has in the past few years, and that in order to handle traffic it will be necessary either to enlarge this canal or to undertake the construction of a new one on the Nicaragua route. The eagerness with which Mr. Coolidge is reported to have listened to this is suspicious. He is not given to sudden or passionate enthusiasms, and it is also to be remembered that one of the fifty-seven varieties of excuses he gave for our utterly mistaken intervention in Nicaragua was that we had to protect the concession for a canal which we obtained through the Bryan-Chamorro Treaty of 1916, for which concession we paid $3,000,000 in cash.

That there should be a revival of talk of a Nicaragua canal in 1927 is, however, a matter of distinct historical interest. It was in 1826, 101 years ago, that the United States sent commissioners to the Panama Congress of that year, instructed to investigate the best possible route for a canal. From that time on the Nicaraguan proposal was a live issue until the final decision of 1902 to purchase the Panama Canal and make that the one great route between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. Under Presidents Jackson and Van Buren studies of both routes were made and the first favorable report for the Nicaragua Canal was brought in. In 1849 a group of American citizens, headed by Cornelius Vanderbilt, obtained from the Nicaraguan Government the right to construct a ship canal through its territory, but the concession lapsed in 1856, as the company could not go ahead with the undertaking. Our first treaty with Nicaragua dealing with the canal question was negotiated under President Taylor, but not submitted to the Senate for ratification, and the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty was not negotiated until 1850. In accordance with its provisions, which were not abrogated until 1901, the English agreed to retire from the Mosquito Coast in Nicaragua and to join with the United States in guaranteeing the neutrality of any canal which might be built there. But further progress in the Nicaraguan plans was stopped, first, by the Walker filibustering expedition, and secondly, by the Civil War. From 1872 until 1882 there was one survey after another, and a commission appointed by President Grant unanimously reported on February 7, 1876, in favor of the Nicaragua route. It was, therefore, a profound disappointment to most Americans interested that an international congress held at Paris, in May, 1879, voted for the Panama Canal.

In 1884 a treaty was concluded between the United States and Nicaragua, with such peculiar provisions, however, that when President Cleveland took office he withdrew it from the consideration of the Senate. His reasons were that the agreement that the canal should be jointly owned by Nicaragua and the United States and that the United States should guarantee the integrity of Nicaragua was "inconsistent with its [the canal's] dedication to universal and neutral use." That was the original American ideal for the canal—that it should be an international waterway, neutralized and held in trust for all the nations of the world. It remained for President Roosevelt to overthrow this conception and to make of the Panama Canal a private possession of the United States calling for the expenditure of millions upon millions for coast defenses, the largest guns in the world, a permanent standing force of 508 officers and 7,663 enlisted men—almost as large as the whole standing army of this country in 1860. The canal was one of the most familiar excuses of our militarists for maintaining a large fleet and standing army. It is to be noted, too, that Mr. Cleveland held the proposal to indorse the integrity of the Nicaraguan state quite beyond American polity, and also beyond the means of the United States!

In 1889 Congress incorporated an American company to build the Nicaragua Canal with a capital of $200,000,000, and the company at once went to work and expended at Greytown, in preparation for the canal, no less than $2,000,000 before the funds gave out in 1893. Congress refused to aid the company financially, but in 1895 and 1897 appointed commissions of experts which recommended the construction of the canal and put the cost at only $135,000,000. The report of the second, or Walker, commission favored the Nicaragua route because of the difficulty of obtaining control of the Panama Canal Company, whose French mismanagers and owners demanded the large sum of $109,000,000 for their plant and as much of the canal as they had constructed. In May, 1900, and in January, 1902, the House of Representatives voted to accept the Nicaragua route and pay for it; only the Senate's refusal to concur prevented the canal from being built. Thereupon, the French Panama Canal Company, in great haste, reduced its price from $109,000,000 to $40,000,000, and the United States then became its successor and the Nicaragua proposal was abandoned. Nicaragua had seemed impregnably intrenched in American public opinion; but the Panama route was finally favored because of its shorter length, a lesser degree of curvature, a lower summit level, shorter time of transit, a lesser cost of maintenance, and because of the existence of a thoroughly equipped railroad.

The Panama Canal, however, cost $450,000,000. It is now stated that to enlarge the Panama Canal by a new lock will cost $125,000,000—almost the once estimated cost of the whole Nicaragua Canal. That figure, however, is now put not at $135,000,000, but at between half a billion and a billion. Last year the Panama Canal earned $15,000,000 net, and it is asserted that it is paying from 5 per cent to 6 per cent on the total investment in it. This is humbug pure and simple, for the cost is reckoned at $275,000,000; by some hocus-pocus, the remaining $175,000,000 of the actual cost is "charged to military defenses and additional purposes not directly related to commerce or canal interests." Of course, when the cost of new guns, of the maintenance of the military in Panama, of the constant fleet maneuvers off the Panama Canal, etc., are reckoned in, the showing is very different. It is to be hoped that Mr. Coolidge, who wants a survey made, will tell the truth about this, and will carefully investigate the allegation that the capacity of the canal will have been reached in eight or ten years. It is a fact that the number of ships using the canal grew from 1,075 to 5,197, exclusive of 534 United States government vessels, in the year ending June 30, 1926.

Yellow Peril or White?

FOUR years ago brigands stopped a train bound from Peking and Shanghai and kidnapped its passengers, among them many foreigners. After their release, the Powers, by diplomatic pressure, compelled the Chinese Government to pay each foreigner $250 a day for the period of his detention. Now, while those white men were in captivity a foreign automobile ran down and killed a Chinese in the International Settlement of Shanghai. The Mixed Court, then under white control, awarded the family of the dead Chinese $25 damages—the indemnity paid a white man for about two and a half hours of mere captivity.

That was in 1923. The Chinese are in a different mood today; they will not tolerate such ghastly race discrimination in their own country, and the discriminations of the past are the reason for their bitterness today. But the foreigners? The talk of ultimatums, of coercion, of "immediate concerted action" leads one to fear that the foreigners have learned nothing.

What happened at Nanking on March 24? We do not yet know. The hot-headed Shanghai dispatches of most of the newspapermen give no suggestion of any calm study of the facts. We know that prior to the bombardment of the city by British and American guns six foreigners were killed, and none afterward. But the theory that this is cause and effect falls down when we learn further that the Cantonese general did not reach the city walls until an hour after the bombardment. The evidence at hand seems to indicate that he established order immediately upon his arrival, but that Northerners, and some Hunanese troops allied with the Cantonese, had prior to his arrival gone amuck. How many Chinese were killed by the foreign guns? Chinese reports run from six to 200,000; a British report says only three. Inasmuch as individual Americans of the Socony Hill party have been quoted as boasting that they had personally picked off and done for seven Chinese, one may assume that the British report, like the larger Chinese estimates, is colored by prejudice.

At any rate, Chinese were killed—several; and one American, two Britons, and one Japanese were killed. The Chinese are reported about to protest, but presumably they do not intend to enforce their protest by invading or blockading the United States and Great Britain. The British are reported determined to protest, the Japanese as inclined to protest, and the United States as uncertain only whether to join with the British or to protest alone. And the foreigners apparently are increasing their military and naval forces in China with the intention of enforcing their demand for apology, reparations, and guaranties for the future—perhaps by more bombardments, perhaps by a blockade, perhaps by more landing parties. The American Chamber of Commerce in Shanghai urges "immediate concerted action by the Powers . . . to suppress disorder and restore conditions favorable to the formation of a responsible government"—a large and vague order, which seems to mean assuming responsibility for the administration of all China.

And no one knows precisely what happened. There has been no neutral investigation. It is ridiculuous, and tragic.

We can understand the panic of the foreigners of Shanghai. They are a proud but tiny oligarchy which has built one of the great cities of the world upon race prejudice and race domination. Twenty thousand white men—with another twenty thousand darker-skinned Indians and Japanese—dominate a city of nearly a million Chinese. The old prestige of the white man in China is gone; the old life of Shanghai is doomed. No wonder the foreign community is in a state of mass hysteria, appealing for more guns, for reparations, guaranties, "action"—always for force.

But there is no need for home governments, with a longer perspective, to yield to the hysteria of a community which sees its old privileges slipping. The governments have a responsibility to protect foreign lives in China—but not an unlimited responsibility. Men who sit still in the face of a civil war and revolution of which they have had full warning take risks the burden of which they must bear themselves. Surely the American Government does not intend to enunciate the doctrine that its gunboats and marines will protect all Americans in China, no matter where they are, what they do, or at what cost. If they are caught in the fire and flame of civil war, it cannot be our duty to "protect" them at the cost of Chinese lives. What is this ghastly talk of blockading the Yangtze Valley but the assertion of a right of foreigners to starve and stop a civil war in order to defend the right of their alien nationals to live where even Chinese are unsafe?

That the British are alarmed is natural. Their Oriental empire is built upon the caste system. If China succeeds in establishing race equality within her borders, the example will shake the foundations of white domination in the Malay Peninsula, at Singapore, and in India. Of course the British strain every nerve to obtain the cooperation of the United States and of the other Powers in their desperate effort to rebuttress their empire. They have even brought pressure to bear on German banks in Shanghai—which are in debt to the larger British banks—to force the Germans in Shanghai to modify their pro-Chinese attitude. The American correspondents in Shanghai seem to have caught the infectious hysteria of the British in that city; their cables are less news than editorial pleas for an alliance with Great Britain. This is partly due to the fact that we also are accustomed to drawing color lines; in part, however, it is a reflection of the persistent American "inferiority complex," always most marked among the expatriates in foreign cities and in diplomatic circles in Washington. The French press is full of emphatic denunciations of the British and American exaggerations of the Chinese situation, and the Japanese have been calm and level-headed throughout. Only the Americans have accepted the British theory that it is necessary to act violently to restore white prestige—and fortunately, not all of them. There are still missionaries in the interior who insist that their task is to continue with the Chinese people, and who feel themselves safe. Many even of the American business men in Hankow, including bankers and Standard Oil officials, think that the diplomatic instructions to evacuate are dictated by panic rather than by statesmanship. They smack of preparation for war.

Let us beware. Joining with Britain in this crisis, asserting our will by force is a plain warning to China that for her there is a White Peril. It may end by creating for us a Yellow Peril which does not yet exist.

The Revolt of the Traveler

WHEN will the guides and the makers of guide-books to Europe discover that the traveler of today is not the same person as the one who made the "grand tour" fifty years ago? The traveler of today is in revolt. Like youth, women, and the weather, the modern traveler is taking on a new character. He does not want a tour like Mother used to make, nor is he satisfied to ask Dad, for he doubts if Dad knows.

To put it bluntly, the modern traveler is bored stiff with half of what the guides and the guide-books lead him into. He drags his feet wearily through innumerable churches, looking at altar-pieces in which he has no interest; he stands on historic battle-fields with no other emotion than a desire to fight the man who brought him there. The American woman of mature years still feels for the most part that it is her duty to see the accepted "sights." The American man has no such sense of responsibility, and although commonly dragooned into going the rounds, he is furtively looking for an avenue of escape. The American youth is frankly flippant. And at that let the old-time guide and guide-book beware!

Of course, the excellent and accurate Baedeker (and its imitations) is not to be cast aside. It is a reservoir of invaluable information in regard to hotels, money, railways, and a thousand other practical details, but as a guide to what to see it is top-heavy with art, archaeology, and ancient history. The average traveler of today has some interest in art and archaeology, though less than is assumed by the usual guide-book. And when it comes to viewing the battlefield of Waterloo, standing on the spot where Sir Walter Raleigh smoked his first cigar, or visiting the room where Mary Queen of Scots was imprisoned, he wants—and increasingly he dares—to say, Bosh! As to cathedrals, he hopes after three months in Europe never to see one again.

The revolt of the modern traveler against the accepted "sights" is well enough understood so that, so far as Paris is concerned, at least, we have lately been visited with an entirely new sort of guide-book, one which ignores all the usual material and is filled only with information about restaurants, cabarets, and "gay night life." But such books jump too far in the other direction. The average traveler to Europe is less trivially minded than they assume. He has serious interests; student tours are now arranged for the study of modern languages and other subjects in Europe for which college credits are given. A man of long experience with American travelers in Europe is writing a literary guide, giving information in regard to scenes and people made familiar by authors of today and yesterday. He plans a similar book for students of music. Nor should the interests of the student of modern politics and economics be neglected. Everyone who has ever attempted investigations in those directions knows that the standard guide-book is full of facts about the catacombs of Rome but has nothing whatever about the silk industry of modern Italy. Since the World War, especially, thousands of Americans go to Europe with a serious interest in present conditions and problems.

And the European guide is even more of a back number than the guide-book. He is repeating the same patter today that his grandfather did half a century ago. It is time for him to learn a new piece.

The Outrages at Nanking

By WILLIAM F. PROHME

(By cable to The Nation)

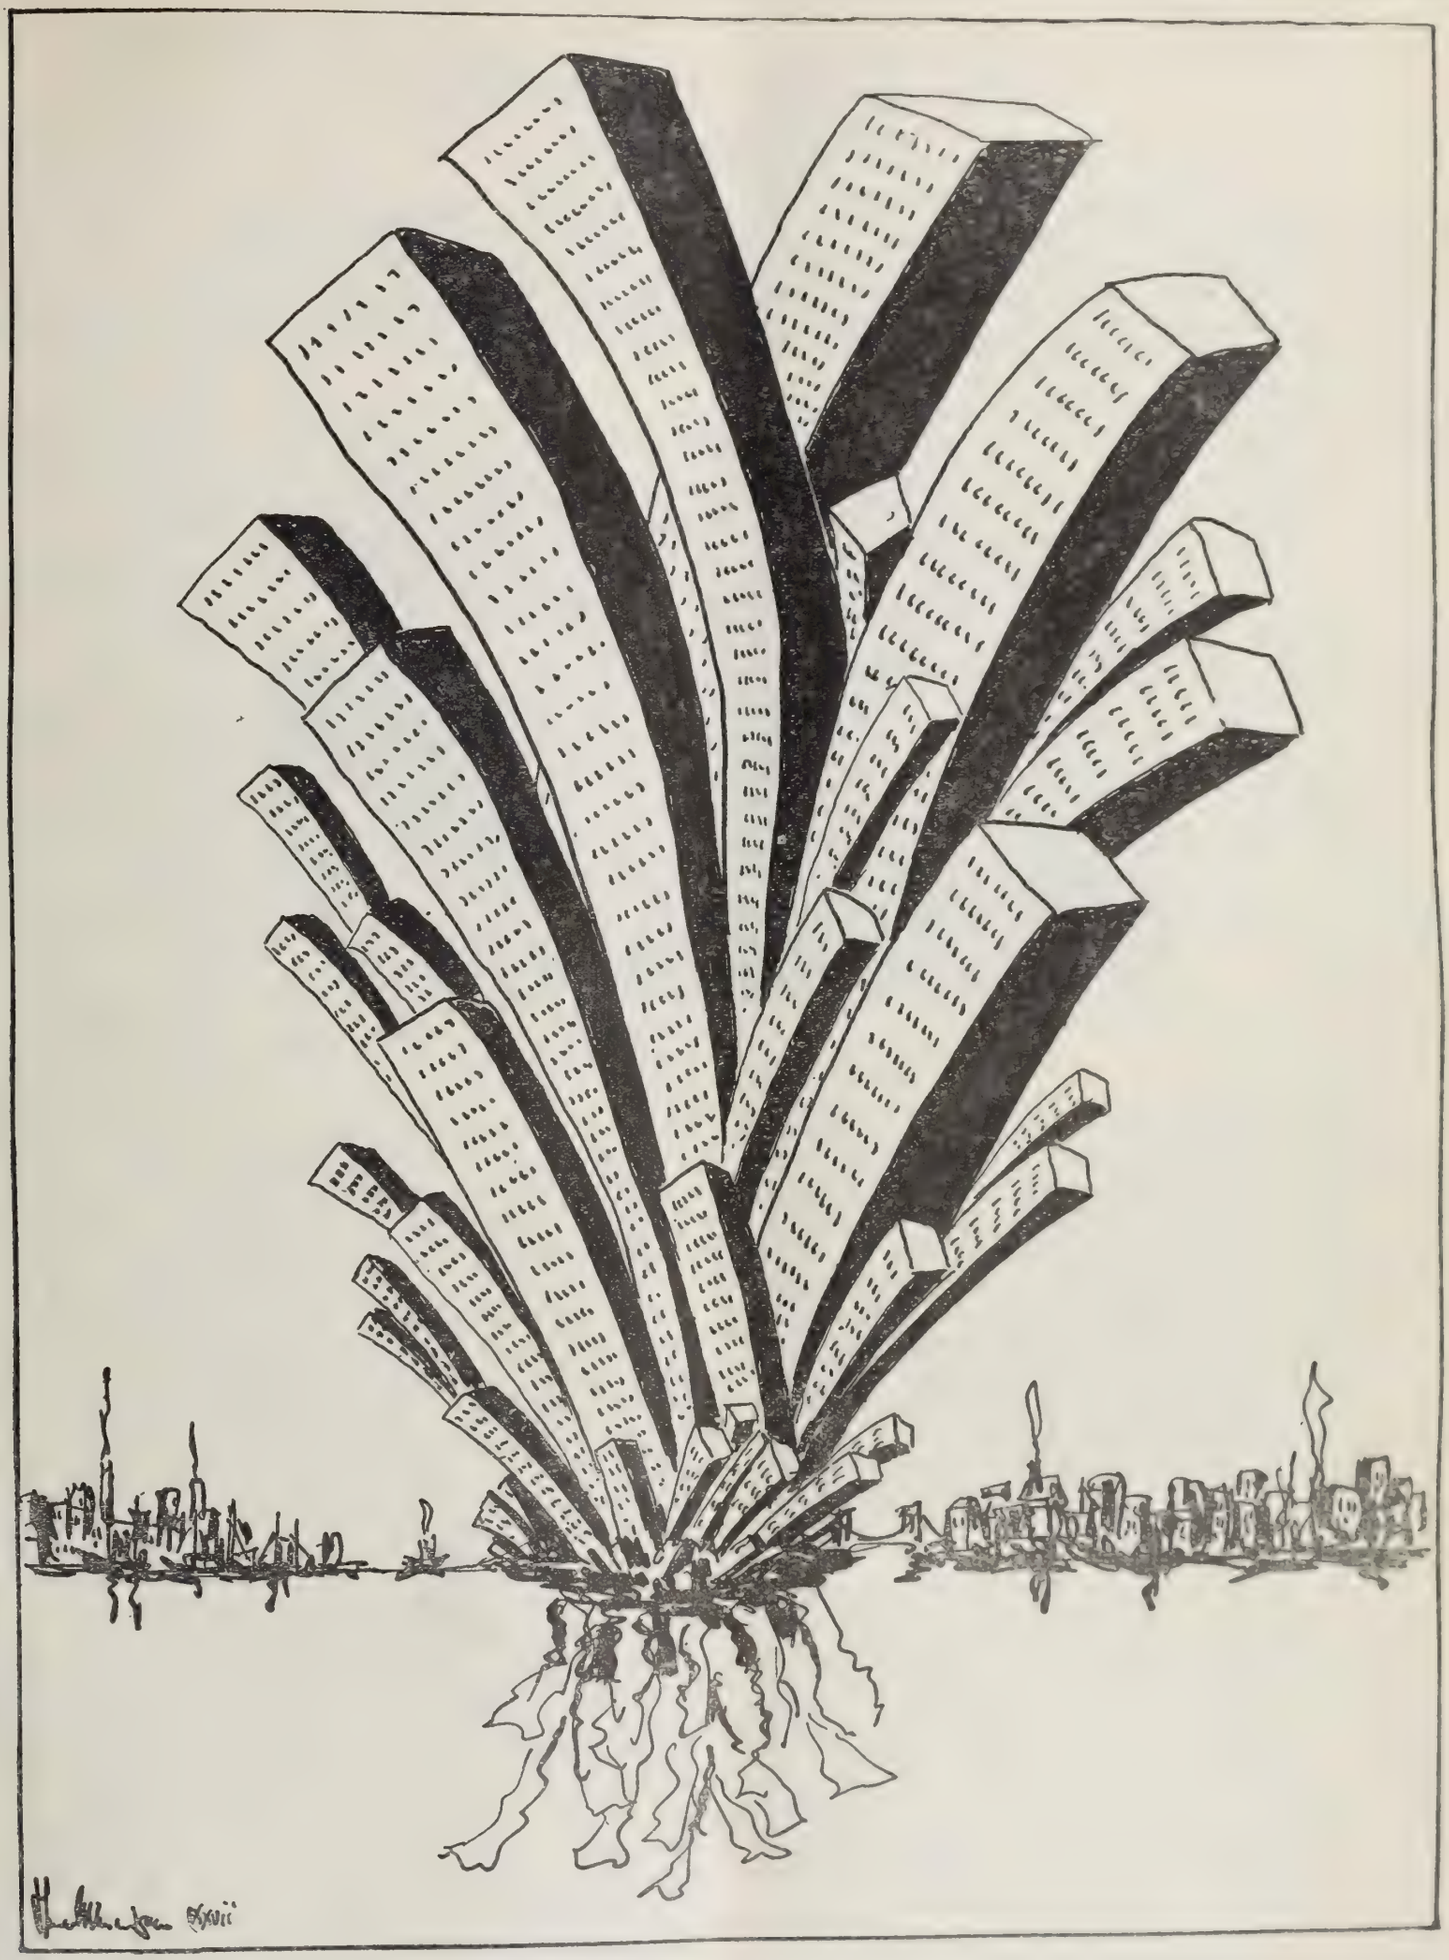
Shanghai, April 4

G. A. KENNEDY, a Chinese-speaking American, formerly a student at the Columbia School of Journalism, went to Nanking and made a two-day observation of the effects and occurrences of March 24. This is a digest of his statement: "By April 1, 27,000 interned Shantung prisoners had been registered in Nanking by the victorious Nationalists. All these, and more, were in the city when the first Nationalist soldiers entered at 3 a. m. on the twenty-fourth. The attacks on foreigners in the morning and afternoon of that day, resulting in the deaths of one American, two British, and one Japanese, and the looting of the consulates of those countries, therefore, cannot be conclusively fixed upon the Nationalist soldiers.

"The first of the four foreign deaths, that of J. E. Williams, vice-president of Nanking University, occurred at 8 a. m. on the twenty-fourth. It has been proved that four other Americans were with Williams at the time the soldiers threatened. Williams drew his revolver and was immediately shot dead. The others were not hurt. The three other foreign deaths occurred in the late afternoon before the bombardment, which was at 4.30 p. m. The Nationalist general entered the city at 5.30.



"The foreign houses burned or looted were all on the route taken by the Northerners in their efforts to escape from the city. Foreign houses were not the only houses looted. Hundreds of Chinese were robbed and many killed by the soldiers, presumably, again, Northerners running amuck.

"The physical effects of the bombardment by the British and American war vessels are comparatively slight. About fifty Chinese houses were wrecked, and one foreign-inhabited home was demolished. The number of Chinese casualties was probably under one hundred. But this is uncertain, as they have not yet been recorded."

Despite the uncertainty regarding the affiliations of the soldiers participating in the outrages, the Nationalist military officials concede the possibility that some of the first Southerners entering the city were among the culprits, but they doubt the probability. The previous record of the Nationalist soldiery is unblemished by any such attacks. This is considered strong circumstantial evidence in their favor.

Shanghai itself is thick with the atmosphere of anti-Nationalist propaganda generated by the local British press. The correspondents are working in and affected by this atmosphere.

The bombardment by the British cruiser of Nanking is not changing the Chinese attitude. They are accustomed to such action by the British. But participation by the United States gunboat was a profound shock to the Chinese. The impression that an American gets in talking with the Chinese is that they are profoundly disappointed. They had hoped that the United States would be definitely friendly in all circumstances. Their feeling is that the United States policy is now completely dominated by the British. It is to be noted that the Japanese gunboat at Nanking did not participate in the bombardment, although Japanese nationals and the Japanese Consulate suffered equally with the others.

Top-heavy

The Ferry to Europe

By ARTHUR WARNER

WESTBOUND transatlantic passenger traffic for the year 1492 totaled eighty-eight persons, carried in three ships. There was no eastbound traffic. That did not begin until the next year, when two ships, the Niña and the Pinta, cleared for European ports. (The Santa Maria had gone aground off Santo Domingo and was left behind.) There are no exact statistics of the number of persons carried to Europe on the Niña and the Pinta, but the total was below the westbound traffic in 1492. Then, as now, the foreigner arriving on our shores expressed immediate admiration for the American girl, and doubtless that was a potent reason for the failure of some to return who had booked with Columbus on his first tour to see America first.

From Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper

The Return from Abroad—1884

From that day to this westbound travel has continued to be the heavier, but the amount and character of the movement in both directions has undergone amazing changes. Last year—in spite of the Volstead law—661,000 persons traveled from Europe to America, while 431,000 went the other way. That represents the largest movement in either direction since the beginning of the World War, but it promises to be surpassed by the travel this year. Probably never before has the more desired accommodation for the summer-vacation season been sold out so far in advance. Accommodation eastbound for the months of May, June, and July on the handful of cheap and popular steamships carrying only tourist third-class passengers has practically been preempted since Christmas. Accommodation for the same months on what are called cabin ships—those carrying no class above second—has been almost equally in demand.

America is said within recent years to have become motor-mad, dance-mad, radio-mad. One might add travel-mad. Vacations seem to have become more of a necessity than work. We take them in winter now as well as in summer. We flit away for week-ends all the year around. And a trip to Europe is regarded almost as casually as a week-end. The followers of Columbus mutinied en route from disbelief and despair. Even as recently as 1838, the year in which the Sirius made the first transatlantic passage known certainly to have been accomplished all the way by steam, the crew mutinied when the fuel gave out, crazed with the fear that they would never see land again. The other day when the President Harding ran out of fuel in mid-ocean the passengers made a picnic of it, sure that the ship's officers would bring them safely to dock—as they did. The modern spirit toward transatlantic travel is expressed in a recent newspaper cartoon in which a woman, bidding goodby to another at a liner's gangplank, says lightly: "And be sure to give me a ring as soon as you reach London." We eat and dance our way across the Atlantic as we do up and down Broadway.

Not only does the modern traveler cross the Atlantic in a different spirit from the old, but the traveler himself has changed. European vacations are no longer for the so-called upper classes only. They have become democratic. America's phenomenal material prosperity in recent years has seeped into new and numerous places. In this the Restless Age everybody travels. Parents run off to Europe without their children and children without their parents. College boys and office clerks are caught by the same lure. Girls go it alone. Everybody's Stenographer ascends the gangplank of the Leviathan (second-class or tourist third) as nonchalantly as she would leave her desk for lunch.

Yet with all the growth of the tourist habit transatlantic travel is not yet what it was before the World War—not in either direction. In 1913, the last full year before the conflict, westbound traffic amounted to 1,866,000 persons, almost three times the movement in 1926. Eastbound travel totaled 719,000 persons, nearly 75 per cent as many again as in 1926. It is not necessary to look in the back of "Ask Me Another" for the answer. It is to be found in the publications of the Government Printing Office—in our post-war restrictive immigration laws. In 1913 there were 1,406,000 steerage passengers among the total of 1,866,000 coming from Europe; they were almost all immigrants. In the other direction 473,000 of the 719,999 were likewise third-class passengers—immigrants going back temporarily or for good. In 1926 only 313,000 of the 661,000 westbound passengers and 152,000 of the 431,000 eastbound travelers were in the steerage.

In 1924 the transatlantic steamship companies were faced with a crisis. During and just after the war they had made huge profits through chartering their vessels to their governments or by carrying at high rates the multitudinous cargoes offered. Then came the slump. Cargoes dwindled in an era of trade depression while the passenger business was at ebb. Fares were high; Europe was dismal; travel there was beset with difficulties; Americans had lost the habit of going abroad for pleasure. The immigration traffic was the one bright spot; it seemed destined to develop again rapidly. But the American Congress had other ideas. It passed in quick succession two restrictive laws. The last and most drastic, in 1924, cut immigration to a mere dribble of the former stream. The steamship companies were hard hit. What to do? Some officials fatuously proposed that fares be raised. Others fortunately realized that higher fares would strangle such passenger business as there was. Actually, although not ostensibly, a lowering of rates began.

How? In the first place the companies began to reestablish the one-class vessels at second-cabin rates which had been so justly popular before the war. Such ships sometimes carry third- but never first-class passengers. Hence persons traveling at second-cabin rates actually have the accommodations and prestige of first-class passengers although on slower vessels and without so bristling a display of cutlery on either side of them at table. These vessels are now known as cabin ships. The word is a poor one, meaning nothing, but it has been adopted generally, and so doubtless must be accepted. Nearly every company of importance now operates a number of cabin ships, and they are always popular with experienced passengers to whom speed is not of first importance.

But in addition to the cabin ship a genuine innovation was tried in 1924. It is impossible to say with whom the idea originated. Probably Edward A. Filene, the Boston merchant, deserves some of the credit. He was reiterating publicly at the time his belief that Americans were ready and keen to resume European travel but could not in any numbers afford existing first- or even second-cabin fares. He argued that steamships offered more luxury than most Americans were accustomed to at home; that thousands of persons were ready to travel even in some hardship if they could be assured of economy, cleanliness, and decency. He proposed that the Shipping Board fit out some of its idle or unprofitable vessels with a view to attracting the potential travelers that he had in mind. The Nation commended editorially Mr. Filene's suggestions.

Several companies, almost simultaneously, experimented with a plan embodying substantially Mr. Filene's ideas, whether or not they got them from him. They announced a new, manicured, English-speaking steerage, with the odor of garlic and cheese chased out to sea. Only of course they didn't call it steerage. They called it, that first year, student or tourist accommodation. It has since been classified as tourist third-class, with the "third-class" dropped by mutual consent so far as practicable. The idea was to set aside a portion of the third-class quarters—largely empty since the decline of immigration—for students, teachers, and other persons of education but limited means. It was recognized that the average American objected to the existing third-class not so much because of the hardness of the bunks or the plainness of the food as because of the habits of his fellow-passengers and the way he was herded around by stewards and officers.

The United States Line maintains that it was first with this new kind of travel. On the other hand the International Mercantile Marine Company holds that one of its ships, the Regina, carried the first bona fide student party abroad at low rates; that the tour was organized by Earl Hubbell of Boston, sailing from Montreal in 1924. As a matter of fact at least four companies tried the new plan in a small way that same summer. The Nautical Gazette of May 3, 1924, stated that the Cunard Line had arranged three sailings with provisions for this special form of third-class travel, while the United States Lines announced four, the International Mercantile Marine three, and the French Line two.

The idea was a sensational success. It caught the public fancy and in college and certain other circles became "the thing to do." A good time was had by one and all. The next year the new kind of travel was extended and put on a permanent basis. It has been increasing ever since. In 1925 some 20,000 persons booked tourist from Atlantic ports, while last year the number was more than doubled and this season will show a still further gain. Several vessels now carry only tourist passengers. Aboard such one is in fact a first-class passenger traveling in a simpler and less expensive way than usual.

If we exclude steerage traffic as almost wholly immigrant, then the other kinds of travel—which may be regarded as tourist—have, taken together, been heavier since 1925 than they were in 1913. In other words more Americans have been going abroad on pleasure or business trips for the past two years than just before the World War, in spite of the fact that the total traffic is smaller. The following figures show the number of passengers from and to Atlantic ports (Canada included) for 1926, by classes:

WESTBOUND		EASTBOUND
95,000	First-class	92,000
100,000	Cabin-class	75,000
117,000	Second-class	69,000
36,000	Tourist third-class	43,000
313,000	Third-class	152,000
661,000		431,000

Fares vary according to the season of the year, the type of ship, and the character of accommodation obtained, but in a rough way it may be said that it is hard to get a satisfactory first-class passage, one way, for less than $250. Cabin and second-class rates range around $150. Tourist third-class costs about $100, and ordinary third-class, or steerage, $10 or $15 less. Even with the practical lowering of fares which has been accomplished by the development of the cabin ships and the novelty of the tourist third-class, rates are higher than before the war in comparison with the cost of living. Before the war one could get a first-class ticket to Europe for from $100 to $125, a second-class passage for from $45 to $60, and third-class accommodation for from $30 to $40. Rates are now more than twice those amounts—in the second-class almost three times as high—whereas the general cost of living is only about 75 per cent higher than in 1914.

There are sound reasons why steamship fares are higher now, compared with other costs, than before the war. For one thing the standard of accommodation—and therefore the expense—has been rising. The lost immigrant traffic is another factor. In former days, even at the low fares asked, the immigrant more than paid his way; he helped to bear the expenses of his more prosperous fellow-travelers in the first and second cabins, although there is no record of receipt by him of any testimonials of gratitude. It is said of the street transit of New York City that the profit is in the straps. So in the steamships of pre-war days the profit was in the steerage. Finally, the older travel could be handled more economically because it was better distributed. Third-class traffic was heavier, of course, westbound than eastbound, but it was fairly constant throughout the year. On the other hand, the tourist travel, upon which the modern passenger carrier must depend, is highly seasonal and irregular. It flows strong in summer and weak in winter. And the summer flood moves first in one direction and then in the other. In May, June, and July vessels travel eastward as crowded as movie theaters and return with as much unfilled room as a hall in which there is a lecture on "The Duty of the Citizen Toward the Community." In August, September, and October the process is reversed.

A striking aspect of post-war steamship travel is the rise of the Italian lines and the revival of the German business. Fifteen years ago few Americans could be persuaded to travel on Italian vessels, although even at that time many of them were most satisfactory. But the average American settled the argument by saying that he disliked garlic and anyhow: "In case of accident the officers and crew would lose their heads. They'd jump into the boats first and leave the rest of us behind." Recently that attitude has disappeared, and the new, luxurious Italian liners are among the most fashionable on the Atlantic.

Equally interesting is the revival of the German lines. Previous to the war their ships had a high reputation for comfort, courtesy, good food, and a friendly atmosphere. The war cost the German lines practically all of their once magnificent fleet and left them with a stigma of ill-will besides. They have overcome both of these handicaps and their fast-growing fleet of newly built vessels is rapidly restoring the lines their old prestige. The German companies have the advantage that their vessels are all modern and thus adapted to the latest requirements. The North German Lloyd has recently built for its New York-Bremen route the 32,500-ton steamship Columbus, the largest and fastest vessel under the German flag. The Hamburg-American Line has been equally indefatigable in its effort to win back its former eminence on the high seas. Its "spring offering" to the North Atlantic passenger trade is the newly constructed steamship New York.

A Plea for Justice to Mexico

By WILLIAM E. BORAH

WILLIAM M. EVARTS, at the time Secretary of State, in discussing our affairs with Mexico, declared:

> The first duty of a government is to protect life and property. This is a paramount obligation. For this governments are instituted, and governments neglecting or failing to perform it become worse than useless.

I suppose few, if any, will differ with this fundamental truth. The only controversy which could possibly arise would be over the manner and method of carrying this principle into execution.

President Coolidge, in his first message to Congress, had this to say:

> Our foreign policy has always been actuated by two principles. The one is the avoidance of permanent political alliances which would sacrifice our proper independence; the other is the peaceful settlement of controversies between nations. By example and by treaty we have advocated arbitration.

With that policy I find myself in enthusiastic accord. Perhaps the highest service in international affairs which our great Government can now render to the cause of peace and to humanity is to demonstrate to the world that when we have been talking about arbitration and advancing the cause of arbitration through speech we have meant what we said. If controversies relative to property rights cannot be arbitrated and are not to be subject to arbitration, then arbitration need no longer be regarded as a thing of substance in the advancement of peace between nations.

A few weeks ago a high official of this Government said in discussing the affairs of Mexico: "We find its hand [the Third International] clutching at the heart of our sister republic on the south. We find it stirring up trouble in Asia, in China, in Nicaragua." And then the speaker significantly added: We must have a strong army and navy "to assist weaker nations to maintain free government." This statement is to be commended for its candor. It tells the whole story. It is too often true that wherever a people may be found seeking to throw off foreign domination, to establish their own government and protect their own interests, some strong government discovers a Bolshevistic conspiracy and thereupon a benevolent desire with the army and navy "to assist weaker nations to maintain free government."

For nearly a hundred years China has been hobbled with signally unfair treaties. Her territory has been from time to time parceled out and her ports and trade controlled and dominated by foreign nations. Many years ago it became apparent that the Chinese were harboring a deep feeling of resentment against these conditions. They indicated their purpose to contest further encroachments and ultimately to be rid of those already established. Sixteen years ago a revolution took place, and since that time the nationalistic spirit has strengthened and spread until now an entire nation seems, whatever its differences may be about other things, determined to be rid of foreign domination. Immediately the cry was raised that there was a Bolshevistic conspiracy, that Russia was at work stirring up trouble in China. It mattered little that the nationalistic movement long preceded the appearance of the Russian Revolution. I venture the opinion that had there never been a Russian revolution, the program in China would not have been materially different from what it has been and now is.

In 1924 an election was held in Nicaragua. The successful candidates for President and Vice-President were elected by a very large majority. The election law was framed under the direction and the election held under the counsel and advice of a distinguished American citizen. The newly elected officers took office on the first day of January, 1925. In August, 1925, two prominent members of the opposing political party started a revolution; their names were Chamorro and Diaz. They drove the duly elected President and Vice-President from the country, compelling the former under duress to tender his resignation. Since that time the conflict has gone on. This is another instance in which it is claimed Bolshevism is clutching at the throat of a small nation and another instance in which it becomes necessary with the army and navy "to assist a weak nation to maintain free government." It will also be recalled that the Bolshevists stirred up trouble in the Riff country, among those hardy devotees of independence and freedom. They were also the conspirators who spread revolution in Syria, so we are advised. I recall that at one time, not many months ago, there were seven small or weak nations struggling for their independence and for their freedom who were charged with being dominated by the Bolshevists and who were being helped by strong nations through their armies and navies "to establish free governments."

All this is but a preface to a discussion of Mexico and Mexican policies. Is the hand of the Third International clutching at the throat of Mexico? For weeks and months the propaganda has been put out that Mexico and Central America have come under the domination of communistic teachings and that this is the cause of trouble in that part of the world. I venture to assert that the Third International, that Russia, has not one thing to do with Mexico or with Mexican policies. No country on this Western Continent has been more outspoken or vigilant against communism than Mexico. Her labor organization and her President have not left the world in doubt. Mexico has her troubles and her own idea of dealing with them, and her policies, wise or unwise, are of her own making. She alone is responsible for those policies and for their execution. Communism and Russian influence have no more to do with either the origin or execution of those policies than they have to do with the policies of our own Government. The only Communists who ever made any trouble with Mexico went there from the United States and were sent back by the Mexican Government.

The agrarian revolution in Mexico began in 1910, seven years before the Russian Revolution. Professor Hackett, of the University of Texas, an able and disinterested student of Mexican affairs, has declared:

> At the outset it may be said that the Mexican Revolution, which began in 1910, was as inevitable as was the French Revolution, and as the causes for that more celebrated European struggle lay in the history of France as a divine-right monarchy, so the causes of the Mexican Revolution of 1910 are to be found in the history of the so-called thirty-five years' presidential reign of Porfirio Diaz.

I believe the facts justify completely Professor Hackett's statement.

Let us look at these facts. They ought to silence the lips of those who would have the American people believe that Mexico has simply gone mad over communism. When Diaz became President of Mexico in 1876, Mexico already had her share of large estates, great ranches, haciendas. Diaz, during his reign, disposed of some 134,600,000 acres of land, part of it legally and part otherwise. Some of it was sold to political parties and some of it was given to his retainers and supporters. This acreage thus disposed of was about three times the size of all New England. The average citizen received none of it—in fact, the small holders were dispossessed and their property confiscated in order to enable the large holders to increase their acreage.

From time immemorial the Mexican villages have owned communal lands, the ejidos, averaging in area from 4,390 acres to 17,560 acres. These lands were used by the villagers for raising food and pasturing their animals. The communal holdings were all that stood between the villagers and peonage. These lands under Spanish and Mexican law could not be alienated. But Diaz broke up and destroyed over 90 per cent of the communal holdings—a ruthless, brutal exploitation of the poor people of Mexico. When the communal holdings were destroyed, 3,103,402 Mexicans passed into a state of peonage, they became serfs, working upon the lands to pay a debt that could never be extinguished.

In 1910, at the close of Diaz's administration, there were 834 haciendados [large landowners], holding haciendas ranging in size from 22,000 to 6,000,000 acres. In the state of Morelos alone 20 haciendados owned and controlled the entire state, while 180,000 Mexicans in that state alone were landless. It is asserted that at the close of Diaz's administration 96 per cent of the heads of the rural families were without land and without means of acquiring land. So we had 834 haciendados, while at the other end of the ladder were 12,000,000 propertyless and landless people, forced into cruel and unending economic bondage.

This was the condition of affairs which confronted Mexico at the close of the reign of Diaz. It was a condition which must either have been changed or at least modified or Mexico as a nation must have perished. No nation could long endure with its vast and incalculable wealth in the hands of a few hundred while the million were serfs.

Nothing could show more conclusively that it was the land problem, the economic problem, which brought on the revolution from 1910 to 1920, than the action of Diaz in the closing hours of his reign. A few days before his resignation and flight he submitted to Congress a plan for getting the land back to the people. This bill gave power to the Executive to subdivide the lands and to expropriate large estates for this purpose. The proposal embodied the plan of breaking up the large estates and employed confiscation in order to accomplish that end. It was subject to every objection now made to the land laws of Mexico. It was a futile effort to stay the revolution. It was too late. The people were aroused. The people who had been robbed of their lands, the villagers who had been despoiled of their communal holdings, the people who were hungry, young men whose fathers had been drafted to serve as peons or who had lost their holdings and upon complaint had been shot were aroused from one end of the country to another. Belshazzar's feast was drawing to a close, and the fight of the people of Mexico for their lands was already in progress.

No one will deny the right of Mexico to pass the land laws she passed. As to the future she had an absolute right to establish any land system she deemed proper. Our Government does not question it. Wise or unwise, they were within her competency to enact. The thing which she did not have the right to do, and has not the right to do in the execution of these laws, is to destroy vested rights, to confiscate property. This we are in duty bound to insist she must not do. The supreme question is this: Is Mexico, in the stupendous task which now confronts her, acting in good faith? Is she in sincerity endeavoring to work out her problem and in doing so to respect the vested rights of our people? I believe Mexico is acting in good faith. I have examined the laws of more than one country where the attempt has been made to break up large estates, and in none of these countries do the laws more thoroughly respect the vested rights of foreigners. For myself, I do not fear to say that I sympathize with Mexico in her task. She may fail in this great national effort, but I do not propose to commit the crime of wishing her to fail. If I should be convinced that there is wilful and deliberate purpose to destroy American life or American property, I think I should be as swift as anyone to go to their protection. But so long as there is evidence of a sincere effort to solve this problem in harmony with our substantial rights, I feel we should cooperate in a spirit of genuine help and friendship. Especially do I feel that these slanderous statements that Mexico is actuated by a spirit of ruin, of destruction, that she is governed and controlled by communistic influences abroad, that she is simply seeking plunder, can bring no good to our own people or in any way protect our interests in Mexico. There is a higher and better and more peaceful and lawful method by which to protect our interests. God has made us neighbors—let justice make us friends. The first step toward justice is to stop making false and unfair statements about Mexico.

Borah—Watchdog on the Potomac

By RAYMOND CLAPPER

Washington, D. C., March 26

THAT faint-hearted flirtation which Mr. Coolidge started up with Senator Borah some time back seems to be over. Breakfast, luncheon, and dinner invitations from the President to the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee are becoming more rare. The resplendent White House limousine no longer rolls up to the north entrance of the Senate office building to pick up the distinguished Senator. Roses from the Presidential conservatory are not being sent to the Borah apartment as often as formerly. The Senator must have made it clear that he and the President could be just good friends, nothing more. At any rate, Borah is now back undisturbed in his favorite role as the watchdog on the Potomac.

Those who believe that democratic government functions best when there is a healthy, outspoken opposition are compelled to count on Borah alone. For he is the opposition at Washington now. Formerly that function was assumed by the Democratic Party. Of late the Democrats seem to have abdicated. The so-called leaders have been going through motions. For instance, they met recently and solemnly resolved, Mr. McAdoo's Toledo speech to the contrary notwithstanding, that prohibition is not a political issue. Toward the end of the last session Senator Robinson of Arkansas, minority leader of the Senate, sponsored a resolution favoring arbitration with Mexico. But the resolution was so general and so innocuous that every Senator voted for it. Senator Heflin, Alabama Democrat, conducted an extremely vocal attack on the Administration's Mexican policy, but his Democratic colleagues looked on silently with apologetic smirks. And it was a Democrat, Reed of Missouri, who answered Heflin, defending the Administration.

Senators, Republicans as well as Democrats, went around complaining that they could not get the facts from the State Department. Who did anything about it? Borah. He called Secretary Kellogg before the committee though with only indifferent support from some of the leading Democratic members of the committee. That was not satisfactory and Borah then sought to get information direct. He wrote to President Calles and was accused of violating the ancient Logan Act. He proposed that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee visit Central America and get facts first hand. Democratic leaders on the committee feared this would embarrass the Administration and they assisted in amending the resolution so that the committee would be compelled to remain within the confines of the United States. When the Administration guard on the Committee on Audit and Control killed off the resolution Borah was the only mourner.

The same sort of thing happened with regard to China. Opposition in the Senate to continuation of the extraterritorial rights came from Borah, and from him alone.

What is the situation now? Congress has gone home. Democratic leader Robinson has gone to Little Rock, Arkansas, and expects to go to the Orient during the summer recess. It is gossiped in Washington that he wants to stop off in the Philippines and see if a political issue can be dug up there, realizing no doubt that his party is not ready to take hold of a hot issue here at home.

Borah, on the other hand, has settled down in Washington for most of the summer. He may go alone to Latin-America later, but barring this possibility he will remain in the Capitol in the role of Horatius at the bridge, working alone to counteract the White House Spokesman, who otherwise with Congress away would have the public ear all to himself.

Perhaps the best indication of the real importance of Borah as the spokesman and sole embodiment of the opposition at Washington is the fact that every afternoon at three o'clock newspaper correspondents gather in his office to question him about public affairs. These meetings are on the initiative of the correspondents, who find them the only means of obtaining the opposition viewpoint and balancing the Administration position.

Borah seldom talks for publication at these conferences. He feels that he cannot talk as freely for publication as he did before he became chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and he has resorted to the same protective device as the President with his Official Spokesman. The system has its drawbacks regardless of who uses it, but in the absence of anything better the two spokesmen functioning at either end of Pennsylvania Avenue act as checks on each other. Taken together they enable the newspapers to furnish the public with a fairly balanced version of what is going on.

Borah's reticence about talking for quotation accounts somewhat for the view prevalent in Washington just now that the Senator's star, after a long ascendancy, is fading.

He suffers by popular comparison with Jim Reed. Borah has had to yield the headlines to some extent to the more spectacular perambulating Senator from Missouri, who has been unusually active in the last year.

But a poll of the headlines is no real index here. Reed has done effective and spectacular work. Borah has done effective but not such spectacular work. Perhaps the Senator from Idaho has learned that to be effective it is not necessary to scold at the top of his voice every day. At any rate, while the Democrats have abandoned the true role of a minority party, a solitary and unwontedly quiet Borah is keeping vigilant watch along the Potomac.

These Modern Women

Lightning Speed Through Life

ANONYMOUS

[We print herewith the twelfth of a series of anonymous articles giving the personal backgrounds of a group of distinguished women with a modern point of view. The next article will appear in The Nation for April 27.]

WE always have been and are now a family of laughers. When father and mother and the seven children with the grandchildren gather each fall in the family camp on the lake shore in northern Maine, we do more laughing in two hours than lots of families do in six months.

There are several reasons for the laughter that has always welled up through our family relations like a clear spring. Perhaps the main reason is that father and mother have loved each other with a feeling that runs through the whole structure of their emotional and mental beings, not a consuming passion but a living and powerful reality. I have never heard them quarrel. Sometimes one turned upon the other with a burst of passionate impatience, but even now when they are far along in years—father is eighty-seven—these occasional gusts end in a quaint bit of humor like a rainbow.

My forebears on both sides were pioneers of New England stock. My paternal grandfather was a doctor, and one of the founders of the village in northern Maine which was, until recent years, a lumber-supply center for the lumbering operations to the north and west. He and a handful of other college-educated men founded the academy, the library, and the churches, and ran the affairs of the town in the days when northern Maine depended for its communications on stage routes through unbroken forest. He was a little man who drove through the woods at a great pace in a very high, two-wheeled untopped gig, hitched to a dappled mare named Nell. Under the seat was a bag of little black pills.

Father was until recently more than six feet tall with a splendid physique, dark eyes and hair, a commanding personality, and what is called in the town "the family gift for gab." He was not a student and did not go to college, but he has been a thinker after his original fashion all his life. He reaches his conclusions as the crow flies, and they are sound and logical.

Mother's people were ship-builders and farmers. Her father, a West Point graduate, was killed when she was very small. She lived with her grandfather, who used to clear a fine farm, plant it to small fruits, and then get rid of it to start all over again on another spot. There are in mother fine feeling, innate reasonableness, gentle understanding of people, and a love of beautiful and gracious things. She has a swift, buoyant spirit, intrepid but with some shyness in it, as if her solitary childhood in the depths of forest country had left its touch upon her. Her schooling was not much, but she has read and studied and gathered knowledge from every direction until she is one of the most well-informed persons I know. Physically she has always had great recuperative power. If this had been lacking she would have succumbed to the amount of manual labor that always confronted her.

As a family, we lived all the life there was to be lived in the community, on the farm, and in the woods. Money was scarce—the only rugs we ever had were moose and deer skins and a chance nickel looked as big as a straw bed—but I do not see how with money we could have got more out of our surroundings. Father was for many years a lumberman in the woods around Katahdin and to the north of it. We children, four boys and three girls, spent our vacations in the string of lumber camps. It never seemed to occur to anybody that girls didn't do everything that boys did. Nobody ever followed us around or suggested fear to us. We were expected to use good judgment and keep our wits sharp. Guns, canoes, axes were utensils to use and handle with skill whenever we had need of them. We met the test of endurance at every hand.

In all that woods life—from the winter camps with their vigorous activities to the spring drives of logs with crashing white waters, log-jams, the ringing bing of cant dogs, dams with their roaring sluiceways—we children belonged, not so much looking on as feeling part and parcel of it. And back on the farm, with woods on four sides of it, we belonged too. We worked hard and played hard, and all the children in the neighborhood were welcome to come and play with us.

We were always going off on camping expeditions of various kinds—and are yet, for that matter. Piling on buckboards behind teams of horses with tent and food; spending a week or two on some distant lake shore, or back over the tote roads to the fire-swept Wissattaquoik Valley for blueberries; on to a Grand Army encampment, for father was a Civil War veteran, or to a county fair perhaps. All expeditions that filled us youngsters with joy as well as the several neighbors' children who went along. And Thanksgiving and Christmas were gorgeous feasts; the relatives all gathered to make holiday, and being a hearty folk, they loved fun as well as a groaning board.

My parents both had the old New England ideal of responsibility for public affairs and were leaders in church and town activities, working tooth and nail for the things they believed in. We children shared in discussions of these questions, as well as of national politics. We had current magazines and papers and a good supply of books. We had to attend church and Sunday school as long as we lived at home, but we were never urged to join the church. My parents' religious belief is a real thing to them, but it has no bigotry. They never tried to force it down our throats, nor did they any other belief. As I feel back along my childhood I am not conscious of any galling strain, but rather a rapid movement of prodigious and wholesome vigor. Father and mother succeeded in leaving us children a wide freedom of choice. After I left home it never occurred to me to lay any of my decisions before my parents nor did it ever occur to me that their disagreements with my decisions or ways of life could make any real difference in their feeling toward me.

With a few dollars earned by teaching a back-district school—I added some by building my own fires and chucking the wood in through the schoolhouse window—I started forth into the world to seek my fortune. As a small child I decided, one day, to learn to dive. I went out by myself in a canoe to a raft we had in the middle of a bottomless cove, clambered up the springboard, and dived straight down into the black water. If my fears had got the best of me I should have drowned, but they didn't. In much the same way I plunged into the world.

My first venture was ringing the bell of the great door in the Massachusetts Normal Art School in Boston. Our schools at home had no drawing at all, but by making caricatures of the teachers on the blackboards—and being put in the corner therefor—I had discovered a little talent. I had an idea that by training this a bit I might help myself through college. This particular door of the Normal Art School was most imposing and was used only on state occasions; but I didn't know that and rang away at the bell. A six-foot Negro—the first I'd ever seen—opened the door, finally, and stared down at me with bulging eyes. "Was dat you makin' all dat ringin'!" he exclaimed, taking in my diminutive figure in impossible country clothes, "I t'ought 'twas a fire!"

I stayed in that school as long as my money lasted, which was not long. I did not get much out of it. The life of the great city interested me so passionately that I had little time to spend in the musty depths of the school. I hated the plinths and the dead white casts and the stiff designs for wall-paper. One instructor's phrase did become a part of my equipment and has stuck to me like a good angel ever since: I had chased a circus parade through Chinatown when I should have been preparing for an examination; consequently I failed. When I told my charcoal teacher about it he said heartily, "Don't let a little thing like that bother you."

I finally gave up my college ambitions for two reasons: I failed the preliminary examinations—mischief had played a bigger part in my school days than application—and I became obsessed with the idea of teaching an elocution and physical culture system that an Armenian preacher in our town had introduced to me. Having earned half the money necessary to get to Washington, D. C., where the school was located, I borrowed the rest from a Canadian woodsman and departed. My scientist brother, living in Washington, investigated the school and reported it mostly fake, but I entered just the same.

The head of this establishment, learning of my brother's condemnation, took out his wrath on me. He was rascal enough to refuse me admittance to the two classes for which I had paid tuition until I had paid cash tuition for all the classes there were. Somehow I raised the money. It was a disagreeable year, but at the end came an episode that eased my sore heart. Twice in the season the school gave a public performance. The head attempted to shut me out of these, but one of the teachers, a most noble and gifted woman, put me into the final exhibition in spite of him. I wrote my own recitation, a piece that called for character work and humor. It made a huge hit and brought encore after encore. After that requests to recite came from organizations all over the city; so that I left the school with its owner flat as a pancake and my own soul filled with satisfaction.

With a girl I had met in the school I decided, at the close of the season, to go West from Chicago and organize physical-culture classes from town to town. We reached Chicago and our last penny at the same moment. My friend was pretty and amiable but quite unwilling to stand the gaff of hard work, so I undertook to support both of us. We were young, and this expedition covering the better part of a year was a great adventure. We pawned and sold our clothes, and I dipped candy in a chocolate factory, became an expert waitress, clerked in a hotel, and succeeded in organizing physical-culture classes which were big enough to support one but not two.

We put through one enterprising job in a Far Western city that I still think was not so bad for two inexperienced backwoodsmen. It would have turned out well, too, if I had known more about business. We took a whole suite in a leading hotel, went to the best stationer, and had handsome cards printed; we hired the swellest carriages possible and, having found out who were the leaders of society, made calls upon them. Incredible as it sounds, since we had no money and the shabbiest clothes you ever saw, we induced the ladies we called on to be patronesses of a public demonstration of physical culture set to music. We hired a hall and invited the general public, announcing the performance by lively posters.

The hall was crowded. As a result I got a fine class and aroused considerable excitement even among the Mormon elders. Unfortunately I failed to charge enough for the lessons to meet the bills. I just managed to finish the course. By that time the hotel threatened arrest and seized our luggage. We cared little about that because there was nothing inside it. I tried to meet the calamity, but failed; and one night we both quietly slipped out of town. Long afterward I paid my share of those bills.

Soon after this tramp adventure I decided to be a cartoonist—a real political cartoonist. I came to New York without a cent and without knowing a soul. I was unskilled. I had not the slightest idea how to tap the city's resources. I was certain of only one thing: I would be a cartoonist. I did almost everything from working in a disreputable prize-package factory on the East Side to selling Woodrow Wilson's "History of the American People" in instalments on West End Avenue. I was often ragged and cold and heartsick and hungry, but after a while I began to get the lay of the land. I attempted to invade the sacred precincts of the big newspapers. I tried Arthur Brisbane over and over, until the youngsters in the outer office grinned at me in derision. One day I sat down and wrote a letter to Mr. Brisbane. I told him I had come to the city to earn money as a cartoonist in order that I might raise the mortgage from the old farm in Maine; that I had no training or money but that I did have some cartoons that I should like to lay before him. The mortgage story was a whopper, but it fetched Mr. Brisbane by the next mail. With what an air I presented myself and my invitation to the dragons at the entrance need not be described. Mr. Brisbane was gentle and kind. He looked at my stuff and suggested that I could undoubtedly raise the mortgage much more quickly by going back to Maine. He said that newspapers had no use for women in this particular line of work and not much use for them in any other.

Life got pretty desperate. I had heard of a teacher at the Art Students League whose criticisms were so harsh that he was not allowed to teach women's classes. I am sure now that this was not so, but I thought: "Now, that's the very man I'll go to. He'll tell me the truth." So I took my sketches under my arm and went to the League. I waited in the half-light on the stair-landing for this man on whom I had pinned my faith. Finally he came up the stairs, a slight man with head bent. Timidly I accosted him: If some time he was at leisure would he give me some advice? I was not a student there. "Of course!" he said as if he'd been waiting for me to ask him, "why not, right now, this minute?" He took me into the members' room, and looked at my sketches. What he said warmed my heart as nothing ever had before or has since.

"You have the talent of one in twenty thousand!" he said. He told me he was giving me the benefit of many years of newspaper experience when he added, "Newspapers have no use for women in this field; your row will be a hard one. Keep out of art schools, pick up what knowledge you need, and keep at it." I was still in a way as much at sea as ever, only now I had a reason for sticking.

In the place where I lived was a college-bred woman who bitterly hated the suffrage cause. Until I listened to her railings I really never knew there was such a thing. Now it did make an impression. I hunted up a street-corner speaker, got some literature and read it, and on the instant knew I belonged. There was no bitterness in my soul, just a recognition of the need to help men and women change their focus a bit. I still knew little about drawing, but I saw that there was not a cartoon on our side, though plenty of fierce ones on the other. I made a sketch in ink of a man standing in a most conceited attitude with both feet on the ballot box holding against his breast a diploma marked "Past master in egotism"; I drew huge donkey's ears on his head and under it I put the caption: "The ballot box is mine, because it's mine."

I went with this to suffrage headquarters. Dr. Anna Howard Shaw's experience with cartoons had been very unhappy. I am sure this unladylike picture filled her with horror. It was certainly not welcome, and I took it to the New York Call. The editor literally hugged me! Next day the thing came out on the front page—and a full page at that! I still have the proof, and after all this time I find it not so bad.

Whether in the years since then I have accomplished anything worth while or not, I have thoroughly enjoyed living. Love is no stranger to me. My love affairs began in childhood and have been going on ever since in varying kinds and with as many results. Love is good wherever it comes from. I am married now, and I find that good, too. Economic freedom is good, and I still have it. But it seems to me that in these days of rapidly increasing fair play between a man and a woman neither economic dependence or independence makes much difference. It is the spirit of cooperation that counts and enables two people to make adjustments both inside and outside of their relationship.

I don't know exactly what people mean by disillusionment. I love to live and the longer I keep at it the greater capacity I have for living, and when I die, if it be so arranged that I lose my individual entity, I pray that I may become the lightning that snaps and crackles and whips through a thunder-storm.

A League of Nations Oppressed

By ROGER BALDWIN

Brussels, March 1

FOR the first time in history the black, brown, and yellow peoples and the white working classes of the imperialist Powers have united in a campaign against imperialism and for national independence. From all over the earth they came to Brussels on February 10 in a four-day "Congress against Colonial Oppression and Imperialism" and founded an international organization with headquarters in Paris—the League of Oppressed Nations. Forty countries were represented—seventeen of them colonies or dependent peoples—by 175 delegates ranging from the Chinese Kuomintang, the Indian National Congress, and the Egyptian National Party to the British trade-union lefts, the South African labor movement, the Mexican workers, and the native independence parties in French and Dutch colonies.

It was a responsible and determined crowd. Here were the official representatives of the world's most militant movements of revolt and independence—in India, China, Indo-China, Korea, Indonesia, Syria, and North Africa. Here were a dozen Socialist or Communist members of the British, French, and German parliaments. Here were delegates from seventeen trade-union bodies with a total membership in the millions. And among them was a sizable sprinkling of "intellectuals" and middle-class pacifists, of whom many were women.

The whole crowd was young, enthusiastic, and revolutionary. As you looked them over assembled in the gilded hall of the old Egmont Palace, rented from the city of Brussels, there were not half a dozen gray heads to be seen. And those were old revolutionary veterans with the fire of youth—Georg Ledebour from Germany, George Lansbury from England, and Sen Katayama, Japanese Communist living in refuge in Moscow. Vigorous, alert young men of all races united under the congress banner "National Liberty—Social Equality." The central driving power in them all was the purpose to achieve a national independence, not only political freedom but the freeing of workers and peasants, whether from foreign or native exploiters. In the union of the workers of the imperialist countries and the natives of the colonies a common war can be waged against common exploiters. A dramatic expression of this feeling brought the whole congress to its feet cheering when Fenner Brockway, secretary of the British Independent Labor Party, at the close of his speech grasped the hand of the representative of the Chinese Kuomintang and pledged to him the relentless opposition of the British working class to war on China. Cheers again greeted the declaration of General Lu Chung-lin, second in command of Feng Yu-hsiang's army, that the only object of that army is to protect the workers and peasants in their revolutionary struggle. A joint manifesto signed by the Hindu, Chinese, and British delegates pledged them to a united and many-sided campaign for the freedom of the workers and peasants from imperialist rule. Behind all the speeches and resolutions burned the fire of the class struggle, with the double inspiration of Soviet Russia and the Chinese Revolution. No Russians were present; there were no representatives of the Third International or the Red Trade Union International. There were many Communists among the delegates, though they were a minority of the entire group, but the feeling of all the others was pro-Soviet in the sense that Russia alone stands uncompromisingly for freedom for the colonies.

George Lansbury in a ringing speech called the conference the most important he had attended in his long career. All the speakers stressed its value as expressing a new and universal understanding by the dark races that their freedom cannot be achieved on purely nationalist lines; that it can be won only as an economic struggle of the workers and peasants against capitalism itself; and that to win it, union with the white workers of Europe and America is indispensable. Whether or not the new league rises to the hopes of its founders as a center for action, propaganda, and financial aid, the force of this new unity must influence the whole movement the world over. The congress was recognized as significant only in the colonial, Communist, Russian, and German press. The capitalist press was almost wholly silent, even the Brussels papers running only very brief items. The Socialist press ignored it after condemning it as merely another Communist effort to mask political purposes behind a non-partisan shield. The Brussels daily Socialist organ after ten days came out from its silence and conceded handsomely that, whatever its origin, the congress had shown itself far above partisan interests and would undoubtedly be of great historic significance.

The idea of the congress was conceived by the same Communists and near-Communists in Berlin who were active in the International Workers' Aid, working in close cooperation with the European representatives of the Kuomintang Party and the Mexican workers. Its early financial support came from those sources. But the congress was not under Communist control, and the Communists, with what the Brussels Socialist paper called "unaccustomed modesty," kept way in the background. No party controls the new organization. It is exactly what its program and make-up indicate, and it should gain the confidence and support of all elements opposed to imperialism and in favor of colonial independence.

Of course China held the front of the stage at Brussels. Every delegate paid tribute to the Chinese struggle as the greatest hope for every other people. The Chinese delegation was the largest and the most active. Cables from Canton, from the army, from the provisional government, from Mrs. Sun Yat-sen, from labor and business groups marked almost every session. The Chinese delegation gave the congress an evening reception at which the whole history of the revolutionary movement was set forth by a former aide of Sun Yat-sen's, whose draped portrait, by the way, was the only face on the walls of the congress rooms. General Lu was there, fresh from the front. He was in Europe, it appeared, to get supplies for his army, mainly in Russia; he had come on from Moscow expressly for the congress.

Next to the Chinese issue I should say French imperialism came in for most attention. The Indo-Chinese fairly flooded the congress with propaganda. One of the leaders of the Syrian Druses, in exile in Palestine, dramatically arrived on the last day of the congress from Berlin, where he had been held for three days by the hesitation of the Belgian Government to give him a visa in the face of pressure by the French. The congress put some counter-pressure on the Belgian Socialist Foreign Minister, and got it. Tall, handsome, young, his passionate plea, though in Arabic, won instant applause before translation. The spirit and force of the man was enough. Another native rebel against French colonial rule was one of the hits of the congress through the power of his speech, his humor, and simple wisdom. He was a tall, rangy young Negro from Senegal. In action on the platform he commanded attention for every word, alternating shafts of delightful humor with passionate denunciation of France. The French Government tolerates in France these rebels against her colonial rule, while repressing them brutally in the colonies. In other words, they are free to agitate wherever it does no good. And they may print only in French, which most natives cannot read.

Of course Nicaragua and Mexico were actively on the program, though American imperialism took a distant third place behind British and French. The South American delegation was strong and determined. The delegation from the United States was feeble—consisting of two Communists and myself. Our six island colonies were not represented, though a Filipino was said to be on his way. But American imperialism was hard to tackle. "Tell me," said one of the Latin delegates, "how on earth we are to be saved from your lending us money?" And the Europeans asked it, too. The United States loomed up as a new type of menace. With the direct occupation of territory, with the national struggles for independence they knew how to deal. But to the problem of economic imperialism the only answer was socialism, with the boycott and united resistance to political interference as temporary tactics.

Of the other imperialisms little was heard. The Indonesians were there, in dead earnest against the Dutch Government's suppression of their workers' and peasants' movements in Java. But the Portuguese colonies were not represented, nor was a word said of them; nor were the Italian. Italy was represented, if that word can be used, by a solitary exiled official of the defunct trade unions. Ireland, old friend of her fellow-oppressed, was wholly absent—settled down, apparently, to home life in the empire. Not a word was said of the Congo, for the Belgian Government in permitting the congress to be held had specified that no Belgian political issue was to be discussed. But despite that, the congress was freer in Belgium than it would have been elsewhere in Europe today except in Germany or Switzerland. This first conference may be only a try-out but it is the beginning of united opposition to the increasing concentration of international imperialist finance.

AS a professional drifter the writer of this column is naturally interested in other drifting or floating particles—in flotsam and jetsam generally. So he has followed with zest the zigzaggings of the drifting or floating university aboard the Holland-America Line's good ship Ryndam. The Ryndam will return to the United States in May, after an all-winter cruise around the world with some 500 students, a fifth of them young women, who supposedly have been combining foreign travel with scholastic work. The floating university has experienced its share of stormy weather, some of the wildest originating within rather than without, and no doubt the faculty has spent a number of sleepless nights on the bridge wondering if it should send out an SOS call for help.

* * * * *

THE roughest weather, it is reported, has been due to coeducation. From Paris comes the word that the cruise has developed twelve engagements and that two marriages are "reported though not confirmed." To the Drifter that does not seem a high percentage of romance, even if all of the two marriages should be confirmed—not when one considers that the students have spent at least one coeducational evening on the Grand Canal and presumably have visited the Acropolis by moonlight. The hardships and dangers of the deep are so well known that nobody could have enrolled in the floating university without realizing that he was taking certain risks. Yet the situation has led some members of the faculty, including ex-Governor Allen of Kansas, to declare themselves against coeducationalizing the high seas. For stationary campuses in the Middle West a mingling of the sexes is all right, they think, but to mix oil and water is child's play by comparison with mixing coeducation and the briny deep.

* * * * *

THE real trouble, one surmises, is that you cannot mix university education and drifting. That's why the Drifter is short on learning and long on flotsam and jetsam. It is impossible to get a shipload of active-limbed, live-minded youngsters to concentrate on logarithms or French irregular verbs when they can go ashore in Mandalay or shopping on the rue de Rivoli. It is doubtful if the proposal that next year there be one steamship for young men and another for young women will solve the scholastic problems of the floating university. It may be that the young women will be easier to manage by themselves, although the Drifter would not care to go surety for that. As for the other sex, it is generally believed that a feminine leaven has a restraining influence. Deprived of that salutary balance, it is possible that another year we shall hear that two members of the sophomore class of the men's floating university have climbed the Eiffel Tower by night and painted in red at the top the numerals "1930." Or that a score of freshmen have been arrested while trying to steal Big Ben out of the bell tower of the House of Parliament and replace it with a year-old Jersey calf.

* * * * *

THE Drifter knows of no young people anywhere who could profit more by foreign education than those of the United States. But he doesn't see how they are going to get it in a floating university. Leaving aside the distractions of continual stops in successive ports, there is a greater difficulty. A foreign education means getting out of one's native atmosphere into another one. It isn't possible for 500 students traveling together to do that. They carry their own atmosphere with them, imposing it upon any place they visit. No steamship can travel far enough or long enough to take them out of the United States.

Precipitation, Presidents, Pennies, Potatoes

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Robert Marshall's article on Precipitation and Presidents suggests, first, that the largest campaign fund has elected its President some twenty-three times out of twenty-four, which is a better correlation than the rainfall figures. Next comes the amusing fact that, by and large, the farmers get more for their crops in a short-crop year than when there is a bumper crop, illustrated most glaringly in the case of potatoes. This would produce the amusing paradox that in these "weather-vane States" it is not so much acute financial distress on the part of the rustics as emotional depression from watching a poor crop that is the immediate precursor to the profound decision to vote for Tweedledee instead of Tweedledum at the forthcoming Presidential election.

Anatole France, Moralist

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In his comments upon Anatole France in your issue of January 19 Mr. Joseph Wood Krutch apparently did not feel called upon to discuss the question of morality. But as this question was raised in the book under review, "The Degeneration of a Great Artist," to ignore it is to give a sort of assent to the contentions of its author, Mr. Cerf.

However unorthodox or questionable the attitude of Anatole France may have been in regard to sex relationships, these do not make up the whole field of morality, and I am inclined to think that it would be difficult to name, among his contemporaries, a writer more effectively engaged in promoting the ideals of truth and justice.

Without venturing to challenge your gifted critic's prophecy, one may be permitted to take issue with Mr. Cerf's judgment that the writer who made superstition ridiculous and cruelty hateful, and was remarkable for the wide range of his sympathies, "sought knowledge for amusement rather than improvement and did nothing to promote the establishment in the world of sound ethical principles."

The delicacy of feeling which Ruskin noticed in "Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard" developed into a profound understanding of the lives of others as such figures as M. Bergeret, L'abbé Coignard, and Crainquebille followed one another upon the stage. If the delicate and telling shafts of irony were aimed at the government, the army, the church, and big business, it was because these venerable institutions were careless of the peace and happiness of the people whose lives they controlled. The "cynic and sensualist" stood for the rights not only of Frenchmen but of all men.

The generous sentiments that pervade his imaginative writing are not the only revelation of his moral standards. Instead of remaining "aloof from the hurly-burly of his times," as Mr. Krutch infers, his love of fair play and his detestation of violence compelled him to leave the study for the platform. The volume of speeches entitled "Vers les Temps Meilleures" bears witness to his participation in politics and suggests that his pessimism was tempered by hope.

He may have been unwise to rely upon the Socialist Party as an instrument of liberation, but in spite of mistakes and inconsistencies, the advocates of equal freedom and the friends of tolerance will, for generations to come, find in his works so much to quote that he may be saved from oblivion until there are no more oppressors and oppressed.

Who Will Help Barbusse?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Henri Barbusse sends me a copy of an extremely eloquent appeal which he has written, addressed to world opinion upon the subject of "the invading barbarity of Fascism." He wishes to have this appeal signed by persons whose names would carry weight in all countries of the world, and he asks my help in obtaining signatures. It happens that I am inconveniently situated to carry on such work.

It occurs to me that there must be among your readers some persons having leisure and enough money for postage who would be glad to assist M. Barbusse in the work he has undertaken. Let me say that for several years I have been receiving, through my mail, continued evidence of the heroic devotion of this great French man of letters to the cause of the oppressed workers throughout Europe. Surely there must be, amid all the materialism and cynicism of our great rich country, enough of our old-time idealism to cause a few people to wish to help M. Barbusse. His address is "Vigilia," Miramar par Theoule (A.M.), France.

If those who write to him will send me a carbon copy of their letter, I will be glad to act as a clearing house and put them in touch with one another, so that they may cooperate.

Why Italy and Britain Are Allies

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I, too, wondered what might be the other half of that bargain between the British and the Italians at Shanghai until I read the following paragraphs in the Survey Graphic's admirable number on Fascism:

> Obviously any large Italian expansion in Africa is not an immediate possibility. When and if it becomes practical politics, it can only be carried through with the assent of Great Britain. Hence Mussolini has every reason for maintaining the best possible relations with Downing Street. This is true also as a means of attaining more limited objectives, as, for example, a position of equality in the international control of Tangier; the rounding out of the Somaliland on the Indian Ocean and the Italian colony of Eritrica on the Red Sea; political penetration in Yemen and Arabia.
> The first week in February saw a singular manifestation of the present close relations between Italy and Great Britain. Mussolini then accepted and indorsed substantially all of the points of Sir Austen Chamberlain's Far Eastern policy. An Italian expeditionary force in China is a possibility.

To Music Lovers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am appealing to you in the interest of the great Festival Theater at Bayreuth, which gave to the world the traditions of Richard Wagner's magnificent works. I feel certain that you will do whatever you can to save this great institution from the eclipse which threatens to put out the light forever. The fund which Richard Wagner himself, with the aid of contemporary friends and admirers, established to assure its future, has, through Germany's financial collapse after the war, completely disappeared. Royalties from the master's works automatically ceased thirty years after Wagner's death, and there is no source of income other than the summer festival ticket sale. The continued presentation of Wagner's great works and the maintenance of the Festival Theater have become entirely dependent on the assistance of altruistic and art-loving circles.

Since Wagner's works now are world property, and music the universal language, music-lovers of all countries will want to share in maintaining this Festival Theater as a memorial to Richard Wagner. One hundred thousand dollars are necessary; I have begun to raise a fund in my native country—Sweden. In July and August of this year the Bayreuth Festival Theater will celebrate its fiftieth anniversary.

May I ask your readers to consider this appeal and if possible to send me contributions in care of the Metropolitan Opera Company?

The American Citizenship Foundation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of January 12 you referred to the American Citizenship Foundation of Chicago and its drive to obtain an endowment of two million dollars, and also stated that their purpose was to control and supervise the speakers at all church and public forums, lecture courses, etc. I am convinced that you were mistaken in some of these statements. Not that I believe in this sort of work. Citizenship teaching is much more needed among some of the men behind foundations of this kind than among our foreign-born immigrants, as witness the case of Senator-elect Frank Smith, Samuel Insull, etc. It will interest you to hear that the drive for two million dollars has completely broken down, and that according to reliable reports the foundation is now in financial difficulties and that the active man, George Bond Ellison, has retired.

New York, April 4 M. I. K.

[Independent inquiry has convinced us that the statement that this foundation intended to control speakers and had established a blacklist was erroneous, and we regret that we were misled by the press reports upon which we based our comments. It will, however, be no loss if the movement comes to an end. In our opinion it was another effort by men of great wealth and of corporation managers to regiment the foreign-born and to teach them what they should think about our institutions.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

Advertisers, Publishers, Masses

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I did not know until I read The Nation that I had been quoted in the newspapers as saying that none of the faults of the American press was of its own creation. In my speech I had in mind the demand of advertisers for quantity circulation and the fact that publishers in their desire to get mass circulation are ignoring class readers. If advertisers and advertising agencies insist upon regarding mass circulation as the basis of their decision, the poor publisher will have to follow the policy of printing only those things which appeal to the mass. My statement was that, recognizing the difficulties of American publishers in fighting against the mass idea, the amount of news they do print for the benefit of the class reader is amazing. I feel that on the whole they give a much more rounded summary of the news of all classes than the newspapers of any other country in the world.

The Man Economy Has Caught

By RAYMOND HOLDEN

A mouth of ivory snow and coral,
A plenteous body's quiet horn,
Breasts like a swelling bloom of laurel,
These are the crowns that I have worn.

Here, with no crown, I have no power
And crickets could outwit my brain.
Fallow she lies. I may not plow her
Who lies beyond this picket rain.

What in this arch of hill and valley
But the field, woman, is worth thought?
What but her grain could hope to rally
The man economy has caught?

First Glance

IN the six episodes reconstructing Emerson's environment which Van Wyck Brooks uses to fill the first half of his new book, "Emerson and Others" (Dutton: $3), Mr. Brooks, as might have been expected, returns to the one theme he has never deserted since he began to write, or at least to publish. The sterility of the American scene, the failure of American life to support and enrich the American artist—this is his theme, presented already in so many ways and through so many personalities that in the hands of a less lovely writer it would long ago have become intolerably wearisome. For the most part, of course, Mr. Brooks has applied himself to the contemporary situation—and so we have here, among the miscellaneous essays which complete the volume, an essay on The Literary Life in America containing the sentence: "If our writers wither early, if they are too generally pliant, passive, acquiescent, anemic, how much is this not due to the heritage of pioneering, with its burden of isolation, nervous strain, excessive work, and all the racial habits that these have engendered?" So also we have, in a passionate tribute to the late Randolph Bourne, this statement of Bourne's ruling hope: "It was for a new fellowship in the youth of America as the principle of a great and revolutionary departure in our life, a league of youth, one might call it, consciously framed with the purpose of creating, out of the blind chaos of American society, a fine, free, articulate cultural order." But the theme is no less the concern of Mr. Brooks as he looks with delicate, expert eye at Emerson's Concord and Boston, as he listens, all affectionate attention, to the Transcendental Club.

> One topic especially stirred the club: the American Genius, the causes that hindered its growth. On this titanic continent, with nature so grand, why should genius be so tame? One had only to think of Bryant—chaste and faultless, but uncharacterized. Or Dr. Channing's preaching, the sublime of calculation. Allston was thin, and Greenough was thin, and Irving and Prescott and Bancroft. Not one drop of the strong black blood of the English race! No teeth and claws, no nerve and dagger. A pale, diluted stream. There was the topic of topics: the lukewarm spirit of the day, as Father Taylor called it. Who cared whether Bryant wrote good poems or not? Whether Greenough made a good statue? The great poems had been confessions of the faith of races, the great statues had been worshiped. No necessity of the people called these Americans out. And alas, why look for art where society was unbelieving, honeycombed, hollow?

Mr. Brooks, like Lewis Mumford in "The Golden Day," goes all the way back to Emerson's New England to find an American place and time when and where the accident of genius combined with the circumstance of a suitably growing society to produce literature both American and fine. In Emerson Mr. Brooks finds, perhaps, the first subject with whom he can wholly sympathize; and the result is a particularly lovely book, even for one who has several to his credit. Emerson in his study and in his garden, Emerson strolling to Boston, Emerson lecturing, Emerson writing, Emerson editing the Dial, Emerson talking with Ellery Channing, Bronson Alcott, Thoreau, and Margaret Fuller, Emerson conscious of young reforming spirits engaged in a comical though admirable search "for modes of life, perhaps, familiar enough in history, or in other parts of the world; for careers and social customs, disciplines, that a simple colonial society had never dreamed of providing, had not been able to provide"—Emerson in all these aspects shines here in a few pages, and shines, as Henry James did in Mr. Brooks's last book, largely in his own words, which are plucked like gleaming threads from the "Works" and the "Journal" and woven into a living tissue of quotation. For Mr. Brooks's perennial complaint I have less use than I suppose I ought to have; for this book, however, as indeed for most of its predecessors, I have much use. It gives me joy—and for a moment I believed everything Mr. Brooks said about America.

MARK VAN DOREN

A Belated Masterpiece

Decadence. By Maxim Gorky. Translated from the Russian by Veronica Dewey. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.50.

THE idea of a new novel by Gorki is sufficiently hard to get used to. Russian literature as we have come to know it, that amazing volcanic panorama which the introverted energies of a great people heaved up before nineteenth-century Europe, has tended to recede into the perspective of literary history—an extinct volcano apparently, whose extinction coincided with and was no doubt related to the eruption of Russia's political crater. Here and there a sputtering of spent fires, but hardly of the ancient heat, hardly fierce enough to disturb the hardening crust of critical judgment. But this almost posthumous performance of Gorki is doubly upsetting. For it seems that Gorki not merely has added a postscript to the rather important chapter he occupies in Russian literature but has actually succeeded at this late date in rewriting it.

Not that this chapter didn't need revision. The position of Gorki was a precarious one. It rested on a pedestal of achievement which, while creditable enough in itself, was not proportionate to the statue which surmounted it. When one thinks of Dostoevski one conjures up "The Idiot" or "Brothers Karamazov," and immediately a satisfactory equation is formed. Similarly, "Anna Karenina" can be put against Tolstoi; "Fathers and Sons" against Turgenev; "The Seven That Were Hanged" against Andreev; and any volume of his evenly perfect stories against Chekhov. But what can one set against a reputation like Gorki's? None of his novels. "Foma Gordyeef" was an ambitious failure, "Mother" a piece of propaganda, "Three of Them" a tediously prolonged short story. Nor his best-known, much over-rated play, "Lower Depths," wherein a motley of unindividualized types are loosely threaded together with a Tolstoian moral. There remain the short stories. But how many of them can stand by themselves, apart from their creator, like Chekhov's stories? Most of them are helplessly tied to the umbilical cord of Gorki's lyric love of humanity, and can seldom wander far afield. The truth is that so far Gorki's chief literary creation has been his own rarely beautiful personality—indirectly in his objective work, and directly in his autobiographic series: "Childhood," "In the World," "My University Life." Significantly enough, only in these frankly autobiographic works does he achieve the necessary detachment which characterizes finished art. He has got out of his own way by putting himself in as one of the characters, and is thus saved from stumbling over himself in his over-eagerness to understand and explain them. But while autobiography as a human document is at a premium in other literatures, Russian literature is too well human-documented to appraise it unduly.

Suddenly, one might say unexpectedly, Gorki reaches over himself and places a novel on the top shelf of Russian fiction, beside "Brothers Karamazov," "War and Peace," and "Fathers and Sons." Whether it be the detaching influence of the revolution, which pushed him gently but firmly off the political-social arena, so that he found himself a properly disinterested bystander; whether it be the calmer, clearer vision of age from which the froth of opinion has subsided—the result is undiscountable. "Decadence" purports to trace the degeneration of a peasant family turned merchants; but with due respect to Gorki's object, the work is too alive to be confined to any formula. It must be remembered that "Brothers Karamazov" was originally entitled "The Life of a Great Sinner," and was planned as a polemic against atheism. There are no types in this book that one can pin down with an apt adjective and be sure of. Three generations of human beings grow and decay capriciously before our eyes like trees in a forest, in obedience no doubt to inevitable laws, but not accountable to our preconceived logic. We see their natural, unexpected development through the years, and can only scratch our heads reminiscently: "just think of it, I knew him when . . . ." There is Ilya, the founder of the house of Artamanov, an emancipated serf turned manufacturer, an Adam still fresh-formed from the earth, with the strength of the earth and its compulsive desire to grow. There is his son Pyotr, with something of the dull strength of his father, but in whom the blind impetus that impelled his father is spent. There is his wife, Natalya—we follow her from the time when, unknown to herself, she is a fairy princess, the object of the secret adoration of Nikita, Pyotr's hunchback brother, until the time when even her stolid husband exclaims: "All you can do is to eat, sleep, and put grease on your face." There is the grandson Ilya, a young eagle who deserts the Artamanov chicken-coop as soon as he finds his wings. And there is his brother Yakov, who, from within the fat folds of his timid soul, is yet able to sense maliciously the hollow pompousness of his more active cousin, Miron, who aspires to the Duma. There is the town idiot, Antonushka, whose head is a-jangle with incoherent verses, and the digger Tikhon, whose mind is a blunt spade, obstinately trying to dig a meaning out of life. In an exchange between them, Gorki sums up Russian literature:

> "What are you trying to get out of him?" Artamanov would ask with a solicitude which he did not understand.
> "I want him to explain the superhuman words he uses."
> "But they are only the words of an idiot!"
> "Even an idiot must have some sort of reason," Tikhon would say stupidly.

Life "is a story told by an idiot, full of sound and fury"; but here the Russians part company with Shakespeare. For it is their blind faith that "even an idiot must have some sort of reason."

ALTER BRODY

The Negro Problem: A Restatement

The American Race Problem, a Study of the Negro. By Edward B. Reuter. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $2.75.

THE American Negro problem has a deceptive simplicity. It is not until the student really gets into the data that he realizes the extent to which complete mastery is well-nigh impossible for one individual. Unfortunately there are few students who understand that the many aspects of American Negro life take one into intricate problems not only of sociology and economics, but of biology, racial mixture, ethnology, and history. This is the essential reason why almost all books about "the Negro problem" are so thin and superficial. And this is why it is so gratifying to take up Mr. Reuter's book on the subject and to realize that here are balance, mature consideration, and sanity in a sociological study which has been held to almost a purely sociological plane, and which attempts neither to encompass all possible aspects of the problem nor to solve it for all time.

The book is essentially for the classroom and for persons who wish to consider a problem thoroughly before they feel they can express themselves intelligently on it. It "is designed to serve as an outline and as a point of reference as well as to provide an organization and a point of view. It is not intended as a substitute for the study of concrete material." Its convincingness lies, I must repeat, in the fact that it remains at all times a sociological study. Thus, for example, we have a discussion of race. But here, instead of a diffuse consideration of the biological problems involved, we have rather a short and concise statement of the generally accepted idea of race, after which Mr. Reuter immediately goes into a full study of the social significance of the term, and particularly the social importance of the fact of racial differences. And when one considers for a moment the extent to which the difference in pigmentation between the Negro and the White has been an important factor in making for social differences between the two groups, the significance of concentrating a discussion of race on this point becomes immediately apparent. Mr. Reuter also understands the importance of historical background. Often in his discussion we are taken back to slavery times so that the development of particular phenomena or attitudes can be traced for us. Too many discussions of social situations neglect the time perspective, which, indeed, has come to be regarded as something belonging essentially to an ethnological technique. It is gratifying to see how the method illuminates the subject in hand.

We are first presented with a fundamental aspect of the American Negro problem—the population statistics regarding it. Here Mr. Reuter is thoroughly at home, and his statements are illuminating. Not so much can be said for his next topic, that of racial differences, but this is obviously a bow to a point that cannot be disregarded, and one imagines that he regains his historico-sociological footing with relief in the following discussion of the accommodation and the assimilation of the two racial groups in this country. From here on is clear sailing, and the consideration of the development of the Negro from slave to freeman, with the consequent racial differentiation and racial consciousness on the part of both groups, is clear, well-organized, and authoritative. In the course of this the problems of Negro health and family life, of the economic and educational status of the Negro, of the Negro church, and of the Negro in crime are brought forward, and one realizes how thoroughly they have been thought through. Thus, although the usual statistics regarding the extent to which Negroes are criminals are brought forward, we are not allowed to pass on them without being reminded that current prejudice against the Negro makes it easier to arrest a Negro than a White man, easier to convict him, and easier to get a long sentence for him. This balancing attitude is typical, and I venture to predict that Mr. Reuter will be assailed more than once by the anti-Negro as well as by the racially conscious Negro groups.

The book is so considered, indeed, and of such high quality, that one regrets its shortcomings the more. Thus, where Mr. Reuter touches African ethnology, as in his short discussion of African tribal family life, he is obviously treading terra incognita. Certain statements about race might be amended, also, but this is not serious. One would wish for greater completeness in bibliography—thus it is unfortunate that Cox's "White America" is not recommended as an exhibit for the extreme pre-White position, while the lacunae in the citations concerning the anatomical aspects of Negro-White physical differences are at once apparent. I also feel that Mr. Reuter's conservatism regarding the general situation, while usually admirable, has led him to undervalue the achievements of the American Negroes in the literary and artistic field. And this promising development is still sufficiently tender to make one wish for leniency rather than overstrict understatement.

But these points are essentially minor ones. Indeed, the last chapter of the work, on the present status of the problem and its future, is such as would alone more than balance them. As for solutions of the Negro problem, those which have been advanced thus far are dismissed with a "brief comment." To my mind no comment was ever more to the point: "There is no solution."

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

Nothing New

George Rogers Clark: His Life and Public Services. By Temple Bodley. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

WESTERNERS cling tenaciously to three principles when they write about their great revolutionary hero, George Rogers Clark. First of all, his enterprise against the Illinois country was extraordinarily hazardous; secondly, his success won for the United States the Old Northwest; and thirdly, all contemporary criticism of Clark and his enterprise was false. Mr. Bodley runs true to form. He has presented to his readers the usual portrait of a gilded hero, a Napoleon and Sir Galahad rolled into one. The expedition against Kaskaskia is thus heralded: "A more daring offensive is hardly to be found in history." After describing the surrender of Vincennes by Hamilton to Clark, the author declares: "From that day to this, the country north of the Ohio has been ours." The last half of the volume is an attorney's brief for the defendant against various accusations of misconduct, one of which involved him in treason.

Mr. Bodley is very much excited about the neglect of Clark's fame by historians. That there has been neglect cannot be doubted. But no advance toward a better understanding can be made except through the establishment of what Clark actually did and a careful evaluation of his accomplishment. Hyperbole gets us nowhere. Within our own day the importance of events west of the Alleghanies has become generally recognized. Students both East and West are reinterpreting our history, and the influence of the frontier has been made a part of the historian's creed. Clark's contribution to the welfare of the United States has become a favorite object of study and there is now emerging a sane view of his acts. The new view borrows nothing from the ignorance of the older Easterners or from the extravagance of the Westerners. Clark's march through the flooded prairies from Kaskaskia to Vincennes, the most remarkable of his military deeds, is now proclaimed heroic by all. There have been during the history of the world, however, several military episodes wherein the endurance of men was more severely tried and the genius of the leader even more completely exemplified.

Like previous biographies of Clark Mr. Bodley has followed too exclusively the historical sources emanating from Clark and his immediate associates. For instance, the occupation of the Illinois country is told in the words written by Clark. The Mason letter and the famous Memoir are excellent sources for an understanding of Clark's own mind, but when it comes to facts the statements in them should be checked up by other contemporary sources. This has not been done. The author has neglected that mass of documents from the French villages which have been printed by the Illinois Historical Library in the "Cahokia Records" and the "Kaskaskia Records." These volumes would have brought to his notice many a problem needing careful consideration. The origin of the expedition was not so simple as Mr. Bodley thinks it was. How far it was inspired, if at all, from Kaskaskia itself he does not tell us. He could also have learned that the British had abandoned the Illinois and were making no effort to protect it. Detroit was the center of their line of defense. All Clark did was to travel the well-known water and land route and occupy an undefended village where a large minority, if not an actual majority, of the villagers received him with rejoicings. The attack on, and defense of, Verdun in the late war appears to have been more hazardous.

The exaggeration of the consequences of the occupation of the French villages, a most common failing among Western historians, is a much more serious error than extravagant claims of heroism. The British line of defense on the Great Lakes was never seriously threatened. Throughout the war their Indians and partisans overran the Old Northwest and threatened Kentucky. Clark was pushed back to the Ohio River and was ordered to build forts for the protection of Kentucky. Such was the condition in the West when negotiations of peace were opened. So unimportant were the doings of General Clark that they were not noticed by the negotiators. Had the British Prime Minister desired to make the Ohio River the boundary of Canada he would have encountered no opposition from Spain or France. He did not so desire. The forces that gave the Old Northwest to the United States were not generated at Kaskaskia. To seek the origin of them one must probe the souls of the two principal negotiators, Lord Shelburne and Benjamin Franklin. Of a knowledge of the peace negotiations, however, Mr. Bodley appears to be innocent. His volume may afford entertainment to the uncritical; to the student it has nothing to offer.

C. W. ALVORD

Old Clothes

Fine Clothes to the Jew. By Langston Hughes. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

MR. HUGHES is right when he reprimands Mr. Schuyler in The Nation for denying the necessity for a Negro expression. Such expression is not only unavoidable, but it is also most desirable for both America and the Negro. The original American from Europe has done nothing with his heritage and is certainly now too distant from it to convert it to contemporary uses. Whatever hope there is for an American art lies with the minor races. To urge a cultural assimilation of the Negro is to urge the Negro to lose his singular identity and to enter into something only nominal. For him to become an American is for him to toss away a unified character for something unestablished and as yet unattractive. For what shall he exchange his native systemic heritage; for contradictions unfused?

The Negro is conscious of his singular identity. But as yet there are few among his artists equipped to meet this consciousness of identity with a consciousness of its material. The Negro artists divide themselves into those who have capitalized the fact of color without paying for it by the study of its essence and peculiarity, those who recognize the need for a separate expression of a racial material but whose aesthetic apprehension or control is not adequate, and those who attack the essential material for what it can yield under aesthetic suasion. It is evident that an artist is great in proportion as he approaches the third category. Of the Negro poets only Jean Toomer has entered it with both feet. Langston Hughes is as yet on the threshold of the second category, and there is no visible progress in his present book beyond "The Weary Blues" to reveal that he has become sensible of his poetic problem, which is to convert the material.

Whatever value as poetry the Negro spirituals or blues may have, duplicate spirituals or blues have only duplicate values. In the conformation of the inherent qualities of these indigenous songs to an original personal intelligence or intuition lies the poetic performance. And Mr. Hughes has not made the material so conform. One critic has attributed to his work "force, passion, directness, and sensitive perception." The "force" is the material's, not the poet's. It remains literal, unconverted. The "passion" is not great enough to convert the attitudes of his verse (attitudes simply rewritten from the material) into integrated experiences or even effective quasi-experiences. "Directness" in itself is of no importance; it can intensify or sharpen initial power or give precision to inventiveness. His "perception" is not sensitive, for what he sees it takes only eyes to see. He reads what is written, no great feat; he hears well, that is, his receptive pitch is accurate. But what of the final instrument of poetry that recreates the sensations in terms of a personal idiom? He is apparently unaware of even its existence.

Mr. Hughes has been called an interpreter of certain of his race. Perhaps. I see nothing in his verses to convince me of their experiential authenticity. But interpretations are only reutterances at best. Not even a translation creates the new utterance which is a poem. I find in the work of Langston Hughes the recording of certain Negro songs. I have no doubt it is as good a record as we own, for he has here and there done a little rewriting. But beyond that he has made no individual contribution. HARRY ALAN POTAMKIN

Party Campaign Funds. By James K. Pollock, Jr. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

Mr. Pollock wrote, of course, before the investigations of the Reed "slush fund" committee showed how lavishly the Republicans of Pennsylvania and Illinois spent money in their Senatorial primaries last spring, but since the data which he uses, and which it must have cost him much labor to collect, relate mainly to the years since 1912, what he has to offer bears closely upon a present situation with which Congress may bestir itself to deal. As a concise survey of federal and State laws relating to campaign funds, and a record of party expenditures in recent campaigns, the book easily supersedes all others in its field. Mr. Pollock does not go to extremes in criticizing the system or suggesting further checks and balances. The size of a campaign fund, as he rightly points out, is not the most important matter: what needs attention is the source of the fund and the uses to which it is put. Neither federal nor State laws, the latter the only ones that are concerned with primaries, insure satisfactory publicity, and the laws themselves appear to be extensively violated or ignored. Beyond a more effective publicity and a better system of accounting lies the need of "more statesmanship and less partisanship," which is the same thing as saying that we cannot expect to get rid of the evils of money in elections until we develop a higher order of citizenship and insist upon knowing fully who supplies the cash and who gets it when it is spent. The book is heartily to be commended.

Minutes of the Albany Committee of Correspondence, 1775-1778. Vol. II: Minutes of the Schenectady Committee. Prepared for Publication by the Division of Archives and History. Albany: The University of the State of New York.

The records of the Schenectady district of what, at the time of the Revolution, was Albany County are the only minutes of the various district Committees of Correspondence in New York that appear to have survived. Of these there remain three fragments, covering somewhat more than half of the period from May, 1775, to August, 1779, and with their publication, which has been carried out with textual literalness under the direction of Dr. Alexander C. Flick, State Historian, the documents have at last been made available for students. The labors of the Schenectady committee appear to have been quite as multifarious and important as those of the Albany body, and historians and antiquarians will find much to interest them in the proceedings of an organization which, in addition to incessant labors in enforcing loyalty and helping on the war, thought it well to order physicians "and others" to desist from inoculation of the small pox," urged magistrates to avoid wasting powder by firing salutes at New Year's, bound its members by oath "not to discover their proceedings in regard to disaffected persons" in order that "it shall always appear as if this committee are unanimous in opinion about such matters," ordered the arrest of Negroes "that may be found to run on the streets after ten o'clock," heard witnesses who swore "on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God," and fined tardy members "the price of one bowl of toddy" for their neglect. There is a consolidated index to the two volumes.

The Giant of Oldborne. By John Owen. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

Judged by this one book, John Owen deserves to be better known in America. He writes a clear, simple prose, poetical without affectation, and has a delicate insight into the souls of his characters. Daniel Windmill, the giant, is a sensitive boy, cursed with a long, gangling, weak body and an intense capacity for joy and suffering. His story, which could lend itself so easily to bathos, is told with taste and distinction, and a very moving sympathy.

The Best Plays of 1925-26. Edited by Burns Mantle. Dodd, Mead and Company. $3.

The seventh annual issue of Mr. Mantle's well-known and invaluable compilation. Besides the condensed versions of the ten "best plays" there is the cast of every play presented in New York during the season.

The Best Short Stories of 1926. Edited by Edward J. O'Brien. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.50.

This is one of Mr. O'Brien's lean years; his selection of the "twenty best" may be representative, but it is not exciting. The value of his annual as such is, of course, undiminished.

Music

New Wine in Old and New Bottles

IT is pleasant in this year of solemn ritual to have an occasional ballet come along to remind us that we cannot always believe what we hear. Casella's "La Giara," for instance, when first presented last year by the Philharmonic as an orchestral suite, seemed fairly modern. It had, it is true, some of that old-fashioned emotional substance which comes from the blood rather than from the brain, due perhaps to the hot, rhythmic little folk tunes which strewed the score. At the same time, however, there were enough of those lemon-edged dissonances which have marked the various "periods" of Casella's progress to stamp the score with the seal of his present modernistic tendencies. How astonishing then to find this modernism denatured, as it were, by choreographic interpretation when the Metropolitan presented this work in its entirety as its last novelty of the season! The story, one must admit, does not lend itself to much subtilizing. An old and valuable jar belonging to Don Lollo, a rich farmer, is broken during a merry-making by the peasants. To make matters worse, the real culprit is no other than the accepted suitor of Don Lollo's pretty daughter. All are in terror of the farmer's whip when someone has the happy thought of fetching an old hunchbacked journeyman who has just passed that way boasting that he can mend anything. He now declares he can make the jar like new, but to do so must do it from the inside. He keeps his promise, only to find that he cannot get out again on account of his hump; whereupon the Don, to the horror of all, kicks the jar with its human contents down the hill. Fortunately, the old man lands on a load of hay. The peasants bring him back in triumph; and as the Don, realizing his deed, has fled from the house, there is general rejoicing. As Miss Galli conceived the miming, there were pretty sentimentalities between the lovers and hearty, vigorous whirling among the peasants. Even the setting had the good old rural operatic atmosphere of twenty-five years ago. There were the little stone house with its coquettish shutters, the garden for the lovers, and the sward for the villagers to dance. And in these familiar surroundings and sentimentalities all the discords and angles of modernism dissolved into a nice, jolly ballet, so innocent of futuristic leanings that the Metropolitan's corps of dancers seemed perfectly at home in its demands. If the composer had any other intentions they remained a secret with the conductor, Tullio Serafin.

And now comes Adolph Bolm doing modern ballets also, only for the League of Composers, and making modern music seem new by infusing into it the emotions we read about in the program notes but seldom hear. "The Tragedy of the 'Cello," for instance, by the young Polish modernist, Alexandre Tansman, might have seemed somewhat stale and banal if heard only as music. Even so, the tale itself is slender: the Violin and the 'Cello are rivals for the love of the Flute. They fight a duel, the 'Cello is killed, and the Violin and Flute, united in matrimony by the Diapason, take up their new home in the case of the late 'Cello. Pointed with a mockery by Mr. Bolm and his company, that is carried out in both costume and setting by Nicholas Remisoff—late of the Chauve-Souris—the music catches the satirical slant of both miming and décor, and, with it, a raison d'être. Again, in the Chinese ballet, "The Rivals," which Mr. Bolm built on a Chinese legend of the sixth century, and Henry Eichheim on a Chinese ceremonial theme of the seventh, the score takes on, through the illusion of the stage, an authenticity that neither the Chinese theme nor the Chinese instruments which Mr. Eichheim utilized could in themselves have imparted. On the other hand, the "visualization" of three preludes by Scriabin—Désire, Enigme, Caresse Dansée—was not so successful, because the music itself is so definite in its suggestion that carrying the suggestion farther merely renders it literal.

In spite of this, Mr. Bolm and his company taught us the valuable lesson that music written for the ballet is dated largely by the manner of its stage presentation. Tansman's score, for instance, written in 1924, seems even newer for Mr. Bolm's interpretation of it; while Casella's, written even later and in an equally modern idiom, might have been, like the Metropolitan's version and stage directing generally, of twenty-five years ago. The eye does indeed play strange tricks upon the ear!

HENRIETTA STRAUS

Drama

Clemence Dane Discourses

AT the center of Miss Clemence Dane's imperfect but absorbing drama "Mariners" (Plymouth Theater) lies one of those situations of compelling force which have the power of fixing the attention of the spectator and which require no commentary. A ghastly though daylight horror grips the imagination, and though the author allows herself to be seduced by certain discursive tendencies, the dramatic power of her situation triumphs over the somewhat hesitant treatment which she gives it. She seems for a time unable to get to the point and, once she has got to it, she hurries away as fast as possible in another direction, yet for all the fumbling involved in this procedure the high moments of her play remain memorable.

In the all too brief glimpse which the second act gives us of the disordered household of a middle-aged minister who has allowed himself to be married to a Cambridge bar-maid, we have drama in something like its starkest and purest form. Everything about the characters and their situation—the love which brought them together, the impotent, raging tantrums which express the wife's baffled realization of her own unfitness, and the minister's patient resignation to the irreparable ruin into which he has been precipitated—is at once understandable and hopeless. No judgment and no remedy is possible. The fact, completely comprehensible and completely ineluctable, exists, and it grips the imagination as all facts must grip it which are powerful not because they are regarded from any particular point of view but because they are powerful in themselves. The situation needs no elucidation or commentary; there is no explanation that can be offered and no conclusion that can be drawn half so impressive as it is in itself. No use to which it can be put, no point which it can be employed to prove but is insignificant by comparison.

Such situations, requiring only that they be realized, are rare indeed, and in default of them we fall back upon deduction and theories. We construct plays which are interesting because they illustrate this or because they prove that; but when we are presented with one so significant in itself, we resent the essential levity involved in attempting to do more than to state it with clarity and succinctness. Yet Miss Dane, though she shows more than once that she has the power to realize the situation, is nevertheless unwilling to trust its inherent strength and has insisted upon using it for a purpose which seems by comparison infinitely trivial. She has constructed a subsidiary plot which deals with the doubts of a young flapper who has engaged herself to a post-war wastrel and who concludes from the spectacle of the minister's tragedy that love after all is worth the cost. She even goes so far as to ask us to concern ourselves with a happy ending which provides "another chance" for the wastrel in spite of the fact that the magnitude and the passions of her tragic characters dwarf her little heroine into absolute insignificance and make her and her pale affairs a frivolous intrusion. Nobody cares what lesson the girl draws from the drama she has witnessed, nobody cares what conclusions may be drawn by this moralist or that from the fact embodied in the central situation. To use that situation to set a flapper right in her philosophy of love is a mere impertinence.

Yet it is for such unimportant affairs that Miss Dane abandons the powerful story which she has not completely told; after giving her auditors a glimpse of great and terrible passions she expects them to be content with a commonplace moral and commonplace people. Doubtless she supposed that she needed to give her drama a meaning, but the fact which this play so clearly demonstrates nevertheless remains: A passion is, dramatically at least, more interesting than an idea and a fact more impressive than a moral. The story of this minister and his bar-maid should have stood alone. It is most powerful when it is not explained, most meaningful in its meaninglessness.

The production afforded by the Actors' Theater is an admirable one, Arthur Wonter being particularly impressive as the minister and Pauline Lord finding in the role of his wife a part almost exactly suited to her talents. Miss Lord is, perhaps, not so fine an actress as she was at first supposed, but she is at least an absorbing person with a pathos of her own which she lends to the characters whom she portrays. "The Crown Prince" (Forrest Theater) is an interesting if somewhat conventional romantic tragedy with all the dramatis personae taken from the "Almanach de Gotha." Mary Ellis is the royal mistress and Basil Sydney the prince who kills himself for love. "The Willow Tree" has been transformed into a pleasing if not very exciting libretto for a gorgeous operetta called "Cherry Blossoms" (Forty-fourth Street Theater).

The International Settlement of Shanghai

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

SHANGHAI, like Topsy, "just growed." The separate administration of the "International," the French, and the two native cities is a product of circumstance and habit rather than of forethought or of treaty. The "rights" which the foreign troops are defending today have been acquired by use, not by negotiation. In peace times you walk or ride in your ricksha from the native city to the International Settlement, and from the International Settlement to the French Settlement, and from the French to the other native city without knowing where the boundary-line lies. It all seems like one great city. Only your ricksha-coolie, who has to pay for a separate license in each administration, knows the difference.

Today the "International Settlement" is governed by a municipal council elected by the foreign taxpayers. It is a city with a population of 850,000, about 97 per cent of which is Chinese. The Chinese pay 80 per cent of the taxes, but cannot vote or even enter the public parks maintained by taxes. The Municipal Council consists of nine members, of whom custom decrees that six shall be British, two American, and one Japanese. The chairman is an American, Stirling Fessenden of Maine; but the real executive is English, the Commissioner General, Major Hilton Johnson. The council is theoretically responsible to the Consular Body, but in fact acts independently. Since the 1925 disorders the council has offered three seats to Chinese, but the Chinese Ratepayers' Association refused the offer, demanding equal representation. More radical Chinese demand proportional representation, which would mean Chinese rule.

The French Settlement is ruled by the French Consul General. A municipal council elected by the foreign taxpayers, with merely advisory powers, functioned until the recent crisis, when the consul dissolved it, substituting an executive committee one-half foreign and one-half Chinese. The French Settlement lies adjacent to the International Settlement, and, like it, has an excellent waterfront. Its population is smaller than that of the International Settlement, but has about the same proportion of Chinese.

North of the International Settlement is the native district of Chapei, which includes many large factories and a considerable modern residential district. South of the French Settlement is the district of Nantao, including the old Native City. Both districts have nominally elected municipal councils, really appointed by the local gentry and business men, subject to the provincial civil or military authorities; in 1926 their administration was merged. Their population has been estimated at half a million.

After the First Opium War, by the Treaty of Nanking (1842) the British obtained the right to reside in five Chinese cities, including Shanghai. The supplementary treaty of 1843 provided that the grounds and houses, and the rents or prices for them, should be equitably arranged at the prevailing rates; and that such premises should be set apart by the local Chinese officials in consultation with the British Consul. Other Powers acquired equal rights by subsequent treaties. But the provisions for the government of the foreign settlements of Shanghai were not made by treaty, but by local "Land Regulations" drawn up by the foreigners and sometimes, but not always, approved by Chinese officials. Nor is it true, as is often said, that the foreign settlements of Shanghai were built upon an unoccupied swamp, for the early records are full of disputes arising from the unwillingness of the Chinese inhabitants to part with their land. When land finally was obtained, it was in the form of leases in perpetuity subject to an annual payment of land tax, called "rent."

The original Land Regulations, drawn up by the British Consul in 1845, and approved by the Chinese taotai, made no definite provision for municipal government. Article XXII provided that "The interpretation of the regulations, their correction if necessary, and any additions to them should be the duty of the local authorities [Chinese and foreign] in communication together." These regulations gave the British Consul general powers over the foreign residents; he even claimed the right to forbid an American to raise the Stars and Stripes within the settlement. The Americans acquired territory for a separate settlement in 1848, as the French did in 1849, but the Americans continued to live in the British settlement, and in 1852 forced the Chinese to admit that according to the treaties they had equal rights to hold land in it. The perils of the Taiping Rebellion, however, brought the foreigners together, and in 1854 a new set of regulations was drawn up, the American, British, and French consuls approving. No Chinese authorities were consulted regarding this redraft. The 1854 regulations provided for a joint elected municipal council for the three settlements; unlike the 1845 regulations, they permitted Chinese to reside within the foreign district. This was largely due to the fact that the Taiping Rebellion, then raging, brought to the settlement hordes of Chinese refugees, who were willing to pay enormously for the privilege of living under foreign protection. The foreign Shanghai realtors made huge profits, housing them in dangerous tenements. The Consular Body more than once instructed the Municipal Council to dispose of these shabby structures, but the realtors refused. Finally the consular authorities, in agreement with the impotent taotai, drew up further regulations requiring natives to obtain a license from the foreigners before buying, renting, or building land or houses in the foreign settlement. Such natives were taxed equally with the foreigners but given no representation in the municipal government.

Repeatedly these 1854 regulations state specifically that the Chinese have sovereign rights to the land within the settlement; the Chinese Government was to receive a small annual tax, and deeds were to be sealed by the Chinese authorities. But the sense of independence was growing; in 1862 an independent Free State of Shanghai, under the protection of the four Great Powers, was proposed, and the British Consul refused to permit the Chinese to tax their own subjects within the settlement. The London Government, however, took a different position, declaring that:

> The lands situated within the limits of the British Settlement are without doubt Chinese territory, and it cannot reasonably be held that the mere fact of a residence within those limits exempts Chinese subjects from fulfilling their natural obligations.

The local British, however, have had their way from that day to this, despite treaties, home governments, or reason.

France formally withdrew from the International Settlement in 1862 and set up her own jurisdiction; in 1863 the Americans formally and finally merged their settlement with the British. The American Minister proposed in 1864 revising the constitution of the settlement, under a charter from the national Chinese Government, suggesting that the local authorities should levy only municipal taxes, and that Chinese taxpayers should be represented on the council. To this the Shanghai foreigners objected, fearing domination by the Chinese, significantly suggesting that as a safeguard to life and property the "spirit rather than the exact words of the treaties should be adhered to when necessary."

The land laws were again revised in 1866, without consultation with any Chinese authority, and in 1869 the foreign ministers approved the revision. In 1882 came another revision. Chinese participation in the government was again suggested in that year, but the British insisted on its omission. The 1882 revision gave the Shanghai municipality greater independence of the consular and diplomatic authorities, fuller police and tax powers, and the right to compel surrender of land for roads. This constitution, which virtually made the International Settlement an independent nation by itself, was not approved by the Diplomatic Corps until 1898 (and then with some modifications), and has never been submitted to the Chinese. Clause XXVIII of these regulations, still current, reads:

> Hereafter should any corrections be requisite in these regulations, or should it be necessary to determine on further rules, or should doubts arise as to the construction of, or powers conferred thereby, the same must be consulted upon and settled by the foreign consuls and local Chinese authorities, subject to confirmation by the foreign representatives and Supreme Chinese Government at Peking.

Meanwhile certain theories as to the powers of the settlements, which are today of vast significance, had grown up. The settlements have claimed the right to regard themselves as neutral territory in civil or even international wars to which China was a party, to refuse to permit belligerent troops within their borders except with special foreign permission, to give asylum to political refugees, and to bar or expel Chinese whom they dislike. These seem to be mere assumptions of power. Westel W. Willoughby, professor of political science at the Johns Hopkins University, says in his monumental "Foreign Rights and Interests in China":

> As a matter of treaty right it is difficult and perhaps impossible to sustain this claim of the settlements and concessions of the right to grant asylum, or, indeed, to demand that their areas remain free from all belligerent opinions in times of civil war, but what lack there is of legal or treaty right has been largely supplied by custom acquiesced in by the Chinese authorities. . . . There remains, of course, the more fundamental or theoretical question as to whether derogations of sovereign or territorial rights can be validated by other than specific and explicit consent upon the part of the Power whose rights are diminished.

The British Consul, indeed, said at the meeting which inaugurated the Shanghai municipality on July 11, 1854:

> Neither Great Britain, nor the United States, nor France, has undertaken by treaty to protect their subjects ashore in Chinese territory, nor could they, by treaty, legally do so without the consent of the Chinese Government.

But the British, French, and Americans shortly thereafter did land troops to defend the settlement, and time and custom have led to the conviction that they have that and the other rights they have assumed, despite the protests of the Chinese and the lack of treaty authorization.

It should be added that the present limits of the International and French settlements reach far beyond those originally drawn. This process of enlargement has been rather informal. The municipal councils privately bought land for roads outside the settlements and then built roads and cross-roads; foreigners built houses along these roads; foreign police, without agreement, were sent to patrol these roads; water mains, street lights, pavement, telephone systems were extended, and eventually the new territories were officially included. The last such extension was in 1898. But in 1913 the Municipal Council, authorized by the Consular Body, sent its police to clear a revolutionary army from the northern suburb of Chapei, on the ground that its operations had "disturbed" trade; and the barbed-wire entanglements, where the combined foreign armies mount guard in 1927, have been erected far beyond the boundaries of what, in any sense except that of immediate occupation, can be called foreign territory. To the foreigner in Shanghai, today as throughout eighty years of the foreign city's growth, foreign might is right, and nothing else counts.

I would not wish to a dog or to a snake, to the most low and misfortune creature of the earth—I would not wish to any of them what I have had to suffer for things that I am not guilty of. But my conviction is that I have suffered for things that I am guilty of. I am suffering because I am a radical, and indeed I am a radical; I have suffered because I was an Italian, and indeed I am an Italian; I have suffered more for my family and for my beloved than for myself; but I am so convinced to be right that you could execute me two times, and if I could be reborn two other times I would live again to do what I have done already.

THIS WAS THE ELOQUENT and moving and courageous close of Bartolomeo Vanzetti's address to Judge Webster Thayer of Massachusetts who sentenced him with his companion, Sacco, to death. The judge is reported not to have lifted his eyes once to receive the blows that Vanzetti dealt him; if Sacco and Vanzetti are electrocuted on July 10 Massachusetts justice should never again be able to lift its eyes. Whether these men are guilty or innocent is not the point at issue today; whether or not they had a fair trial in a Massachusetts court is the question. Hundreds of thousands of persons believe they did not. Governor Fuller will be recreant to decency, humanity, and justice if he permits "the passage of a current of electricity" through the bodies of these two men to stop forever the possibility of justice being done.

THE BORAH-BUTLER DEBATE in Boston attracted a great deal of attention in the newspapers and was even heralded as making the prohibition issue the foremost one in the coming Presidential election. To us it advanced and retarded nothing, and left the situation as it was. The views of these two gentlemen were as well known before the debate as after. Unfortunately for President Butler's position, as the conventions and the election come nearer the politicians are showing about as much affection for the prohibition issue as for the glowing end of a red-hot poker. As for Senator Borah's plea to uphold the Constitution, New York City Republican politicians are quoted as saying that he got the better of the argument. But they will be the last to take a genuine stand for law enforcement, or to see to it that the whole Constitution is really upheld. They will themselves continue to honor it in the breach while saying sanctimoniously that the sacred Constitution ought to be upheld at any cost. Wherein has the public profited? When, if ever, there is an overwhelming demand for the repeal of the amendment it will be repealed. There is nowhere today evidence of any such tidal wave of emotion outside of the sanctum of the president of Columbia University. The best result of the debate is that it led Senator Borah to declare that he was also in favor of enforcing the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. When he seriously attacks that task, how many thousands of public men who protest today their devotion to the Constitution will rise up to smite him!

THE EERIE MYSTERY of the "forged documents" which reached President Calles is still dark, but a few rays of light have picked out corners of the gloom. Someone in the office of the American military attaché in Mexico City stole a series of 275 genuine documents from the diplomatic files. Photostatic copies of these—perhaps the originals—together with what are said to be cleverly forged distortions of other documents were sold to the Mexican Secret Service and reached President Calles. The State Department has been conspicuously silent concerning the realities and the fakes; it acts as if it had been "caught with the goods." Among the real documents seized were plans for an invasion of Mexico—such plans, it is blushingly explained, as all military attachés collect; among the fakes, it is said, was a note to our ambassador saying that while Congress was too hostile to make intervention possible, the prohibition of export of arms to revolutionaries could be lifted without Congressional sanction. That doesn't sound like a fake; a score of Washington newspapermen know that it is what Mr. Kellogg and Mr. Olds have been telling their cronies. When the stories first leaked out we believed that there had been forgeries as well as thefts; if the State Department continues its mysterious mumness we shall begin to wonder whether the documents that so excited President Calles were not genuine after all.

JOHN E. WILLIAMS, the one American who lost his life at Nanking, was known to his friends as a stalwart friend of the Chinese people, whom he had served for half his life. We printed last week the statement of another American, who had visited Nanking since its tragedy, that Dr. Williams was killed after drawing his own pistol. Mr. Kennedy's report, based on statements made to him by student eye-witnesses, obviously disturbed the State Department, then planning its protest against the Nanking attacks. It cabled to the United States Consul General at Shanghai, and received this reply:

> The Americans were wholly unarmed and no resistance was made by them whatever. While one of the soldiers was taking a watch from him Dr. Williams, without resisting or touching either the soldier or the watch, stated that the watch belonged to his mother and that the soldiers would not want it. At this point another of the soldiers shot Dr. Williams, and killed him. Two other soldiers looted his dead body. They then walked away unconcernedly.

Earlier reports attributed to Dr. A. J. Bowen, president of Nanking University, who was with Williams, give still another story:

> The soldiers stopped us and demanded our valuables, which we handed over. Dr. Williams, who was a noted Chinese scholar and spoke the language like a native, then stepped up and addressed one of the soldiers and protested at the action. The soldier immediately shot Dr. Williams through the temple, killing him instantly, after which he robbed him, taking everything of value, even stripping the clothing from his body.

THESE ARE AMONG A DOZEN CONFLICTS of testimony as to what happened at Nanking. We do not yet know how many Chinese were killed by the Anglo-American bombardment, and even the State Department has not dared deny Mr. Kennedy's statement that thirty Chinese homes were destroyed. Mr. Kennedy obtained his information on the spot, in Nanking. He may have been wrong; the State Department's Shanghai informants also may have been in error. The only way to settle the question of fact would be by a neutral investigation in Nanking. We should like to see an inquiry as to the responsibility for both foreign and Chinese deaths in Nanking conducted by disinterested parties, including other Asiatics—say by a joint French and Turkish committee. Certainly to base an ultimatum solely on the statements of excited Americans and other imperiled foreigners, without inviting Chinese to participate in the investigation, is to behave as the Austrians behaved after Serajevo in 1914. It is to follow a criminally partisan policy of war.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE gave a complete catalogue of reasons for vetoing the Philippine bill for a plebiscite on the question of Philippine independence. He was against it because it would mean nothing and because it would mean too much, because it would feed agitation. But most of all, he was against it because he is against Philippine independence. The bulk of his long veto message was a lecture on the economic advantages of remaining part of the United States. That strayed a long way from the initial question: Should the Filipinos be permitted to vote whether or not they want independence now? Mr. Coolidge obviously thinks Filipino desires of small importance; if the Filipinos want independence they ought not to, and he does not intend to let them have it—or even to say that they want it. That is a dangerous position for the President of the United States to take at a moment when all Asia is throbbing with new hopes and dreams.

THE FILIPINOS WOULD LOSE by severing their ties with the United States, the President says. They would have to pay for their own defense; their bonds would require higher interest rates, and their products would have to pay tariff duties on entering the United States. Since 70 per cent of their exports go to the United States, he says, this would be ruinous. He forgets to say that it has been the deliberate policy of the United States to tie the islands to us by a tariff net. Does he intend to grant them the eventual independence which Congress and a series of Presidents have promised them? If so, why does he not recommend a program of gradual lessening of the tariff bonds, so that the Philippines can prepare themselves for economic as well as political independence? The present tariff makes the islands every year more dependent on the United States; to argue that its operations make the Philippines unfit for independence is ironic cruelty.

THE PRACTICAL COLLAPSE of the disarmament preparatory commission of the League of Nations need surprise no one. It will be, however, a bad black eye to the League. That body is pledged by the Versailles Treaty to disarmament, as Count Bernstorff has so unpleasantly been reminding the preparatory commission. He has even gone so far as to say that if the other League members will not disarm the Germans will arm—which can hardly be expected to please the French. Of course, there will be no disarmament in Europe if the will to disarm is not there; if the nations continue to send to disarmament conferences the old-fashioned diplomats, and large delegations of generals and admirals—as does the United States—who will certainly never be eager to legislate their professions out of business. The deeper these officials get in considering each nation's factories, man- and woman-power, railways, inventions, waterpower, boundaries, commercial airships, coast lines, etc., the more hopelessly involved they become. What folly! The way to disarm is to disarm, to show courage, to take chances, not to try to match every French revolver or rifle against every British or Italian weapon. Far better reading is the news that thirteen conservative French deputies have introduced a bill calling for the abolition of battleships, and battle cruisers, and submarines. That has the right ring! And so has Louis Loucheur's interview, after a visit to Berlin, in which he declared that the French wish more than ever for a lasting reconciliation with the Germans and a permanent economic union between the two nations.

LIBERALS HAVE WON two by-elections in England. When Wedgwood Benn left the Liberal for the Labor Party he resigned his seat in the House of Commons. The Leith Laborites nominated for the place R. F. Wilson, a Left-winger who preached "confiscation." Benn, when a Liberal, had defeated Wilson by 5,319 votes; this time Wilson polled only 1,111 votes less than the successful Liberal candidate. That was hardly a thrilling Liberal victory. Haden Guest, who won the North Southwark seat for Labor in 1924, recently resigned from that party in protest against its opposition to sending troops to China. This time he stood as an Independent; the Tories put up no candidate against him; he fought the election on his Chinese policy—and came out a bad third. The Liberal won, with 7,334 votes; the new Labor candidate stood second, with 6,167; Haden Guest polled only 3,215. The Manchester Guardian hails this as a great victory for progressive Liberalism; the New Leader says it means rather that "anti-Socialist electors are turning from the Conservative to the Liberal Party."

THE PITIFUL DISPARITY between justice and the law has never been better illustrated than in the case of the State of New York vs. Francesco Caruso. Caruso's child lay dying with diphtheria; a doctor, summoned too late, injected antitoxin into his spine; the father, believing the needle's stab to have been the cause of his death, stabbed the doctor in turn. Now he has been convicted of murder in the first degree, and unless an appeal is successful or the Governor intervenes, he will die in the electric chair. "I am satisfied with the verdict," says the doctor's widow. "I believe justice has been done." Caruso, in jail, tortured by fear of what will become of his wife and his four other children after he dies, says despairingly: "Doctor give Joey medicine and Joey die. I get crazy, kill doctor, and scare everybody. Now people say, medicine no kill Joey. I hope they show me to read and write before they kill me. Maybe I understand more good if I see things on paper." The law in the case is plain: A murder, not in cold blood indeed, but nevertheless an innocent and unarmed man done to death in a most cruel and unexpected and unjustifiable manner. The state demands that the murderer pay for his crime with his life. This is as right as right can be. But what has it to do with justice? Does the law take into consideration a piteous ignorance, a mind crazed by grief, a primitive fear of science; does the law answer the question: How will society be served by the death of this murderer? Does the law concern itself with realities like poverty and ignorance and fear and grief? Rhetorical questions, these, to which the answers are too well known.

THE REDUCTIO AD ABSURDUM of literary censorship has been reached, and in Canada, too, just when the United States seemed the logical candidate for the prize. Hester Prynne is recipient of the censor's protective care, Hester Prynne of "The Scarlet Letter," who spent so many hours embroidering her sin upon her bosom. Hester, by grace of the Canadian censor, has now been made an honest woman; the Quebec Board of Moving Picture Censors have demanded a marriage somewhere in the picture, to legitimatize little Pearl, or else there can be no showing of the film. There is a rumor, not yet confirmed, that the story of the Woman Taken in Adultery is to be deleted from all Canadian Bibles. Meanwhile, one wonders what will become of the scarlet letter in "The Scarlet Letter." What will the "A" stand for now? Can it be that it will be the first letter of a word synonymous with "censor"?

THE TWO SENSATIONAL PLAYS—"The Virgin Man" and "Sex"—which found their way into court in New York have both been duly found obscene and the producers of both have been duly sentenced, the one by judges, the other after a trial by jury. Whatever else these events may prove they certainly demonstrate that there is no possible need for the establishment of a censorship when it is as easy as it was shown to be to obtain a conviction when occasion arises. It is, however, worthy of note that in the charge which Judge Donnellan gave to the trial jury in one case he laid particular stress upon the fact that the section of the penal code under which the defendants were indicted was intended "not to protect the morals of the mature and adult but of the young, the ignorant, and the sensually inclined," and one is moved to inquire if all art is to be judged, not according to the value which it may have for those to whom it is addressed but only by its possible effect upon the "young, ignorant, and sensually inclined"—if, that is to say, government is to be ordered always in the interest of the worst and least valuable element in the country. Meanwhile, Governor Smith has signed the theater padlock bill upon which we commented editorially two weeks ago. He expresses the pious hope that the Commissioner of Licenses will use discretion in applying it, but from our own observation we have scant faith in the virtue of laws which become monstrously unjust unless they are administered with discretion by those in whom arbitrary power is invested.

ALICE AND IRENE LEWISOHN have announced that the Neighborhood Playhouse will be closed at the end of the present season. For twelve years the Misses Lewisohn have been responsible for both the financial and artistic direction of the Grand Street organization, and in spite of the fact that many of its productions have received universal praise, its expenses have exceeded its receipts by more than half a million dollars. The theater itself is so small that even the tremendous popular success of such pieces as "The Dybbuk" has not made it possible to recoup the losses sustained on other productions, and the Misses Lewisohn have decided that whatever the social meaning of the experiment their work cannot continue in so small and remote a house. They refuse to say whether or not they plan to begin again upon a larger scale at some later time, but every one interested in the American theater will eagerly hope for a renewed effort. No single organization has contributed more to make the New York stage significant, and without them the New York theatrical season would lack no inconsiderable part of its interest and beauty.

WHAT'S THIS? A New York judge threatening to fine a woman ten dollars for contempt of court in that she powdered her face and used her lipstick in his august presence? Surely this is judicial intolerance and old-fogyism carried to the limit. Where does this wearer of the ermine live? Not in New York City surely, else he would see women powdering their noses in subways, in elevators, in the theaters, at table in the restaurants, on the streets—all over, in short. The secrets of the toilet are everywhere as openly revealed as are the flappers' knees. Does not the judge realize that customs change? It is not merely that youth is having its fling and desires self-expression in cosmetics as well as other things at its own time and its own place; even the mothers and grandmothers use their powder puffs indiscriminately. Who shall cry bad taste and worse manners in the face of this new and truth-telling frankness? Manners have been outgrown, and so has concealment of the method of creating blush or pallor. Why not turn the tables on the judge by getting a permanent injunction from one of his brethren of the bench to keep him from interfering with the right of any citizen to beautify himself or herself in the courtroom or anywhere else.

The Silence of Governor Smith

WHEN Governor Smith informed the State of New York after his election that he would not lift a finger to win a delegate for his own nomination to the Presidency or personally enter the field as an active contender, he stored up trouble for himself because it was interpreted as meaning that he would remain silent on national issues. The spirit of his utterance was excellent, and it is of course essential that he, although an avowed candidate for the Presidency, should continue to devote himself to the duties of his present office as did Grover Cleveland prior to his election to the Presidency. But this self-denying ordinance which the Governor passed ought not to be taken by him and his advisers as binding him not to express himself on public issues or to take cognizance of questions which may be asked of him between now and the national conventions. We are only a few weeks from the beginning of the Presidential primaries; in some of the States a candidate to be considered must file petitions and state his intentions. If Governor Smith or his friends intend to exercise the right to do this, he should make unequivocal statements as to his position on the problems of the day.

The issue has been forced by the publication in the Atlantic Monthly of Charles C. Marshall's article demanding that the Governor answer whether, if elected, he will be the President of the United States independently of Rome. Mr. Marshall cites papal encyclicals, in which the Church of Rome seems to demand of Catholics who govern temporal states that they shall yield authority to the Pope. According to America Mr. Marshall's citations are erroneous, that Jesuit weekly declaring that at least one of them is falsified, that others are not fully quoted, or are torn from their fair context. By multitudes of Protestants we suppose Governor Smith's reply will be awaited with profoundest interest. We, however, cannot get up the slightest excitement over the papal quotations. Catholics have an easy way of adjusting themselves to the realities. "Al" Smith has been Governor of New York now for more than six years. If anyone can point to an act of his which was dictated by the hierarchy or the Pope we shall be interested to hear of it. His bitterest Republican enemy has not charged that the Governor has been under priestly control during his residence at Albany. Clear up the issue he will. His reply has already reached the Atlantic; it will, we hope, not be limited to echoing what America says about the accuracy of Mr. Marshall's quotation. It should be unequivocal and frank. But whatever the form of his answer, we have no fear that if elected Governor Smith will violate his oath of office to oblige the Pope in Rome.

What we are interested in is the Governor's position on the issues of the day. We know how he stands on water-power and conservation, on home rule and state ownership of natural resources, on education, child welfare, corrupt practices, housing, and a few labor issues. But there are other questions. If Governor Smith is to have the support of the Progressives, of whom 467,293 cast their votes for Senator La Follette in New York State in 1924, while 109,028 similarly voted for the Wisconsin Senator in New Jersey, he must let them know what position he will take on outstanding national and particularly foreign issues. There is Mexico. Not only is the Catholic issue involved here, but a very deep and far-reaching issue of Americanism in its best sense. We cannot say now whether a Progressive ticket will or will not be placed in the field in 1928, but if there is any doubt as to Governor Smith's attitude toward the policies of Messrs. Kellogg and Coolidge in Nicaragua, Mexico, and China we venture to prophesy that strenuous efforts will be made to put a third ticket in the field. Progressives have learned that foreign policies are of enormous moment in their reactions upon domestic questions. If Governor Smith stands for imperialism abroad, for the policy of the "mailed fist" in the Caribbean, which eventually means control and subjugation of Latin America by our Government in cahoots with the international bankers, Progressives will wish to have nothing to do with him. They will seek someone else to vote for.

Again, on the question of prohibition the voters are entitled to know just where he stands, and whether he believes that it should figure as an issue in the coming campaign and what, if he should be elected, he proposes to do about it. We believe that this will prove his most difficult problem. It is our belief that the nearer we come to the convention the more the Democratic politicians will, like Senator Carter Glass, advise that the issue be left alone. Mr. Glass has just publicly told Governor Smith that the Presidency has nothing to do with prohibition. Senator Edwards of New Jersey, who has just come out for the nomination of Governor Smith, is one of our greatest Wets, but we notice that in his interview he did not once mention the liquor question. He declared that Republican and Democratic leaders both are convinced that Governor Smith has caught the imagination of the people and that even in the South the cry of Catholicism is waning as time passes and people realize that the Americanism of so tried and true a public servant as Governor Smith would be bound to rise above any religious tenets. Senator Edwards had much to say about the faults of the Republican Party and President Coolidge's third-term candidacy, but he did not find it timely or tactful to mention prohibition.

Indubitably Governor Smith is riding on the crest of the wave. Every day more politicians come out for him and the opposition fades. But he has a long way yet to go. The American people want to know a lot more about his plans and his program. They want to know whether he stands for the Wilson policies abroad or not; whether he is really for or against the League of Nations; whether he believes in sending marines all over the globe. They want to know his attitude on the debts owed us by foreign nations, and whether he is as ready for government ownership of railroads as he has been for State ownership of water-powers and forests and canals and canal terminals and State control of the milk supply of the State of New York. If Governor Smith wishes to give his candidacy an impetus which cannot be blocked he will define his position as unequivocally as did Grover Cleveland, the last man who went direct from Albany to the White House. If to the glamor which now attends his name as one who has come up from the sidewalks in true American fashion he can add a reputation for courage and forthrightness on national issues, he will pretty nearly have won his nomination.

Whose War in China?

ONE hundred and seventy-two fighting ships, flying the flags of eight non-Chinese nations, besides thirty or forty colliers, tugs, and transports, are now riding in Chinese waters. Forty-five of them are at Shanghai, forty-six are patrolling the Yangtze, and the rest are stationed up and down the China coast. America has three admirals on duty in China, Great Britain three, France one, and Japan one.

If anyone still thought that this enormous naval concentration was intended simply and solely to protect the lives and property of foreigners in China he must have been sorely puzzled by the events of April 6 and 7, when the Dutch dean of the Diplomatic Corps in Peking, after consultation with the British and American ministers, gave Chang Tso-lin permission to violate the Boxer Protocol and enter the Legation Quarter in order to sack a portion of the Russian Legation; the French authorities permitted Chinese police to enter the French Concession in Tientsin in order to raid the Russian consulate there; and the British and Americans on the Municipal Council of Shanghai posted about the Russian Consulate White Russian guards, who searched every person going in or coming out, including Chinese civil officials. More, these Russians turn out to have been members of the Northern army who were taken into the International Settlement after their defeat and immediately incorporated in its police force! (It is not generally understood in this country that whole regiments of the anti-Nationalist armies in China are made up of half-starved "White" Russians.) This is something more than protection of foreign lives and property; it is a kind of concealed warfare.

"The belief grows among military and naval experts," Thomas F. Millard cables to the New York World from Shanghai, "that the sending of foreign troops to China is preliminary to the expected clash between Great Britain and Russia." It looks that way; it looks also as if Great Britain were utilizing the events in China to make the United States her ally in such a contest. "Why," Eugene Chen, the Nationalist Foreign Minister, asked the British Minister, "does Britain bring her quarrel with Russia into our country?" Why, indeed? And an American may well inquire why America, too, has to be dragged into Britain's struggle to maintain her dominance in Asia.

There are 35,000 foreign troops in Shanghai today—apart from the bluejackets on shipboard and 10,000 more are on the way; whereas the Chinese Nationalists have only 10,000 soldiers in all the Shanghai region!

There is something very strange in this situation; one might almost suspect a deliberate plan to build up a military concentration in Shanghai as a base for a real attack upon China. Why does the American Government at one and the same time urge the missionaries to evacuate their posts, and send more and more troops to protect them? Why does it inform the American people that it maintains its freedom of action, yet send its consul in company with the British consul to present identic notes protesting against the events at Nanking and demanding reparations, without waiting for a neutral investigation?

"American consular officials are using all their resources in an effort to persuade Washington to join in strong action with the other Powers," Mr. Millard states. (Incidentally, we urge our readers to follow his Monday cables to the World, for no other American cabling from China has half his insight or his common sense.) If the consular officials have, like the newspaper correspondents, succumbed to the hysteria of the fear-stricken foreign community in Shanghai, they should certainly be asked to follow the missionaries to places of safety where their sanity can be restored. "Strong action" at this moment would be a colossal disaster; it would mean that the White Powers deliberately set themselves against the struggle of a continental race for freedom.

Those are right who see in the Chinese drama a struggle between Russia and Britain. But in this struggle Britain stands as the representative not of industry but of empire, and Russia as the friend not of communism but of national freedom. The simultaneous attacks upon the Russian consulates, sponsored by the foreign Powers, were evidently part of a concerted effort to disgrace Russia with the Nationalists by embroiling her with the Northern Chinese. Russia refused to be trapped; she protested, of course, but made no threats. From this diplomatic intrigue America ought to hold aloof, sympathetic with Nationalist China and uninterested in defending the fortresses of empire. In the absence of positive direction we seem to be drifting along, a tail to Britain's kite.

The Business of Book-Making

THE London Nation and Athenaeum has recently launched a general discussion of the book trade, and the discussion is now meandering through its columns after the amiable if inconclusive British fashion which permits everybody to have his say either in a regular article or through the medium of the long letters signed "Pro Bono Publico" or "An old Eton Boy" and allows the subject to be gradually widened in a series of concentric circles until it includes the universe. In the beginning somebody suggested that all was not well with the publishers and Mr. Stanley Unwin replied with a volume which the Nation and Athenaeum quoted. Then somebody else had the temerity to assert that books are too dear, and Mr. J. M. Keynes instantly mobilized his battalions of statistics to show that they are not. Still another indicated advertising as the panacea, whereupon Mr. Leonard Woolf pointed out its dangers. Thus matters were left standing much where they were before, until at last somebody remembered to charge that after all the general public was to blame and, since the general public is nobody in particular, there was a general disposition to let it go at that.

Meanwhile the Oxford University Press continues to publish solid and sumptuous books at pretty solid and sumptuous prices, while Mudie's Library supplies popular fiction at such a small charge that the majority of English authors outside the Nat Gould class are coming to depend upon the returns from American sales supplemented by the whopping fees they receive from Mr. Feakins and his fellow lecture-impresarios.

In many respects America has much less to complain of, for book production and book sales have both bounded upward within a generation. Our free libraries, probably because they make no effort to supply every reader with the current book he wants at exactly the moment he wants it, have never interfered with book sales to the extent to which the popular subscription libraries of England have interfered with them there, and though we have no university press comparable to that of Oxford, the author who addresses a popular audience has a pretty fair chance of reaching it. Even though the writer whose field is scholarship or criticism still has a difficult time making a living, his struggle is less long and desperate than it has been at any time since he came to depend upon the public rather than the patron, and as for the writer who has the good fortune actually to catch the public fancy, his financial rewards are such that not only artists of the past but its Maecenases as well might envy him.

Yet it must be remembered that this prosperity which many publishers and many writers enjoy is part of the general American prosperity and does not indicate a relative improvement nearly as striking as a first sight might suggest. Authorship is still one of the least profitable professions—not to be compared, for example, with medicine or law—and book production is still quantitatively one of the least important and profitable industries. An ingenious advertising writer has recently been collecting statistics to show that there are two hundred times as many tobacco dealers as bookstores in America and that Americans spend seventeen or eighteen times more money for candy, ice cream, and soda water than they do for books. The prosperity of literature as a business is due, then, to the enormous size of the market, not to any amazing responsiveness in the public, and there is no reason to fear that we are becoming a nation of bibliomaniacs.

Doubtless the time will never come when people will spend money as freely for books as they do for soda water. Perhaps it is not even desirable that it ever should. But the fact remains that even in America, where the vast majority of people have a financial margin which makes the purchase of non-essentials possible, they spend comparatively little for books. They think twice or even thrice before buying a book; with nothing else does acquisition by purchase seem so desperate an expedient. Many a man who, as a matter of course, spends a hundred dollars a year for theater tickets and even attends the opera occasionally, considers himself a patron of literature if he has bought three books during the season.

Many explanations have been given for this anomaly, but we are inclined to think that books have always suffered from a certain air of virtue which is associated with their possession. They are not like clothes and food, absolutely necessary, but neither do they constitute the sort of dissipation that even theatergoing does. There is something so laudable about buying and reading them that one hesitates to put into them the money which one devotes to luxuries—it is too much like dropping it into the collection plate or doing something else equally virtuous, and therefore unexciting. If book-buying could only come to be regarded as a conspicuous and frivolous expenditure; if preachers would only denounce men impartially for wasting their money in road-houses, night clubs, and bookstores; if serious fathers would only have heart-to-heart talks with their daughters over the size of the spring-book bill from the Fifth Avenue shops, then more books would be bought. As it is, they have to struggle along as something which has its place in a dun, unexciting region between the necessities and the luxuries, something which the poor cannot buy and which does not make possible enough of a splurge to interest the rich.

Free Speech and the Legion

ONCE more the American Legion looms up as a menace to the liberties of this country; once more it has proved how completely the spirit of Prussianism which its members once set out to conquer has entered into their own minds and possessed them. The West Chester, Pennsylvania, post has now dared to lay down the law in Pennsylvania that there shall be no criticism of the Government or its policies in any institution which is maintained by public money in that State. As the first step, under the leadership of Major John A. Farrell, the West Chester legionnaires have brought about the dismissal of two professors from the State Normal School. A frightened trustee or two has declared that the school is being reorganized into a higher grade institution of college rank, and that the dismissals were merely in accordance with the reorganization. But the Legion post knows better. These teachers, it says, were guilty of what in its judgment is subversive teaching; they have encouraged a Liberal Club which has dared to criticize the policy of the government in Nicaragua and Mexico, and that has got to stop. Says Major Farrell: "They dug their own graves. They expressed defiance of the feelings of citizens who still believe in patriotism and that our country is not always wrong." Hence they had to go. The Legion swears it accomplished this; that it compelled the head of the school to yield.

The youthful Liberal Club responded as if it had imbibed the spirit of 1776. It held another meeting on April 10, in the home of one of the members, and listened to Robert T. Kerlin, one of the two men dropped. The other is John A. Kinneman. No one questions his competence as a teacher; nor does anyone doubt Mr. Kerlin's scholastic ability. Mr. Kinneman, besides being interested in the Liberal Club, voted and worked for the Democratic candidate for Senator, William B. Wilson, at the last gubernatorial election. He was marked for slaughter thereafter. He is a brilliant man of power and personality, of independent views, who dares to think for himself and make others think, and that kind of teacher is not wanted at West Chester. Professor Kerlin has been personally and favorably known to the editors of The Nation for some years. His chief offense is that he takes his religion and his patriotism seriously; being a good American, he declines to accept the new doctrine that the Administration temporarily in power in Washington is beyond criticism. Moreover, although Southern born and for years a teacher in a great Southern military school, he refuses to draw the color line.

Two years ago Professor Kerlin was nearly dismissed for having colored men in his home and inviting four colored teachers to sit with the faculty at a school meeting—the very line of conduct which ought to make him beloved in West Chester, once an anti-slavery stronghold. Now it is the home of the father of General Smedley Butler, whose aunt was one of the committee which ousted the professors. The prominence of the victims, the widespread publicity given to the cases, the protests of prominent citizens, a petition signed by virtually all the students, the revolt of the Liberal Club, the outspoken opposition of the West Chester newspaper, the Local News, and of the Willard Straight Post of the Legion in New York bid fair to make this a case about as famous as the Scopes trial. Is West Chester to become another Dayton?

Sacco-Vanzetti

By GEORGE W. KIRCHWEY

BRINGING Daniel Webster's panegyric down to date—Massachusetts! "There she is. Behold her and judge for yourselves. There is Boston and Concord and Lexington and Bunker Hill" and William Lloyd Garrison and the Sacco-Vanzetti case, "and there they will remain forever."

Massachusetts justice has spoken its last word in the fateful controversy over the rights and wrongs of the two obscure Italians whom it has lifted into fame and is now awaiting judgment on the performance. Meanwhile the word, like the shot fired at Concord bridge, has been heard round the world. But the judgment is not in the storm of indignation aroused by the refusal of the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth to reopen the case but in the still, small voice of reason and, as luck would have it, at the moment when we are called upon to form a reasoned judgment on the performance we are furnished with Professor Frankfurter's admirable critical review of the case from the beginning.*

The beginning goes back seven years to the arrest, May 5, 1920, of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti on the charge of having participated in a pay-roll robbery committed in South Braintree, Massachusetts, which resulted in the deliberate murder of two men who had the money in their possession. The robbery was a slick, workmanlike job of a gang of four or five men in a car, accomplished in a minute or less and followed by a clean get-away. What the murder gang left behind them was the dead bodies of the victims, a clear picture of the shooting by two unidentified men, and a blurred impression of the escaping car filled with foreign-looking men, probably Italians.

It was a combination of tragic accidents that brought Sacco and Vanzetti under suspicion of complicity in the Braintree job. The former, a "steady" shoe-worker in a Stoughton factory, and the latter a prosperous fish-peddler at Plymouth, were involved together in radical propaganda and it was in the effort to hide their compromising literature and warn their friends against the federal police that they found themselves caught in the net that had been spread for other fish. On the same day, three weeks after the commission of the crime, they were placed under arrest on a charge of murder. More than a year later, May 31, 1921, they were placed on trial at Dedham before Judge Webster Thayer and a jury.

Let it be said at once that no lawyer, sensitive to the honor and dignity of his profession, can read the record of that trial without shame. Habitually the real issue in the case—guilty or not guilty of murder—is swamped by testimony on wholly irrelevant issues, drawn out by the District Attorney, allowed and sometimes followed up by the court. At one time the defendants are being tried as draft dodgers; at another time for concealing and circulating radical literature; and again for not loving the United States as they should or for speaking disrespectfully of Harvard College. It was a bungling, ill-managed performance. One gets the impression that the only person on the place who knew what he was about was the District Attorney, Katzmann, who cunningly invoked against the luckless defendants all the fears and prejudices of the mob spirit that was rampant in the community from which the jury was drawn.

As a matter of law, the only issue in the case was the identity of the murderers, and the conviction of Sacco and Vanzetti rests technically on a mass of flimsy and discredited identification evidence, on speculative inferences from conduct alleged to show consciousness of guilt, and, finally and conclusively in the case of Sacco, on deliberately falsified testimony of a gun-expert to prove that a bullet found in the body of one of the murdered men was fired from the defendant's gun. This shameless imposture, which made Sacco's conviction all but inevitable and naturally carried with it that of Vanzetti, was made the basis of the first attempt to secure a retrial of the case. It is only charitable to assume that Judge Thayer's ingenious but contradictory handling of this piece of evidence, both at the trial and in his memorandum denying the motion for a new trial, was due to his inability to grasp the import of the facts submitted to him.

The case has now reached an impasse. The evidence directly bearing on the participation of the defendants in the crime was all in and had been considered and passed on by the jury. Who is to say that the jury was unduly influenced by the prejudicial testimony showing that the defendants were pacifists and draft-dodgers in time of war, enemies of the established order at all times? Certainly not Judge Thayer, who had cooperated with the District Attorney in thrusting this evidence upon the jury. Certainly not the Supreme Court, which would not think of questioning the discretion of the trial court. One wonders whether it was all as coldly automatic as this makes it out to be, or whether there was the fire of passion back of the dispassionate utterances of these Olympian minds. Possibly the whole hierarchy of judicial powers had something of the feeling of the foreman of the jury, who, when told by a friend that he did not believe Sacco and Vanzetti guilty, replied: "Damn them. They ought to hang anyway."

But now the case takes a new turn. Celestino Madeiros, a young Portuguese with a bad criminal record, held under a death sentence in the same prison with Sacco, sends the latter a note confessing to the South Braintree crime and declaring that neither Sacco nor Vanzetti had any part in it. Following the clue thus supplied the defense was able in a short time to secure a substantial body of evidence in the form of affidavits and corroborating circumstances tending strongly to show that the crime had been, as indeed it appeared at the time to be, a professional job and that it was committed by the notorious Morelli gang, which had induced Madeiros to take a hand in the enterprise. It was this newly discovered evidence that was made the basis of the latest application for a new trial for Sacco and Vanzetti.

Did they get it? The whole world knows now that they did not, and wonders. But to those who have followed the workings of the judicial mind in the preceding stages of the case there can have been little of surprise in the result. The Supreme Court, equally with Judge Thayer, had assumed a defensive attitude. "Athanasius contra mundum." The Commonwealth against Sacco and Vanzetti was no longer a mere law case to be dealt with on well-defined legal principles. It had become a cause: The Commonwealth against a world of Reds and Red-sympathizers; law and order against the forces of anarchy and disruption.

* "The Case of Sacco and Vanzetti." By Felix Frankfurter. Boston: Little, Brown and Company. $1.

But if justice has been betrayed in its own house, it still lives in the spirit of the people of Massachusetts. The swelling tide of public sentiment for justice through and beyond the law, which the Sacco-Vanzetti defense has called into being, is palpable evidence that the heart of the old Commonwealth is still sound. And, as for the pathetic Sacco and his brave comrade, let them live or die in peace. They have done their work. Plucked by the heavy hand of the law from their futile anarchist propaganda, they have become the prime agents in a better propaganda, that of making justice just in the country which, after their fashion, they loved.

Clarence Darrow

By DAVID E. LILIENTHAL

THE Attorney General of Tennessee was addressing the court and a battery of microphones in a sweltering courtroom in the town of Dayton. The burden of his remarks, in theory at least, concerned the validity of an unusual statute under which a freckle-faced young teacher was being tried. "Mr. Darrow," said the Attorney General with an expansive gesture, "is the greatest criminal lawyer in America today." He turned to an elderly, coatless, gallused man seated at the counsel's table, whose enormous head was tilted forward so that his jaw rested on his chest, his bulky shoulders hunched up, a long wisp of stringy hair fallen over one eye. "His courtesy is noticeable, his ability is known," the Attorney General continued genially. And then with a deep frown and a look of indignation he shouted: "Great God! the good that a man of his ability could have done if he had aligned himself with the forces of right, instead of aligning himself with that which strikes its poisonous fangs at the bosom of Christianity!"

Through a good many years people have been saying something of the sort about Clarence Darrow. His views on the labor movement, religion, prohibition, capital punishment, and so on have, for a generation and more, been rousing men to similar denunciations. But in spite of the unconventionality of his ideas, or perhaps because of them, he continues at seventy to hold public interest securely, and to add to the flavor and zest of life in the United States.

I

Clarence Darrow was born in the little Ohio village of Kinsman, April 18, 1857, and there he spent his boyhood. His father had studied for the Unitarian ministry and had been ordained as a minister. But before he could actually serve as a pastor the doubts concerning God and the universe, which were later to assail his son, became so strong that he withdrew from the ministry and established himself as a small furniture manufacturer in Kinsman.

The years Clarence Darrow spent under his father's roof left an unusually deep impression upon him. His mind constantly drifts back to those early days; his conversation and writing are rich with clear pictures of his boyhood. The best writing he ever did—in his novel "Farmington"—is nothing more than a philosophical reverie upon the life in Kinsman which seems still to hold so much for him.

The Darrow household was quite out of the ordinary. The father had a passion for books; every moment he could possibly spare from his little factory he spent reading. This love of books he taught his children, to whom he gave daily instruction, supplementing that received at the district school. Religion had no place in the Darrow home, although both parents came of a long line of Puritans. The elder Darrow had forsaken the cloth to become the village atheist, and the fiery pamphlets of Thomas Paine took the place of the family Bible. His political views were as radical to his neighbors as his religious ideas: he was an ardent Greenbacker and a follower of old Peter Cooper. As a young man in Pennsylvania he had known John Brown and had become an Abolitionist of the most fervid sort; his Ohio home was a station on the underground railroad. When the works of Darwin and Spencer and Huxley appeared, the old scholar read them eagerly, sometimes spending most of the night over them.

Darrow was once asked by a newspaper-feature writer: "To what do you attribute your success?" The reporter had been interviewing leading business men whose answer to this question was invariably: "I owe my success to hard work." "That goes for me, too," said Darrow. "Hard work, in fact, is responsible for my choosing to become a lawyer. When I was sixteen I hired out to a nearby farmer. I had never done any hard work before. The first day I pitched hay, and the sun was hot and I got very tired. The second day the farmer set me to knocking fat potato bugs off the plants into a pan of kerosene. By noon I was disgusted. I chucked away the pan and the job, and swore I'd never do another day of hard work in my life—and I never have."

Across the street from the Darrow home was a tinner who was justice of the peace as well. Here the boy listened to one pettifogger abuse another, and acquired a passion to outdo them. A blacksmith nearby, also a "J. P." and a one-horse lawyer, offered young Darrow the use of his books. Darrow explains that he "studied law with a blacksmith and began practice before a tinner." After he was admitted to the bar he began practice in the village of Andover, soon moving to Ashtabula. There he lived for six years, becoming city attorney. He came to Chicago in 1887, at the age of thirty. He was in most respects a typical young lawyer with no unusual economic notions, distinguished if at all only by a very serious attitude toward life and a remarkable faculty for debate and impromptu speaking. One night he seized an opportunity to address a meeting of Democrats in the old Central Music Hall, speaking on free trade. The speech was a sensation; the politicians recognized his ability to dramatize an issue, and he was straightway made an assistant corporation counsel, in charge of important cases. From this point of vantage he watched the political machinery of a city work—and his illusions about political democracy were forever dispelled so that, years later, he was to say: "It is the mediocre, the thimble-riggers, the cheap players to the crowd, the men who take the customs and thoughts of the common people, who weave them into song and oratory and feed them back to the crowd, who get their votes, and from them nothing ever did come and I fear nothing ever can."

He soon became acting corporation counsel and one of the most powerful men in the City Hall. The next step was logical; he joined the legal staff of the Northwestern Railroad. Meanwhile, as he rose rapidly in the conventional role of corporation lawyer, a host of doubts were perplexing him. The agitation for an eight-hour day had reached its climax in the explosion of a bomb at Haymarket Square and the death of several policemen. The city was in a tumult, and the blood of labor leaders was demanded—and given, after a mock trial. These events stirred Darrow. Himself tough-minded, practical, and ambitious, his sympathies were touched by the prospect of these dreamers calmly mounting the scaffold for the sake of their ideas. He decided to find out more about those ideas. Chicago was then a center for militant unionists and he sought out their meeting places. He marveled at the devotion of the group of rare spirits who then led the movement. The injustice of society and its implacable cruelty, especially to its dreamers, "the Prometheans who tried to carry candles for the world," oppressed him. The prospect of becoming a successful and wealthy railroad attorney gradually lost much of its seductiveness.

Then, in 1894, came the great strike of the American Railway Union against the Pullman Company, led by the late Eugene Debs. The strike soon became a fight to the finish between all the railroads, supported by federal troops and a federal judge's "blanket injunction," and the strikers. Debs was arrested and jailed for contempt of court. Darrow could no longer contain his resentment. With one stroke he cut himself off from all hope of a conventional success at the bar, and threw himself into the task of defending Debs.

For the next fifteen years Clarence Darrow was the country's outstanding defender of labor, at a time when labor was more militant and idealistic and employers more hardened and desperate than ever before or since. The cases he was called upon to defend were almost invariably criminal prosecutions in bitterly hostile communities. His success in persuading the most carefully "selected" jury to bring in acquittals was soon the talk of the country.

The wood-workers' conspiracy case, tried in 1898, is typical of these fights. The employees of a large lumber mill asked their employer, George M. Paine, a baronial old fellow, to make certain improvements in their working conditions. He refused to deal with them and a strike was called. Paine, who held title to the entire county government, obtained the indictment of the strikers' leader for "conspiracy"; a conviction was almost a matter of course. Darrow, for the defense, presented the case, not as an ordinary criminal prosecution, but as a part of a dramatic struggle of the poor against the rich and powerful, in which the humble jurymen found themselves suddenly in the camp of the "conspirators." It was too much for the jury; they voted an acquittal and went home to their suppers with a warm feeling of virtue.

The defense of indicted labor leaders—part of a bitter guerrilla warfare between the unions and the employers—occupied most of Darrow's time during the opening decade of the new century. It was in this work that the acute railroad lawyer, turned labor advocate, came to be known in every town and hamlet; everywhere dinky lawyers in one-horse towns began to affect white washties, baggy trousers, and the newspaper version of the Darrow jury manner. His most widely known cases included the Haywood trial at Boise, Idaho, where he was opposed by a young lawyer named William E. Borah; the McNamara dynamite case, and his victory in defense of himself at Los Angeles, on a trumped-up charge of bribery.

Some observers think that Darrow, at this time, conceived of himself as a great leader of the common man, and that he planned to use his tremendous hold upon the affections of the working class to play for the highest political stakes. There can be no doubt that a calculating and ambitious man, with the devotion of ten million men to draw upon, and the friendship of such leaders as Altgeld and Bryan, would have been scheming just such a rise to political power. But Darrow became a leader of labor not in obedience to a design but upon an impulse, and in spite of himself. The labor cause in the militant nineties appealed to his emotions, to a strong, almost irresistible sympathy for the under-dog. Here is the unifying element in a life which is otherwise almost incoherent. Bred of a sensitive imagination which gives him an uncanny and disturbing faculty for understanding the suffering of all unfortunates, it has plowed his face with care and put into his eyes the sadness of wisdom. It has driven him out of the comfortable conformity in which men find tranquillity, to make him spokesman for inarticulate mechanics and miners, murderers, highwaymen, and "niggers"—the despised and beaten of the earth.

The wide public interest in Clarence Darrow has in recent months been maintained by his participation in three criminal trials, in which his genius for turning an ordinary case into a drama of far-reaching significance is well illustrated. In the Loeb-Leopold hearing he addressed a single judge—and a listening world—upon the mechanistic philosophy and the cruelty and blindness of our criminal law. The trial of Scopes at Dayton was saved from becoming simply a fundamentalist revival by his salty sarcasm and his fearlessness. In the trial at Detroit of eleven Negroes charged with the murder of a white man he raised the whole question of the Negro's right to live decently in the urban North.

II

Within the same week I have heard a bishop and a prominent Socialist express wonder and dismay at Clarence Darrow's hold upon the interest and even the affection of large sections of the American public. But there is no mystery about it; agree with him or not, Darrow is a charming, colorful figure. His avowed pessimism notwithstanding, he finds living zestful and infinitely entertaining. He is intensely interested in men, and understands their pretensions and their troubles. His ideas are usually unconventional and expressed with a sly wit and warm geniality which the toughest cannot resist. He is rarely argumentative, never didactic, always tolerant and good-humored. Free of bustle and hurry, he walks through the streets, his hands jammed deep into his coat-pockets, the last calm Chicagoan.

The secret of Darrow's amazing ability to master a jury is the same that underlies his attractiveness to the public generally: He knows what moves men, and how to amuse them. Men, he has learned, act because their emotions, not their minds, have been aroused. His whole effort in winning a jury—and he begins the campaign when they first step into the box to be examined—is to stir their imagination, to make them put themselves in the place of the man accused.

No trial in which he participates is ever very solemn; there is a steady fire of humor which melts even the fiercest prosecutor; and a jury in a genial, joking frame of mind is not inclined to hangings! Even under the merciless pressure of the Loeb-Leopold hearing he never became sour. One day he was chatting with the reporters during a recess, and complained to them of their frequent mention of his wrinkled and baggy clothes. "As a matter of fact, boys," he said very soberly, "I suppose I pay more for my clothes than any of you, and my pressing bills are higher. But you damn dudes take off your clothes when you go to bed!"

There is nothing of the slick platform orator about him when he delivers an address or participates in a debate. He shuffles about, as awkward and embarrassed as a schoolboy "speaking" a piece; he hunches his enormous shoulders; he writhes and twists. This almost grotesque awkwardness and apparent self-consciousness before an audience is not, however, part of his jury manner. When he faces the jury he stands before the box, composed and serious, his arms folded across his massive chest, his huge head dropped forward, the eyebrows drawn to a Mephistophelian angle above the grim round eyes. Although his arguments sometimes last through two or even three days, there is never any "rehearsal"; every sentence is impromptu and delivered without a note. His voice is a low rumble, almost a growl, and his words are weighed and very slow, like some old philosopher explaining very simply the sad truths of life to immature students.

But when he begins the attack upon the prosecution the philosopher becomes the fighter, with head lowered, his loose under-jaw now tight and hard, his arms swinging viciously, voice harsh and brazen like a hideous alarm gong. This transformation is so amazing that most juries are startled. But it is not long before the fighter disappears, and Darrow becomes again the genial, satirical maker of gibes—the engaging old fellow whom few juries have ever been able to resist.

Darrow is probably wittiest in the many debates in which he has participated in the past twenty years. He has debated upon a variety of large questions: "Is the Human Race Getting Anywhere?" "Is Life Worth Living?" capital punishment, immortality, religion, prohibition, the mechanistic philosophy, and so on. His opponents have been anthropologists, ministers, professors, Senators, and judges, most of whom have been routed not so much by Darrow's intellect as by his irresistible flow of good-natured cynicism.

He has debated religion upon many occasions. Through his argument runs a vein of gentle scoffing. He will say: "Of course I know that Confucius was as great a philosopher as Billy Sunday, and that as a thinker Buddha was the equal of Billy Bryan. But still all orthodox people know that Confucius and Buddha were spurious and the Billy brothers are genuine."

Although as a young man he was attracted by the doctrines of socialism and still has the devotion of many Socialists, he has often enjoyed poking fun at them. In talking to an audience of Socialists he said:

> Now, as far as socialism affects your life today, it is because it is a dream, a religion, nothing else. Why, I have known Socialists who haven't been awake since I knew them. They never will awaken. They are living upon a dream; they are taking dope. Practical socialism is not a political theory; it is a religious doctrine. When you fellows look at a man with that far-off, dreamy look, and say, "Are you a Socialist?" it is exactly the same as the liquid stare of the Salvation Army lassie, who looks into your eyes and says, "Do you love Jesus?"

In spite of his thoroughgoing pessimism, Darrow finds the greatest flavor in life. He enjoys baseball, and can play a keen game of poker. He is fond of children. In fact, his book on "Crime, Its Cause and Treatment" was written at a camp in Wisconsin with two youngsters, the children of friends, hanging on his neck and playing havoc with his papers. He enjoys talking with the ordinary run of men. In a court recess, while the other distinguished counsel are engaged in important "conferences," Darrow can usually be found discussing the latest prize-fight with the elevator man or listening meekly to a bailiff's theory of "what this here country needs . . ."

And yet his despair over the cruelty and futility of the world is so deep that the joy he takes in living seems inconceivable. A few years ago John Howard Moore, a brilliant naturalist and beloved brother-in-law, killed himself one morning in Jackson Park in sight of the Darrow home. Darrow delivered a memorial address which shows how, intellectually, he despises the life which in fact he enjoys. He said:

> John Howard Moore wrote and worked with feverish haste, and he believed that the blind and heartless world would listen to his words and mend its ways. But humanity went on trading and dickering, lying and cheating, marrying and dying, and never heard his voice. One day he opened his eyes and knew his work was in vain, and feeling the weight of the universal sorrow on his soul, he took his life. The coroner's jury determined that "he died from his own hand, while suffering under a temporary fit of insanity." I tell you he died from his own hand while suffering under a temporary fit of sanity. . . . Poor, dead dreamer! You are not the first or last mortal to learn the truth. Other men have awakened from the mad and blissful dream of saving mankind from itself. I, too, have dreamed my dreams, had my illusions, and wakened from my sleep. . . . Among all who are gathered here there is but one whom we can felicitate on this event, and that one is our friend who lies peaceful and all unconscious of the world. If any word of mine could call back his troubled soul, I should feel myself guiltier far than I would to cause a brother's death.

In many sections of the country Clarence Darrow is regarded, quite literally, as the earthly manifestation of the Evil One. There are many who feel as did the late Mr. Bryan, who said during the Scopes trial:

> Mr. Darrow embodies all that is cruel, heartless, and destructive in evolution. He is the finished product of evolution, the most perfect that has developed in the United States, and proves the criminal folly of intrusting to the tempestuous sea of life an intellectual ship without a moral rudder and a compass.

The fact is, of course, that Darrow has no quarrel with any man to whom religion holds out consolation or hope, making life more palatable. "I know there are millions of people in the world," he has said, "who derive consolation in their times of trouble and solace, in times of distress, from the Bible. I have never tried to impose my views on religion on any human being. I have a right to my own views, and I would fight as hard to protect every other man's views as I would fight to protect my own."

III

At forty Darrow was a partisan. At seventy he has become a philosopher. At forty the partisan, stirred by the suffering and wretchedness of men, led a gallant attack upon those economic forces which he believed deliberately held the workers in bondage. At seventy the philosopher feels even more deeply the suffering of humankind, but he neither blames nor excuses. He now believes that man acts as he does because of stimuli from without and is as little responsible for his conduct as a machine of steel. Darrow as a young man dreamed of a day when the intelligence of man would rule, when his bestiality and cruelty to his fellows would give way to love and kindness. The old philosopher believes such dreams to be mere opiates with which we drug ourselves against the terrifying facts: that man is not a creature of infinite possibilities, that he is ruled by his emotions, not by his mind, that he has the same "purpose" as the amoeba—simply to wriggle along as best he can.

Some fifteen years ago, in addressing the prisoners in the Illinois state prison, Darrow said: "It is not the bad people I fear so much as the good people. When a person is sure that he is good, he is nearly hopeless; he gets cruel—he believes in punishment." The good people are still his chief concern, the good people who are forever sitting in judgment on their fellows, who seek to force every one else into their mold of goodness, to adopt their good habits of drinking, of worship, of thinking—even of procreating. The metamorphosis of the partisan is now complete: Darrow has become the most feared enemy of the cocksure and omniscent, the ablest libertarian of the day.

"Bolshevist" China

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

WHEN Wu Pei-fu came back to power in Hankow three years ago, loudly applauded by the Americans and British in China, he ordered his subordinates to cut off the heads of the leaders of the railwaymen's unions—and they did. When the Canton Nationalists arrived at Hankow in September they sent their young men out to organize unions in every trade and industry of the city and a great wave of strikes swept the industrial center up the Yangtze. In the last two and a half months of 1926 there were 160 strikes, involving 200,000 workers in the Hankow region. Some were settled the day they broke out; some lasted two weeks. And when the strike wave subsided these wild Bolshevists had established the ten-hour day in heavy industries and the twelve-hour day in commercial establishments, and had raised the minimum wage in the district from $1.50 a month, gold, to $3.75 a month. That is Chinese "bolshevism."

There is a split in the Kuomintang, the Chinese Nationalist Party. But it is not so much a split between "moderates" and "Bolshevists" as between militarists, who would be satisfied to have the Nationalist movement stop when it had put generals of the Southern party in the places of power previously occupied by generals of the Northern party, and civilian democrats who want to put an end to military despotism and extortion and really to create a new China.

The Nationalist movement is at a dangerous crisis. It has won such sweeping victories that its enemies are joining it, and it runs the risk of being swamped. The Shanghai foreigners, who have always been able to bribe old-fashioned Chinese generals and politicians, want to see it swamped. In the past, when one Chinese general defeated another, he put his own friends in the chief revenue-bearing offices, but accepted and retained the old subordinate officials. The old channels of graft flowed on unchanged; for the masses of the people the shift of overlords meant no change at all. But the Kuomintang generals are subordinate to the civilian councils of the party. When a loyal Kuomintang general conquers a province, he does not stay to exploit it; he turns its administration over to the party committees, and moves on to fight new battles. The so-called "moderate" split threatens because some of the new-found allies of the Kuomintang—perhaps even Chiang Kai-shek himself—look longingly upon the fleshpots of the old system.

The Kuomintang political leaders intend to make it impossible for a hostile general to recapture a Kuomintang province. This may be called Bolshevist technique; whatever its name, it is effective. It creates chaos and excitement for a time; but it explains the invulnerability of the Nationalists. They organize workers in trade unions, peasants in farmers' unions, women in women's organizations; for all these oppressed classes they produce results, and out of them they create a public spirit which makes reconquest almost impossible. Mere honesty goes a long way. Take the financial situation of Canton Province, still their strongest base. Since the 1911 revolution tax collections in that province had never exceeded $15,000,000 gold; in the ten years before the Kuomintang took power they had averaged $10,000,000. In the first year that T. V. Soong, the Harvard graduate who is the Kuomintang Minister of Finance, was in charge, they rose to $24,000,000; in the second year to $33,800,000, and Soong's credit was by that time good enough to borrow—honestly borrow—$15,000,000 more. He did not raise the tax rate; he simply forced the local grafters who had kept their collections to turn them over. He increased the appropriations for education, justice, trade, and agriculture fivefold and still had enough left to finance the start of the Northern Military Expedition!

In Hupeh Province, where Hankow lies, the militarists had for years collected special taxes which were supposed to be used for building dikes to hold back the river floods. But no dikes were built; the money was squandered. The Hankow "Bolshevists," not yet six months in power there, are already building dikes—they have appropriated $4,000,000 for the purpose. They have engaged an American engineer, Oliver Todd, who for years had served with the International Famine Relief, to assist them.

The Nationalists encourage the formation of farmers' unions, and these agitate against high land rentals. In the old days the farmers often organized for self-protection —sometimes in protest against militarists who forced them to grow opium poppies. Again and again the local gentry (landlords) forced the arrest of such farmers; now the gentry who try to interfere with the farmers' unions suffer arrest. They do not yield gracefully; and they can still buy occasional military support. On December 30 sixty soldiers suddenly appeared in Sanpu, near Hankow, where the farmers' union had led an anti-opium campaign, and attempted to arrest its leaders. One farmer was killed, several were wounded, before the raid was beaten off. Near Hanyang the farmers rose against the corrupt local gentry who had misappropriated dike funds and had even kept from the small farmers seed grain intended for them; there again there was a bloody conflict, and the new Nationalist authorities gave their aid to the farmers.

Wherever the Nationalists go they open schools—schools for workers, schools for farmers' union leaders, schools for women, schools for political leaders. They are indeed agitators, they seek to destroy the whole rotten fabric of the old governmental system, and to create a new. It is part of their technique to excite people. They do not stop to be fair to individuals. They interrupt foreign as well as Chinese trade and business; often their revolutionary agitation means a temporary closing of all the old-fashioned schools, including the mission schools. Foreign opposition to the Nationalist movement of course helps to crystallize it and to fix its determination to reestablish complete home rule for China; but the anti-foreign and anti-Christian outbreaks are essentially mere excrescences. They would disappear quickly if the foreigners did not defend with such an insane show of force privileges which they must know they will soon lose.

All China has been won to half the Nationalist program—that which is directed to the reestablishment of national independence. The fundamental conflict between "moderates" and "extremists" is, I think, between short-sighted men who think that the Nationalist passion can subside without causing fundamental changes in China's social fabric, and those who recognize the inevitability of industrialization in China and are determined that their country shall not pass through all the miserable phases of capitalistic industrialism which created a disinherited proletariat in the West. You may call them Communists—some of them call themselves Communists—but in judging them and the men who oppose them it is well to remember that the outcome of their extremism in Hankow is that men who were paid $1.50 a month now receive $3.75, and instead of working sixteen hours a day work twelve.

Thompson the Cowboy Rides In

By WILLIAM J. FLYNN

Chicago, April 8

THREE candidates ran for the high office of Mayor of Chicago: William E. Dever, the late mayor, running to succeed himself; John Dill Robertson, a former health commissioner, running for some reason best known to himself; and William Hale Thompson, mayor of Chicago on two previous occasions, again seeking office. In 1915 Mr. Thompson, who likes to ride police horses and wear cowboys' hats, swept into office on the slogan: "A Prosperous Chicago." Four years later, notwithstanding the shrill outcry of reformers, Big Bill was reelected on the promise that Chicago would not be involved in the next World War—or possibly it was the Irish Revolution. In 1923 the city, becoming aware of a slight odor of corruption emanating from City Hall, decided to take Thompson out for a rest and elected the Democrat, William E. Dever. Mr. Dever functioned quietly and apparently with some degree of efficiency. But beneath the placid surface dwelt trouble. The "organization" was restless, the boys were not finding enough juicy bits in the political pot. Democrats and Republicans both were becoming irritable. Dever seemed certain, however, to succeed himself, when suddenly back into the arena galloped Big Bill. There were doubts, of course; the public had been thoroughly annoyed at Thompsonism in 1923. Still, there he was, big and hearty, radiating prosperity and good-will. Maybe the public had forgotten. They had. Thompson rolled up some four hundred thousand votes in the primaries, and the fight was on.

Brennan, the supposedly sinister Democratic boss, ostensibly extends his support to Dever the Democrat. The so-called "silk-stocking" Republicans want none of Thompson, so they go to Dever. To offset that, thousands of regular Democratic votes go to Thompson because Dever won't play their kind of politics and in addition is reputed to wear a white collar. The third candidate, John Dill Robertson, a most estimable gentleman, is merely a pace-maker, but he serves to enliven the race with pithy comments on his one-time friend, Bill Thompson.

Big Bill is the star of the show and deserves particular note because he is so clearly an expression of the sort of thing the American voter cannot resist. A big lumbering man with rather more than one chin; a hearty, back-slapping manner with constituents; a friendly way with little children and foreigners; a cowboy hat. He talks in a curious, rough, throaty voice that curls to a crest and breaks into waves of picturesque invective.

If Big Bill is not a mental giant, it is beyond question that his campaign has been directed by someone with genius; someone who knows how to reach the great mass who vote by their emotions and to whom the real issues of any campaign mean little. For these people it is only necessary to send up brightly colored balloons proclaiming as civic issues matters as fantastic as any that Alice ever encountered in Wonderland, and then guide their hands over the ballot while they gaze skyward. Let Mr. Dever accuse Mr. Thompson of wasting Chicago's money. Mr. Thompson retorts effectively by shouting that the superintendent of Chicago's schools is a paid agent of King George:

> Read These Histories Yourself. The ideals you were taught to revere, the great Americans you were taught to cherish as examples of self-sacrificing devotion to human liberty, are subtly sneered at and placed in a false light so that your children may blush with shame when studying the history of their country. Read "A History of the United States" by William Fiske Gordy, "Our United States" by William Backus Guitteau, and Lewis and Rowland's "The Silent Reader"—the textbooks that have been revised and rewritten for the Dever-Merriam-McAndrew school board, falsified and distorted to glorify England and vilify America—and then you'll understand why "America First" should stir to action every red-blooded man and woman in Chicago until the city is rid of pro-British rats who are poisoning the wells of historical truth.

Mr. Dever may retort that these same textbooks were adopted during the former Thompson administration, but by that time Mr. Thompson is in another part of town insisting that America's young men shall never again be used for cannon-fodder in France—while he is Mayor of Chicago. One of Mr. Robertson's orators suggests that Mr. Thompson may have been concerned in a recent stag party involving some ladies in the nude. Whereupon Mr. Thompson's supporters tear the heavens apart proclaiming that he loves children, and Mr. Thompson doubts (very loudly) that Mr. Robertson can eat eggs without getting them in his whiskers. So presently the question of table manners becomes a vital issue in the campaign.

Mr. Dever's predilection for golf knickers and white collars takes on an additionally sinister meaning when it is suggested that the owner hankers to graduate to knee breeches at the Court of St. James's.

"'America First,' and not 'America Second,'" shouts Mr. Thompson, "because the American who says 'America Second' speaks the tongue of Benedict Arnold and Aaron Burr!" And in a full-page advertisement in the Chicago American he continues:

> Vote for William Hale Thompson and "America First," a red-blooded American, whose forefathers helped rock the Cradle of Liberty. Rid Chicago of these British lackeys—let them go to England, rally under the folds of the Union Jack, and sing "God Save the King." Let Chicago again take its place as the champion of true Americanism.

Mr. Thompson has strong opinions as to the relative merits of Britishers and Americans:

> There never was an Englishman that was the equal of an American. If there was he could make a million dollars in an hour and a half by beating that brave sailor boy, Gene Tunney. But there isn't. And John L. Sullivan didn't wait for the Britishers to come over here. He went over there and beat all the best men they had.

He further indicts Mr. McAndrew, superintendent of Chicago schools, as an ally of King George because he refused to allow school-children to solicit funds for the preservation of the ship Old Ironsides!

> The reason, of course, was that Old Ironsides licked hell out of every British ship she met and the King of England wouldn't like to have us preserve that ship. So he gives his orders to his stool-pigeon, Mr. McAndrew, and our children are not permitted to solicit pennies to preserve a priceless heritage.

How the crowd loves it all! They pack the armories and halls when Thompson talks and cheer him to the echo. Blare of bands. Song pluggers singing "America First" and proclaiming Thompson the greatest living American. Ex-service men on the platform. Remember the boys in France and vote for Thompson! Auto horns and rattles. Phalanxes of white-carnationed ushers rushing to clear the aisles for the speakers. The Stars and Stripes. And lastly, the treat of the evening, Big Bill himself. They stand on chairs, grab his hands, and fight to get near him.

Against all this Mr. Dever plugs along in his dignified, unspectacular way. Mr. Robertson proceeds about his unseen projects with large-type utterances concerning the "smashing of crime rings." But the heart of the mob is with Thompson the Cowboy, who brings color into the drab lives, daubs the landscape with fire and brimstone, and fills the thirsty ears of the multitude with large words. What more can be asked of a mayor? If the sinister figures of electric-light barons and traction magnates are woven into the fabric of his organizations, who cares? The old cry of the Roman mob rises—"Panem et circenses"—and the Big Boy is swept into office on a tidal wave of half a million votes. For this is the land of Barnum, William Jennings Bryan, and Aimee Semple McPherson.

IT was with distinct irritation that the Drifter learned the other day that Dead Horse Inlet, down where the Borough of Brooklyn wanders away in a series of salt marshes into the Atlantic Ocean, had been renamed Gerritsen Inlet. The deed was done by order of the United States Geographic Board at the request of a group of "prominent citizens" (which is to say, in most cases, real-estate promoters with $100 lots to sell at $500). The change seems as unjustifiable to the Drifter as the action of the Board of Aldermen of New York City in altering the historic name of Blackwells Island to Welfare Island. As the island is known chiefly as the seat of the city's penal institutions, it would seem that to sentence a man to thirty days in the workhouse on Welfare Island would be one of those "cruel and unusual punishments" forbidden by the Constitution.

* * * * *

GEOGRAPHIC names in America are usually good. We have taken the Indian nomenclature as a basis and, in spite of considerable manhandling, have preserved a foundation that is individual and colorful. We have added some good English names in the East and South, some French history and poetry in the Mississippi Valley, some Spanish music and imagery in the Southwest, and everywhere bits of description and reminiscence that are alive with native spirit and tang.

NO section of the country is richer in fine flavorful names of various sorts than Long Island, where by official decree Dead Horse Inlet is now defunct. There are Indian mouth-twisters like Neguntapogue and Arshamomaque, Ketcabonock and Mannetohill, Speonk, Yaphank, Potunk, and Mashomack. Added to these is some much-to-be-prized fisherman-and-farmer lingo in Wading River and Baiting Hollow, in Black Stump Road and Granny Road, in Tobacco Lot Pond, Gravesend Bay, Hell Gate, Great Hog Neck, Skookwams Neck, Jo Coe's Marsh, Pattersquash Island, Pumpkinpatch Channel, Fishkill Hassock, and Plum Gut. The Drifter trembles for the future of Plum Gut if a realty company ever becomes active in the neighborhood. What realty companies can do is attested by the presence on Long Island, cheek by jowl with such historic and descriptive joys as those noted above, of places like Edgemere, Success, Glendale, Cedarhurst, Floral Park, and North Woodside.

YES, we are generally fortunate in our geographic names in America; but we have done less well by the streets of our cities, where after using up Main, State, Water, and the names of the Presidents, we have commonly thrown up our hands and resorted to numbers. In this respect most Old World cities have the better of us. The Drifter once went to London expressly to live on (or in) Oldstairs, Wapping. He had seen a drawing of it in a magazine, and was lured partly by the appearance and still more by the name. As it happened, he found it impractical to take up quarters there, and squatted instead in that reservation of American tourists which has been well described as "Bloomsbury, U. S. A." But the names of streets and quarters in London remained a fascination. One may linger in Angel Court or Paradise Walk, commune in Crucifix Lane or Paternoster Row, moon in Love Lane, Huggin Lane, or Bride Lane. Also (if one is a coarse-minded lout) one may revel in Beer Lane, Brewery Road, and Wine Office Court. The Drifter does not know of any Dead Horse Inlet in London, but is sure that if there were one the townsmen would be proud of it—as they ought to be. No good Englishman objects to Rotten Row, to Garlick Hill or Craven Hill, to Tooting or Barking, to Thistle Grove or Wormwood Scrubs, to Shepherd's Bush or Highbury Barn, to Houndsditch or Shoreditch, to such living descriptions as Cowcross Street, Bird-in-the-Bush Road, Three Colts Lane, or White Conduit Street; nor to homely reminders like Cheapside and Eastcheap, Haymarket and Poultry, Old Jewry, Ironmonger Lane, and Ropemaker Street.

* * * * *

LIKEWISE in Paris. It is one of the regrets of his misspent life that while in that city the Drifter never lived in the Passage of Hell or the Impasse de l'Enfant Jésus-Christ; but he believes himself to be a better man for knowing that there was one—of each. Then, too, there was the way of the Little Butcher Shop, of the Washerwomen of Sainte Opportune, of Much Begging, and of the Cat That Fishes. Finally, he remembers the names, though he has forgotten the whereabouts—maybe never knew it—of the street of the Daughters of Calvary and that of the Field of the Lark. To the latter he would like to return to pass his last days when he is 150 years old and sadder, if not wiser, than as he pens these lines. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Ten Years After

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have just finished reading Ten Years After by Oswald Garrison Villard and wish to say that it's the best thing I have read since I got out of service.

I served fourteen months in France with the A. E. F., thinking that I was fighting for the things that were promised. I realize the mistake now and more as the years go by.

Lake Charles, Louisiana, April 6 I. A. GLUSMAN

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: That is a splendid editorial by Mr. Villard, Ten Years After. . . . How evident it is now that the World War and our entrance into it were the most ghastly failure in history. Poison-gas propaganda and mob psychology did the mischief. Probably a hundred thousand of our people were killed directly or indirectly by the war or pestilence. In addition to this, the billions it cost us in money were worse than squandered! Not a thing have we got to show by way of compensation. Let us thank God that there are men like Mr. Villard and Mr. Holmes, who have the honesty, courage, and frankness to acknowledge the truth. . . .

We Hope So Too

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On behalf of the Chinese students in New York, we take the great pleasure to express to you our hearty appreciation for the impartial, righteous, and sympathetic attitude of your paper toward the recent situation in China.

We sincerely hope that such noble and truth-seeking spirit of the intelligent American press be continued and promoted, and firmly believe that the long-established friendship and goodwill of these two sister republics be strengthened thereby.

Women and Children

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Chinese situation is indeed grave, for have not women and children been brought forward to the first line of defense? A recent issue of the New York Mirror pictured on its front cover a Chinese villain seizing a white woman by the hair with one hand and threatening her with a huge and wicked looking knife in the other. Messrs. Steep and Moore, star American correspondents, write indignantly of Chinese "carnage" and "fiendishness," and can hardly depict coherently what they can see and gather, so outraged has been their manhood and so aroused their righteous wrath.

In China anti-foreign posters picture the brutal foreigners in much the same way (Mr. Moore reports a Chinese poster showing a foreigner stabbing a Chinese girl), and Chinese equivalents of "carnage" and "fiendishness" are as freely used.

Those of us who are old enough to remember those mythical years 1914-1918, and the obscene pictures that the belligerents drew of one another, need not be reminded what effective weapons the "innocent women and children" were in carrying on and winning the war.

Women and children are almost infallible barometers of war psychology and atmosphere. When one group of human beings accuse another of brutally treating and attacking women and children, those with weather eyes know that the two mean business and bad business at that. Let us hope, then, that the women and children will be withdrawn from the front lines (and from the headlines) of the warring propagandists and kept in the safe sanctity of their homes.

A Solution of the Farm Problem

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have a suggestion to make, simple but fundamental. Discussion of it must be educative, whether or not it is legislatively practicable.

Let farmers and friends of farmers boldly demand that the next Congress declare that whenever the Secretary of the Treasury learns that title to an importation of foreign goods has been obtained by any United States citizen or corporation by definite exchange or barter of United States farm products, the said importation shall be admitted free of duty—provided, however, that the total value of such foreign goods so admitted free of duty in any year shall not exceed the estimated total value of surplus farm products for that year.

This suggestion asks for farmers nothing but an opportunity to get goods for goods. No bounty is to be paid; no government subsidy or revolving fund would be needed. It would merely partly compensate the farmers for the general burden to them of the tariff. The plan would stimulate exports and increase rather than decrease employment. The loss of government revenue would not be serious. There would be no price-raising effect upon consumers.

I do not wish especially to be known in connection with this proposal. I am old and living a retired life, and have never had much influence. The Nation can give the idea wide publicity, and enlist support for it.

Who Was the Criminal?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It is true that the late filibuster in the Senate during its closing days last March was responsible for the failure of the Congress to enact the Urgent Deficiency Bill. It is true that the failure to enact that bill is now responsible for many inconveniences and many injustices in the operation of the executive branches of the Government. But why put all the blame on the "conservative" statesman, David A. Reed of Pennsylvania? Why not let it fall justly also on some "Progressive" statesman?

Look at page 5664 of the Congressional Record for March 4. The Urgent Deficiency Bill was being discussed. Unanimous consent for its passage had been requested. The Vice-President said: "Without objection, it is so ordered, and the bill is passed."

Therefore it is clear that at a certain moment the enactment of the bill was accomplished.

But, as you will further note from the passage to which I have invited your attention, Mr. Howell of Nebraska was already addressing the chair and was ejaculating "Mr. President."

The Vice-President thereupon listened to Mr. Howell and heard Mr. Howell object to unanimous consent and was obliged to remark: "The action on the passage of the bill is reconsidered."

Mr. Howell, in the course of objecting to the passage of the bill, spoke bitterly of the hard-heartedness with which the managers of the bill had refused to include in it an appropriation of $12,000,000 for the Missouri River, which is a river extremely interesting to his constituents. Mr. Howell's position was that he would object to the passage of the bill unless he could have an opportunity to endeavor to include the Missouri River within the scope of its beneficences.

I do not criticize him. I only wish to point out that his "progressive" shoulders, as well as the "conservative" shoulders of Mr. David A. Reed, deserve to be loaded with responsibility for participation in the alleged crime—I emphasize the word alleged—of conducting a filibuster.

Gesegnete Mahlzeit!

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Apropos of Mr. Ward's letter in your issue of March 16, it may be of interest to note a variation of the German custom, universally practiced in the Scandinavian countries. As soon as the guests are seated, the host bids them welcome in three words, "Velkommen til bords" ("Welcome to our table"). As they rise from the table, the guests bow to the host and hostess, expressing thanks in the three words, "Tak for maten" ("Thanks for meal"—hospitality).

Sir: Equivalent expressions of "Ich wünsche Ihnen eine gesegnete Mahlzeit!" are daily used in China.

Asking Another

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: During my constant correspondence with Eugene V. Debs he sent me the following verse, expressing in a delicate and generous way his feelings toward me:

Sometimes it's only the lilt of a song
That brings you back to me;
Sometimes down in the heart of a flower
It is your face I see.
Sometimes the smile of the lifting morn
Is all your smiling, too.
Everything glad in the whole wide world
Seems just a touch of you.

Because this is such a beautiful verse, in addition to the fact that I received it from Debs, I would like to see it printed in The Nation asking who was the original poet. Although Debs wrote most delightful letters, I never was informed that he was the author of any original poems.

"The Massacre at Fort Pillow"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have just read your article A Hun of the Civil War, referring to the recent death of the Confederate general, John McCausland. You mentioned "the massacre at Fort Pillow." There was no massacre at Fort Pillow. I accompanied General Forrest in all his daring and desperate enterprises. Now that bitterness has gone out of the hearts of the people, permit me to recite the facts, the whole truth, about the capture of Fort Pillow, April 12, 1864.

Soon after his advent into west Tennessee, General Forrest was distressed by well-authenticated instances, repeatedly brought to his notice, of atrocious outrage upon non-combatants by the garrison at Fort Pillow. This garrison consisted of a battalion of whites, commanded by Major Bradford, and a Negro battalion under Major Booth, who commanded the post. Many of Bradford's men were deserters from the Confederate army. Under the pretense of scouring the country for arms and "rebel soldiers," Bradford and his subalterns had traversed the surrounding country with detachments, robbing the people of horses, cattle, beds, wearing apparel, plate, and money, besides venting upon the wives and daughters of Confederate soldiers the most obscene epithets, with two extreme outrages upon the persons of the victims of their hate and lust.

The families of many of Forrest's men had been thus grievously wronged, and many of his officers united with the citizens of the country in petition. Forrest determined to capture or destroy the nest of the marauders.

He reached Fort Pillow at daylight on the morning of April 12. His advanced guard surprised the Federal pickets and captured them. The Federals had six pieces of artillery with a garrison of 580 men. The attack was made soon after sunrise, and the Confederates quickly surrounded the works. Forrest sent into the fort a flag of truce, with the following note:

> As your gallant defense of the fort has entitled you to the treatment of brave men, I demand an unconditional surrender of your force, at the same time assuring you that they will be treated as prisoners of war, this to include Negro soldiers as well as the whites.

The answer, received after some delay, required an hour for consultation with officers. Forrest immediately replied, in writing, that he would give twenty minutes for a decision, and added: "If I am obliged to storm the place, I cannot be responsible for the consequences, so great is the animosity existing between the forces." At this point the smoke of several gunboats was discovered ascending the river, and one of them was seen to be crowded with troops. Soon the answer came, written in pencil: "Your demand does not produce the desired effect." Forrest then sent one of his staff officers to say he was anxious to prevent the useless loss of blood, but unless his demand was acceded to he would attack at once. The answer was—"No." Forrest then called to his bugler—"Blow the charge!" and the hungry, ragged Confederates, leaping headlong into the ditch, clambered over the breastwork, opening from its crest a fearful converging fire upon the garrison.

At a prearranged signal the garrison, en masse, white and black, with arms in their hands, broke for a place of refuge under the bluff where they had been led to expect naval aid. As they sped down the precipitous bank they turned repeatedly to return the fire. But the Confederate fire was deadly, and some three hundred fell before reaching safety. The gunboats failed to give any assistance. The naval commander kept his vessels at a safe distance and many of the Federals threw themselves into the river and were drowned.

There was no surrender. The garrison did not yield, did not lay down arms, nor draw down their flag; with arms still in hand, they fled toward another position, and while on the way returned the fire of their pursuers. Generals Forrest and Chalmers, with their staff officers, rushed among the men and signaled to stop fire; all allegations to the contrary are malicious inventions, started, nurtured, and accredited at a time of and through a sentiment of strong sectional animosity.

Among the prisoners was Major Bradford, the commanding officer of the post, after the death of Major Booth. He was temporarily paroled to supervise the burial of his brother, after which, under a pledge not to attempt to escape, he was placed for the night in the custody of Colonel Robert McCulloch, who gave him a bed in his own quarters and shared with him his supper. This trust Major Bradford violated; while his host was asleep he escaped.

The wounded of both sides were placed under shelter and the care of Confederate surgeons. The Federal wounded, black and white, received prompt surgical attendance. The following day General Chalmers signaled a passing transport and transferred to the cabin seventy wounded officers and men, white and black.

The EVOLUTION of WAR

A new and original study by Emanuel Kanter, author of THE AMAZONS. It explains in a novel fashion the economic and social causes that produce war. It points out the weakness of present-day pacifism, and shows the social changes that must precede the complete elimination of war. Ample historical data are cited to support the author's theories.

American Imperialism in Chile

By ARNOLD ROLLER

AND now Chile has been added to the growing array of frankly dictator-ruled countries. On February 9 Colonel Carlos Ibañez succeeded by the mere threat of a military revolt in forcing the Government, in which he was Minister of War and Interior, to abdicate. He deported the liberal Premier, named himself as successor, and also retained the Ministry of the Interior. On April 7 he had himself appointed Vice-President also, after forcing the temporary retirement of President Figueroa Larrain.

The coup ends a brief democratic regime in Chile inaugurated in January, 1925, when the workers helped the young liberal army officers, headed by Colonel Ibañez, to oust the reactionary military dictatorship of Altamirano.

Upon assuming the role of dictator the first act of Ibañez was to arrest, imprison, and exile all his opponents. He defied the constitution, disregarded parliamentary immunities, choked off court protests. He suppressed the Communist press, six dailies in all. He arrested and deported Conservative as well as Liberal and Communist Deputies and Senators, including the ex-president of the Chamber of Deputies, who is also the owner of the largest conservative daily of Chile (El Diario Ilustrado), the Communist Senator Manuel Hidalgo, and the Communist Deputy Luis Cruz, head of the Chilean Labor Federation. Not only did Ibañez completely ignore the protest of the Supreme Court against the disregard of constitutional immunities and against these deportations, but he had Felipe Urzua, president of the Court of Appeals, deported also, and later he even arrested the president of the Supreme Court, Javier Figueroa, the brother of the President of the republic. The bourgeois opponents of Ibañez, together with the Communist Senator and a few other members of Parliament, were deported to Ecuador, while 300 Communist workers were sent to the Island Más-a-fuera, belonging to the group of the Juan Fernandez Islands in the Pacific about 500 miles from the mainland. There are no houses on this island, and the deported men had to take along building material and seeds for sowing the next year's crop.

Ibañez not only struck at the class-conscious workers and the feudal and clerical interests of the landed aristocracy, but also against certain liberals representing the native financial and mining interests. Thus he appeared to be opposed to and by everybody—conservative aristocracy, liberal industrialists, and Communists. Who, then, are the new Prime Minister's friends? Who pulled the strings and paid the bills? Where did Ibañez draw the courage and assurance to antagonize so many elements? According to all dispatches, this new Fascist Ibañez regime is supported by the "Democrats," representing the petty-bourgeois elements, and also by a part of the "radical" Deputies; both representing the extreme left wing of the bourgeois parties. The "Democrats" were the precursors of the Chilean Socialist Party, which later became the Communist Party. Many of the most important leaders of the Communist Party and also the founder of the party, Racabarren, came from this "Democratic" Party which finds its adherents mostly among the unorganized and unskilled workers. Though one of the leaders of the "Radical" Party, Santiago La Barca (not to be mistaken for the Communist Deputy Contreras Labarca), was deported for opposing Ibañez, the majority of the party supports Ibañez. Ibañez is mainly supported by the army officers, who are mostly sons of the petty bourgeoisie, and who two years ago played a "revolutionary" role against the navy officers, who are mostly sons of the aristocracy, and by the unorganized workers and the "Democrats," whose strength has greatly declined. Thus an analogy with the "popular" support of Italian Fascism is established.

There remains the question as to the financial support of the Ibañez regime. This question seems to be answered by the statement made on March 7 by Ibañez's Minister of Finance, in which he attacked the native nitrate magnates, accusing them of having forced the nitrate industry to a crisis in order to compel the Government to reduce or eliminate the export tax. He threatened that "any further movement seeking to force such action will be taken as directed against the state." "By lowering the sales price and cutting the prices," the statement continues, "the magnates could have kept their plants open during 1926, but they preferred to suspend operations, depriving the Government of 100,000,000 pesos (about $12,500,000) in export duties and occasioning a loss to the country of 30,000,000 pesos ($4,750,000) monthly in salaries, meanwhile trying to blame the tax for the paralyzation of the industry." The statement concludes with the words: "The plants must renew operations because the country demands it."

In fact, the nitrate situation was almost disastrous for the Government. The export taxes on nitrates formed more than half, and in 1916 80 per cent of all government revenues. But the estimated production for 1927 would have netted the Government not more than 17 per cent. In 1890 Chile supplied 80 per cent of the world's nitrogen and only 20 per cent in 1926.

This statement is accompanied by another: That "the Government is fighting a political oligarchy which would enable the privileged classes to thrive on public misery" and that it was "necessary to save the country from the Bolshevist danger and simultaneously put an end to the governing class, which through its methods made the people eager recruits to the Communist cause."

The explanation of this hitting high and low may be found in two facts. In the same demagogic declaration "against the oligarchy and the governing class" it was announced that the Government considered it necessary to establish a new sales system in the nitrate industry, abolishing the limitation of production, and that after June 30 the present system would not be continued. The second fact is that the American Guggenheim interests acquired immense nitrate tracts from the Chilean Government and had secured control of one of the largest British nitrate companies, which will operate under the name Anglo-Chilean Consolidated Nitrate Company with new processes suitable for large-scale production in competition with the German synthetic nitrate.

Hitherto the quantity of nitrate which each company might sell has been determined by the Nitrate Producers Association, in which native Chilean and British capital was largely represented. The Chilean and British nitrate producers were attempting to limit the production of Guggenheim, who had asked for an allotment corresponding to one-third of the total output of Chile, and whose improved processes threatened to ruin the native producers. As early as November, 1926, a bulletin of the United States Department of Commerce predicted that the Nitrate Producers Association would refuse to grant this allotment to the Guggenheims; but that by July, 1927, the association would be dissolved, leaving the American company unhampered thereafter.

Ibañez fulfilled the "prophecy" of the United States Department of Commerce to the exact date. He announces that restrictions on nitrate production will be abolished on June 30. Thus the new Chilean Government, which calls itself "the nationalist Government of Chile"—abandoning all old party denominations—prepares the ground for the unhampered exploitation of the workers by American capital, by destroying all labor organizations and at the same time betrays the interests of the native Chilean industrialists to American capital. Nothing is now in the way of cheap production of nitrates.

At the same time, the American State Department, which shows such sensitiveness in regard to parliamentary forms and constitutional usurpations in Nicaragua, announced that the Ibañez coup did not affect American interests unfavorably in Chile.

As in most Latin-American countries, British capital, which entered earlier than the American, is generally allied with the feudal landlords and clericals, whose power Ibañez is also trying to curtail. Thus the program of Ibañez represents a triple victory for American imperialism, against the Chilean workers, against the Chilean industrialists, and against British imperialism.

Civil Liberties in Poland

THE following account of the suppression of civil liberties in Poland, based on documentary sources, comprises a part of a pamphlet to be issued shortly by the International Committee for Political Prisoners, 2 West Thirteenth Street, New York City.

Freedom of Worship

"Freedom of conscience and religion is guaranteed to all citizens. . . . Every religious community recognized by the state has the right of organizing collective and public services; it may conduct independently its internal affairs; it may possess and acquire movable and immovable property, administer and dispose of it; it remains in possession and enjoyment of its endowments and funds, and of religious, educational, and charitable institutions. . . ." (Polish Constitution, adopted March 17, 1921.)

According to an official report to the government by the Polish conservative publicist, Srokowski, up to 1923 over 500 Orthodox churches in the Ukrainian and White Russian provinces of Poland were seized by Polish authorities and delivered to the Roman Catholic clergy. Most of them have been transformed into Roman Catholic churches, some were closed entirely. Orthodox bishops have been imprisoned, interned in monasteries, exiled or replaced by appointees of the government.

In Kholmland alone—the westernmost Ukrainian province under Polish rule—"of 287 Eastern Orthodox churches which existed there since time immemorial, 237 have been forcibly taken away from the Ukrainian population." Many more seizures were made during the last three years, the regular proceeding being like this typical case. "The church of Stuzyca, district of Lublin, was built in 1870, the cost of building as well as procuring the site having been borne entirely by the members of the local Eastern Orthodox congregation. This congregation has now 1,850 members. However, on May 11, 1924, this church was occupied by Catholic priests and their parishioners, whom they had been openly instigating against their non-Catholic neighbors. The invaders were accompanied and assisted by the state police, and when the members of the Orthodox congregation tried to defend their church the police beat them up, pulled the women by the hair, and threw them down the church steps. The mounted policemen forced themselves among the crowd and trampled down many men, women, and children."

In many cases, blood was shed and scenes of medieval fanaticism and horrors were revived.

All complaints of the injured congregations have been as yet in vain. They can not reclaim their properties or seek redress in court, because, by the decrees of December 16, 1918, and July 9, 1921, the Polish government has assumed the legal guardianship of all properties of the Eastern Orthodox Church in Poland, and the government alone could be the plaintiff in any court.

The Roman Catholic religion, to which the constitution of Poland grants only the "chief position among enfranchised religions," is actually the state religion. The Catholic church is supported by public taxation and has many sovereign privileges with regard to the administration of justice and to public education. As "the faith of the nation," the Catholic religion is forced upon the heterodox population of Poland.

Instruction in religion being compulsory in every educational institution for all pupils under eighteen years of age, in hundreds of public schools Ukrainian and White Russian children are forced to go to Roman Catholic churches. The same situation prevails in state-supported children's homes and orphanages.

Free Speech

"Every citizen has the right to express freely his idea and convictions in so far as he does not thereby violate legal provisions." (Polish Constitution.)

By a decree issued in January, 1919, the Communist Party of Poland was declared illegal and has remained illegal ever since. The "Communist Parliamentary Faction," consisting now of six members, is the only group in Poland which, thanks to parliamentary immunity, may use that name. All Communist organizations, publications, and propaganda activities have been suppressed. Possession or distribution of Communist literature, public utterances which may be construed as Communist propaganda, and membership in what may be termed an organization of Communist tendencies are characterized by the Polish political police and by the courts as crimes punishable under the old codes of law of Czarist Russia, defining all kinds of activities directed at the overthrow of the existing social and political order. Month after month, penalties ranging from one to six years' imprisonment are imposed on Communists, Communist sympathizers, and alleged Communists in Poland. According to the Warsaw "Chronicle of Repressions," the record of political trials held before the Polish courts of law during the month of April, 1926, shows a total of 34 trials, 280 persons tried, and 108 found guilty and sentenced to a total of 273 years' imprisonment. The same publication lists also several hundred arrests made in April. Although the proximity of May Day might have spurred the police and the courts of Poland to an anti-Communist drive, some of the heavy penalties meted out in April are not unusual. In 1924 Paul Sierankiewicz, editor of Plug, a radical weekly, was tried on a charge of membership in the Communist Party and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. The evidence was supplied by the Krakow police, who had found at the door of Sierankiewicz's apartment a parcel containing Communist pamphlets. He was not at home when they were found, and nobody could tell who had left them there.

The following is not an unusual news item: "On April 12 fourteen young men and women went to trial before the district court of Luck, the public prosecutor charging them with having formed, in 1924, a so-called Komsomol, or organization of Communist youth. The defendants are pupils of the Ukrainian gymansiums (high school) in Luck. At the hearing in court they complained that when examined by the state police they had been beaten up and forced to sign confessions. The trial lasted three days. Seven of the accused were acquitted; five boys were sentenced to eight years' imprisonment at hard labor; two girls of sixteen received sentences of four years. The prison terms do not include the 19 months they spent in jail awaiting trial." (Kurjer Warszawski, Warsaw, April 16, 1926.)

"On November 8, 1926, the peasants Michael Bily of Berezowicia and Omelan Jackminsky of Ostrow were put on trial before the District Court of Ternopol, the public prosecutor charging them with subversive activities against the government. Two books on Communism, which had been found in Bily's house, were presented as evidence. The charge against Jackminsky was that he had transported a package containing Communist proclamations. At the trial Bily testified that he never was a member of the Communist Party, and never was a propagandist. He had the two Communist books among many others on political and social subjects in which he was interested. Jachminsky admitted that while in town he had been requested by a man he did not know to turn over a parcel to his neighbor Antkow, which was no unusual request to be put up to a farmer who had come to town, and which he did without unwrapping the parcel. Although actually no definite offense could be established, the jury—all Poles, two of them leaseholders of big estates—brought in against Bily a verdict of guilty of treason against the state, and the court sentenced him to death on the gallows. Jachminsky was punished with one year's imprisonment only." (Dilo, Lvov, November 11, 1926.)

While in Poland proper only Communist and near-Communist beliefs and activities are systematically suppressed, the policy of suppression is intensified with the distance from Warsaw. In the outlying district Polish peasants are oppressed, Socialists are gagged, and in the Eastern provinces the "national minorities" are persecuted, regardless of their political beliefs or activities. Thousands of secret agents, confidential informers, and agents-provocateurs are employed by the Defenzywa—political police—to uncover secret organizations. The alleged secrecy is accepted by the courts as plain evidence of criminal dealings. The proximity of Soviet Russia and the racial kinship of "Polish" Ukrainians and White Russians with the people across the border make a Soviet connection or Communist leanings appear plausible even when they are supported by nothing but the depositions of the police officers who accused them. Expressions of political or social discontent, objections to the policy of the Polish government or the local administrations, the outcry of a peasant whose land has been seized by military colonists, are just as likely to fall under the Austrian high treason law or the subversive activities provisions of the old Czarist code.

Freedom of the Press

"Freedom of the press is guaranteed. Censorship, or the system of licensing printed matter, may not be introduced. Daily papers and other matter printed in the country may not be debarred from the mails, nor may their dissemination on the territory of the republic be restricted." (Polish Constitution, Article 105.)

The Secretary of the Interior, the provincial governors (Voyevods), and the police can delete partially or totally, suspend or suppress any publication. The function of deletion is called "confiscation." Their decisions must be executed irrespective of the right of appeal, and when appealed, they are ratified by the courts almost automatically. Moreover, the editor may be prosecuted under the old Russian law. But while in old Russia press offenders were punished with incarceration in a special prison for politicals, now in Poland they go to the regular prisons, and in addition suffer the loss of citizenship rights.

In Galicia, a former province of Austria, the "Imperial Royal Press Statute" of 1862 is still in force. It provides an advance censorship, with the prosecuting attorneys as the "censors in press matters," who must read every publication before it may be circulated. They may delete and prosecute. A paper may be totally suppressed by the police.

WHAT DOES JEWISH SOCIAL WORK OFFER AS A CAREER?

"(3) . . . unusual opportunities for leadership . . ." (See Pamphlet, p. 8.)

The Training School for Jewish Social Work

Offers a fifteen months' course of graduate study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.

Several scholarships and fellowships ranging from $250 to $1500 are available for especially qualified students.

April 29th is the last day for filing applications for fellowships.

The regular course begins July 5. 1927.

BOOK

EYE EDUCATION

By W. H. BATES, M.D.

The author of this book presents evidence that all errors of refraction are caused by strain—and cured by rest and relaxation.

The complete method of treatment is described so clearly that the reader can usually discard his glasses and improve his vision.

By these means, the organs of all the radical trade unions have been suppressed. The Communist press has been reduced to a few "sympathetic" sheets, hardly fit to survive, so colorless are they. In 1924 the weekly Wycinki (clippings), which had been reprinting only censored news from other newspapers, was suppressed on the ground that its "assortment of clippings showed a marked tendency." In the provinces the independent peasant press and even the organs of the Polish Socialist Party, which is generally not unfriendly and often very friendly to the Polish government, suffer "confiscations" calculated to ruin a publication both politically and financially. The post offices supply the police with mailing lists of the radical and opposition press.

The amount of freedom enjoyed by the "national minorities" papers may be estimated from the following figures, showing the confiscations by the District Attorney of Lvov of Ukrainian political papers during the first nine months of 1926:

	Issue confiscated	Not confiscated
Dilo	93	122
Rada	53	17
Nowy Czas	48	20
Hromadsky Holos	31	7

No Ukrainian paper is allowed to exist in Volhynia, a province of Poland with 1,500,000 Ukrainian inhabitants, constituting over 80 per cent of the total population.

Freedom of Assemblage

"Citizens have the right of combining, meeting, and forming associations and unions. The exercise of these rights is defined by statutes." (Polish Constitution, Article 108.)

In cities the police and in rural districts the Starosta (chief of the county administration) must be notified weeks in advance about the time, the place, and the purpose of every public meeting. According to a decree issued during the war, they may even require the text of addresses to be made. No notification is necessary in cases of so-called meetings for "invited guests," but they must gather behind closed doors, and the police may enter the premises—to make certain that everybody present has a written invitation and that the person who issued the invitations knows every "guest." Thus, for instance, the last convention of the Radical Peasant Party (1926)—a legal political organization which has been in existence for over thirty years—was raided and dispersed by the police of Lvov three times in one day. Practically the entire time of the convention was taken up by the police scrutinizing the letters of invitation and by the party secretary issuing new invitations to the delegates to meet in some other place—to be raided again.

Under the general right to forbid a public meeting, the authorities in rural districts do so frequently under the pretext of an "epidemic prevailing in the vicinity." It may be typhoid fever, or smallpox, or glanders, or a disease of the cattle, or "a contagious disease" in general, and the infected "vicinity" may be hundreds of miles off. The epidemic, real or imaginary, works only against political meetings and never interferes with religious pilgrimages, official parades, or even county fairs.

In both cities and villages public meetings are being forbidden on the ground that they "may endanger public safety," or "peace and order." Often the answer to an application simply is that "permission to hold a meeting is refused," and this is final.

In cities the right of peaceful assemblage is practically nullified in times of strikes. For "reasons of public safety," no permits are issued for strike meetings, and if the strikers meet without permission the illegal gathering is scattered by the police and by the military. As a rule, strikes in Poland are suppressed by armed force, wholesale arrests, and police terror, and, moreover, in many cases strikers are prosecuted under the anti-strike articles of the old Russian penal code. In those parts of Poland in which Russian law is not applied, the German and Austrian acts against violence and against resisting public authorities are used. The unemployed, always very numerous in Poland, are never permitted to meet peacefully and to discuss their grievances. The proximity of Soviet Russia always gives a good excuse for invading constitutional liberties for reasons of public safety.

Radical trade unions and workers' professional organizations are subject to incessant police persecutions. Their locals are searched over and over again, and for the most trifling reasons padlocked by the police. Trade-union secretaries live in constant danger of arrest, and when a strike comes or an unemployment crisis is imminent, they are invariably arrested. Twenty-six trade unions, with all local branches, were dissolved in the course of one year, 1924. During the first six months of 1925 the police of Warsaw suppressed the organization of the building trades, leather workers, tobacco workers, cloakmakers, and commercial employees; the union quarters were seized by the police. The dissolution has to be decreed by a court, but court action in such cases is considered a mere technicality. The proceeding at the industrial court session is secret, the defendant union is not represented by counsel, and the police reports and the testimony of Defenzywa agents form the basis for the decision of the court, which simply sanctions what has already been done by the police.

Poems by Clinch Calkins

The Skater

He cuts parabolas upon the ice
And flees his fellows on swift wings of steel—
Is caught, and with elaborate device
He proudly patterns out an eight, a wheel.

His merry laughter from its yarny nest
Flies warm upon the air. His mittened hands
Hotly unfasten his young crimson vest—
The ice remains unmelted where he stands.

Children of Earth, laugh not so loud,
White on the bitter night
Your breath is but a cloud.

Oh Lad So Passionate

Oh lad, so passionate, so full of dreaming
Never there was and never will be hereafter.
I knew this when I let him hear my laughter,
I knew this when I let him hear me crying,
I knew this when he laid his sighing mouth
On my mouth's sighing.

More golden youths may come, golden and gleaming
And one may lay his ear upon my sighing,
And one may still my cries with his mouth's crying;
But never a lad to set the heart aflying!
But never a lad to set the heart aflying!

I Sometimes Think

I sometimes think I know how I shall die,
Since I have little time to spare for dying.
A winter day my pretty mare and I
Shall walk into a wood and come out flying—
Startled by some wild animal's queer crying.

And over hills blue heliotrope with cold,
She'll take a course to make a meteor wonder.
A lemon west; a little moon of gold,
And, knowing my heart, my heartless mare there, under,
Running the miles until my knees lose hold
And I shall lie quite limp beside a wall—
My horse too far away to hear me fall.

The Tree of Heaven

Noon bares the bole of the diurnal tree.
Young leaves of twilight clothe its boughs around.
Stars spread ephemeral bloom eternally.
Dawn, like a ripe fruit, drops without a sound.

Tribute

The night is storming in the trees,
The night is raging on the plain;
The night is raising high the seas
And raining in the hearts of men.

Oh martyr, feel again the stone
And drink again the hemlock cup!
Oh Christ be crucified again
And from the grave be taken up!
If giving once will not suffice,
Give twice!

For breath that man must draw alone
Is one death ample to atone?
Yes. So it be his own, his own.

Old Men

I. WAITING IN LINE

Old man with tired cheeks—
Old man with tired, stretched cheeks,
Do not despair!
Do not look so weary of waiting in line;
It grows shorter in front of you.
Your turn will come soon.

If some thoughtless, lusty youth
Jostles you aside,
Jealous of your place,
He will not be given your rest.
It is not for rest that he will be asking.
No. The rest will be saved for old men.
Old men can make use of all rest.

II. LOOK BACK

See the old man coming out of the old house.
He bends over.
I think he is searching for the present.
His friends have told him that it is the same as the past—
The same rain, the same sun, and that the trees are as beautiful as they once were.

I think his bright eyes see even no grayness in the rain.
To him also it is only wet.
The sun has no shining, only heat, and not enough of that to warm his bones.

How like skeletons the trees are. The flesh of their beauty has been corrupted.
It is fall. He cannot find the path with his stick because of the leaves.
Look back! Is he coming? Do not let him follow me. I cannot lead him.
I follow the blind trails
That are marked falsely, and at the end of them I am brought short.
Leave me and lead him, my friend. Go back and take his hand,
Show him the road to the new country where the past is.

Thwacks from the Motherland

By H. L. MENCKEN

MR. C. E. M. JOAD prefaces a terrific philippic against all things American* with a disarming quotation from the late F. Giordano Bruno: "Se non è vero, è ben trovato." He needs it, for he confesses that he "has not had the privilege of visiting the United States," and the fact is visible on almost every page of his book. Much of the evidence he relies on, indeed, seems to have been derived from the travelers' tales of returning English actors, baffled English lecturers, and the more humorous and ingenious members of the corps of cabin-stewards of the Cunard line. Thus, on page 83, he begins a long diatribe with the postulate that "the films are the literature of America"—which is to say, the only literature—and on page 89 he permits himself the grave announcement that the lamented J. Gordon Cooglar was "the one famous Southern American poet." The one criterion of eminence in the Republic, according to the agents he appears to trust, is money. "The artist, the scientist, the musician, the statesman, and the author are held of no account unless their claims to consideration are backed by money." A rich man, regardless of his private virtue, "is king of any company he chooses to enter." This preeminence, it seems, takes on a transcendental character, and so works miracles. "Thus a rich man who had lost his eye recently purchased another from a poor man, the transfer of optics being hailed as a marvel of medical science." And no wonder!

But it is not necessary to swallow all of Mr. Joad's evidence in order to discuss his conclusions. They are, in brief, that the machine civilization which now threatens the whole world has reached its highest development in the United States, that the influence of American gold is rapidly extending it, and that if its proliferation is not checked it will destroy most of the values that men have cherished for ten thousand years. I see nothing against reason here. The facts, in truth, are apparent to everyone, and even some of the most startling testimony that Mr. Joad introduces, though it is not true, is at least consonant with what is. We have surely not yet come to the pass that "a rich man is king of any company he chooses to enter," but we have certainly developed a respect for mere money which goes far beyond the bounds of the seemly and ordinate. I know of no other country in which the hollow imbecilities of a Judge Gary would get the respect they get here, nor in which so preposterous a vacuum as Mr. Mellon would be venerated as a great statesman. The English also bend the knee to men of money, and so do the Germans and the French, but they have not yet come to the point of mistaking them for philosophers. The English had a fair chance to venerate Otto H. Kahn, but seem to have muffed him. The Germans read Henry Ford, but do not confuse him with Mommsen and Goethe. The French, I fear, if Charlie Schwab went to live and make speeches among them, would regard him as a comic character. Even the Portuguese, Serbs, Rumanians, and Greeks would probably laugh at Cal.

Thus Mr. Joad is often right in essence, even when he is wrong in his specification. It is not true, literally, that J. Gordon Cooglar was "the one famous Southern American poet," but nevertheless there is an inner plausibility in the dictum that makes it somehow disconcerting: if the majority of Southern fanciers had their way it would be true. Similarly, it is not true, literally, that the dreadful bilge of the movie-parlors is the only American literature now in being, but there remains an uncomfortable possibility that it may be true on some not distant tomorrow. Try to put together a list of American imaginative authors, all of the first chop, who have never taken the film shilling. I can think of Cabell and Sherwood Anderson, but there I begin to wabble; the complete roster is surely not long. The rest of the scrivening boys and girls have all submitted to the loathsome embraces of the Hollywood art-fosterers. The effects of this psychic fornication are not concealed from Mr. Joad's atrabilious eyes. The movie rubber-stamp, he observes, begins to show itself upon even the swellest varieties of our national swell letters. The self-same novelists who, but a decade and a half ago, swore upon Alps of Bibles (and meant it) that they'd never yield to the foul caresses of Hamilton Wright Mabie and Anthony Comstock—these same novelists, planning their masterpieces today, find it a sheer impossibility to rid themselves of sneaking, Freudian thoughts of Gloria Swanson and Jack Gilbert. It is sad, but it is vero.

Such sadnesses fill Mr. Joad's tome—an instructive work, but extremely depressing. Purge it of all its errors of fact—some of them really shocking—and its general thesis remains defensible. More, its general thesis remains a fair statement of the view of the republic held by civilized Europeans. That view is not only critical; it is downright indignant. We are, it appears, not only a nation of barbarians; we are actually hard to distinguish from criminals. Unless we are dissuaded from our course by remonstrance, and, if remonstrance fails, by a resort to force majeure, the civilization that men have been struggling for since the dawn of history will go to pot. The wisdom of Judge Gary will supplant that of Plato and Aristotle; Henry Ford will displace Thucydides; Luther and St. Francis will be shelved for the Rev. Dr. Billy Sunday and the beauteous Aimée Semple McPherson; the epic and the sonnet will be alike engulfed by the scenario; the whole world will wear Arrow collars, eat Uneeda biscuits, and read the Saturday Evening Post. I do not argue that these transformations are sure to come to pass; I merely report that a fear of them is widespread in the world. Mr. Joad simply puts into a convenient book, weighing exactly one pound (it is printed on feather-weight paper), what gnaws at the hearts of hundreds of thousands of the European intelligentsia. One cannot pick up an English newspaper without getting some flavor of that dread and indignation. It is an ironical situation, and no doubt full of lessons for specialists in the historical and ethical sciences. The Yankee saved civilization, and now civilization damns him to Hell. He put down the accursed Hun, and now the Hun, compared to him, becomes an archangel. As a professional patriot I resent all this. But on days when my patriotism passes a dividend I confess that I am consoled by certain pizzicato snickers, or, as they say in the Motherland, sniggers.

Yiddish: Our Literary Dominion

By ALTER BRODY

IN the last decade and a half so many Jewish names have appeared on the American literary scene that they have agglutinated into a more or less well-defined Jewish province on some critical maps. As it contained critics of its own, tags were not found wanting for the group, on which were inscribed mystic mottoes such as "Hebraic Power," "Biblical Simplicity," "Prophetic Passion"; and from time to time articles appear about the American Jewish Poets, the American Jewish Fiction, by the American Jewish Critics. To which none of the poets or novelists in question takes exception—for what artist would go out of his way to deny that he had prophetic passion, Biblical simplicity, or power of whatever nationality? And so, while there is a general awareness of the existence of another American Jewish literature, in Yiddish, it has come to be accepted as a supplementary exhibit, of interest only to the specially inquisitive, like objects in the family curio cabinet.

To this East Broadway can hardly be expected to subscribe. Just as once, in things communal, it regarded itself as the Sanhedrin of American Judea, and took no notice of self-appointed "Jewish Committees" from "Uptown," so at present, in things literary, it regards its Anglicized expatriates as outsiders, with no share in the body of Jewish culture, which, it insists, is and must be Yiddish. In the teeth of all the gloomy croaking about the inevitable demise of Yiddish, it nails its flag to the mast and maintains, in the words of the Yiddish critic Niger: "If Yiddish should ever become a language without children, the Jews will be children without a language for their Jewish thoughts and emotions."

Though I find my own portion in Israel thus questioned, I must confess this dictum sounds like good anthropology to me. Modern anthropology has long since torn to tatters the romantic mysticism of inherited racial traits, upon which a non-Yiddish Judaism must be built. There are omniscient critics who can tell at a glance the "Jewishness" of any poem or picture; but biochemistry has not as yet isolated "Jewish blood," and to date anthropology seems content with the conclusion that the inheritance of racial traits is solely through the non-biological machinery of the lingual-cultural-political-geographical organism called a nation. In the case of the Jews, who have for some eighteen centuries been without a geographical-political reservoir for the preservation of racial traits, the lingual and religious conduits are the only ones left. In so far as contemporary Judea can be bounded at all, it is by the walls of the Ghetto and by the Yiddish language. When the Jew leaves the Ghetto and stops speaking Yiddish he loses definability. Certainly he cannot identify himself by a book that St. Paul, Martin Luther, and the American Bible Society have made pretty nearly everybody's property. Not a very "broad" point of view, but how else can one explain the almost religious faith with which a considerable group of brilliant young writers, many of them products of American schools and colleges, cling to an obscure German dialect which has been the vernacular of the bulk of the Jewish nation for a longer period than Hebrew?

But its literary history, particularly in America, is comparatively brief. Here, in uncanny foreshortening, is a literature that has gone through its archaic, classic, romantic, and decadent periods in less than half a century; some of whose early primitives are still alive and able to argue in the cafe with their ultimate decadent successors. Like American literature it has ties to a mother tongue and a mother literature across the sea; but at the outset its new background stamped it with a character of its own.

This background, it must be admitted, was not as fertile as the one it left behind. The first Russo-Jewish writers, whom a wave of "back to the people" brought to Yiddish, may have had a poor opinion of it as a literary medium. But actually they started under circumstances as auspicious as any of the major European literatures. The thousand little Jewish towns thickly sown in the Pale formed a compact, continuous body—the nearest approach to a country that the Jews have had since they were driven out of Palestine. Though Jewish life there was urban, as in America the wives and daughters of the artisans and petty tradesmen of the Pale, barred from the study of Hebrew and the law and kept in ignorance and submission by their husbands, grew up into a simple but imaginative peasantry—which is the life-blood of all language. A woman's tongue the scholars of the Ghetto called it, contemptuously. But that's why it is so delightfully garrulous and wayward, sung rather than spoken, with rhythm for grammar; that's why the Yiddish folk-songs are almost all feminine—either plaintive lullabies or love songs full of the suppressed skittishness of the brief Ghetto girlhood. When the fathers of Yiddish literature took it in hand to make of it an up-to-date literary medium, the genius of the folk speech squirmed through their fingers and gave their work a whimsicality and extravaganza that was not in the realistic Russian models they had in mind.

In America the Yiddish writers were all too successful in that object. They brought with them a language already "refined" in Russia; and the intellectual proletariat of the East Side—the most serious in the world—was not in the mood for idle fancies. Their folk-songs were the sweatshop lyrics of Rosenfeld and the socialistic verse of Winchefsky; and in prose what they wanted was "a slice of life." So did their sweethearts and fellow-workers, equally class-conscious and intellectual, whose highest recommendation was that "they understood life." There were their mothers and grandmothers, still incurably romantic under their bewigged piety. The orthodox journals ministered to them. To this day one may observe wizened matriarchs of the Ghetto bending solemnly over "An Absorbing Mystery of Life in the Royal Court" in an occasional idle hour. But the orthodox papers were aesthetically unimportant. The stage was set ideally for a school of remorseless realism, with an audience that did not wince at the rawest revelations. And so it came to pass that when Stephen Crane died it was on the despised East Side, all unknown to America, that the gap between "The Red Badge of Courage" and "Sister Carrie" was filled—by Kobrin, Pinsky, Libin, and others. Long before Sinclair Lewis founded the Babbitt-baiting school of literature, Kobrin wrote his novel "Orah of the Beard," an analysis of a Brownsville Babbitt. Abraham Cahan, however, editor of the Forward, and thus foster-father of so much of Yiddish literature, had himself no confidence in the permanence of the language; and the result was that "The Rise of David Levinsky," an integral part of Yiddish realism, was written in English—to startle an American public not yet accustomed to such work.

When the war broke out the local school was for a time almost overshadowed by distinguished refugees from Europe—Asch, Raisen, Hirschbein, Jonah Rosenfeld—but though these readily assimilated the American scene, they are only partially American. Asch is perhaps the most important figure in international Yiddish literature, and his American and European work exemplify both branches of the literature. In his earlier, European career he produced "Motke the Vagabond," a novel as fanciful and as folk-flavored as Synge's "The Playboy of the Western World." In America he wrote "Uncle Moses," merely a more powerful study of Babbittry than "Orah of the Beard."

American Yiddish literature is a chapter of "proletcult" that might interest Soviet aestheticians. Most of the Yiddish writers were factory workers and almost all their readers were; some of the younger writers still divide their time between literature and the shop. One result is that the East Side of Yiddish literature is hopelessly lacking in the "picturesqueness" that characterizes it in American fiction. It is not written for literary slummers. "O wad some power the giftie gie us, To see ourselves as others see us" is not always sound artistically. The Yiddish writers fortunately did not have to take into account "how others see us." Addressing a public to whom the East Side was not in itself interesting, and unable to delineate the Jewishness of their characters by the means of Yidgin English, they had to depend on psychology rather than spelling. Translations of Yiddish novels, therefore, seem surprisingly un-Jewish. Like Sherwood Anderson and others who strike bottom psychologically, they attract the accusation of "Russian." A representative series of translations would open up a panorama of Jewish life that would be refreshing to an American public fed up on stage Jews. It would not give us The Jew, but perhaps—Jews.

In poetry Yiddish lagged for a long time behind its prose—repeating the phenomenon of nineteenth-century Russian literature, of a Byronic falsetto in verse existing side by side with a prose naturalism. Strange that the Yiddish poets, whose illiterate ancestors the Badchans (wedding minstrels) had developed in Europe a balladry as lyrical as Elizabethan song, and whose descendants play such an important part in our "Negro" jazz, have themselves shown no capacity for rhythm beyond following the mechanics of meter. Only recently under the impact of the new American poetry did the younger Yiddish poetry find its natural voice. But of many talented younger poets Mannie-Laib is the only one combining naturalness with music.

It is the work of these younger men in prose as well as verse that is worth watching, for its own sake and for the crucial drifts which are sweeping through it. As Yiddish life is moving out of the Ghetto mold which shaped it the newer Yiddish literature is faithfully following, even though it be to its death. Finding themselves in a surge of alien forces, the younger Yiddish writers are valiantly striving to master them and make them their own before they are mastered by them. So that on the covers of recent Yiddish books one deciphers in Hebrew lettering such titles as "Kentucky Poems" (by I. Schwartz), "New England" and "The Far West" (by Raboy), "America" (by Chester). Different books and different men, but what unites them all is the almost physical passion with which they hug the American landscape, its trees, its flowers, its animals, its people, and above all the soil itself; as if the suppressed soil hunger of two thousand years had suddenly overflowed in them and filled them with one thought: to root themselves into it, and become as native to it as the trees. This is less evident in a psychologist like Opatashu. But in "Races," his latest collection of stories, the Jew plays but a minor part, and the longest of them deals with a Southern lynching party. On the other hand, there is Kloomak, who solves the problem by taking refuge in a world "out of time and out of space." There, in a land which has no name, peopled by characters without nationality, and governed by no law but that of beauty, he has created a series of idealized feminine types that remind one strangely of another refugee, Edgar Allan Poe. And Ignatov's characters, twisting in the Laocoon of their own individualism, though nominally Jewish, are no more Jewish than Strindberg's characters are Swedish.

Lavick seems to be almost the only one of them who can extract nourishment from the Ghetto and its traditions. His "Golem" is a dramatic poem of seventeenth-century cabalism into whose symbolic tapestry is woven an intellectual panorama as vast as that of "Faust." A minor strand out of this complicated pattern is of special significance. When the Messiah, disguised as a beggar, reveals himself to the Rabbi and begs to be permitted to liberate the Jews from their suffering, the Rabbi sends him away, saying that the time has not come. The truth is that the Jew—and by that I mean the Ghetto Jew—had become so at home in the inner, other-worldly life which his history forced upon him that he feared to be redeemed from it and brought to earth. He had become a spiritual being who, in an inversion of the Antaean myth, died when he touched earth. This same disembodied spirit, for whom the outer world and its problems exist only as necessary evils, is the hero of Lavick's prose drama "Shmattas" (Rags), probably the only play in which local Yiddish drama achieves literature.

But the outer world is seeping in, and the quintessential spirit of the Ghetto, the distillation of two thousand years, is being diluted with other forces. The Luftmensch is being forced to descend and take root. Certainly in America. Lavick's "Golem" has been an event in contemporary Yiddish literature; but the tendency is all the other way. Most of the younger Yiddish writers are not concerned so much with interpreting the Jew to himself as with interpreting America to the Jew. There is the problem for the Yiddish critics who intrench themselves in the dictum that Yiddish will survive as the language of the Jewish thoughts and experiences of the race. But as it happens Americanization is the major Jewish experience just now. So that the Yiddish writers, faithfully voicing this experience, are becoming more and more American in thought and content; whereas among the nostalgic Jewish expatriates in American literature a sort of parlor Judaeism is becoming increasingly fashionable. Which is more Jewish, a poem about the Kentucky mountaineer written in Yiddish or a novel of Jewish life written in English, is a problem which seems to be worrying the theorists on both sides.

In the meantime it seems a pity that the primitive energy of a folk speech as mobile as Yiddish cannot be brought over in all its poetic garrulity to enrich American literature and teach it to use its hands as all vigorous languages do. Perhaps when the last of the Yiddish writers are through Americanizing themselves they will rediscover Yiddish and recreate its rhythm and imagery for us in their new tongue. If they do that, they will only be paying a hitherto unpaid debt.

Native Drama in Our Southwest

By MARY AUSTIN

THE landing of the Pilgrims on the coast of Massachusetts was dramatic in situation; the entrada of the Spanish Colonists by way of the Chihuahua Trail was so by intention. There is all the difference in the world between the cultures that might be expected to spring from such beginnings. Arriving at the crossing of the Rio Grande amid hardships before which the Pilgrim crossing pales, the expedition sat down on the bank of the Rio Grande and witnessed a comedy of their adventure written by Captain Farfán and played by his company. Thus on the 29th of April, 1595, modern drama began in our Southwest, which was taken possession of next day with a pageant of banners and ritual in the name of all the Blessed Personages, the King of Spain, and St. Francis. The founding of their first capital, now Chamita, New Mexico, was celebrated by a horseback pageant of Christians conquering the Moors before an audience augmented by two pueblos of Indians who sat securely on their housetops against the possibility of being eaten by the "long-tailed elk" on which were mounted the strange bearded men. From this gallant beginning the chief entertainment of New Mexico has been, aside from horse-racing and cock-fighting, dramatic, and almost exclusively native.

The century of extensive Spanish colonization along the Rio Grande was also the "golden" century of Spain, in which Lope de Vega wrote his thousand comedies, Pedro Calderon wrote his religious plays, and Lope de Ruega regenerated the Spanish theater, introducing music between the acts and sometimes into them, thus opening the way to grand opera. In that happy age the king also wrote plays and the people took as much interest in literature as in bull fights. It was the century marked in its beginning by Cervantes's "Don Quixote," and distinguished toward its end by the substitution of the guitar for the viola as the popular musical instrument of Spain. Most of what came over in the saddlebags and in the memories of the Colonists of that period was wiped out by the Pueblo Revolt of 1680. But after the reconquest by De Vargas in 1698 every settlement began to have societies of players whose performances became social institutions, existing in some of the outlying towns to this day and in others rapidly reviving under the sympathetic revaluation which has been the gracious result of the most recent invasion of New Mexico by working artists. Collections of the various local versions of the more popular plays are being made, and the privilege of attending their presentation is eagerly sought. It is still impossible, however, to trace out the entire connection between what goes on in New Mexico and its possible derivation from drama in Old Mexico and Spain. Quite certainly nothing much came from Spain after the first half of the eighteenth century, and after the first quarter of the nineteenth the slender trickle of cultural influence from Mexico definitely ceased. A generation later the American invasion, with its characteristic bargain-counter rush, forced the Spanish Colonial culture back upon itself, and almost succeeded in causing its complete extinction. Only under the conserving influence of the church, careful of what is ritualistic and symbolic in culture, the Spanish Colonial drama has survived in whatever was definitely of religious significance. At present only one of the native plays of that period which is not religious in theme is still being played or has been collected in entirety. This is "Querneverde," sometimes known as "Los Comanchos," a drama which seems to have been written in Taos County about the middle of the nineteenth century and which deals with the exploits of Querneverde (Green-Horn), a Comanche chief who harried the Spanish settlements of that time.

One is entirely within the fact in speaking of "collecting" these Spanish Colonial plays. Writing among the New Mexican settlements was never much practiced, and so seriously were the dramatic societies taken that membership became hereditary; parts as well as costumes and properties were handed down often from father to son, and in many cases passed from generation to generation without once being written down. I have heard, for example, of manuscript copies of the play "Nuestra Señora de Guadaloupe," but my own version was taken down entirely from word of mouth; and of the less popular plays, which may yet be performed from memory, there is not even a tradition of a written version. One must collect a part speech by speech—with its cues—from an old man at Ranchos de Taos, another from a great-grandmother somewhere about Socorro, and missing fragments where they can be found. There was, of course, marked preference for the "fat" parts, such as Lucifer in "Los Pastores" (The Shepherds) or the Chief in "Los Comanchos," and these can often be found letter perfect, as the player learned them from his father forty years ago. People who do not trust much to print have excellent memories.

"Los Pastores," as may be guessed, is a Nativity play. and still frequently played on Nochebuena (the Good Night), first before the priest's house and then in the patio of the local rico or other influential citizen. In remote villages where there is no resident priest and no sala large enough, the performance will take place in the schoolhouse or the church, and the interest and appreciation of the audience is never a whit dimmed by the fact that most of them have been present at all the rehearsals. The costumes are traditional and suggest the period in which Agamemnon might be played in a powdered wig with ruffles and Lady Macbeth in hoopskirts. I have seen "Our Lady of Guadaloupe" done at Santa Fe with no setting but a rock of crumpled paper, a few tissue roses, and a single ecclesiastical chair; the long journey between the rock of Tepeyac, where the Vision appeared to Don Diego, and the Bishop's palace, indicated by the chair, being so completely presented by the actor in fifteen feet of flat space that the audience missed nothing of its mountainous character, its fatigues and misgivings. In these native players the power of entering into the part, which is shared by a native audience, is quite capable of so completely engaging even the sophisticated attention that it is only afterward that the observer recalls that the Star of Bethlehem was an evil-smelling oil lantern hitched along on a rope, and that the audience has united in helpful suggestion when the mechanism by which the Angel of the Annunciation is let down from heaven has been unaccountably stalled. And with both audience and players one has relapsed into reverential awe when the difficulty has been overcome.

Such plays as "Los Pastores," "Our Lady of Guadaloupe," and "Las Estrallas," and "Los Comanchos" show literary quality with an explicit folk flavor, and such variations of style and handling as suggest Colonial origins. Even the Nativity play is so completely localized that no one has yet been able to trace it to a Spanish derivation. But if such origin could be predicted it could probably only be proved out of old monkish manuscripts. "Los Pastores" and the "Guadaloupe" are both found south of the Rio Grande, and may have originated there, but "Los Comanchos" could not have arisen south of Santa Fe.

Also of distinctive New Mexican origin is the yearly "Passion Play" of the Penitentes, now so rapidly disappearing before the assaults of the bargain-counter spirit which incites Americans to rush in wherever there is rumor of beauty and strangeness, to tear it to tatters of sensation. This American version of the drama of the Crucifixion is played out in entirety between the first Wednesday in Lent and Good Friday, and its source is obscurely traced to the Dark Hours of the Spanish settlements between the withdrawal of the Franciscans by order of the newly established Republic of Mexico and the coming of the French priests in the 1880's. It is possibly a local revision of the Third Order of St. Francis, which came into the country with Oñate, or fragmentary recollections of whipping brotherhoods such as were common in Europe throughout the period of Spanish colonization. Unquestionably it drew from penitential practices of various Indian tribes; for by that time Spanish and Indian blood were well mingled in New Mexico. More than anything else it drew from the dramatic urge that brought the Spanish settlers over the sea and up the whole arduous length of the mountains of Mexico, along the Jornado del Muerte (Journey of Death), to face the wild hills and wild tribes of the Rio Grande. And not only from that impulse, rooted in the love of conquest and adventure, but from the world-embracing missionary spirit of the century. It was most deeply informed with what is in some measure at the root of all art, man's profound, incurable passion for expiation.

The Penitente play culminates during the last three days of Holy Week in what was formerly a detailed realistic crucifixion. But after the church resumed its direction of its Spanish-speaking membership in New Mexico, many realistic features disappeared. The Cristo is no longer nailed but tied to the cross, and the most dramatic penances take place within the morada, or are screened by midnight and remoteness. Within the past four or five years there has been a disposition to substitute a painted life-size image for the Cristo, and to enlarge the dialogue until it approaches the proportions of literary drama. As much as I have been able to hear of this dialogue is far superior in directness and simplicity to the pretentious blank verse of the Oberammergau "Passion Play." Such is the reverent purity of spirit in which this humble rendering of the dramatic climax of the Christian story is made that it was not until hours after the effect of seeing it at Talpa had worn away that I remembered how the three Marys chewed gum in the pauses of their parts, and how the two parts of Pontius Pilate and Caiphas had been combined into one by the simple expedient of a Roman robe and a Hebrew high priest's hat. This was the first time the whole story had been presented at one session, the usual method being to represent the betrayal and abandonment of Jesus, with which are often curiously combined incidents of the hours of darkness, on the evening before Holy Thursday; the Via Dolorosa with the meeting and parting of Jesus and his mother, on the afternoon of Holy Thursday, and the crucifixion at the traditional hour on Friday, each one at appointed places. Left to itself, the Penitente performance would inevitably develop into a true passion play of considerable power; but it seems evident that the tourist passion will prevail over every other and that the beautiful occasion will pass without a trace.

This Penitente play, with the Matachina, links the Spanish Colonial theater with the Pueblo Indian dance-drama. For still in New Mexico the Puebleños keep up the annual mask dance typical of that on which all European play-acting is founded. In the corn dance, the deer dance, the fire dance, and a score of masked, ritualistic performances all the forms and devices of the dramatic vehicle before it split into the allied but definitive arts of dance, song, and dialogue, may be studied. The Penitente play, besides being communal and ritualistic in character, as Indian dances are, and expiatory, as we now know Greek drama was at its best, mingles whippings, genuflections, solemn processions, and other modulations of the dance impulse with its dialogues and spoken prayers. Midway between the dance-drama of the Puebleños and the miracle play is the Matachina. Matachina is a generic name applied in Spain to an old type of ballad dance, reapplied in Old Mexico to more than one modified survival of native dance-drama. But along the New Mexican border the name refers to one specific dance which has all the earmarks of Indian origin with super-imposed Christian handling. The costumes are unquestionably derived from Roman ecclesiastical robes, particularly the head-dresses; the wands used by the dancers are three-branched, such as are used in many Indian-Catholic ceremonies to signify the Trinity—and in many Mexican-Indian rites for the fruitful corn-mother. There are not wanting hints that the use of these things might have originally been derisive; and more than a hint that the aboriginal foundation of the local Matachina was of phallic significance. For what else was the miter, of which the Matachina head-dress is plainly reminiscent, but the phallic crown? But whatever the original intention, the Roman influence has triumphed since the Matachina is recognized as a dance suitable for exclusively Christian festivals, such as Christmas and Easter. At the same time there are reasons for suspecting that this might have been one of the native Mexican dances which the church in the beginning of the Spanish conquest undertook to repress because it was found that they keep a sense of nationalism alive among the conquered tribes. For the leading characters of the Matachina can be found both north and south of the border, with two sets of names: El Monarch, Montezuma; El Toro, Cortez; the Bride, Malinche (mistress of Cortez); and sometimes a hair-and-horn masked figure which is recognized either as the Devil or as one of the Sacred Clowns familiar to dance-drama audiences. Altogether it seems probable that this was an aboriginal fertility dance made over by the church into a masque of the Soul's (the Bride's) struggle with the world, the flesh, and the devil. For which violence to their traditions the tribes compensated by reading into it secretly their own forced acceptance of Spanish rule. As an example of transition from dance-drama to popular entertainment the New Mexican Matachina is worth more study than has been given to it.

So much has been written of late about the beautiful and inspiriting dance-dramas which may be seen not only in the pueblos of the Southwest but at the tourist festivals

A New Novel by the Author of "Jean-Christophe"

ROMAIN ROLLAND'S

Mother and Son

(THE SOUL ENCHANTED)

Translated by VAN WYCK BROOKS

The creator of "Jean-Christophe" has written at last a great novel of the war. The threads of human adventure are caught and bound into a fabric whose richness is finer than anything the author has done. The drama lies in the background of the war and its tighter struggle between Annette and her illegitimate, adolescent son. It is a novel that might well have the title of Romain Rolland's creed Above the Battle. "For peace is not the absence of war. It is the virtue that is born from the vigor of the soul." $2.50 of Santa Fe and Gallup, that description here would be superfluous. To the student the chief use of these ceremonies, besides providing a high type of aesthetic entertainment, is to enable him to divide the several elements of gesture, both realistic and symbolic, from the literary components of drama. Beautiful enough to engage every aesthetic reaction, even that least worthy and by the average onlooker most coveted one of sensation, the fire dance, the buffalo dance, the Yebetchi challenge the intelligence at every contact. As if all the primitive life of man from the very earliest were gathered up in them, about to burst into the final flower of art expression. To the uninstructed, however, they remain largely unintelligible because the explicatory acts and incidents of the drama are many of them performed in the kiva, as in the Penitential drama they take place in the morada, as in the best Greek tragedy they took place off stage. So that one wonders if the Greek habit of having the killings and other acts of violence done behind the scenes, instead of springing, as popularly supposed, from a Greek sense of propriety, did not rise from an earlier ritualistic custom of having them happen in the secret ceremonial chamber. The whole dance-drama complex is thus a mine of information and illumination as to dramatic origins and as to the possible use of elements of form and expression that in the modern theater have gone as flat as uncorked champagne; synthetic gesture, significant setting, the use of masks, of climax, of sacred clowning. Indian comedy, a subject too vast for more than descriptive mention, is sufficiently close to modern comedy to be easily understood by any audience. It springs from the tribal need of social correction by laughter and is the business of the Koshare, the Society of Sacred Clowns personating the spirits of the ancestors. Historic events, such as the entrada of Coronado and the killing of Estevan, the first Negro, are often used as pegs on which to hang corrective farces, and of late the absurdities of modern white life are satirized for the benefit of the younger generation.

While at present the office of native drama in the Southwest seems to be that of reinstruction in the fundamentals of dramatic and theatrical practice, it cannot be seen as providing other than the securest groundwork for a type of dramatic writing which will be inevitably fitted to carry all that the Southwest has to express. In so doing it will probably be found to be more expressive for what we call American uses—meaning by that the concurrent output of our mingling strains and local environment—than anything derived from purely Nordic sources, such as Greek and Elizabethan playwriting. Already the incursive interest of creative workers occupies itself with the separation of Indian dancing from its tribal elements in order to save it for aesthetic service, as Greek drama was saved. On this point public opinion is somewhat at fault, arguing that apart from its tribal significance Indian dancing will cease to have meaning and power. But the whole history of plastic art goes to show that the only way any of it was ever incorporated into the evolutionary history of culture was to cut it out cleanly from the creedal and mythologic root as poetic tragedy was cut off from Hellenic pantheism, as European drama was excised from the medieval theology. Several movements have begun looking toward such a saving result; an association for the revival of Spanish Colonial Arts at Santa Fe, Witter Bynner and Camilo Padilla for the encouragement of Spanish Colonial lyricism, an Indian Art Museum for Indians. The emergence of a native Southwestern drama is only a matter of a little time and intelligent fostering.

In particular I expect to see a new school of gesture—taking the word in its widest sense in which the human personality can be used as a vehicle of expression. Here alone, in Indian drama, do we approach the condition in which gesture is speech, as in the Spanish Colonial plays we rediscover something of the provocative relation between manners and art. And if such evolutionary processes go on, screened as they are by little-understood languages, so much the better for their successful escape from the present gaucheries and dulness of American drama.

First Glance at the Season's Books

By MARK VAN DOREN

THE sensation of the season is, of course, Sinclair Lewis's "Elmer Gantry." Final proof of this was furnished me the other evening when one of the most narrowly read men I know—a citizen whom I would have accused of complete indifference to books both new and old—asked me if I had seen Upton Sinclair's "Elmer Gaunt." If Mr. Lewis's novel against the Non-Conformists had got down that far, I said to myself, it had gone and would go everywhere. And apparently people in all States are at present undergoing the query: "Have you read 'Elmer Gantry'?" Eventually, no doubt, most of them will say yes; and all of them will argue concerning the extent to which Mr. Lewis has given a fair picture of a certain kind of preacher—who will or will not be assumed to exist. All of which is extremely interesting as a social phenomenon, but not so interesting for literature, since it has never been necessary to ask of a good novel whether its hero was "true to" some contemporary type which may possibly not have been there to be true to. We do not go to literature for evidence that human beings exist, and we do not care whether heroes of good books exist outside the books. So there will be less discussion than there might be concerning the quality of "Elmer Gantry." Yet when have many readers cared for such discussion?

Colonel T. E. Lawrence's long awaited "Revolt in the Desert," cut down from his longer work, "The Seven Pillars of Wisdom," seems to be getting the attention it deserves, though I am not sure of this; it is a great book, and it may not thunder in the bookstores. Personally, I was more interested in learning through it about Feisal and his fanatical countrymen than I was in listening to the Methodist-Baptist lingo of Brother Elmer. And the season has offered or will offer half a dozen books of unquestionable distinction. There is to be a new essay by Santayana. Edna St. Vincent Millay's "The King's Henchman" was a little disappointing as drama; but it amply fulfilled its author's promise as a poet. Eugene O'Neill is soon to publish a full-length play, "Marco Millions," in advance of its performance in any theater. I cannot doubt that it will be important, and I am interested to see Mr. O'Neill thus coming into his own as a dramatist whose plays are recognized for their literary significance as soon as written. I am looking forward with especial eagerness to John Livingston Lowes's "The Road to Xanadu," which I understand is a very long and ingenious exploration, by the author of one of the few good modern books on poetry, into the processes of Coleridge as he composed "Kubla Khan" and otherwise discovered himself in verse. It ought to take its place among the richest offerings of the season in belles-lettres. So already has Paul Valéry's "Variety," which gives American readers their first opportunity to sample the intellectual wares of a very much talked-of Frenchman. In Maxim Gorki's "Decadence" we are said to have, after years of waiting, another Russian masterpiece. Roger Fry, a truly distinguished critic of art, adds to his distinction with "Transformations." And there are announcements of two extended works in American history which ought to make a great deal of difference. One is Charles and Mary Beard's "The Rise of American Civilization" and the other is Vernon L. Parrington's "Main Currents in American Thought." The Beards are better known than Mr. Parrington for a certain keen integrity of criticism which makes the reading of their histories an intellectual pleasure; but Mr. Parrington has this quality in abundance and one may expect from the four volumes together a reinterpretation of American ideas which will be at the same time conscientious and entertaining.

The list of spring books is heavily loaded with titles carrying an Americana flavor. But not too heavily. Never, it would seem, has there been so much demand for volumes dealing with our past, important or unimportant; never has there been so much willingness on the part of authors and publishers to supply the demand freshly and intelligently. The "Anthony Comstock" of Heywood Broun and Margaret Leech, making as it does an analysis not only of Comstock but of censorship, scarcely could have been done so well, if done at all, in an earlier generation. The process of revising our judgments of standard American authors goes on with two works devoted to Hawthorne, by Herbert Gorman and Lloyd Morris, and with Van Wyck Brooks's six essays on Emerson. Mary Best, I am sure, looks squarely at Tom Paine, Joseph Dillaway Sawyer produces one more extended life of Washington, and The American Library announces an edition of William Maclay's fascinating "Journal." All this in the field of biography, which also sees this spring an extraordinary number of important works coming from abroad—the "James Bryce" of H. A. L. Fisher, the "Morley" of Francis Hirst, three separate lives of Buddha, the "Napoleon" and the "Wilhelm Hohenzollern" of Emil Ludwig, and Aldous Huxley's new edition of Haydon's "Memoirs" (to be compared, as someone has pointed out, with Susan Glaspell's portrait of another unadjusted genius, her husband, George Cram Cook, in "The Road to the Temple"). In the field of American history there is Bernard Fay's study of France and the United States at the close of the eighteenth century, there is John Bach McMaster's new volume on the Lincoln period, and there is Hendrik Willem van Loon's "America" (with pictures). C. E. M. Joad looks at us and calls our land "The Babbitt Warren"; André Siegfried announces that "America Comes of Age"; while here at home Langdon Mitchell more modestly tries his hand at "Understanding America," and in "Fire Under the Andes" Elizabeth Shepley Sergeant is content to analyze the genius of a few living Americans. I have not spoken of such antiquarian excursions as those made by Edna Kenton into the Indian sections of the "Jesuit Relations" or by Richardson Wright among "Hawkers and Walkers in Early America."

In fiction it is good to see that Arthur Waley brings forth a third volume of the "Tale of Genji" and Romain Rolland the third part of "The Soul Enchanted," and that new stories are published by Arnold Bennett, Theodore Dreiser, Ludwig Lewisohn, Thomas Mann, Arthur Schnitzler, Olive Schreiner, Evelyn Scott, Upton Sinclair, Hermann Sudermann, Sigrid Undset, Sylvia Townsend Warner, Virginia Woolf, and E. H. Young. I have heard it said, finally, that the season is poor in poetry; but E. A. Robinson, Robinson Jeffers, and "H. D." are on the list—the first with "Tristram," a major American poem—and so I cannot agree.

Morley and Bryce

Early Life and Letters of John Morley. By Francis W. Hirst. The Macmillan Company. Two volumes. $10.

James Bryce. By H. A. L. Fisher. The Macmillan Company. Two volumes. $8.

JOHN MORLEY and James Bryce (late lordships sit lightly on their names) had much in common in the circumstances of their life and work. They were born in the same year, grew into manhood during the great Victorian era of complacent progress, passed from an early manhood of scholarship and literature into parliamentary life as members of the radical wing of the Liberal Party in the great Gladstonian epoch, spent many years of arduous labor as members of the Commons and as Ministers, lived through the horrors of the Great War, and died in the disillusionment of the Bad Peace. Neither was "meant" for politics, or equipped with the moral obtuseness and capacity of self-deception needed for supreme success in a field where nice intellectual distinctions and fine moral scruples are out of place. Neither showed his best qualities in the House of Commons, though Morley did doughty service as a platform speaker in the early times of the Home Rule struggle, while Bryce was stirred to moral eloquence in the cause of oppressed Eastern nationalities and both of them bore a gallant part in the uphill fight for higher education. In substance their Victorian liberalism was the same, in its faith in representative institutions, its support of nationalism, freedom of trade, and peaceful relations between nations, its distrust of the imperial spirit in the relations between strong and weak peoples, its application of the healing principle of equality of opportunity in every sphere of conduct. Neither of them had much trust in governments as instruments for the positive welfare of the governed, and the growing tendency toward "social" not to say "socialistic" legislation was to both suspect, though Morley in his last years, disgusted by the conduct of his Liberal associates during the war, entered into friendly relations with leaders of the Labor Party. Neither at any time showed any clear perception of the need for revision of liberal doctrines which the constantly growing pressure of economics into politics demands of modern statesmen.

But the main interest of these two biographies lies outside the strict diocese of politics. For both men won their distinction in other fields. Morley had made his mark as the great exponent of the intellectual makers of the French Revolution and as one of the chief editors and journalists of his age before turning to parliamentary life, while Bryce took on practical politics as an adjunct to his busy career as professor, lawyer, historian, and traveler. In all essential characters the two men were widely different. Trained in the schools of Bentham, J. S. Mill, and Comte, the rationalism, utilitarianism, positivism of the mid-century meant much to Morley, little or nothing to Bryce. Indeed, no more revealing passage occurs in Mr. Fisher's brief and fine commentary upon Bryce's mind than the disclosure of his complete indifference toward that large province of the intellectual life termed philosophy. While Morley remained through life a complete, though tolerant, skeptic in religious matters, Bryce seems to have retained a vigorous sort of free Christianity, based partly perhaps on some strain of mysticism, partly on reverence for the creed of his fathers. While Morley, therefore, was a freethinker in the full sense of the word, for Bryce there were sanctities he would not probe with reason.

The very principles which Bryce brought to bear upon politics were more purely moral and intuitional than those which inspired Morley. From Burke and the French thinkers, from Mill and the great controversies raised by Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, and the coterie of London intellectualists to which he attached himself in early manhood, Morley drew an armory of doctrine which he strove in no pedantic spirit to apply to the practical causes of human progress. Age and experience transposed his use of these weapons of reason; expediencies won more and more upon principles in his official life. But he remained through life a rationalist in a stricter sense than Bryce.

Both men had singularly attractive personalities. Morley was the more vivacious, with more heightened and brilliant expression alike with tongue and pen, drawing on a rich store of personal reminiscences with bright phrasing and flickering allusiveness, perhaps the most interesting talker of his time. Bryce could pour out more copious learning, excelled in sagacious criticism and sharp probings into dark issues of fact. Full of a quiet appreciative humor, he had little of the irony which gave sap to much of Morley's talk and writing. Bryce's greatest claim to personal distinction lay in that he knew more than any other man of his own or any other time. There may be tucked away in the seclusion of some university or other home of learning two or three scholars who have read and remembered as much booklore as Bryce, but when one takes into account his first-hand intercourse with men and things in all parts of the habitable globe, he assuredly stands outside all competition. From earliest boyhood, through his long span of over fourscore years, he set himself the task of Herodotus to visit strange lands, see everything there was to see, and question everyone he met. How different from the ordinary tourist was his travel! The geology, the flora and fauna, the archaeology, history, current politics and economics, the scenery, the habits of the people—he gathered everything into his net. Nor did he confine himself to the main thoroughfares of travel; he penetrated every bypath and recess in search of information. "He had a genius for putting the right questions." Could any other man have written his "American Commonwealth," or that amazing work of erudition, "Modern Democracies," the product of octogenarian wisdom?

Neither book under review can rank as a full biography. Mr. Hirst's two volumes only bring his hero up to 1885, while Mr. Fisher deals lightly with Bryce's long parliamentary career and devotes virtually the whole of the second volume to the chief task of his latest years, his close relations with America as ambassador, missioner, and informal correspondent. Morley had a favorite question he used to put to anyone who praised a book or other work: "What does it all come to?" Now, no great formal achievement in the world of politics can be attributed to either of these men. Posterity will regard Morley as a very considerable figure in literature, as a great interpreter of thought, and as a brilliant commentator upon life. But his work for Ireland, for India, and for other political causes to which he devoted so much energy could have been done as well or better by a ruder, less sensitive politician. So too with Bryce; his vehement campaigns for expelling the Turk from Europe and rescuing Armenia and other subject nationalities came to naught, while his diagnosis of the causation of the Great War led him to oppose every attempt at peace without victory, though he lived to realize something of the crimes and policies of a distorted peace.

Bryce's great work lay in his skilful and persistent efforts at a better understanding between Americans and British. For this he had a special gift. It was well said of him that he was "a natural American," by which was meant that his qualities and aptitudes expressly fitted him for mixing in easy, friendly, understanding terms with all sorts of people in the great republic. Class, race, creed, culture presented no barrier to him. But especially was he sympathetic with the descendants of the puritan stocks, both East-Anglian and Scotch-Irish, who have figured so powerfully among the influential forces in modern America. During his numerous visits he moved largely among the educational, political, and business leaders, absorbing knowledge of their country and communicating knowledge of his own. This personal bond between the countries has counted for not a little in the years of strain through which we are now passing. Nor was this influence confined to personal contacts and oral communications. Apart from his great books, all through his life his pen was busily engaged in articles and letters directed to the same end. "One of his many occupations during the eighties was to contribute a London Letter to the New York Nation, 'the best weekly not only in America but in the world' (I, p. 178)," and the most valuable passages of Mr. Fisher's second volume are from private letters addressed to President Lowell, Dr. Eliot, and other old friends.

Mr. Hirst's "Thomas Jefferson" will have made him well known to many American readers as a skilful and sympathetic interpreter of liberalism which endures through the centuries and transcends political frontiers. Nor has Bryce been less fortunate in his interpreter. Mr. Fisher's wide range of historical erudition and his personal contacts with the art of government have well fitted him for the difficult task he has here so successfully accomplished.

Bruegel of the Peasants

Peter Bruegel the Elder. By Virgil Barker. The Arts Publishing Corporation. $2.

THE reproduction in permanent form of Mr. Barker's admirable essay which appeared in the Bruegel number of The Arts will be welcomed by all who hold those "damnable opinions" which direct men's minds back to the sweet-smelling mold of the earth uncontaminated, unsoured by insalubrious miasmas of mysticism. Mr. Barker is one of those privileged people whose imagination is capable of taking fire when it comes in contact with genius. Below the restrained and orderly measure of his prose we feel the underswell of an aesthetic and intellectual response, vigorous and authentic. By taste and training he is well fitted to appreciate and interpret the technical excellence of Bruegel's work, and, what is even more important, to understand the philosophic implications latent in the amazing canvases of the great artist. For it has long been recognized that Bruegel is one of the greatest champions of that "open secret" which has been carried down, from age to age, by certain bold and enlightened spirits, the secret namely that it is wisest for the sons of men to give little heed to the false prophets who would have them cast deceitful glances up at the sky. Bruegel's work, like the writings of Homer, Rabelais, Montaigne, Shakespeare, Goethe, and Anatole France, would seem to suggest in no faltering tone that the highest reward on earth is to be found in contemplating with inspired vision the simple poetry that surrounds the life of man, as generation after generation, for so brief a period, he goes out into the fields to sow and to reap. Let Robert Browning and Alfred Noyes whistle never so prettily the disciples of Bruegel of the Peasants will not easily be persuaded that crested larks nest in the heavens. There is miracle enough in the sudden crying of a child taken from its mother's womb, in the love of a girl and a boy, in the shocking majesty of Death!

"The earth is the only thing that knows how to deal sensibly with man." This is what, as Mr. Barker so admirably indicates, Peter Bruegel iterates over and over again. For this sturdy countryman whose genius made him tremble like

by EDWIN MUIR

There are certain rare books which evoke in the sensitive reader the feeling of having lived the life of one of the characters. Such a work is The Marionette, the first fiction of Edwin Muir, critic, poet, and philosopher. The mind of the reader withdraws from the life about him just as the mind of the boy in this book retires from the coarser fabric of his living into his dreams.

Suddenly a welcome reality enters these dreams: a marionette transformed by the dreamer into an idol of beauty at whose shrine he worships with a love and pain far greater than most mortals devote to their flesh-and-blood gods.

There follows a tale of delicate but firm conception, distinctly for the literary connoisseur.

springtime foliage, burgeon like August fruit, was incapable of envisaging any scene, secular or religious, as being independent of what was entirely natural. If this Fleming had been present at the crucifixion of Our Lord, at that most intense hour in our history when for one supreme moment, to those present, the very veil of our senses seemed on the point of being rent from top to bottom, we can well conceive that the dicing of the soldiery, the braying of the Palm-Sunday ass, or the squeaking of the twilight bats would have been what chiefly occupied his "silly thoughts."

He understood well that "Death is inexorable, man of little moment." For him life as he knew it upon earth sufficed, like Wolfgang Goethe he had no wish to evade truth. Why should he? Without the knowledge of the long hours of absolute peace, of absolute oblivion that is the eventual heritage of every peasant and burgher, these people of his could never dance jigs, peel the bark off trees, prod their cattle, slide upon ice, and eat devil's pancakes at the rate they do in his pictures. He would not have the world changed by one jot. "Big fish eat little fish"; he knows it and he approves of it. He likes human beings when they are most at their ease. If they are gross then he would have them be gross, would have them snouting on the ground like hogs after beach mast. If they are tender he would have them be tender, trembling with compassionate solicitude over the Massacre of the Innocents.

Mr. Barker's admirable appreciation reveals all this to us. Our only regret is that once or twice by the use of an ill-chosen word he mars the weight and dignity of his style. "Part of his realism is his robust laughter, which is the only solution to the fix in which human beings find themselves." And again: "In Ghent a mob sacked the Abbey of St. Peter and . . . ran smashingly at large through the city." Still more distressing: "But one can move from one to another without any feeling of shifting gear or changing speed." In contrast to such minor lapses is a sentence like the following: "In giving himself over so unreservedly to the impermanent, Bruegel took what was for him the only way to the permanent." That is a discerning observation and goes far to explain the artistic power of this extraordinary painter, "who loved to frighten his companions, often also his own pupils, with all kinds of goblin noises."

The Lion and the Fox. By Wyndham Lewis. Harper and Brothers. $4.

The Art of Being Ruled. By Wyndham Lewis. Harper and Brothers. $4.

FIFTEEN years ago it might well have seemed to the casual student of contemporary thought that the world had settled comfortably down to a liberal orthodoxy. It had, to be sure, agreed to the existence of many individual disagreements, but since it had accepted variety rather than unity as the most characteristic feature of the aspect under which the universe was to be regarded and had recognized opinion rather than truth as the ultimate possible achievement of the human mind, it was not surprised that opinions should differ. Detailed disagreements notwithstanding, democratic conceptions of the function of government, mechanistic theories of natural science, and relativistic theories of both art and morals had coalesced into a recognizable type of thinking, and whatever voices were raised against it were definitely voices from the past.

The last few years have seen, on the contrary, the emergence of tendencies which, taken together, seem to represent the beginning of a revolt against this type of thinking. In science a neo-vitalism invents such conceptions as that embodied in the theory of emergents and, seizing upon an anomaly like that which the Quantum Theory presents to the mechanist, attempts to revise our whole conception of nature by regarding what was formerly called "dead" material as something which presents characteristic features of the organism; in politics one may observe a recrudescence of authoritarian theories even apart from such definite practical embodiments of them as Fascism and Bolshevism; and in the theory of criticism there is a revival of interest in "standards" and "impersonality," both of which seemed to have been disposed of for the last time when Anatole France made a football of Brunetière. One cannot read, let us say, A. N. Whitehead on science and T. S. Eliot on criticism without realizing that they both represent, not a continuation from late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century traditions, but a break with them. They are radical in the literal sense of the word because, however they may tend in a direction contrary to that of contemporary "radicalism," their ideas involve a complete revision of the basic assumptions accepted by the "advanced thinkers" of a few decades ago.

This new movement has no single and universally recognized leader; it has only—though the term is unfortunate in view of the fact that the movement might, on its political and artistic side, be called authoritarian—"representative men." And perhaps none of them has been concerned with more of its aspects than Wyndham Lewis has been. A friend of Eliot and of Ezra Pound, he was first known as an ultra-modern painter and critic of art; later he published, some ten years ago, the novel "Tarr," which anticipated "Ulysses" in making a definite break with the socio-romantic traditions of contemporary fiction; and now, within the past year, he has published here the two books at present under consideration—one of which is an extended piece of literary criticism dealing with a particular subject, and the other a general discussion of government in the broadest sense of the word. A rooted opposition to the popularization of art and philosophy is, it may be added, part of the new movement, and Mr. Lewis's books, though written with great force, are difficult reading. They make no concessions to those who have come to expect a journalistic ease even in discussions which concern themselves with weighty abstractions.

In "The Lion and the Fox," subtitled "The Role of the Hero in the Plays of Shakespeare," Mr. Lewis advances a highly interesting conception of Shakespearean tragedy. He considers the crucial conflict of the Elizabethan mental life to have been the conflict between the ideas of feudal Christianity and the new realism of Machiavelli, and he bids us regard Shakespeare as a man who, without Machiavelli's hard, exclusive interest in man as a political animal, was, nevertheless, fully aware of the conflict, and who presents in his chief heroic figures the spectacle of a series of men with whom he greatly sympathizes, but who, because of what Mr. Lewis calls their "Celtic" ideals, go down in defeat before the forces upon which Machiavelli's realistic philosophy is built. Shakespeare, so considered, becomes then a greater and robuster Cervantes, dealing essentially with the same conflict as that with which Cervantes was concerned.

Considered merely as a specific piece of interpretative literary criticism, this theory, as expounded in Mr. Lewis's learned and laborious book, is of considerable interest, but it is even more important when he relates it, as he does, to the whole complex of ideas exposed in the more inclusive statement of his general philosophy, "The Art of Being Ruled." This philosophy, or this world program, is composed of too many interrelated parts to be summarized in a review, but some idea of its nature and temper may be given. Hating science as the influence which has destroyed human values by leading us to regard them under analogies drawn from the world of non-human things, hating democracy because it has established the reign of the inferior man, and hating Nietzsche because he vulgarized the idea of aristocrcy by making every mediocrity claim the privileges of the superman, Mr. Lewis has found a political ideal which is that of a sort of Pax Romana coextensive with the world, and an artistic ideal which is that of a classicism possessing the standards of right reason and order—both of these things to be brought about by an abolition of that amateurism in government and art which democracy has encouraged.

A criticism of these ideals cannot possibly be made a matter of a few phrases, but whatever one may ultimately think of them, Mr. Lewis has a mind of arresting force. Since he is one of those writers whose whole philosophy and temperament are cast in an unfamiliar mold, there is scarcely a page which can be read without active attention and which does not provoke some active process of acceptance or resistance. No one in the slightest degree interested in the attempt now being made in many quarters to formulate a philosophy radically different from that which has gradually gained almost universal ascendence during the last two hundred years can afford to neglect him. He is one of the most incisive of the neo-radicals whose thought is a continuation from scholasticism rather than from anything which has come in since the Renaissance.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

What Was the Question?

Why Religion? By Horace M. Kallen. Boni and Liveright. $3.

THIS is a peculiarly baffling book. It is maddening in its gratuitous obscurities and ambiguous in its aims. Setting out apparently to answer the question Why religion? it leaves at least one reader utterly in the dark as to what questions have been asked, what answers have been given, and what the answers mean. Mr. Kallen has obviously read a good deal about religious practices and ideas and not a little of the now aging "new" psychology. There is any amount of illusory information, scrambled into any amount of pretentious and irrelevant psychological jargon. The range is from sex orgies in primitive religion and matriarchy in primitive society to the organization of the church of Christian Science and the methods of deifying a president in a democratic society. There are the curiously complicated statements of any number of miscellaneous ideas, from the dismissal of the clergy as a guild whose craft is that of manipulating the supernatural to the familiar Jamesian idea that religious belief emerges and becomes important in times of personal and social crisis. There are confused trappings of the latest fashions in psychology. The Œdipus complex and the fear of the Father are disproportionately invoked in the confused and omnivorous story Mr. Kallen gives of the making of the gods. But when it is all over, and it is one of the most fatiguing books this writer has ever read, one is compelled to ask: Why this book on religion? The unpleasant conclusion is inevitable that these are random notes for lectures carelessly exfoliated into a book.

A writer on any of the serious and profound issues of existence certainly does not owe it to anybody, and certainly not to professors of philosophy, to be simple. There is no law compelling him even to be clear. But to judge a book one must be able to detect what it is about. If that cannot be done, after careful efforts by a reader familiar with the literature of the subject, the book already stands judged.

The chapter on The Religious Experience, which ought to be fairly central, is certainly twenty-four pages of the most confusing miscellany available in contemporary philosophy. The net result which may be arrived at after considerable effort is that the religious experience occurs at time of crisis and that it becomes the starting-point for reformation of old cults and the beginning of new ones. But all this one might have found out much more comfortably from James. Mr. Kallen proceeds, very indirectly, to show how the beliefs that arise from the religious experience are "preferences" rather than merely acquiescences. He indicates, also in the most roundabout way, that religious beliefs function as instruments of salvation in perturbed lives or societies. There is a complicated statement of the simple facts concerning tabu, mana, totem, and ritual, facts out of Frazer expounded in language out of nowhere.

It would be foolish to scold a thinker for his verbal mannerisms unless these seriously interfered with the reading and understanding of his book. One might pass over Mr. Kallen's grammatical ailments—"To the experimentalist Christianity is a way of life and he proposes to translate the way into the plain and simple language understanded of the times," "Progress is not the same with perfection," and a dozen other mistakes that seem deliberate aspirations to elegance. One could forgive Mr. Kallen a hundred annoying affectations that are half the time simply incompetent English: "Judaists" where he means "Jew," "conventual" where he means "conventional," "formulary" where he means "formula," and such jargon as "omnocompetence," "intercombination," "paramountcy," and "repristination." What one cannot forgive him is the elaborate verbiage in which he dresses up to the point of absurdity trivial ideas or none at all. In Mr. Kallen's diction, "one thing leads to another" becomes "Each fresh development becomes a condition and circumstance for the exfoliation of others." One cannot forgive a "humanist" (as he describes himself in the preface) for publishing a book that save in the titles to its chapters seems to have no plan at all, and, save for the determined reader, no attainable coherence or clarity.

Two or three parts of the book apparently say something new and interesting. It is a pity Mr. Kallen could not have said these things without ruinously interrupting and obfuscating himself. Mr. Kallen has suggestive ideas on the importance of property in the solidification of church doctrine and power. He has something new to say about the eruption of the unpredicted in experience as the essence of the supernatural. At least so far as one can understand. There seems very little point in answering the question Why religion? with riddles. Why bother?

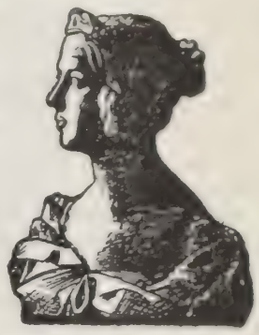
Breadless Ireland

The Bible in Ireland. By Asenath Nicholson. Edited with an Introduction by Alfred Tresidder Sheppard. The John Day Company. $3.



TRAVELING through the length and breadth of Ireland in 1845, a Vermont woman, Asenath Nicholson, observed a state of affairs which should have aroused all the instincts of self-preservation which the country possessed and even forced the thing that called itself a government to take some action. In large tracts of the country it was not possible to get bread. "Not a loaf of bread was in this town, and the Methodist lady where we stopped said there had been none for six weeks." There was another town where "I went from street to street, and almost from door to door, to find a roll of bread and a cup of cocoa. . . . At last I found a few small loaves, took a penny's worth, and left the town to walk to Oranmore, a distance of fourteen miles." There are, of course, other things besides bread which people can live on—meat, meal, potatoes. But in Ireland of that time meat and meal were even rarer than bread. There were only potatoes.

No one in 1845 seemed to reckon on what would happen if potatoes failed in the soil out of which too many potato crops had been taken already. A catastrophe came and a second catastrophe came on top of it, with such heart-rending consequences as we can read of in Carleton's novel "The Black Prophet." But the leaders of public opinion at the time seemed to be making no reckoning. "Three hundred and sixty-five days a year we have the potato," a young peasant said to Mrs. Nicholson. "The blackguard of a Raleigh who brought 'em here entailed a curse upon the laborer that has broke his heart. Because the landlord sees we can live and work hard on 'em he grinds us down in our wages, and then despises us because we are ignorant and ragged." This is the clearest judgment made upon Ireland of the time by any contemporary. If only a few thousand of his kind had felt it they could have saved themselves and their race from irreparable disaster.

The landowners took everything except a boiling of potatoes from the people and spent the greater part of their revenue abroad; the Protestant church by law established took a tenth

THE LAST VICTORIANS

By ARTHUR A. BAUMANN
Formerly Editor of the London "Saturday Review"

"A brilliant book—the gems are genuine—pungent, opinionated (biased if you will), sharp in outline and color—a definite addition to the biographical literature of the period."—London Saturday Review.

The ideas and prejudices, the idiosyncrasies and the genius of every prominent statesman from Disraeli to Lord Oxford. Alone among political writers of today, Mr. Baumann can claim to have lived among the great Victorians, but at the same time to be able to approach them from the standpoint of one who still plays an active part in the world of affairs and letters today. He has a caustic pen and is unsparing in his criticism but he is also intimate in his treatment of his subjects, all of whom, with two exceptions, he has seen and heard. of their crop and stock from the peasantry; but the revolution that was made due by such social injustice was being slacked down. "They feel daily more and more the iron hand that crushes them; and were it not that Father Matthew has sobered them, and O'Connell is enjoining 'Peace, peace,' their forbearance would cease." So Ireland staggered on to the disaster of 1846 and 1847. After that disaster another Ireland came into being: gone was the Ireland that was mainly Gaelic-speaking, with its traditional poetry, stories, and music; gone was the Ireland of Carleton's peasants and Charles Lever's squires. An Ireland mainly English-speaking, shorn of its traditional arts, shorn, too, of its kindliness, its love of diversion, and a certain honesty in dealing, came into being.

Asenath Nicholson told herself that she went over to Ireland to bring the Scriptures into the cabins, but we must believe that what really brought her there was some imaginative emotion—such a passionate and magnanimous curiosity as brought Charles Doughty to the Bedouin tents. "Often when seated at my fireside," she writes, "I have told those most dear to my heart that God would one day allow me to breathe the mountain air of the sea-girt coast of Ireland; to sit in their cabins and there learn what soil has nurtured, what hardships have disciplined a race so patient and so impetuous, so revengeful and so forgiving, so proud and so humble, so obstinate and so docile, so witty and so simple." At last, with hardly any money in her pocket, without any recommendations to the powerful and the influential, she went among the people of Ireland. They shared what they had with her, and she, with a hardiness that seems incredible, subsisted on a scanty and monotonous ration, slept on bare floors, tramped incredible miles along unsheltered places, with the rain and the wind buffeting her. She mentions that the people mistook her "for a holy Saint Brighid." She did not know that according to the most beautiful of Irish traditions Saint Brighid often went through the country, living with the people and suffering with them, blessing them and bringing them peace. More often than she knew, this Vermont woman, with her disinterestedness, her readings of the Gospel stories, her practical kindliness, must have been taken for Saint Brighid as she sat in some poor and simple cabin.

Her book was called originally "Ireland's Welcome to the Stranger," and its reissue with a changed title is well justified. Let us say at once that it has no episodes such as those which make "The Bible in Spain" so memorable. The writer has nothing of Borrow's dramatic invention. She gives us the experiences of a discerning woman of good judgment and good heart, who writes straightforwardly though by no means prosaically. On every page of her book there is character. And in the last ten chapters, in which she describes her journey through Kerry and Connacht, she is vivid and often eloquent. Can we forget the old man who guided her around that "bay of all bays," Bantry Bay, and whom she subsequently found seated upon a wall eating a piece of bread?

> I asked, "Do you expect to go to heaven?" "No, ma'am, I shall never go to heaven. The poor, ma'am, are great sinners, and must not expect to go there." "The poor will certainly go to heaven, if they repent." He still insisted. "The poor are very wicked, and must not expect to go there. No, no, ma'am, I shall not get there." As he was departing, I said: "John, I shall see you no more, and I beg you to go to Christ and be saved." He paused, resting on his stick; and giving me a piercing glance of despondingbitterness, he shook his head, and answered emphatically: "That can never be for me."

She saw Ireland verging on dissolution, and she noted not so much the misery of the people as the rare virtue still possessed by them—something that was apart from the world and that could help them to form a real nation. It was in the Kerry women whom she looked after.

> I looked after them among the rocks, more with admiration for the moment than with pity; for what hearts, amid splendor and ease, lighter than these? And what heads and stomachs, faring sumptuously every day, freer from aches than theirs, with the potato and the sup of milk? This woman who danced before me was more than fifty, and I do not believe that the daughter of Herodias herself was more graceful in her movements, more beautiful in complexion or symmetry than was this dark-haired matron of the mountains of Kerry.

This Bible-vending Vermont woman had the early American passion for freedom and democracy, the reluctance to accept any form of oppression. Seldom did Ireland ever take in a stranger who so deeply sympathized with her, who had such will to understand her. Not knowing Catholic lore and custom, she missed understanding the whole of Ireland. Still, she was never misled. And how generous was her loyalty to what she saw and what she understood. Pre-War Ford

The Good Soldier. By Ford Madox Ford. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.50.

MR. FORD'S best pre-war novel, now reprinted as the first volume in the collected Avignon edition, is of distinct historical and sociological value. Read at this late date, it serves to recall a multitude of tender memories. Its carefully loosened narrative form ("one goes back, one goes forward"), the anxious tenuity of its psychology, and the quality of its characters—all remind us of Mr. Ford's master, Henry James. On the whole "The Good Soldier" is preferable to James at his best, though not perhaps, to the confirmed Jacobean, at his worst. At any rate, amid all his literary excitements, Mr. Ford has always managed to retain a firm grip on his syntax and he has adhered consistently to a clear and masculine style, less forceful here, to be sure, than in his war tetralogy.

The two outstanding characteristics of James's personages are reproduced with sedulous care. First, Mr. Ford's people are one and all so filthily wealthy that it almost doesn't matter what happens to them. One has really to apply an onion to the eye of one's soul in order to be able to weep over the amorous tragedies of a group of people whose average yearly income is about a quarter of a million. In the second place, the formula James came to England to learn is the basis of this work by his former disciple. All of Mr. Ford's creatures—Edward Ashburnham, the Good Soldier of the title who reminds one of Stephen Leacock's irresistible aristocrat who "drained a dipper of brandy and water and became again the perfect English gentleman"; Leonora, his glacial and efficient wife; Dowell, the simple-minded American narrator with a personality like a walking-stick, and Florence, his coldly sensual wife with her noble ambition to be the great lady of a Wiltshire estate—all of them are dominated by the mystic necessity for preserving what is called "good form." We have already met this Toryism in Mr. Ford's Tietjens; but Tietjens, fortunately, was educated and humanized by a war which was not at all sporting. Here, however, we have a complete set of museum specimens. Nothing could more completely mark the difference between pre-war English society and our own deracinated generation than the importance Mr. Ford's people attach to doing the correct thing and concealing properly all the improper emotions. Like all good Christians they live by a divinely-revealed Book; but it is a Book of Etiquette. The most amateur psychologist might have foreseen that eventually tragedy would visit all of them, almost entirely as a result of this continuous series of repressions. Edward cuts his long English throat, Dowell becomes a sort of professional cuckold for ten years, the young girl Nancy goes mad, and Florence Dowell swallows prussic acid. And all this because they must so complicate their lives by silences, secrecies, and afternoon tea gestures that an explosion is necessary to resolve the tangle.

Even if this apotheosizing of the "cricket" psychology were absent, one other quality in the book would avail to remind us of its predominantly historical interest. I speak of the preternatural seriousness with which the subject of adultery is treated. Like many English and would-be-English aristocrats, these people are all sentimentalists. (Edward, for example, in a moment of weakness, weeps for days because two hereditary Van Dycks and some family silver are sold from his estate.) This romanticism is most easily excited by the problem of adultery, the theme on which "The Good Soldier" is based. Hearts break, eyes glaze, hands tremble, long, dreadful silences ensue—and why? Because Florence deceives her calf-like husband by sleeping with the glorious Edward. Because Edward's wife knows it, but must not notice it. Because Florence's husband must never be made aware of it.

Reading this story (sub-titled A Tale of Passion), one becomes conscious of one of two things: either that county-grown English novelists are incurable romantics; or that the entire viewpoint in regard to adultery has undergone a radical transformation, at least in literature, since 1914. A modern civilized writer, if he wishes to retain any reputation for sane judgment and maturity, is forced to acknowledge the almost complete contemporary collapse of the cavalier love ethic; and if he desires to employ the adultery motive, he is forced to return to the only methods which still hold dignity and interest for the modern intelligence. He must treat adultery either farcically, as Molière did; or ironically, as Joyce does. To view it through a medium of romantic emotion, either in the lava-like D'Annunzio manner or in the restrained "English" manner of Mr. Ford, is to invite the attention not of the critical reader but of the antiquarian, the historian of morals, and the necrologist.

On the other hand, "The Good Soldier" is filled with many arresting, almost amazing, qualities. Mr. Ford, for example, employing some peculiar magic of style and viewpoint, has managed to tell a fairly interesting story about a group of almost utterly unintelligent people. Leonora is the only character who seems to be in complete possession of a complete brain; the others swish their riding crops, sit at the county assizes, drink port, invest in consols, and lose a hundred thousand without batting a single English eyelash—all this with the regularity of well-bred robots. It was formerly thought (or should have been) that the place for dull people was in the naturalistic novel of low life; but Henry James and Ford Madox Ford have managed to construct an admirable art-form about these same people in high society. It is a glorious victory.

Who Killed Cock Robin?

An Adventure in Constructive Finance. By Carter Glass. Doubleday, Page and Company. $3.

THAT ill-fated book "The Intimate Papers of Colonel House" appears to have given great pain to everybody concerned —to the public, which vainly tried to read it; to the publishers, who mistakenly figured on selling a huge edition of it; and last, but by no means least, to Senator Glass, whose sense of justice it outraged because Professor Seymour editorially ascribed credit to the Texas Colonel in connection with the writing of the Federal Reserve Act and the securing of its passage. For Professor Seymour asserts that "the Colonel was the unseen guardian angel of the bill," with much else of like purport; while Senator Glass in reply asseverates that "Professor Seymour's narrative on 'Currency Reform' is a profanation of history," with much, much more, of like and liker tenor. As the Senator's book has already appeared in serial form, newspaper readers will need only to be reminded that in giving major credit for the Federal Reserve Act to President Wilson, the story in its inference, though not in its words, does not withhold a proper meed of praise from the Chairman of the House Committee on Currency and Banking, who in those far-off ante-bellum days was none other than Carter Glass of Virginia.

Somehow the main question at issue does not really seem so dreadfully important. After all, we do have a Federal Reserve system which has effectively centralized our banking reserves and given us an asset currency. The devising of it was a job that required economic knowledge, political ingenuity, and grueling hard work. The Chairman of the House Committee did his full share, and he doesn't propose at this late date to have the credit for the job passed on to Colonel House or Mr. Paul Warburg or Senator Aldrich or any of the other people whose friends claim the glory for them now that the system has shown its worth. No; let the glory go to the dead President, says Mr. Glass. Well, well, it's all natural enough, and the book, judiciously read, tells a deal about the legislative history of the measure. One lays it down with a question in mind: When is a central bank not a central bank? A moment's reflection gives the answer: When it is a Federal Reserve System, and when the people are therefore preserved against the machiavellian machinations of Wall Street. Truly, great is Diana of the Ephesians! But it is a good banking system all the same.

The Epicure's Guide to France. Volume I. Paris, the Environs of Paris, Normandy. By Curnonsky and Marcel Rouff. Harper and Brothers. $4.

BOHEMIA, as all wise men know, is a state of the mind, not of the map. It exists only in anticipation and retrospection. While hacking our way through we call it poverty, loneliness, lack of recognition, and the devil of a hard time. The classic answer to him who complains "I'm not the man I used to be" is "No, and you never were." And to the young husband who declares "You don't make pies like mother used to make" the modern wife retorts "Neither did she."

Well, does that mean that one can no longer write of la vie de bohême without expecting to be laughed out of court? I hope not. For imagination is as real as statistics, and the stuff that dreams are made of is sometimes more solid and lasting than that which goes into elevator apartments and skyscraper offices. An outstanding characteristic of a generation that is trying to be realistic is its passionate reaching after romance. Although we have ceased to believe in our gods as gospel, we cling to them as a beautiful fairy story. It is still lawful to manufacture nectar and ambrosia provided we do not violate the pure-food-and-drugs act by advertising them as cures for consumption and cancer as well as for nostalgia and housemaid's knee.

If Jean Émile-Bayard sees Montmartre and the Latin Quarter through too golden a haze, it is at least comforting to pick up a couple of books by a Frenchman who cares for history and tradition, in contrast to the volumes by smart Americans which concern themselves only with the "gay night life" and a thousand and one asininities which exist chiefly for foreign consumption. The "sacred butte" of Montmartre (not to be confused with the boulevard district just below it) has in recent years been the retreat of French artists in distinction from the colony in the Montparnasse quarter, which is international. Even during the World War I recall that modern apartment houses were pushing upward on the butte, in odd contrast to the old buildings and lanes about them, and since the signing of the peace the demolition has been yet more rapid. Monsieur Émile-Bayard tells of the effort of the artists to hold their own, but he says: "The legend that the artist is a Bohemian is dead and buried."

So, too, the post-war Latin Quarter is grown more somber and serious. "The spirit of present-day youth reaches maturity before the due season." This apparently in spite of the craze for athletics—which Monsieur Émile-Bayard finds distasteful. "Formerly brain ruled muscle; now, it is to be feared, the contrary is the case. Youth once grew enthusiastic over thought; now, particularly since the war which made youth very if not wholly practical, it worships champions!" The grisette has disappeared. Even a decade ago, when I lived within sound of the bells of the Sorbonne on the Street of Mister-the-Prince, the word had dropped out of current language, while the young lady herself was of doubtful authenticity. And now:

"There remains in the Latin Quarter as a worthy companion for the zealous student only the étudiante, the 'studentess.' These are hard times and the spirit of the feminist movement peeps out in women's courageous acceptation of celibacy or of work to lessen the cost of married life. Bernerette, Lorette, Rougette, and Musette now are typewriters, and amid bursts of laughter rap out their 'friend's' thesis for his university degree. He, by the way of thanks, kisses their lips in the old unchanging way."

Sidney Dark writes "a series of personal impressions" of the more permanent as opposed to the effervescent Paris. I find myself in hearty agreement when he says: "I do not think that its people are notable for their courtesy, for I have many times watched elderly gentlemen boarding crowded trains on the 'Metro' with the aid of the points of their umbrellas." Also: "I think I know the French for what they are and not for what admiring ignorance or racial prejudice believe that they are, and on the whole I find them very good."

The authors of the first volume of "The Epicure's Guide to France" spread tantalizing meals in more places than one could eat his way in and out of in years. They also give some mouth-watering recipes. After eating "of all kinds of cooking, from the admirable and learned Chinese cooking to the dreadful thermochemical and doctored food served in the American Palace-Hotels," they are convinced "that one can be fed almost anywhere but that one really eats in France only."

The Whole Story of a Great Reformer

John Wyclif: A Study of the Medieval Church. By Herbert B. Workman. Oxford University Press. Two volumes. $12.50.

THE profession of matador calls for skill and courage. But this modern pastime is mere child's play in comparison with the risks incurred by one in medieval times who dared to enter the lists against papal bulls that bore down with inquisitorial fury upon recalcitrant individuals. Even if one survived to die a natural death, there was still the prospect that one's mortal remains might be exhumed half a century later and burned with heretical honors. To a sport-loving age like that of today the story of a reformer such as Wyclif should make a strong appeal. While the specific cause championed by him may no longer excite us, the very persistence and daring of the man give an abiding charm to his career.

To treat a character of history without primary reference to his immediate environment, and to exhibit him as a model to be imitated or a horrible example to be execrated by a later generation, is a procedure all too common in biographical literature. It is so easy to lapse into propaganda! Our author has been unusually successful in resisting the temptations that beset the biographer. His subject is neither idolized nor defamed, but is depicted in truly objective fashion as a real figure within the life of his own age. First, the story of his education and cultural interests is sketched. This is followed by an account of his political connections. A third topic, naturally treated at greatest length, concerns Wyclif's views on the necessity of ecclesiastical reforms and his personal efforts at their realization. The continuation of his cause by his followers is too briefly treated, but an additional volume is planned on the "Origins of Nonconformity."

A new account of Wyclif's life and work, that would embody the findings of the last half-century of research, was much needed. For this task no one was better fitted than Principal Workman of Westminster College, London. Already he was a foremost English historian of medieval Christianity and he had been devoting himself particularly to the study of Wyclif for a dozen years past. Every page that he writes gives abundant evidence of wide reading both in the original sources and in the modern literature of the subject. But in these days when outlines are popular, and a millennium of culture may get scarcely a hundred pages, will the reading public endure two large volumes on a single historical personage? Probably the author never asked himself this question. His motives were purely scientific. Evidently he aimed to write a comprehensive, well-proportioned, and critically evaluated account that would stand for many years to come as an encyclopedia of authentic information on the subject. This quality gives these volumes their chief claim to esteem.

Timid persons who fear to venture far into a book whose pages sometimes suggest the proverbial thin ice of text over a chilly depth of footnotes may b prematurely dissuaded from attempting to read this new biography of Wyclif. Really, it is interesting even though it is insistently informing. Although dates, proper names, and cryptic citations of authorities bristle on almost every page, there runs throughout the whole narrative a keen human interest and a lively appreciation of those matters that were of vital concern to people in Wyclif's own day. Amid the most forbidding array of statistics there is constantly interwoven some pertinent phrase from Wyclif or his associates that lends to the whole the vividness of real life. Everywhere throughout the story there breathes the spirit of this reformer as expressed in his memorable utterance that "if there were a hundred popes and all the friars were turned into cardinals, in matters of faith their opinions ought not to be believed except in so far as they have their foundation in Scripture."

SHIRLEY JACKSON CASE

The Progress of Roger Fry

Transformations: Critical and Speculative Essays on Art. By Roger Fry. Brentano's. $10.

MR. FRY'S previous book of essays, "Vision and Design," established him as the most influential of the liberal wing of art critics writing in English. The present volume, drawn from six years of subsequent criticism, shows a steady progress toward full perception and balanced appraisal of a wide variety of artistic forms. Touching on subjects as diverse as Chinese bronzes, post-impressionist drawings, the paintings of Sargent and Van Gogh, it adds significance and interest to all of them. No reader with a mind of his own will agree with all of its theories and judgments, certainly, but its author asks for comparison of findings rather than agreement. He raises a host of tantalizing questions and a desire to see more of the things he writes about, which is perhaps the best result that a book of art criticism can achieve. Mr. Fry's discourse is rambling and fragmentary, never thorough or final, but never tiresome, and as free from cheap cleverness as it is from heavy pedantry—both diseases common to critics. He can berate the stupid public and its idols with vigor, and cheer for unheard-of promising youths without forgetting old masters whose reputations he thinks undeservedly clouded. Indefatigable in the quest for new experiences, he is disarmingly modest in admitting past mistakes and present puzzlements.

"Vision and Design" was rather a record of enlarging horizons than a consistent doctrine, and "Transformations" continues that enlargement. In the former book the essay on Giotto, which had been written twenty years before, was accompanied by a footnote which told of the author's partial disagreement with it after that lapse of time. He no longer believed that the dramatic, story-telling idea in a picture was the essential factor determining its value; "pure form" was the thing, and our reaction to it should be disentangled from our reaction to its implied associated ideas. Accordingly, the later essays in that book tried to estimate various works of art in terms of "pure form," which meant chiefly the design formed by the arrangement of planes and masses in deep space, together with the decorative effect of their lines, lights and shadows over the surface of the picture. Color was barely and infrequently touched on, and great colorists like El Greco, Cézanne, and Renoir were analyzed with little or no reference to the function of color in producing their three-dimensional designs.

In "Transformations" the final essay, on Plastic Color, is devoted entirely to this function, and to an historical sketch of the tendency, culminating in Cézanne, by which color was made an integral part of the expression of solids and spaces. Throughout the book references to color are far more frequent than in its predecessor, even in discussions of inferior colorists like Fra Bartolommeo. What, one wonders, has opened Mr. Fry's eyes to color after all these years? And are they quite open yet? If so, would he credit Rubens and the seventeenth century, rather than the sixteenth-century Venetians, with "the notion of a single all-pervading dominant note of color—the color of the main illumination"? Would he not by now have enlarged his interpretations of El Greco and Renoir?

Mr. Fry's interest is still divided between "pure form" and the dramatic or "psychological" idea, and he admits, in the first essay, an inability to merge the two interests except in the more trivial works of art where neither makes a strong appeal. Hence there is a constant shifting between the two in his discussion, and sometimes his early romantic imagination breaks loose, to carry him far from the picture at hand. For example, one caricature, whose human associations to this reviewer were those of a battered Whitechapel fish-wife, is entitled La Duchesse d'Uzès Douairèire. In it Mr. Fry sees "the sublime self-confidence and indifference to opinion of the descendant of a great aristocratic race with all that these conditions of life have engraved on the pale and faded countenance." But elsewhere he can sum up the aesthetic fundamentals of a whole school of art in a brilliant aperçu: Chinese painting "was always conceived as the visible record of a rhythmic gesture. It was the graph of a dance executed by the hand."

One might go on, if captious, to question many of Mr. Fry's particular judgments: his analysis of Seurat's Poseuses (now in this country) or his rather wandering attempt to answer I. A. Richards's charge that he separates unduly the aesthetic from other activities. But that would be to give a false impression of his genuine importance as an intelligent, open-minded critic, far ahead of his generation. As Mr. Fry himself says (in dealing gently with the sculptor Epstein), "the Philistines are upon us, and we have to close up our ranks."

Rhapsody. By Arthur Schnitzler. Translated by Otto P. Schinnerer. Simon and Schuster. $1.50.

ALTHOUGH the past few years have seen the publication in America of a number of Schnitzler's novelettes and stories, these translations, with possibly the single exception of "Fräulein Else," represent the great Austrian's pre-war period. sionistic; but in its subject matter he is engrossed more than in any previous novel with the discoveries of modern psychology. Though Schnitzler was a prober into the subconscious many years before psychoanalysis became the current rage, he is not even now ready to interpret all life by its teachings. Where after all is reality—in the ordered circumstances of our daily lives, in our actions when we are caught in the spell of an exceptional moment, or in our dreams? This is the question he poses in "Rhapsody"—and like a true artist leaves unanswered.

Fridolin and Albertina are a happy, rather humdrum married couple. On an evening toward the end of the carnival season in Vienna Fridolin, summoned to the bedside of a dying patient, goes forth to a series of erotic adventures which culminate when, intruding masked upon a mysterious orgy, he is saved by a beautiful unknown from discovery and certain punishment. When he returns home Albertina in a burst of frankness recounts to him some lascivious adventures she has had in a dream—adventures which, Fridolin decides, reveal her secret treachery and cruelty. The following night Fridolin, seeking his beautiful unknown, finds a body in the hospital morgue that might or might not have been the enchantress of the secret revels; the body now seems to him a symbol of the preceding night, "a pale corpse doomed to irrevocable decay." Once more he returns to Albertina, Albertina who though she has discovered that her husband, contrary to their mutual promise of frankness, had lied to her the previous night is as ever generous and forgiving.

In "Beatrice," the story of a mother who commits suicide when her son discovers her amour with one of his school friends, Schnitzler presented a situation that was unsavory because it was not adequately motivated. In "Rhapsody," where the scene shifts from a domestic hearth to the room of a diseased girl of the streets and then to a house where libertines of the nobility dance with naked courtesans, one is not repelled because there are no false notes. By the use of the most trifling incidents in the previous history—subjective and objective—of Fridolin and Albertina, Schnitzler prepares for all that occurs.

To assume that the experiences of Fridolin on his night of fantastic adventures were dreams in the conventional sense of the word is to miss the point of the novel. "No dream is entirely a dream" and "the reality of one night, let alone that of a whole lifetime, is not the whole truth." Thus, through his two protagonists, Schnitzler at the very end of "Rhapsody" reiterates his theme. Related to that theme is the underlying idea that though most of our conscious seekings end in frustration, happiness flowers for the seeker in unexpected ways. Together theme and "counter-subject" make of "Rhapsody," for all its brevity and unpretentiousness of scope, a fine fughetto of modern life.

Books in Brief

The Need for Eugenic Reform. By Leonard Darwin. D. Appleton and Company. $4.

The son of Charles Darwin is naturally a leader in the English eugenics movement; and he has justified this leadership by writing a sober and compendious treatise on the applied genetics of man. Every aspect of modern eugenics receives careful treatment; and if the reader looks in vain for any light touch (in a subject which offers much opportunity for a levity that is not always pointless), he will find absolute scientific frankness and fair-mindedness in the discussion of such controversial topics as, for instance, the hereditary effects of alcohol. This work will be useful for reference on the schemes and achievements of the eugenists, for it consists very largely of a non-propagandistic statement of facts. No attempt is made to minimize or ignore the difficulties that bristle in the path of the eugenic reformer.

The third of the six volumes in which Mr. Waley will complete his masterful version of one of the world's great novels.

Wild Goslings. A Selection of Fugitive Pieces. By William Rose Benét. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

Mr. Benét, who plays around in books for the Saturday Review of Literature, plays here to excellent effect. Many of the subjects were slight and are now departed; but Mr. Benét in all of his pieces communicates the delight he takes in literature mortal or immortal.

English Women in Life and Letters. By M. Phillips and W. S. Tomkinson. Oxford University Press. $4.

This new item in an Oxford series of illustrated social histories is, like all of the others, rich, piquant, and valuable.

Norse Mythology. Legends of Gods and Heroes. By Peter Andreas Munch. In the Revision of Magnus Olsen. Translated from the Norwegian by Sigurd Bernhard Hustvedt. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

Sponsored by the American-Scandinavian Foundation, this classic manual fits admirably into the series already begun by translations of the "Prose Edda" and the "Poetic Edda."

The American Indians and Their Music. By Frances Densmore. The Woman's Press. $2.

An elementary but sound introduction to a complicated subject, written by one of the authorities. Miss Densmore takes pains to sketch in the background of Indian life and belief.

Returning to Emotion. By Maxwell Bodenheim. Boni and Liveright. $2.

If Mr. Bodenheim returns to emotion in this sixth volume of his verse he introduces less change than he seems to believe. Perhaps he has no such belief, and is only fooling us—perhaps all of his books are supposed to contain thought and feeling in exactly the proper ratio. At any rate they are all good within their natural limits, and this one is good, too—sardonic, contemplative, and unwearied.

Upper Night. By Scudder Middleton. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

This new book of poems by Mr. Middleton contains Jezebel, his Nation prize poem, and a number of other pieces quite as interesting. Mr. Middleton, who is very quiet, pays the penalty; but he is worth reading for those who like to hunt for effects in well-made verse.

High Passage. By Thomas Hornsby Ferril. Yale University Press. $1.25.

A volume of young verse none of which, except for perhaps the last piece, Bride, attains the originality and strength manifested in Mr. Ferril's This Foreman.

Revolutions to Order

HOW to start a war with Mexico is the subject discussed in the rousing new melodrama "Spread Eagle" (Martin Beck Theater) which two newspapermen have written and to which George Abbott, its director, has contributed his sure theatrical touch. Were it not for its theme the play would hardly be notable outside the chronicles of the commercialized stage, for from the standpoint of form and expression it is no more than an unusually efficient, highly polished, and well-oiled thriller with a regulation Mexican bandit and a regulation assault upon a lonely mining shack guaranteed to raise the hair upon any gallery god's head, but it involves an inversion of the usual assumptions of the popular play which renders it not less than epoch-making in the history of modern melodrama. For once the gallant soldiers of the good old U. S. A. are not avenging heroes but plain boobs enthusiastically engaged in doing the dirty work for cautious patriots with a bank roll to save, and for once the arch-villain is not a treacherous foreigner but a high-powered American business man with a mahogany desk, an urge for profits, and an impenetrable smoke-screen of lofty ideals.

According to the story the president of the Spread Eagle Mining Company has just financed a Mexican bandit leader in the hope that the latter will stir up enough trouble to bring about an intervention, when his daughter introduces to him a young man looking for a job who happens to be the son of an ex-President of the United States. It occurs to the financier that if this young man should get himself killed he would thereby do more to arouse public sentiment than any one otherwise could, and accordingly he sends him to a nice, dangerous post just in the path of the forthcoming revolution. He is indeed killed according to the plan (or rather he is thought to have been) and then when the intervention has got well under way the financier—having patriotically enlisted himself as a dollar-a-year man—journeys down to the border in a private car in order to see the show.

Now, both the director and the authors of the piece are first-rate and up-to-date showmen. They know exactly the kind of effects which a Broadway audience demands, and they have catered to this audience in various ways, for they have sprinkled the play with a goodly number of wise-cracks in the current style, and when the last act showed signs of fraying out they brought the curtain down upon a fine piece of hokum. They have, nevertheless, managed most of their business—including especially the bits intended to give the audience the sense of bustle and tension of the mobilization—with unusual address, and the irony is not only smashingly effective but conveyed in terms calculated to inspire even the man in the street with thoughts which would have sent him to Leavenworth for a good long time if he had been so incautious as to express them a few years ago.

Moreover, all this is, be it remembered, not a story printed in the New Masses, the American Mercury, The Nation, or any of the other dangerous periodicals subsidized by Russian gold for the work of destroying American ideals and preparing for the nationalization of women. Neither is it a play written for production before a specialized audience in some corner known only to the intelligentsia. It is, on the contrary, a strictly popular melodrama, presented in a Broadway theater, designed to attract the man in the street, and so managed as to be as sure as any play ever is actually to attract him. Nothing could illustrate more clearly than the possibility of such a play illustrates the enormous strides which disillusion has made in the popular mind. The play is, indeed, because of its strictly popular character, a more legitimate cause for alarm on the part of the hundred-percenters than any number of highbrow journals and highbrow plays, for when even melodrama represents patriotism as bunk then patriotism is in a very bad way indeed. No censor responsible either to political superiors or to the organized busybodies who appoint themselves the guardians of national opinion could possibly allow such a play to remain open a week even if (as is extremely unlikely) he ever allowed it to get on at all, but fortunately there is as yet no law under which "Spread Eagle" could be prevented and it will probably continue for a long time to come to furnish excellent entertainment and very effective propaganda.

Only the most inveterate of Barrie's admirers consider "The Legend of Leonora," which Grace George has just revived at the Ritz Theater, a good play. To me its fantastic story of the charming mother who pushed a man off a railway train because her little girl had a cold and he would not shut the window is, despite some flashes of humor, merely the most nearly insane of the fantasies by means of which its author has revealed his infantile fixations. In "Fog Bound" (Belmont Theater) Nance O'Neil struggles with a lugubrious and unexciting emotional drama.

JAMES RAMSAY MacDONALD is welcome in America. The only regret one can have in connection with his visit is that it will last only eleven days instead of eleven months. If he could give us a year of speaking, it would be of tremendous benefit to the people of the United States. They need to see for themselves what a great Socialist looks like and how he talks and acts, for there are still multitudes in this country who look upon all Socialists as desperate anarchists; they refuse to differentiate between them. The fact that Mr. MacDonald has held the highest office in England, and may well hold it again, would give him a hearing such as no American of his political views could obtain. Meanwhile, the trend of English public opinion to the Labor Party continues, despite the fact that the Liberals have recently won two by-elections. But Mr. MacDonald's problems of leadership increase rather than decrease. The secession of Mr. Wheatley from the Opposition Bench to a rear seat in defiance of the long-established tradition that an ex-Minister shall sit on the Opposition Front Bench emphasizes the growing friction between the right and left wings of the Labor Party and cannot but weaken the solidarity of the party in its next electoral campaign. Indeed this growing cleavage may encourage the Conservatives in the plan advocated by some of the die-hards to go to the country next fall and see if there is not one Conservative victory left in the bolshevist bogy and the question of the Government's policy in China. The most ardent critics of Ramsay MacDonald, it must be added, have the most extraordinary difficulty in suggesting anyone who has the stature and vigor requisite for filling his place as leader.

GOVERNOR SMITH has met, promptly and straightforward fashion, the challenge which Charles C. Marshall offered him in the April Atlantic Monthly. His letter in the May number is a frank and persuasive declaration of personal religious faith, joined to an emphatic repudiation of the implied charge that loyalty to the Roman Catholic church has ever been regarded by him as inconsistent with loyalty to the Constitution and laws of the United States. His own record, he has a right to say, is his chief answer. Governor Smith is no theologian, and when it comes to interpreting papal encyclicals and other theological statements he wisely falls back upon the doctors and ecclesiastical officials, who are familiar with such matters. What will count most with the average American, however, is the admirable paragraph in which the Governor summarizes his creed. He is a Roman Catholic, but he recognizes no power in the church to interfere with the operation of the Constitution or the enforcement of the laws. He stands for complete freedom of conscience and the absolute separation of church and state. The decisions of ecclesiastical tribunals have force for communicants alone, and the public school and the church school have a right to exist side by side.

THE EFFECT OF GOVERNOR SMITH'S DECLARATION will undoubtedly be great. By the twenty million Roman Catholics in this country the article in the Atlantic will of course be regarded as a complete refutation of the charges of political insincerity which have long been made against them and their church. It will also, in all probability, be accepted as final by all others, of whatever faith, who do not desire to keep a religious controversy stirring in national politics. That it will overcome crass ignorance or bigoted prejudice is, of course, too much to expect. But as a political argument the Governor's statement will certainly advance his claims to a Presidential nomination; if for no other reason than the necessity which some of his political opponents will now be under of insisting that, on the religious issue, he has not told the truth, and a charge of untruthfulness on any matter is an extremely difficult one to lodge against Governor Smith. If the Atlantic articles have not wholly dispelled a controversy, they have done much to clear the air, and now that the religious issue has been squarely met the clearer the positions of all candidates—and near-candidates—can be made on more important issues, the better.

TWO EVENTS give fresh hope that the feeling against Germans and Germany, which still lingers among certain benighted people who have not yet recovered from the war-time propaganda and lying, is gradually yielding to better sense and better taste. Thus, the American Chemical Society has reelected as honorary members two of the greatest chemists of our age, Wilhelm Ostwald and Walter Nernst, whose names were dropped by the society after we went into the war. A third, Richard Willstätter of Munich, whom the society recognizes as being the greatest organic chemist in the world, has been added to the roll of honorary membership. It is to be hoped that an apology went with the notice of these elections; it still seems incredible that great American scholars and students and scientists such as compose this society could have been guilty of such pettiness of spirit, even in the hysteria of war. At the same time the arrival of the new Hamburg American liner, the New York, in the metropolis was made the occasion for unusual courtesies by the Mayor of New York and his wife, who named the vessel when it was launched. All the way up the river the ships of all nationalities in the harbor gave the new craft a royal welcome—a pleasant reminder that the passions of the submarine war are forgotten by seafaring men.

SENATOR GEORGE W. NORRIS was one of the Senators who voted against our going into the war with Germany. He is today the only survivor of that group. Stone of Missouri, La Follette of Wisconsin, Lane of Oregon, and Gronna of North Dakota are dead, and Vardaman of Mississippi is in retirement. A correspondent asked Mr. Norris the other day if, after ten years, he regretted having voted against the war. "No," he replied, "I never have. I would vote today precisely as I voted ten years ago today." And then he spoke as follows:

> The real heritage of the war is to be found here at home. It was here that the soul of America was to have been purified. The millions of our youth who went into that orgy of murder were promised a new and better order of things. For the thousands of our young men killed and maimed, for our billions spent, for the countless millions of heartaches, we have what? We have political corruption such as was never dreamed of before, we have a new crop of millionaires such as the world has never before witnessed, we have a crime wave that staggers the imagination of the world, we have gigantic, war-grown combinations of trade and money that are squeezing billions annually out of the people who "gave till it hurt," and they are doing it under the fawning and paternalistic eye of the government. We have a national avariciousness, and sense of grab, grab, grab, that cannot be eradicated from the national consciousness for generations to come. This we have. Why? Because the war did what a few of us believed it would do—it stupefied and paralyzed the moral consciousness of the American people as nothing else could have done, and because it was a war of gigantic commercial interests from beginning to end.

Who can deny the truth of this?

THE RETIREMENT of General E. H. Crowder as Ambassador to Cuba takes from that sphere of action a man who more nearly than any other American has approached in skill and knowledge the proconsuls which England has been for generations dispatching to India and Africa. His function in Cuba has been far more than a diplomatic one; it has borne a real resemblance to the position of the British commissioners to Egypt, for, thanks to the Platt Amendment, General Crowder had a big club to flourish whenever he gave advice to the Cuban President. His long association with the Wood Government in Cuba gave General Crowder a background of Cuban history since 1898 such as is hardly possessed by any other living American. To the development of Cuba he has personally contributed not a little but more and more his task has been to smooth the path of American economic empire. His ability has been beyond question—witness his skill in drawing up and working out the draft law of 1917, which will forever remain a blot upon the American tradition. If he was ruthless then, it is only fair to say that he has kept the mailed fist more under cover in Cuba. The man who takes his place will find it difficult, indeed, to offer anything in exchange for the knowledge and understanding of the Cuban people which has distinguished this general turned diplomat.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, in its issue of Friday, April 15, attacked The Nation because it believed the statement in the Shanghai dispatch printed in our issue of April 13, as to the circumstances of the death of Dr. J. E. Williams in Nanking, had been proved erroneous. We cannot blame the paper whose biased and inaccurate dispatches from China have roused such widespread protest for seeking to establish a tu quoque against us. But we would point out to the Times and to our readers that the statement to which the Times objects was printed in quotation marks as the testimony of a responsible American writer, known in Shanghai and New York, after inquiry as to his record and reputation, regarding what he had learned in Nanking. When other Americans denied Mr. Kennedy's report we at once printed their denials in even fuller detail, and cabled to Shanghai for confirmation of his story. We are not prepared to follow the New York Times in assuming that when a conflict of testimony exists the anti-Chinese side must be right. As Americans, we naturally hope that Mr. Kennedy's report that Dr. Williams was armed was false. No man or paper is infallible; we should not criticize the Times if its Shanghai correspondent merely made an occasional slip. But the New York Times dropped an able correspondent of proved ability to judge the Chinese chaos accurately; it replaced him by a man who for years had been an adviser of the Japanese Government, and who had made clear at the Baltimore Conference in 1925 that he thought the only trouble with China was the Chinese. From this correspondent it has been getting not only ridiculously inaccurate prophecies, but continuously hostile, bitter, and biased reporting of the events in the disturbed territory of China.

BETWEEN THE LINES of the cabled dispatches one can only guess what is happening to the Nationalist Party in China. The correspondents in Shanghai cannot tell; probably the Nationalists themselves do not know. Chiang Kai-shek seems to have succumbed to the human ambition for personal power; and merchants, foreign and Chinese, in Shanghai, are only too ready to finance an old-fashioned militarist against such labor groups as Mr. Godwin describes elsewhere in this issue. At Hankow, meanwhile, where forty-two foreign warships point their guns against the capital of the Nationalist Party, tension is naturally acute. The foreign gunboat policy may unite China in a new wave of desperate bitterness, or it may merely aid in producing disillusionment and chaos.

THE FABULOUS GROWTH OF THE TABLOID newspapers in New York City continues. Thus, the Daily News has added 147,000 daily readers during the period from April 1, 1926, to April 1, 1927; the Mirror 95,000, and the Graphic 193,000. The average net paid circulation of the Daily News is actually 1,145,481. The Times and World have shown substantial gains and the Herald Tribune a small one. For a time it looked as if the development of the typographically conservative newspapers had been entirely stopped. Indubitably, court scandals helped to boost the circulation figures of the tabloids. Also, these happenings enabled them to touch the low-water mark of sensational journalism in America. Meanwhile, except in the case of the Daily News, the question of financial success for these papers remains unsolved. They cannot begin to print advertising to the extent possible in the old-fashioned type of newspapers. In the case of one of these publications it is interesting to note that various large advertisers have finally concluded that they do not wish to aid in supporting a publication which has aroused so much public protest. This is one way of making life more difficult for purveyors of human slops; we should like to see a buyers' strike as well.

"AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY" is the latest book to be pronounced obscene by the District Attorney of Boston in his attempt to sterilize Boston literature. Extracts from the book, thought objectionable by two Boston police officers, were submitted to Judge Murray in that city in a case brought by Boni and Liveright to test Boston's book-banning campaign. The judge said he could find nothing obscene in the passages cited; unfortunately the policemen had not read the book from cover to cover and had therefore no further evidence to present. Both policemen, however, denied that their own morals had been corrupted by the passages they had read. The judge is reported to be at work on the two volumes. We shall soon know whether or not he comes out of the ordeal unscathed. Boni and Liveright is thus far the only publishing firm to protest, though a dozen books have been interdicted. Harcourt, Brace and Co., publishers of "Elmer Gantry," also forbidden to Boston readers, have done nothing. "Perhaps the matter is primarily the concern of the people of Boston," a telegram from that firm announces. It is heartening to read the protest signed among others by Ellery Sedgwick, editor of the Atlantic Monthly, and Alfred R. McIntyre, of Little, Brown & Co.:

> As citizens concerned with public decency and the maintenance of public sanity, as publishers associated . . . with books and magazines of honorable reputation, we wish publicly and seriously to protest against the high-handed, erratic, and ill-advised interference of certain public officials with the sale and distribution of books, many of them of recognized standing and freely sold elsewhere throughout the United States.

THE MASSACHUSETTS STATUTE forbidding the sale of "obscene and indecent literature" is capable of broad interpretation, and therein lies its danger. For years the booksellers have sent copies of doubtful books to the District Attorney's office for inspection; if the District Attorney or one of his associates could read the book without being seized with a desire to commit adultery or otherwise disgrace his high office, the book was pronounced pure and fit for general consumption. This amiable arrangement is to be continued no longer. District Attorney Foley has announced that his office is not a censorship bureau and that hereafter booksellers must interpret the statute for themselves and not bother him. At the same time he has threatened offending booksellers with jail sentences instead of fines for infraction of the law. One hardly knows what the result will be. Perhaps the courageous action taken by Boni and Liveright will bring about a repeal or amendment of the statute; perhaps the list of possibly obscene books will grow and grow until it includes all the volumes in the shop. Perhaps, being forbidden all other literature, the citizens of Boston will read the minutes of the Sacco-Vanzetti trial. That might result in justice in one quarter at any rate.

E. W. HOWE is not only the Sage of Potato Hill, Kansas, and one of the best prose writers in America; he is the occasion of a dinner soon to be given at the Hotel Biltmore in New York. One hundred and twenty persons will pay ten dollars apiece to sit in the same room with the author of "The Story of a Country Town" and the editor of E. W. Howe's Monthly while Irvin Cobb presides. Undoubtedly the editor rather than the novelist will be feted, and by the same token the champion of business rather than the artist of the sardonic phrase will be acclaimed by Bruce Barton, Bernard M. Baruch, and other members of the dinner committee. Mr. Howe's special merit is that of possessing a terribly simple pen which obeys a ruthlessly plain and cynical mind. If the business man only knew it, Mr. Howe—who does not know it either—destroys him along with most other men by attributing to him qualities which he cannot possibly have. The business man does not know it, and so he gives his champion, who argues that the Saturday Evening Post must be a good magazine because it is a rich one, a ten-dollar dinner. There are many such anomalies in Mr. Howe's career. One other just now is that his daughter, Mrs. Mateel Howe Farnham, has won a $10,000 prize with a novel called "Rebellion," and that the newspapers call the book "an up-to-date version of 'The Story of a Country Town.'" There is a sense in which Mr. Howe still is and always will be a rebel. But his worshipers seem not to know it.

MOST OF THE NEW YORKERS who were not at The Nation dinner on April 12 seem to have been within seeing distance of the great fire which stripped the top ten stories of the new Sherry-Netherlands Hotel of their wooden scaffolding. It was a lovely spectacle, and it may become a Manhattan legend—these white flames wrapping the graceful head of a forty-story skyscraper while 700 policemen fought the crowd away below and innumerable firemen swarmed the roofs of adjacent buildings to play water on the timbers as they blazed, broke loose, fluttered like feathers, and fell. It was a wonder that blocks of residences and clubs to the northeast did not go. None went; only two firemen out of all those exposed to the rain of thirty-foot embers were injured; and passers-by the next day reported the hotel itself as looking quite clean and whole. The wonder of wonders was the silent beauty of the thing. The closer spectators heard spitting and crackling in that high, hot place; most citizens, however, looked on as at a torch planted suddenly in the midst of the city—a torch so vast and tall that no sound could come down from it to say why the thing was there or what it intended to do. The fire, by and large, did nothing except give several hundred thousand persons a thrill. That it did no more may be explained, no doubt, on several technical grounds—fireproof construction, the very height of the building, and the skill of the fire department. But there may have been another reason; the flames may have had their own personal business to attend to up there, and may never have intended to descend even to Fifth Avenue.

The Tree Man

IN the thick shade of the forest it is impossible to tell which trees have crowns that tower above their surroundings. They are not always those with the most impressive trunks or the most conspicuous foliage. So, perhaps, it is not surprising that the death of Charles Sprague Sargent passed almost unnoted by a public that is excited by a Snyder trial, the death of a Valentino, or the coma of a bath-tub impresario.

But Professor Sargent is not in danger of being forgotten. The hundreds of thousands who each year visit America's greatest garden, the Arnold Arboretum in Boston, will remember him. It is his life work, and it is enduring—unless a soulless generation should cut off its water supply, pour soot upon it, trample its grassy walks, and neglect it as New York City neglects its Central Park. There are still trees there which were saplings in the days of the Boston Tea Party; and there are saplings there today of species which, in the Sierras and the Himalayas, become forest giants. What they can do in cold New England will not be known for another century or two—and it was only half a century ago that the City of Boston leased the Arboretum to Harvard University for a thousand years, upon the pledge, first given to the trustees of the estate of Benjamin Arnold of New Bedford, to grow there, so far as possible, every tree or shrub able to endure the climate of Massachusetts. Six thousand species grow in it today. Sargent's emissaries scoured Sakhalin and Formosa, Tibet and West China, the Himalayas and the snow-clad peaks of Equatorial Africa, Europe and the two Americas, the Caucasus and the Barbary Coast in his lifetime, but still he was not satisfied. There were regions yet unsearched. "Harvard College," he wrote a few years ago, "will not have fulfilled its agreement with the Arnold Trustees until it has caused to be explored, through the Arboretum, the forests which cover the ranges of the Altai Mountains, the southern boundary of Central Siberia, and the great interior region south of those mountains."

He gave his life to trees. For fifty-five years, beginning when the Arboretum was only an idea in his own and a few other brains, he served as its director. He found himself, as he once said, with a worn-out New England farm, "nearly ruined by excessive pasturage, to be developed into a scientific garden with less than $3,000 a year available for the purpose. . . . The prospect . . . would not have been encouraging if the men interested in it had had at that time as much knowledge as hope and enthusiasm." He never retired; until two weeks before his death he continued his daily visits to the Arboretum.

In the movement for conservation of forest resources he played a part, but his main interests were remote from the hurly-burly of politics. Indeed, when in 1880 the Chamber of Commerce of St. Paul sent out letters asking support for its project of granting public lands for schools of forestry Sargent characteristically, but impoliticly, replied that it would be of no use; there were no men in the United States qualified to teach forestry, and there would be no students because there was no demand for trained foresters. In connection with the 1880 census he made for the Government a census of its forest wealth, one product of which is the unique Jesup Collection of North American Woods in the American Museum of Natural History of New York City. Out of that experience also grew the intimate knowledge of American trees which reaches the larger public in his handbooks and manuals, and the elite in the fourteen magnificent volumes of his "Silva of North America," a cyclopedia of the trees of a continent.

Books perish; trees endure, and from their seeds new trees grow. Mr. Sargent was characterized by the American Genetic Association as "easily the outstanding leader in the world of plant introduction." Since Chang Kien brought the grape and alfalfa and, according to tradition, the walnut from Persia to China in the second century before Christ no man, perhaps, has done so much to mix the floras of the earth. It began in 1878, when a former president of the Massachusetts College of Agriculture sent Sargent the first seeds to reach America of the now familiar tree lilac and climbing hydrangea. Four years later a Russian doctor who had heard of Sargent's plans sent him seeds of North China trees. In 1892 he himself went to Japan, and found there trees of which the Japanese themselves were unaware. In later years his colleague, E. H. Wilson, traveled to the Far West of China, seeking specimens for the Arboretum. A thousand species of plants grow in the Arboretum today which had never before seen America; scores of the hybrids and the immigrant shrubs and trees most familiar to modern gardeners are products of Sargent's earlier years—the Japanese yew, the evergreen bittersweet, the universal Japanese clematis, and the tinted Thunberg's barberry among them. When others had declared the Cedar of Lebanon impossible in New England winters, he found a sturdier stock in the Taurus Mountains.

Systematic scientific work lay unseen behind Sargent's achievements. His was not the brilliant improvisation of a Burbank. The trees in the Arboretum are not only labeled for the public; behind each label lies a number, and behind that a card catalog record. In solving the mysteries of the perplexing genus of hawthorns—1,056 species of which have been distinguished, 672 by Sargent alone—he raised 200,000 hawthorn plants from more than 4,400 lots of seeds gathered from all over the world.

These things are Greek to the general public. The library, the herbarium—unrivaled for woody plants—mean little to the people of Boston. But they flock to see the magnolias, the cherries, the crabapples, the lilacs, azaleas, rhododendrons, hawthorns. "Lilac Sunday" is as definitely a part of the Boston calendar as Easter. There is not another city park in the world with such steep cliffs clad with dark hemlocks as the Arboretum's Hemlock Hill; Japan itself has few finer vistas of cherry blossoms, beginning with the little Higanzakura, whose petals open pink but fall white, continuing with the dwarf Fuji and the noble Sargent cherry, with blossoms an inch and a half across, running riot for three glorious weeks. Imagine a hillside with a hundred and ninety varieties of lilacs, and azaleas blooming from Mayday into July! It is a glorious park; the city's newspapers know it and tell the people, and all Boston—Yankee, Irish, Jewish, and Italian—walks, drives, or trolleys to see it in flower. Surely it is not within the imagination of man to conceive a more splendid memorial. Charles Sprague Sargent made it.

How Rich Are You?

THE United States has been growing prodigiously rich since the hard times of 1921. The pocket-book of the American people bulges larger by a third than half a dozen years ago, while merely in the three years from 1922 to 1925 the national wealth leaped upward by a tenth. We gather these facts from information just made public in several different quarters. The National Bureau of Economic Research, in preliminary estimates based on recent studies, places the current income of the American people at $89,682,000,000 in 1926, against $62,736,000,000 in 1921. Distributed among the 44,600,000 persons gainfully employed, the average income last year was $2,010, compared with $1,537 five years previous, a gain of 31 per cent. Nor was this a fictitious advance coupled with higher price level, as was most of the gain during and just after the World War. Prices actually fell slightly between 1921 and 1926, so that in purchasing power the increase was somewhat more than 31 per cent. The figures in regard to the 10 per cent jump in national wealth in three years come from an inquiry by the National Industrial Conference Board, which places the amount at $355,000,000,000 in 1925, against the census estimate of $320,000,000,000 in 1922. These amounts are based on physical wealth only, excluding credits and currency.

Fine! These figures will be tasty mouthfuls for politicians, employers, and others bent on making people believe that they were never so well off before. But is it true? It might be pointed out with benefit that material wealth is no index of happiness, or that in our present crowded and complicated existence it takes more material wealth than formerly to maintain an equivalent degree of comfort and health. But the figures of increased income are open to a more direct attack. The important question is not, How rich is America? It is, How rich are you? An increase in average income is of no advantage to the average man unless he gets his share. Indeed, it is a detriment, for it leaves him relatively less well off than before. There is unimpeachable statistical evidence that the average man has not got anything like his share of the amazing increase in wealth that has taken place in the last half a dozen years. It has gone in overwhelming proportion to the groups that were already dripping with fat.

It was different in the roaring industrial years from the beginning of the World War until the tire burst in 1920. The increase then in national income—chiefly offset by higher cost of living—was not confined to the well-to-do. In general, small-salaried persons and probably most kinds of unorganized labor suffered, but workers in the unionized trades came out of the catch-as-catch-can struggle with about the same proportion of the prize-money as they had managed to acquire at the outset. Taking again the figures of the National Bureau of Economic Research, we find that, in 1914, the average income of the 44,600,000 persons gainfully employed was $836. By 1920 it had reached a temporary peak (not attained again for five years) of $1,851, a gain of 102 per cent. During the same period the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics estimates that the average rate per hour of the pay in organized trades throughout the country increased by 95 per cent—somewhat less than the average income. The actual earnings of factory workers in the State of New York advanced from an average of $12.48 per week in 1914 to $28.15 in 1920, an increase of 125 per cent—considerably more than the average income. But although organized labor about held its own in the gain in national income between 1914 and 1920, that increase was not real. It was almost completely wiped out by the higher cost of living. In actual purchasing power, the National Bureau of Economic Research estimates that the increase in national income amounted to somewhat less than 10 per cent.

On the other hand, the gain of nearly a third in average income from 1921 to 1926, inclusive, was pure velvet—and a little better. Did labor, organized or otherwise, get its proportion? It did not. It failed to share even approximately in this astounding increase. The average rate per hour in unionized trades throughout the country advanced only 22 per cent, while the actual earnings of factory workers in the State of New York rose from $25.72 in 1921 to $29.02 in 1926, less than 12 per cent.

To whom did the money go? Information in regard to federal income taxes just made public in Washington suggests the answer. For 1925—the last year tabulated—207 persons reported an income of more than a million dollars each, almost treble the seventy-five taxpayers who scheduled such amounts in 1924. The only other year approaching such a condition was 1916, the pinnacle of the war profits, when 206 persons reported incomes of over a million dollars. In 1921, the first year of the period studied by the National Bureau of Economic Research, only twenty-one persons reported incomes in excess of a million dollars. But even more striking than the return in regard to million-dollar incomes is the fact that there was an increase in 1925 over 1924 of all net incomes in excess of $5,000—the percentage rising constantly with the size of the amount. Net incomes in excess of $5,000 increased by 16½ per cent, in excess of $25,000 by 31½ per cent, in excess of $100,000 by 88 per cent, in excess of $300,000 by 104 per cent, and in excess of $1,000,000 by 179 per cent.

If we think back, we will recall that the greatest market in the history of Wall Street began to bubble late in 1924 and boiled furiously throughout 1925. It has been boiling pretty continuously ever since. Securities listed on the New York Stock Exchange increased in market value in 1925 by $4,907,270,138, an amount equivalent to more than half of the world's total gold supply. Taking into account securities of all sorts, it is estimated that the gain amounted to a round seven billions. In other words, the greater part of the tremendous industrial wealth created in the United States since the beginning of the World War has been carried forward and capitalized in recent years in higher values of stocks and bonds; it is going in a proportion and in an amount never before approached to those who are already well off. We are building a new inequality of wealth beside which the old was almost a Utopian parity. To speak of increase in "average income" is a tragic jest, because the average man is not sharing in it.

In pointing out these facts are we, as some will charge, fomenting discontent with the present industrial order? Are we arraying the dispossessed against their dispossessors?

Well, we hope so.

Nanking—Serajevo

WHAT are we in for in China?

On April 11 the American, British, French, Japanese, and Italian consuls at Hankow and at Shanghai presented "identic" notes to the Chinese Nationalists. "For the prompt settlement of the situation created by the outrages" at Nanking the Powers demanded:

> 1. Adequate punishment of the commanders of the troops responsible for the murders, personal injuries, and indignities and material damage done, as also of all persons found to be implicated;
> 2. Apology in writing by the commander-in-chief of the Nationalist army, including an express written undertaking to refrain from all forms of violence and agitation against foreign lives and property;
> 3. Complete reparation for personal injuries and material damage done.

To these demands was appended the ultimatum:

> Unless the Nationalist authorities demonstrate to the satisfaction of the interested governments their intention to comply promptly with these terms the said governments will find themselves compelled to take such measures as they consider appropriate.

Eugene Chen, the Nationalist Foreign Minister, replied on April 14. He stated that the Nationalist Government was prepared to make good all damage done to the consulates. For personal injuries it was "prepared to make all reasonable and necessary reparation except in cases where it can be definitely proven that the same were caused by the British and American naval bombardment on March 24, or by Northern rebels and agents provocateurs." Punishment of the commander or of individuals, he said, assumed that the Nationalists were guilty of the March 24 outrages, and he proposed that " the question of punishment should await the findings of a government inquiry now in progress, or of an international commission of inquiry to be instituted immediately by the United States and the Nationalist Government." Mr. Chen added that

> As the laws of nations and the recognized practices of civilized states prohibit the bombardment of cities on the territory of friendly states the Nationalist Government proposes a commission of inquiry also to investigate the circumstances of the bombardment of the unfortified city of Nanking by naval forces of the United States.

Any written apology would, of course, also await the result of the investigation; but Mr. Chen stated formally that "the protection of foreign lives and property repeatedly has been declared a settled policy of the Nationalist Government." He repeated the pledge, adding that only a change in the treaties would remove the causes of the trouble.

Only Great Britain and the United States, of course, were asked to join in the inquiry into the circumstances of their bombardment of Nanking, but substantially similar notes were sent to the other Powers. No self-respecting government could well go further in accepting the Powers' demands, but already the dispatches from China indicate that the reply is "inacceptable," and the foreign Powers are conferring upon what "measures" they shall "consider appropriate." Some hint is given by the fact that 42 foreign warships have been concentrated at Hankow, seat of Eugene Chen's Government.

Is it the old story—Serajevo, the ultimatum, the world-war madness all over again?

The Sense of Joy

GEORGE MOORE once complained against the disposition of readers to insist that an author have a sense of humor, and to deny him that quality if he happened to be the kind of author who does not crack jokes. The sense of humor, said Mr. Moore, can be present in the form of a presiding spirit which makes in general for intelligence and illumination, which never ceases to remind both the writer and the reader of that twofold aspect of all things whereby they can seem in a flash either tragic or comic, either lamentable or absurd. Mr. Moore might have gone on to complain against the curiously superstitious emphasis we place upon the sense of humor—demanding that it exist, and almost daring it to show itself lest someone, admitting his lack of it, be forthwith damned. Not long ago, indeed, Heywood Broun of the New York World—himself a humorist among other things—made precisely this protest And we hope the doctrine spreads. For we know no ignorance greater than that which supposes happiness to be the possession exclusively of laughing men, and intelligence to be chiefly a matter of understanding that one thing cannot be more important than another.

The superstition is that we are "saved" by a sense of humor. Saved from what? If it is from dulness, well and good; no one can expect to get far with a campaign for dulness. But if it is certain other things, not so well and good. The sense of joy, for instance. Few speak of that; yet it is the distinguishing mark of supremely and passionately happy persons. It is the passion with which these persons are happy that renders them suspect to the humorous and that keeps them misunderstood by all who assume that error and illusion are necessary obstacles to felicity of any lasting kind. It is also their solemnity—for they are almost invariably solemn in their exaltation. Their very humorlessness is the thing that saves them from depression and loss of faith; their failure to preserve a sense of proportion is what preserves their joy. The sense of proportion, incidentally, is invoked quite as often as the sense of humor is, and by the same people. It ought to refer to that balance which, presumably, we can observe being struck by nature among all the positive forces which compose her energy. Too often the appeal to it merely means an unawareness of positive forces and compelling passions; one is only saying, in other words, that nothing matters—except proportion.

To the possessor of the sense of joy there is always some highly abstract thing that matters very much. He may have difficulty in saying what this thing is; but his struggles to do so are likely to result in great poetry, great eloquence, or great mystical utterance of some kind. Milton and Wordsworth are among the greatest of poets, and they are that not in spite of but because of the complete humorlessness with which they pursued a certain symbol through the manifold forms of the world. Wordsworth lacked common sense, but he had the sense of joy—"joy" is almost the commonest word in his vocabulary. Joy over what? He never said, and possibly he never knew, any more than Jonathan Edwards knew what made him at once the happiest and sternest of men. Such ignorance is appalling to the humorous—and the humorous have a right to be appalled. The pity is that they cannot contrive to enjoy the sensation.

Ourselves and Our Inheritance

The Albanian Peril

By G. E. R. GEDYE

Belgrade, April 1

SOMEWHERE east of Belgrade, where the cart-tracks that do duty as roads get fewer, the peasants' huts rarer, and the forests thicker, lies a deep belt of jagged blue mountains varying in height from 3,000 to 8,000 feet. Winding its tortuous way through the heart of this wild and primitive country is the largely imaginary line which we glibly speak of and which geographers trace with facile pen as the Albanian-Jugoslav frontier. No river and no clear-cut mountain range serves to define it; no racial division helps to maintain it. On each side of this arbitrary line, in huts on the lower slopes or in caves in the heights, are scattered families of both Albanian and Serbian blood, some united across the frontier by family ties, some divided by blood-feuds, the balance of which alters from time to time when a chance shot permits.

Along some of the more disturbed but defendable sections of this line you will see the forests cut back for a hundred yards on either side of the road, in order to avoid, as far as possible, giving cover to komitadjis and brigands. Every two hundred yards stands or walks a gendarme, but never out of sight of his fellow, his carbine loaded and the safety-catch off. The gendarmes are outnumbered by little wooden crosses set irregularly at the side of the road and painted white. Each one indicates the end of the story of some incautious traveler or of a gendarme who left his safety-catch on a fraction of a second too long.

It was on this frontier that Jugoslavia was suddenly accused, through a campaign launched virtually simultaneously in the Italian and part of the British press and through Italian diplomatic channels, of mobilizing troops and making other military preparations for an invasion of Albania, and of encouraging Albanian refugees to overthrow the government of Achmed Bey Zoghu, their President. With such conditions along such a frontier, the most conscientious individual examination of charges of this kind obviously cannot amount to much. One is thrown back on a study of recent history and on the balance of probabilities.

Since the failure of Prince Wilhelm von Wied to establish himself as ruler of Albania in the Teutonic interests, Albania has been without a Mpret, as the hereditary ruler was called. Jugoslavia and Italy contended for control of its destiny. Under the Treaty of London one of the many things which Italy obtained as her price for deserting the Triple Alliance in 1914 was the recognition of an Italian protectorate over Albania. This unhappy piece of bargaining, dignified with the title of "treaty," has brought, and will bring, much evil in its train for Europe. One consequence of its abrogation was the compensating declaration which Italy obtained from the Council of Ambassadors recognizing her as the natural guardian and protector of Albanian interests. She established herself inside the country through the Premier, Monseigneur Fan Noli, who ruled in the absence of a Mpret. Jugoslavia's counter-move was to permit and encourage Achmed Zoghu, an adventurous Albanian conspirator, to assemble and arm on her territory an expedition, largely composed of Russian "White" counter-revolutionaries, which overthrew Fan Noli. Then, if ever, was the moment for a British protest. There has been no attempt to deny Jugoslavia's complicity in this adventure. But Fan Noli had just put himself beyond the pale—he had recognized the Soviet Union, with whom Italy was coquetting and Jugoslavia was not. He was left, therefore, to his fate, and the Tory press suggested that the adventurous Achmed was the chosen of his people.

After he had proclaimed a republic and declared himself President, Achmed Zoghu's fickle affections turned across the Adriatic and away from his Jugoslav paymasters. The latter were anxious, but refused the suggestions made for a partition of Albania into spheres of influence between themselves and Italy. Seeing that Achmed was the creature of Mussolini and about to sell his country to Italy, the Jugoslavs seem to have encouraged last November's abortive attempt to unseat him.

The Pact of Tirana set the seal on the work so carefully accomplished by Italian agents in Albania. At the present time Italy, through her control of the Albanian National Bank and the Albanian Development Company, which has the sole right to build roads and to construct railways, has made Albania and her mineral wealth a close economic preserve for herself; by her right to reorganize the army, to construct an Albanian navy, and to build harbors she has not only secured the control of new naval bases which would prove invaluable in corking up the Jugoslav navy in time of war, but has established herself in Albania in a way which is a threat to Jugoslavia very much as the occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary was a threat to old Serbia.

Jugoslavia sees Albania threatened with the ultimate fate of Bosnia—annexation. Achmed Zoghu has played her false and become the willing instrument of Italian policy. He has still his bodyguard of Russian "Whites," but there is no reason to suppose that he enjoys any greater popularity in Albania than any of his predecessors have enjoyed when they tried to collect taxes from its wild mountain inhabitants. The Serbs, like every other Balkan people, have intrigue in their blood. There are several thousand Albanian refugees on their soil, whose numbers were increased as a result of the abortive attempt to overthrow Zoghu last November, and who find many supporters among Jugoslavia's 400,000 loyal subjects of Albanian race. What more likely than that there is continuous plotting on Jugoslav soil against the man who is regarded as having sold his country to Italy?

It is only fair to say that not one shred of evidence of Jugoslav complicity in these alleged plots has yet been produced by Italy. M. Peritch, the Jugoslav Foreign Minister, has given me personally the most explicit assurance that his government is doing everything in its power to prevent both plots and raids and has removed all the Albanian refugees to Bosnia, out of harm's way. As to the categoric accusations made in Rome and London of aggressive Jugoslav military preparations on the Albanian frontier, common sense alone indicates that they can be dismissed as wildly improbable. Jugoslavia has been forced to yield again and again to Italian pretensions to territory on the Balkan peninsula since the war, and that at times when Italy was not the great military Power that she is today. Many of the Dalmatian Islands, the port of Zara, right in the center of the Jugoslav coast line, the islands of Cherso, Lussin, Grande, and Lagusta, all hugging the Jugoslavian coast, have one after the other been secured by Italy, causing bitterness but no warlike preparations in Jugoslavia. Even Italy's acquisition of Fiume was accepted without an actual clash, though one came very near. I was in Fiume last summer. It is a city of the dead. Italy took it merely to prevent it becoming a rival in Jugoslav hands to her Adriatic ports. Deprived of its hinterland, its volume of trade has dropped to one-third and is still falling, but its grass-grown quais cause Italy no concern. Already, the Jugoslavs assert, the number of Italian subjects who are racial Jugoslavs exceeds that of the population of Albania. Is it possible that, after having yielded so frequently in the past, at this moment Jugoslavia should have desired to precipitate a conflict with her powerful rival?

It is particularly useful to consider the state of Jugoslavia's armaments. Admittedly, she has about the finest fighting material of the Balkans in her indomitable peasant troops. But she has a veritable museum of rifles and no field guns of later date than 1915. It is regrettable, but, placed as she is, far from surprising, that she should be endeavoring to modernize her equipment. Like Poland and Czecho-Slovakia, who also began their existence within the French political orbit, Jugoslavia aspires to step out of the ranks of satellite Powers dependent on France for military supplies as well as political backing, and there is no reason to get excited at the reports that she is building her own munition works, reequipping her army, and organizing her defenses. Indeed, these reports, circulated in recent months from Rome, tend to discountenance the latest reports that she intended military action in Albania. If she is engaged in reorganizing her army, she certainly cannot intend to initiate a campaign which would mean war with Italy.

If, however, this reorganization be considered from the standpoint of Italy, it will be seen that there is good reason to precipitate matters. The Tirana Pact, egregiously described as a "Pact of Mutual Guaranties," firstly empowers Italy to come to the rescue of Albania if she is attacked, and similarly guarantees to Italy the support of the Albanian army and embryo navy if she herself is attacked by another Power. It does more than this, however; it allows Italy to "intervene" should the security of the present Government be threatened from within. Albania is a mass of warring mountain tribes divided into a score of hostile camps by countless petty but bitterly upheld differences. Achmed Zoghu and his Russian "Whites" have no very secure tenure of office or of life, quite apart from Serbian influences, in a country, a great deal of which has never been made amenable to his authority.

What would actually occur were a revolution in Albania to endanger the regime of Achmed Zoghu, or were that gentleman, for any reason, to see fit to declare that he was in peril? Under the Pact of Tirana, he would notify the Italian Government of the state of affairs and request intervention. Before acting, the Italians should persuade the Council of the League that grounds existed justifying their intervention under the Treaty of Tirana as registered with the League. That body, in view not only of the Tirana Treaty but also in view of the unfortunate declaration extracted from the Council of Ambassadors in 1921 to the effect that Italy was the ideal guardian of Albanian interests, would presumably agree to the landing of Italian troops in Albania to protect Achmed Zoghu. If Corfu and other examples of Italian precipitancy may be taken as precedents, it is safe to assume that Italian action would in fact precede any decision of the League.

There are other interesting features of this Jugoslav-Albanian excitement. Just before it began, on March 14, the London Times drew attention in a leader to the Jugoslav tendency to seek a rapprochement with Russia. It is a fact that there has been a strong movement in the country, largely restrained by the powerful influence of King Alexander, to recognize the Soviet Union. Almost simultaneously with the launching of the Rome campaign was the launching of a big Belgrade municipal loan in New York, while other important negotiations are in progress to secure the American capital which Jugoslavia so urgently needs for the development of her magnificent natural resources. The effect which these rumors of wars might be calculated to have on Middle Western investors, on whose confidence such loans largely depend, can easily be imagined: over here it is anticipated that they will have served to enforce the ban of the City of London on loans to Jugoslavia.

Sir Austen Chamberlain has given the most implicit assurances that could be desired that there is no truth whatever in the persistent belief of the Continent that Great Britain is forming, or desires to form, an anti-Soviet block. Clearly, at one point the British Government intervened to restrain the Fascist ardor of the London Times, but on the Continent it is universally remarked that such countries as Greece, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Italy, which are under some form of "White" dictatorships, are always treated in British Tory circles as "consolidated." Poland, in particular, is constantly cited as a country which had the worst imaginable "press" in London, until the military dictatorship of Marshal Pilsudski was forced upon her at the point of the bayonet. Since then reproaches have ceased, despite the many encroachments of that dictatorship on public liberty. But as soon as the Government of any state—like that of the ill-starred Fan Noli of Albania—talks of Soviet recognition, terrible reports of its disorganized condition (imperiling, of course, all capital investment in its territories) find their way into the reactionary press of many countries, particularly of Great Britain.

As to the Albanian scare, it is over for the moment, but the danger to Europe will remain latent as long as peril to Achmed Zoghu can be held to justify the landing of Italian troops in Albania, and as long as "imperial" speeches from Rome cause apprehension in Jugoslavia, with its fertile territory greater than that of overcrowded Italy and its population of only 12,000,000 against Italy's 40,000,000. If the Treaty of Tirana can be so amended as to make intervention by Italy dependent solely upon a decision by the Council of the League that Albania is in imminent peril of lapsing into anarchy or bolshevism, or is menaced with external attack, a great deal will have been done to take the sting out of this dangerous instrument. For the League decision, to be of any value, and to avoid such scares as that recently created, it would probably be necessary to establish a small League Commission resident in Albania (on which neither Italy nor Jugoslavia should be represented except in an advisory capacity) with power to inspect both sides of the frontier under escort. This, like most commissions, would be a nuisance. But a nuisance is preferable to a war.

These Modern Women
The Long Journey

ANONYMOUS

[We print herewith the thirteenth of a series of anonymous articles giving the personal backgrounds of a group of distinguished women with a modern point of view. The next article will appear in The Nation for May 11.]

FARM life in New England is—or was, before the day of the automobile—lonely and isolated enough at best. Picture its overwhelming loneliness for a child without brothers and sisters, who had to trudge a mile and a half to the one-room country school where some fifteen or twenty pupils gathered to learn the three R's—and little else. Only twenty years ago the round of my existence was from such a home to such a school; yet for the last ten years I have been a city dweller, readily adapting myself to conditions in crowded centers of population. Has this experience been simply a part of the general urban drift of rural youth? Perhaps, but as I look back it seems to me that I can discern certain specific influences which were operating even in those early days to shape my maturity.

The lack of playmates forced me to find many of my childhood satisfactions in a land of make-believe. I kept imaginary playmates to a much later age than do most children, and began day-dreaming long before the period of adolescence. Perhaps this over-development of my imaginative life made it easy for me to share my moth dreams with her. My mother was not happy in her ow life; she would have escaped from the dull routine and hard labor of the farm had she been able. Her one consolation was the determination that her daughter should have the things for which she had longed so passionately. In our talks together she dwelt upon her desire that I should not be tied down to household cares and that I should follow a professional career, as many of my other relatives had done. Through her descriptions I became well acquainted with Great-aunt Abbie, who was a pioneer schoolmistress; with Cousin John, who was a professor in a famous university, and with Cousin Josiah, who was a specialist in children's diseases in Boston. I sometimes think these never-seen individuals became more real to me than the neighbors and farmhands whom I saw daily.

At any rate, my day-dreams and ambitions fell docilely into line with my mother's aspirations for me. I never pictured the romantic episodes or the domestic scenes which are the subjects of most maiden reveries. I was not sure what I should do when I grew up, but I was determined to gain a position worthy of the many important figures in my mother's family. I, too, would win fame by virtue of high achievement. I have a tender feeling for those young illusions. I have none left in these days of facing reality, but without the driving power of such dreams I might have accomplished even less.

My parents were unhappily married. From this reality I was not guarded. Popular books in the field of child study were not available at that time, and my mother, in unburdening her mind to me, probably had no conception of the effect her confidences had. In all the struggles between my father and my mother I identified myself completely with her, and always thought him in the wrong. One day I heard her tell him that only the thought of my welfare prevented her from seeking a divorce. I solemnly assured her that I, too, could do without him, and from then on I continually urged her to follow this course. When I was a sophomore in high school my mother acted upon this advice, and the figure of my father passed out of our lives.

But the shadow of those early experiences darkened my attitude toward men and marriage long after. I was sure that I should never marry, never give any man an opportunity to ruin my life. My mother upheld me in these views. By the time I lost this support through going away to college I had read enough feminist literature and studies on marriage to encourage an opinion which had its origin in my early emotional experiences.

My mother was, without doubt, the source of a driving ambition which was sufficiently strong to buoy me up through periods of ill-health or of economic stress. But the antagonism toward men which she had also fostered dwarfed and warped my emotional development. Insistence upon one goal—the attainment of distinction by my own efforts without the need to love, honor, or obey any man—became the guiding fiction to which I tried to shape my life. The result was continual rebellion against things as they

As long as I believed, in harmony with my early teaching, that sex was a degrading and disgusting phenomenon which men enjoyed but to which women submitted only because it was a part of wifely duty, the appeal of celibacy and independence was enhanced. But with the biology and psychology courses of college and university, sex took on a new meaning. It was probably as much of a shock to me to learn that women had their share of the sexual instincts and emotions as it was to many of my classmates to come into contact with philosophical doubts concerning the religious views which they had unquestioningly accepted. My own churchgoing had been at a minimum, indulged in purely at my own whim and inclination, so that I was able to slough off what little superstition I had acquired without any sense of discomfort. But to readjust my ideas and my philosophy to a world which had suddenly lost its feminine integrity, and in which women needed men even as men needed women, was a serious matter.

It took many hours and days of reading to furnish me with a background against which I could evolve a new philosophy to settle this conflict. Westermarck, Crawley, Freud, Adler, Jung, Havelock Ellis, and Ellen Key became my daily familiars. At last I emerged with a modified viewpoint. The necessity of a normal sex life for women was a scientific fact, and I must bow to the truths established by science. I was not, however, compelled to accept the institution of marriage, which was plainly a lineal descendant of primitive rites and ceremonials having its beginnings in ideas of magic later carried over into the folkways and mores. I could recognize that I had normal sex emotions but I need not give up my freedom and independence by submitting to any such religious or legal ceremony. By this formula, I was able to preserve my guiding fiction intact.

It is amusing, now, to look back on this process of reassurance. Men and women are inevitably possessed of a power over each other which cannot be thought out of existence or evaded by refusing to legalize a relationship. Whether or not it is conventionalized, love has a coercive effect upon individual behavior; refusal of marriage cannot alter this fact. My fine theories, which were only attempts to effect a reconciliation of my natural longing for love with my desire for personal autonomy, never stood the test of experience. Once or twice I was tempted to relinquish my profession for the ancient position of woman as wife, but the spirit of independence was too strong. I might play with the idea of submission to masculine authority, but at the first sign of any real or permanent enslavement I shrank away and clung to my liberty. There was always my work to stabilize me in these crises. And as steadily as if there had been no such thing in the world as unsatisfied emotions, I won professional advancement. The loss of dear companionship could be forgotten after a time, in the world of books waiting to be read or to be written; my feelings were eased tremendously by writing.

The long struggle between my own two greatest needs —the need for love and the need for independence—probably had its effect upon my final choice of a profession. I had originally intended to write, but the drive to understand human motives and conduct, which arose out of the necessity of solving my own problems, developed into a desire to understand all behavior, and I turned to the social sciences. Probably this was a happy decision. Had I been only a writer, I might have prolonged indefinitely my separation from reality. Through a more scientific approach, I began to see things as they actually were rather than as I wished them to be. I even came to understand that in spite of the intensity of my feeling about marriage I might be able to accept the outward form so long as the inner spirit of the relationship embodied freedom. Thus, at thirty, I went forth to meet the fate which I had so long feared—and found it good!

It is fortunate for me that this venture has been with a man of insight, imagination, and humor, who cherishes no desire to be owner or tyrant. He respects my work as much as I do his. If he does not feel quite so keenly as I the need of economic independence after marriage, he is more eager that I have leisure for creative work than I am myself. Nor is this because my writings bear witness that I am his wife, for I keep my own name. To us, marriage is no sacred bond which it would be sacrilege to sever. Rather, we regard it as a form to which we have submitted because it is the only way in which we can give expression to our love without interference. With marriage, thus interpreted, I am content. It is as if I had accomplished the impossible feat of eating my cake and having it—for I have both love and freedom, which once seemed to me such incompatible bedfellows.

Kerensky

By LOUIS FISCHER

ALEXANDER FEODOROVICH KERENSKY is forty-five years old. He is the head of a government which has ceased to exist and the editor of a paper which has ceased to appear. One pities him especially during his American stay, for we are a cruel people and we love to fete and lionize. So we have treated Kerensky as a great leader and as the representative of something which he knows he neither leads nor represents. In Europe, as he follows the depreciating currencies from Prague to Berlin to Paris, they leave him in peace. There he is merely the publisher of a thin little Russian émigrés' tabloid which barks but has no bite and which nobody takes very seriously, certainly nobody in Russia. It requires courage to live such a life after history has cast you into the dustbin, and on the Continent Alexander Feodorovich either avoids the limelight or people don't bother to play it on him.

Here, however, we open a wound and remind the poor man of what he once was. I watched him carefully at a recent dinner in his honor, given by foreign correspondents, at the Brevoort in New York. A finely domed forehead marked with deep temples and crowned with a crop of short bristles; the rest of his face an anti-climax. Eyes that are weak and watery, a mouth without force, and a receding chin differentiate him sharply from Trotzky, with whom he has been compared as Russia's best orator. Kerensky has a beautiful tenor voice, and the few words he uttered in his native tongue before reading from the French were a delight to the ear. But he is soft and mellifluous where Trotzky is dynamic and magnetic. Trotzky is iron and steel; Kerensky is velvet and silk. It was Kerensky's forensic skill, his power to impress the multitude which brought him to the fore in the February revolution. It was his lack of action and his insistence on talk when deeds were demanded that made him such a miserable failure in November, 1917.

The Bolsheviks never considered Kerensky a difficult obstruction; they knew him too well. While they were in the very process of proving that his government was really provisional, he stood in the gilded halls of Peter solemnly warning the Communists not to be naughty. The record of events on November 6, 1917, is the most condemnatory proof of Kerensky's weakness in the face of a practical situation.

Everything was set for tomorrow's revolution. The Petrograd Soviet had announced the date. Now hear Kerensky, this Russian Canute: ". . . We are confronted with the opposite—a lawless issue of cartridges and arms as well as the ordering of two companies for the aid of the revolutionary staff. In such manner I establish before the Provisional Council the complete, clear, definite attitude of rebellion of a part of the population of Petrograd." In the hour of crisis and on the eve of his overthrow his chief interest was to "establish," to score legal points. And so he continues: "I have suggested that the necessary action be taken in the courts." In twenty-four hours he would be in hiding. There was shooting in the streets while he spoke. Yet all he could do was to threaten Lenin, Trotzky, and the others with court proceedings.

At that moment Konovalov handed Kerensky a note. While I watch Kerensky at the Brevoort, I can see him in Petrograd, that afternoon of November 6, snatching for the paper with his nervous, sensitive hands. It is an order of the Petrograd Soviet to all the regiments at the front to prepare for the struggle. "Therefore," shouts Kerensky, the lawyer but never the governor, "in the capital at the present time exists a condition which in the language of legal authority and the law is called a state of rebellion." He was winning his case by proving that the Bolsheviks actually were revolutionists.

What was to be done? The Bolsheviks and their friends "must be immediately and finally disposed of." (Laughter on the extreme Left, says the stenogram.) But while the provisional statesmen debated and cheered Kerensky, "army trucks went thundering about the city and firing began in the streets."

The next day a crowd of sailors forced their way into the Marie Palace and one of them stepped up to President Avksentiev, Kerensky's side-partner. "Stop talking," said the sailor. "Go home. There is no more Council of the Republic." All power had passed to the Soviets.

And so when he is lauded at banquet tables or praised in drawing-rooms Kerensky must introspect in the true manner of the Russian intellectual and think: "How strange that these Americans, these people of action, should pay attention to me, who muffed my opportunity, who fiddled while revolution raged."

Nor did he have even a plan of action. He drifted without a program. While millions were demanding peace, bread, and land, he promised more war. He would convene a Constituent Assembly. "More talk," the masses said. The Provisional Government was a political makeshift, but it never had an economic platform. Even so anti-Bolshevik a writer as Professor Karlgren of the University of Copenhagen says:

> When the peasants after the February revolution were put off by the parties then in power with promises that their interests would certainly be considered if only they had patience, they began soon enough, from fear that they would have to wait in vain, to take matters in their own hands, to drive away the landowners, and divide their land and belongings among themselves.

The division of land began before the Bolsheviks appeared on the scene, and when they took power they sanctioned, legalized, and aided it; but Kerensky had nothing to do with this phase of the Russian economic revolution or with any other. He would have continued the status quo.

Politically, too, in many respects, there was continuity between Kerensky's regime and that of the Romanoffs. For instance: Boris Bakhmetieff was first the Czar's financial representative in the United States. (Nicholas II's investments here amounted to $50,000,000 in the Pennsylvania Railroad, $16,000,000 in the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, and $5,000,000 each in the New York Central and Baltimore and Ohio railroads.) When the Czar fell, Bakhmetieff became the Ambassador in Washington of the Kerensky Government. Subsequently he was the accredited envoy of Kolchak and Wrangel in this country.

Or take Serge Ughet. This strange name still appears in the lists of members of the Diplomatic Corps published regularly by our Department of State. He is still the "Financial Agent of the Russian Government." It was he who spent the $187,000,000 credit opened by the United States Treasury for the Kerensky Government. But he was first appointed to Washington by the Imperial Czarist state. Kerensky took him over. When Kerensky disappeared, Serge Ughet found no difficulty in transacting business in this country for Kolchak, Denikin, and Wrangel. Mr. Ughet remains to this very day in an office on Park Avenue and admits that he gets his expenses from the so-called Council of Ambassadors in Paris, an unofficial body composed of Czarist and Kerensky diplomats who even now dispose of money lent by the French and British exchequers to Denikin, Kolchak, Wrangel, and other counter-revolutionaries.

I asked Ughet whether any of the $187,000,000 credit with which we had presented Kerensky was still available. For it had been rumored that Kerensky had come to these shores not only to get money for the Dni, his moribund sheet, but also to obtain ten or fifteen million dollars of unused American credit which he claimed as the only legal survivor of the Provisional Government. But Mr. Ughet insists that the entire $187,000,000 is gone. Was it all spent by Kerensky? No. Fifty-six million dollars remained when the Bolsheviks seized power. What became of that huge sum? It went to pay for supplies. And what happened to the supplies? They were shipped to Denikin, Semionov, Kolchak, etc.

The "Russian Financial Agent" was kind enough to explain one of these shipments in detail. While Kerensky was at the helm, 500 locomotives were ordered for the Russian Government from the Baldwin and American locomotive companies. Immediately after Kerensky fell the United States Government obligingly took over 400 of the engines, but the remainder got to Seattle and from there 80 were sent to Vladivostok for the Chinese Eastern Railway and 20 to Novorossiisk for Denikin. "Now," I ventured to Mr. Ughet, "Washington regards the $187,000,000 credits as part of the Bolshevik debt to this country. Do you think the Soviets should pay for locomotives presented to their enemies?"

"Yes," he replied, "all this material went to Russia. Besides the Bolsheviks captured most of the locomotives anyway."

I smiled, but did not say—because it would be no use—that on this principle the Communists should pay for captured guns or for the cartridges that killed Red Army soldiers. They all went to Russia.

Kerensky's retention of Ughet and Bakhmetieff, both Czarist agents, was characteristic. He no more broke with the past at home than he did abroad. Kerensky had eleven men in his Cabinet. Four were Cadets "who followed Miliukov in preferring a constitutional monarchy of the English type. They not only refused to proclaim a democratic republic as the popular parties desired but they refused to pledge themselves not to establish a monarchy prior to the convening of the Constituent Assembly."* Yet Kerensky kept them in his Ministry.

On March 15, 1917, the Czar abdicated. On the same day Miliukov announced that "the power will be transferred to the Regent, Grand Duke Michael." Yet Miliukov, the monarchist, was the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Kerensky who called himself a Socialist.

The composition of the Kerensky Government was first proclaimed by Miliukov in a speech to citizens, soldiers, and sailors in the Tauride Palace.

* "The Russian Bolshevik Revolution." By E. A. Ross. 1921.

"At the head of our Ministry," says Miliukov, "we have placed a man whose name signifies the organized Russian public" (Cries: "Propertied public!"), "who was implacably persecuted by the old government; Prince G. E. Lvov, the head of the Russian Zemstvo" (Cries: "Propertied Zemstvo!"), "will be your Premier and Minister of Interior. He will replace his persecutor. You say 'Propertied public'? Yes, but the only one that is organized—which, therefore, will give other classes of Russian society an opportunity to organize."*

And yet Kerensky talks of democracy. His government in 1917 was admittedly a government of the propertied public. The people demanded land. He gave them a government of landlords and property owners. The masses had overthrown the Czar. He threatened to give them another. The millions wanted to lay down their arms. He was busy organizing offensives which sent tens of thousands to certain slaughter. Kerensky's democracy was always the democracy of the Constituent Assembly, of a forum for more words. But he had no ear for the will of the people and no courage or desire to let the people rule.

Today Kerensky is a tragic figure. He announces that he has patience with the Russian people. But he will never compromise with the Soviet Government. Neither will I ever compromise with Judge Gary. I want him to know it, and to worry about it, and to abdicate, too, because of my attitude. What Kerensky says or thinks is just as important to the Bolsheviks as my thoughts are to Judge Gary.

Labor Takes Power in Shanghai

By FRANK GODWIN

Shanghai, March 26

ON Sunday, March 20, the troops of the victorious Nationalist army were in the neighborhood of Shanghai, having utterly defeated the Northern forces opposing them. The railway line between Shanghai and Nanking had been cut in several places, and the Nationalists were virtually in control of all of China as far as the Yangtze River. The Northern soldiers who were in Shanghai were Shantung troops, "the worst bandits, murderers, rapists, and incendiaries in China," as a high official of the Shanghai (foreign) Municipal Council described them, and the Chinese districts surrounding the International Settlement of Shanghai would undoubtedly have shared the fate of Hangchow, Kashing, and other towns which were looted by the retreating Northerners had it not been for the sudden appearance here of armed workers.

The labor unions of Shanghai are well organized and powerful bodies, in spite of the suppressive attitude of both the foreign and the former Chinese authorities toward them. They are whole-heartedly (as indeed may be said of the entire Chinese people here) in favor of the Nationalists. On account of this they have been subjected recently to a murderous campaign by hired anti-Nationalist gunmen in the International Settlement (which murders, the British municipal police declared, were carried out by the labor unions themselves), and to a reign of terror of wholesale beheadings and shootings by the Chinese authorities in the territory surrounding the settlement, men sometimes being taken from the French Concession (with the apparent connivance of the French authorities) for this purpose.

These organized workers, many of whom were acquainted with the use of arms, were determined to prevent wholesale looting and killing by the retreating Northern soldiers pending the arrival of the Nationalist forces in Shanghai. As soon as the regular armies from the South were within striking distance of Shanghai a movement began which meant not merely a military occupation but a revolution. The workers in the Chinese districts stormed various places (in the south, the Arsenal; in the north, police stations), obtained arms, and took over the civil power of the Chinese area. In the south of the city the organized railway workers, with street-car men and others, well-equipped with the arms from the Arsenal, captured the railway station from the Northern troops (after a fight of some hours), hoisted the Kuomintang flag, and then proceeded to take over the police stations and other points. In the north of the city other workers, mostly postmen, street-car men, and factory workers, took control of the police stations and, armed with rifles and revolvers, attempted to capture the railway station just outside the International Settlement, which was strongly defended by Fengtien troops (including "White" Russians) with heavy artillery and armored cars.

Here the attack, beginning Monday afternoon (March 21), continued until late Tuesday afternoon. The armed workers, among whom the railway men and printers were now taking an important part, sniped at the Northern soldiers from roofs and windows, and in addition made repeated assaults both on the railway station and on the big armored car which moved up and down along the line through the district. With desperate courage many of the workers ran up to the cars, shoved pistol or rifle muzzles into the apertures, and fired inside, killing or wounding some of the defenders, but at terrible cost to themselves, hundreds being wiped out by the fire of the machine-guns and field-pieces. The armored car was almost impregnable to men without heavy artillery.

The Northern troops, responding to the attack, proceeded to lay waste the entire district around the railway station. The fire station was first destroyed, and most of the firemen shot dead as they endeavored to escape from the burning building, so that there could be no interference with the work of burning buildings. Assuming (apparently correctly) that every civilian was an enemy, anyone seen on the streets was shot at, and hundreds of peaceful civilians, from old men and women to little children, were shot dead or destroyed in the fires which soon began to blaze around the station. As the inhabitants ran out of their burning homes they were shot down. All Monday night the flames mounted to the sky, and Tuesday the soldiers still kept up their work. Some of the "White" Russians were already making their way into the International Settlement, but most of the Chinese still held out, looting many buildings before they burned them. Some of the soldiers came into the settlement loaded with loot, which the municipal authorities did not interfere with in the slightest.

Throughout the Chinese districts, except around the North Railway Station and along the line where fighting was going on, the armed workers maintained peace and order. Parades and processions celebrating the Nationalist victory were the order of the day. Crowds filled the streets, and foreigners in these districts moved about without experiencing any antagonism whatsoever. The present writer walked about through these areas, or went by motor car, without molestation or interference of any kind. The control by the workers was not stringent, and many of the new guardians of the public peace moved about with no weapons but slender bamboo sticks, giving a false impression of laxity which some looters tried to take advantage of with the result that two of the latter were promptly shot dead, and no further looting was attempted.

In striking contrast to this free and friendly atmosphere was the panic prevailing in the foreign concessions which include most of the territory and population of the city of Shanghai. All around the settlement boundary were heavy barricades and barbed wire, with British troops and marines of various nationalities on guard. Even in parts of Chinese territory where foreigners had residences the foreign forces put up barricades and barbed wire. One of the most amusing features of the situation was the fact that between the International Settlement and the French Concession, which adjoin each other, barricades and barbed wire were put up on both sides, by the French to keep out dangerous characters from the International (predominantly British) side, by the British to keep out dangerous characters from the French Concession. A state of emergency, practically equivalent to martial law, was declared by the Shanghai Municipal Council.

Monday morning the whole Chinese population of Shanghai took a holiday in honor of the coming of the Nationalist liberators. The general walkout not only included the workers, called out by their unions, but thousands of shopkeepers who, throughout the city, closed up their shutters and devoted the day to celebrating. In the Chinese areas controlled by the workmen there were meetings and parades. In the settlement the meetings were indoors, and even the shooting off of fire-crackers (China's characteristic expression of jubilation from time immemorial) was banned by the police. Frightful stories were given wide circulation by the Shanghai Municipal Police and by the British press (there is no American daily press) of Shanghai, regarding the "state of anarchy" in the Chinese districts where "Communist ruffians" were carrying on "reigns of terror." All these stories were pure inventions by anti-Nationalist elements, but they were given to a gullible and panic-stricken public as facts, creating a psychology akin to frenzy among the mass of Europeans and even Americans here. All sorts of articles were printed and distributed in the British papers, all sorts of rumors invented and published, of a type to stir up animosity, foment trouble, cause public alarm, and incite to a breach of the peace.

Monday evening and Tuesday the Nationalist troops occupied the Chinese districts. Tuesday afternoon regular artillery reached the North Station, where the Fengtien soldiers were still holding out. Upon the news that the regular Nationalist army was approaching there was a mad stampede among the Northern bandit-troops. All along the northern border of the settlement in the neighborhood of the railway station hundreds of these men, Chinese and occasional Russians, laid down their arms and begged the British troops on duty to open the gates and let them into the settlement. At several places along the line this was done, but the fleeing troops, in a frenzy of fear after their reign of slaughter, pillage, and arson, began to pour through the gates at a pace which alarmed the British troops into firing at them with machine-guns in order to stop the rush. Sixty-five were killed on one street and more than a hundred at another place. Scores more were shot down at various places along the boundary.

In fairness to the British soldiers it must be said that many did not understand that it was Northerners who were making the rush. There was a widespread impression that the men "crashing the gate" were Nationalists. One soldier on North Honan Road walked over to one of the dying men and kicked him viciously, with the remark: "Well, there's one of the bloody Cantonese I got." To make up for this unfortunate misunderstanding, it was announced the following day that all the bandit-soldiers who had been accorded the hospitality of the International Settlement in their flight from the drastic justice of the people would be sent by boat to Shantung to assist further in the war which their chief, Marshal Chang Tsung-chang, is making against the advancing forces of Chinese Nationalism, a war which he ingenuously explains is to protect the Chinese people from the horrors of communism. Tuesday night the last of the brave "anti-Communists" were gone, excepting for a hundred or so taken prisoner by the Nationalist soldiers, including a number of "White" Russians.

"Gone but not forgotten." The bandit-troops left behind them in Chapei acres upon acres of charred and blackened remnants of Chinese homes, with the roasted bodies of young and old within. Scores of bodies, mostly workmen but many elderly gentlefolk and young children, lay in pools of blood along the streets. As a final act the troops had mined the streets and open spaces close to the railway station, but the keen-eyed labor snipers saw this, and removed the mines as soon as the last of the bandits had been either disposed of or had been taken into the kindly embrace of their friends of the foreign settlement.

Thus the whole Chinese area of Shanghai outside the International Settlement came into the Nationalist hands, with the exception of a few square miles of territory to the north and west of the settlement which are occupied by British and Japanese troops. How long they will stay there is not known, but it is not likely that the Nationalist authorities, when their administration is established here, will tolerate the presence of foreign forces upon territory to which the foreigners have no legal title or right whatsoever.

The general holiday of the Chinese people ended Thursday morning, and there has been a general resumption of work. In some places, however (most of all in the post office), a serious shortage of labor exists, due to the fact that many of the workers are engaged in police and other public work in the Chinese areas. These official duties are, however, already being turned over to the authorized representatives of the Nationalist Government. The labor unions are retaining their hard-won arms and ammunition, and four hours' military drill is now included in the week's program of the educational committee of the labor unions.

On Wednesday, March 23, with Nationalist troops a few miles from Nanking, the capital of Kiangsu Province, the order was given to the Northern troops to evacuate the city. Nanking is a great city of the old style, the city wall having a circumference of some twenty-odd miles. There is little modern industry, and the labor unions which were so successful in maintaining order in Shanghai are embryonic at most. Thursday's attacks began upon foreigners. The origin of these attacks is obscure, but several things are certain: They started when both Northern and Nationalist soldiers were within the city walls. The Northern soldiers (who have a propaganda staff with them) were furious at the shooting of their fellows by the foreign troops in Shanghai two days before. The savagery and lack of discipline of these bandit troops could be utilized by Northern propagandists to the disadvantage of the Nationalists, who would naturally be held responsible for whatever went on in the city after they had captured it. But there are also reports that the Nationalists' hands were not clean. "Soldiers in Nationalist uniforms" are said to have been responsible for the looting of the American Consulate and other places. A Japanese report states that Cantonese troops fired upon the Japanese warship from the shore.

The following day the Nationalist army was in full control of the city and order was rapidly being restored.

This is the situation today. The Nationalist troops are masters of China clear to the Yangtze, and are forcing their way toward Peking in the north. The province of Honan is already in their hands, the province of Shensi to the west is in the hands of their ally Feng Yu-hsiang (the "Christian General"); Shansi to the north is in friendly hands.

In Shanghai a new thing has come—labor control. The laborers took over power as a temporary thing, and are now yielding it to the regular Nationalist forces, but they have not surrendered their arms, and remain as a bulwark against possible attempts at military rule here. There is a new spirit among them which, developed and enlightened, may lead the workers of China to greater things than their revered philosophers have ever dreamed of—possibly, even, to political power and industrial freedom.

[Since Mr. Godwin wrote his article Chiang Kai-shek has broken with his own Nationalist Party and bloodily disarmed the workers who resisted him, at a cost of several hundred lives.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

To My Mother

By MAYNARD MACK

There is a loveliness in things like these:
The first dull flare of dogwood on the hills
In May—the fragrance of the cherry trees
Along a country lane—and daffodils.
There is a loveliness in feathered seeds,
In rain, and sky—and in the lonely wind,
Brooding like Pan among his broken reeds
O'er fields loved once, but left long since behind.
There was a beauty in these things, but now
That I have learned to know the gentle grace
Of years, the wistful peace of a tired face,
And calm of care-worn eyes, and silver hair—
Oh now a bud and blossom on a bough
Are little things that I have lost somewhere.

Swift Injustice in Oklahoma

By MAURINE HALLIBURTON McGEE

WHILE it is improbable that the latest occupant of death row at the McAlester penitentiary will be forced to pay the penalty given him, Judge Charles Swindall of the Twentieth Judicial District of Oklahoma has not yet been moved by the storm of protest which arose upon his decision in the case of nineteen-year-old Dave Brown, whose chief crime, it seems, is that he refused to divulge the names of his two accomplices in a daylight bank robbery at Jet, Oklahoma. No one was killed, no one was wounded by the prisoner or his companions, but under a new law robbery with firearms is punishable by life-imprisonment or death. The boy's confession was the first clue to the identity of the bandits. At Cherokee the case came before Judge Swindall, who prides himself upon dealing out "swift justice." The boy pleaded guilty and the judge offered him a light sentence if he would tell the names of his confederates. This the youthful criminal steadfastly refused to do. Even when the judge threatened him with the death penalty if he did not make a full confession, implicating the two others and revealing their identity, he stood firm. This is a dangerous precedent to establish, the use of the death penalty as a third-degree measure: a light sentence if the prisoner does what the judge tells him, regardless of his crime, but the death penalty if he offends or annoys the judge!

Dave Brown stood firm in his resolve to bear his sentence alone. Death row received him and he will die, if Judge Swindall has his way, on the twentieth of May. There was no consideration of the influences which shaped this boy's life. His grandmother, Mrs. W. C. Wright, testified that when he was nine years old his parents separated; at thirteen he entered the United States army; he served overseas with the American Expeditionary Forces and received a head wound, for which he was treated in a hospital at Washington, D. C., on returning from France. His grandmother believes that he is unbalanced and has not committed this crime or others to which he has confessed.

The picture of Judge Swindall lies before me as I write. There is not much hope of softening that face, long and lean and hard as a Puritan Father's, bent upon the extermination of a life. He is quoted as saying: "If they don't want to come clean, they had better stay out of the Twentieth District!" Again, the stress lies, not on the crime, but on the fulness of the confession. It is the confession that is to be judged, against it the punishment will be meted. The Judge says: "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." But whoever heard of death as a preventive measure? One wonders whether the judge's justice is not too swift to be just. Oklahoma thinks that it is. The day following the verdict Mabel Bassett, State Commissioner of Charities and Corrections, declared her intention of appealing directly to Governor Johnson. It is almost certain that a stay of execution will be granted, as the defendant has six months in which to perfect the appeal. The editor of the Tiny Times, a feature of the Oklahoma City Times, says: "It seems incredible that Judge Swindall made a confession implicating the other robbers the weight in the scales between a life sentence and a death sentence." Nor does this indicate an indifferent attitude toward crime. A few years' imprisonment would have been a suitable punishment; a life-sentence would have been severe; death is unthinkable.

In the Driftway

MODERN youth is wild and reckless and radical, we are so often told that we have almost come to believe it. Perhaps it isn't so. Perhaps it is only that the world changes, that everybody of our time is a little different from those of any other era, that youth shares in the differences instead of standing still. And after all it is probable that the changes are not as considerable as some of us hope and others of us fear. Modern life may be like the ocean—a lot of lashing and lather on the surface with miles of unmoved depths below.

* * * * *

THE Duluth Herald has been canvassing Duluth high-school boys to find out what they think of the modern girl and what kind they like best. Does the flapper type win the palm? Hardly. "Give me the bashful type of girl, one that's not spoiled like most of these flappers are," says an all-around athlete of whom his companions assert that he "can have the pick of any girl in the school—they're all crazy about him."

> Why? Well, gee, that's hard to explain. But the girls that dress in style, not extreme, who study, and who can really talk to a fellow are best. Every day one reads about this one and that one saying that all the girls and boys of today think of is necking. Maybe that is true to some extent, but I think it's only among a certain group in every school. The majority of fellows here at school, and the majority of the girls, too, don't go in for that stuff as much as a lot of these later-day Jeremiahs would like to have people believe. We may be a bit freer than they were in their youth, but we still hold close to old ideals and standards.

Another boy, more disillusioned, says from the dregs of bitter experience:

> These flappers are nothing but baby gold-diggers. They read so much mush, and believe all the movies they see, that they think us fellows are made of money and every time we take 'em out they try to make us spend as much as possible. You're a piker if you don't, and once get that stamp from a girl and you have a tough time getting others to go with you any place. They all want a good time, and we have to pay for it. But the more serious girls don't. At least I've had that experience. That's one reason why I like them better than flappers.

"A beautiful dumb girl is pitiful," one brave lad announces. "Brainy, beautiful, and quiet, that's the ideal girl for me. But try to find one," he adds sadly.

* * * * *

FORTUNATELY the flappers have their defenders. "We're for 'em every time," says one young man. "They are not doing wrong; just mixing in a little pleasant good time along with the serious things of school life. Why should we pick on crape-hangers? We are young only once." And another boy insists that the flapper is merely "misunderstood." Ah, there you have it! The Drifter had guessed as much all along. The flapper is like all her sisters since Mother Eve. No better proof could be adduced of the conservatism of the ultra-modern young woman. This one poignant word links her inextricably with the Eternal Feminine.

Correspondence

To Christians!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is many a year since I have given a dollar to foreign missions, nor do I expect ever to give another. But I will give $25 to any fund the churches raise to help the Chinese pay the reparations which the anti-Christian Government of the United States has demanded from that liberty-loving people. If the churches in America really desire to express the spirit of Him who said "thy cloak also," they can, by paying our country's share of the reparations from poverty-stricken China, regain for America the lost friendship of one-quarter of the human race, and open the door for Christ in the Eighteen Provinces. Furthermore, they can open the door for Christ in Washington, D. C.

Missionaries, Guns, and Indemnities

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I appreciate the fairness of The Nation in promptly publishing the authoritative statement of Clarence E. Gauss, Consul General at Shanghai, to the Secretary of State, denying the report of G. A. Kennedy that the Rev. Dr. John E. Williams, vice-president of Nanking University, was killed as he "drew his revolver." We have the clear statement of Americans of high character who were with Dr. Williams at the time and were eyewitnesses of all that occurred. One of them, Dr. A. J. Bowen, president of the university, says that "Dr. Williams had no weapon of any kind. I don't believe he ever owned a gun in his life. The Cantonese soldiers searched us thoroughly for weapons. They found none."

The missionary message is one of peace and good-will. Among the 7,663 missionaries connected with Protestant missionary work in China an occasional individual, under pressure of great provocation, with the safety of women and children in mind, may invoke the protection of his government; but the overwhelming consensus of missionary opinion is adverse to any identification of the missionary enterprise with military or naval force. Many missionaries would have remained at their stations in this present disturbance if it had not been for the urgent representations of the American Minister and consuls that by staying they would intensify the danger of international complications, since whatever their own feelings might be, the government regards them as its nationals and cannot acquiesce in their desire to be considered otherwise than as American citizens. Missionary annals abound with instances of missionaries who have laid down their lives rather than voluntarily run away from their posts or defend themselves with weapons. You will be interested to know that the official Missions Code used by all the leading boards and societies of foreign missions in the United States and Canada, an octavo volume of 744 closely printed pages listing 50,380 code words for every conceivable need and emergency that might arise in connection with foreign missionary work, contains no code word for pistol, revolver, gun, rifle, or weapon of any kind. The use of force in connection with missionary work lies so entirely outside the range of missionary work and the spirit of the missionaries that neither the boards nor the missionaries have any use for such words.

As for indemnities, the Presbyterian Board has written to the State Department that it has never sought financial compensation for the death of a missionary and that it will not do so for the death of Dr. Williams.

Dragging America into the China War

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: We have three American officials here. The Consul General, Clarence E. Gauss, who was transferred here recently from Tientsin, has had long service in China and understands the situation thoroughly from the modern standpoint. Then we have Admiral Charles S. Williams, who has been in the Far East for a considerable period, and who also should know something about the situation. In addition we have Colonel Hill, commander of the marine forces now stationed in the American ships in the Shanghai harbor.

When the trouble started at Shanghai a number of American naval craft were sent here in accordance with the usual practice. When the thing got a little worse, following the Hankow trouble, about three hundred marines were sent here from Guam, the marines being quartered on the gunboats in the harbor. Following the occupation of Chekiang Province by the Cantonese troops we received cable advices that the Chaumont was coming out with about 1,500 marines, but that it was being sent to Manila rather than Shanghai. Gauss told American visitors very definitely that the marines were going to Manila, but suddenly he was surprised to find that the Chaumont had been diverted by the Admiral without consultation with the Consul General, and was coming to Shanghai. When the Chaumont arrived, it anchored at the Standard Oil installation, about eight miles down the river from the Shanghai Bund. The Standard Oil Company has considerable property on the Pootung side of the river—enough there for a small golf course. The marines have been taken ashore almost daily and given exercise and training maneuvers in the isolated Standard Oil compound, where they attract little attention.

But since the British troops landed very great pressure has been brought to bear upon the American authorities to permit the American marines to participate in the demonstration march through the streets of the International Settlement. Gauss steadily opposed this, and said upon several occasions that it was not necessary in view of the fact that the marines were receiving plenty of exercise at the Standard Oil installation. However, it was rumored around town that the American marines were coming ashore for a demonstration march through the settlement. Gauss told his visitors again that he had advised against it; he added that the Admiral was running the show and that if such a march were held he disavowed all responsibility for any possible ill effects. He advised the Admiral, if such a march were held, not to use the band or display the flag unduly. But the Admiral gave the order, and even held a review before the grandstand where the British troops are stationed!

Now, it is being rumored around again that the American marines are to be brought ashore and billeted in the city similarly to the British and Italian forces, again against Gauss's advice. Of course, heavy pressure is brought to bear on our naval and marine forces to take full part in everything that the British are doing. All of the American officers in both the naval and marine forces have been put up at the Shanghai Club, where they meet the British officers every day, and learn that America is a quitter unless she joins the British, etc., etc.

Thus is American policy made in the Far East!

For Free Seamen

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The International Seamen's Club has recently been organized in the Port of New York, with the object of providing a place where progressive seamen may gather for recreational and educational purposes, without being under the watchful supervision and patronage of shipowners or missionary workers. A clubroom has been outfitted at 26 South Street and a radio has been provided. We appeal to readers of The Nation to send us fiction relating to the sea, liberal and radical journals, marine journals, popular scientific magazines. It should be addressed to E. Hillyer, Secretary International Seamen's Club, 26 South Street, New York City.

Of Thomas W. Gregory

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your current issue you permit yourself to use the words humbug and scalawag in connection with Mr. T. W. Gregory. Only those who were associated with the great-hearted gentleman whom you thus insult can fully appreciate how firmly he withstood the pressure from all parts of our country during the years of war hysteria to make of the Department of Justice what you like to pretend it was and how earnestly he strove to protect from difficulty those who were unjustly suspected or accused.

Mr. Gregory obeyed his oath to enforce the law as Congress wrote it. There are those who believe that that was his plain duty, and that it was and remains the duty of the citizen to obey the law as it is written. It should need no demonstration that neither the Attorney General nor his immediate assistants had any control over the judges. It was equally impossible that they should direct in detail every act of every district attorney. But it may be as well to remind The Nation that the most spectacular of all the convictions under the espionage act was sustained by a unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court, written by Mr. Justice Holmes.

The Nation might, among other things, have remembered:

1. That the espionage act would very likely have been passed by Congress in a very much more extreme form except for the opposition of Mr. Gregory. The resignation of my predecessor as assistant attorney general was due to a difference of view upon this very subject.

2. That Mr. Gregory placed in charge of the special war work of the Department a distinguished lawyer who had been an outstanding progressive when there were such.

3. That the presence of Mr. Brandeis upon the Supreme Court is due more to the fact that Mr. Gregory was Attorney General than to any other one circumstance.

Good for Mobile!

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your issue of April 6 appears the following:

> On March 8 Clarence Darrow was forced to leave Mobile, Alabama, after being threatened with lynching because in a speech to Negroes in a school-building he deplored lynching and Southern justice. Police with drawn revolvers guarded Mr. Darrow out of town; Ku Klux handbills denouncing him were passed around to the crowd that pursued him.

This is at least 99 per cent untrue. Some portion of the Darrow speech referred to, made to Negroes, has called forth unfavorable comment here, but such criticism never assumed the proportion of threatened mob violence. "Armed guards" and all such are figments of sensationalism.

The Second Daughter

By IDELLA PURNELL

The second daughter in an alien house,
The first girl in her own,
She is knitted mind to mind with one,
With the other, bone to bone.

In one she gathers crystal flowers
From the spirit's flood;
In the other, dark and heavy fruit
From primeval blood.

This is the hidden reason
That she is deeply wise;
With spring and harvest season
Brooding in her eyes.

Journalists in China

China and the Powers. By Henry Kittredge Norton. The John Day Company. $4.

The Revolt of Asia: The End of the White Man's World Dominance. By Upton Close. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

Our Far Eastern Assignment. By Felix Morley. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.

IT is "mere whimpering" for the Chinese to complain of foreign privileges in China, as Mr. Norton sees it; China's troubles are of her own making. The Chinese Republic is a "political nebula," without "the slightest tendency in the direction of the establishment of a republic or any other government in which there is popular participation." On the other hand, "the foreigners"—Mr. Norton included—"look upon these matters [the special privileges] as sacred rights obtained and consecrated by treaty agreement with the government of China. They are rights upon which hundreds of millions of dollars have been invested, a vast commerce built up, and the lives of thousands of foreigners planned." China, indeed, is in a hard way; she suffers from devotion to the past, but today, when "age and wisdom surrender in despair to the immature and inexperienced judgments of youth, we have a situation fraught with the gravest danger."

If the Nationalist Revolution will, in the sweet and reasonable manner in which revolutions ought to be conducted, follow a strictly peaceful and legal course, Mr. Norton will greet it with a friendly smile and the assurance that "the Powers will meet them more than half way." If the revolution behaves like a revolution, Mr. Norton will deprecate it, calmly but severely.

To those who want the story of China presented without passion, with a forgiving understanding of the impulses of all the foreign Powers except Russia, I recommend "China and the Powers." But for those who want to understand why the Chinese volcano is spouting fire and lava, and into what shapes the titanic forces are molding the peoples of Eastern Asia one might as well recommend a dictionary. It contains all the words necessary to understanding, but——.

Mr. Norton left China before the Cantonese movement was big enough to be discerned from the Legation Quarter in Peking, which, perhaps, explains his calm; Mr. Close has just returned, and he is still smoky from the fire of his recent experiences. He is excited. He writes like a Hearst editorial. He has been tossed by an earthquake and knows that it was an earthquake, and he wants the world to know it, too. He skims from Tokio through Korea, China, the Philippines, French Indo-China, independent Siam, Burma, India, Persia, renascent Turkey, to Egypt. Everywhere he sees the white man's empire slipping. He sees that white men have first maddened the East by their own greed and caste prejudice and then taught it all the tools of rule and war; he sees "a little group in Russia, possessed half by idealism, half by a mania for power," become "the agent of destiny in bringing the eventful era of domination by the white race to its end." He sees the British Empire at bay, desperate; and Japan, responsive to the spirit of the times, aligned at last with the new Asia. He sees Gandhi preaching one cultural revolt, and young Hu Shih asserting that pragmatism, "the greatest contribution to philosophical thought since Aristotle," will redeem Asia. And he sees America, unwilling to free the Philippines, tragically ready to take the onus of the white man's burden off tired England's shoulders. Only America among the great Powers, he says, has the resources to check Asia's self-assertion; and he ends uncertain of her choice. His breathlessness is fatiguing; but his excitement is justified.

Mr. Morley is neither breathless nor blind. He visited the East in the interval of calm between the passion which followed the Shanghai shootings and the stormy rise of the Cantonese. No better editorials on the Chinese crisis are appearing in America today than those in the Baltimore Sun, and their background lies in the experiences described in this travelogue. In 174 pages Mr. Morley contrives to sum up, with a talent for common sense, the essentials of the Japanese effort to create a synthetic democracy; the silent wrestling-match of Japan and Russia in Manchuria; the epic awakening of China, the germination of which he observed at Canton; and the human aspiration of the Filipinos for their promised but ever-deferred independence.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

Deus ex Machina

The Myth of the Individual. By Charles W. Wood. The John Day Company. $2.50.

CHARLES W. WOOD is a journalist who is ever seeking news from Nowhere. And his utopia is not a land of dreams but one of bustling, clanging reality—industrial America. It is his enthusiastic belief that here and now the American people have the means of realizing the greatest hopes of mankind, if they but understood the real nature of that machine industry which they have developed so marvelously.

According to Mr. Wood, the machine was turned from its true purpose by the capitalist who saw in it merely a method of creating large profits. For the very nature of the machine is to produce abundantly. The capitalist, fearful of overproduction, and the laborer, fearful of unemployment, have tried to limit output. But all in vain. The machine has run away from both of them; it produces more than ever. It seems to be driven by an almost mystical impulse to turn out a sufficiency of goods so that no one need go hungry or naked.

Mr. Wood discusses many subjects in his book—business, family, war, crime, politics, religion—but every chapter ends in a hymn to the machine. The great problem of our times, he declares, is the result of the fact that we persist in clinging to the outworn ideas of the pre-machine age. And the most obsolete of these ideas is "ownership." "Capitalism," says Mr. Wood, "is not a system. It is merely a superstitious belief that industry can be owned." The machine has abolished individual ownership, and in doing so it has made all mankind interdependent. That is the "Industrial Revelation." Contrary to general belief the individual is now a "myth," since in industry he cannot function by himself in any way whatsoever. A wagon can be owned but not a steam engine; the latter is, in its very nature, social because it cannot be worked except collectively.

Who, then, is the capitalist? He is, declares Mr. Wood, essentially a pawn-broker, a survival of medieval times, whose object is to lend money at high rates of interest, not to produce goods. The scientist, not the capitalist, created and developed modern industry. What the capitalist did was to pervert its uses for his own selfish interests. Does the solution of the problem therefore lie in getting rid of the capitalist? But in that way lies socialism. As Mr. Wood does not believe in ownership, either private or public, he must find a solution elsewhere. And he finds it in the ideas of Henry Ford, on whom he once wrote a famous interview-article. The Ford policy of buying labor at the highest price and selling goods at the lowest price establishes, in the author's opinion, industry on the basis of service to the community. It is "industry" versus "business," and Ford's great success means the inevitable downfall of business. The death-knell of capitalism has been sounded by the honk of the tin lizzie.

There is growing up a Ford legend. It is that of a great social philosopher at the helm of industry, which he guides for the benefit of the workers. Service is his watchword. The plain fact of the matter is that Ford is a business man. His views on social problems betray ignorance so abysmal and notions so puerile that they merit no serious consideration. But when Ford talks business it is quite another story. There he shows a striking originality and a daring venturesomeness for which he cannot be too highly praised. He is therefore not a Robert Owen, dominated by a passion to renovate society and using his business talents for that purpose, but a captain of industry dominated by a passion to renovate business methods. Like Judge Gary, Ford is opposed to any fundamental change in the existing order. The only difference is that Ford is a much better business man than the Judge. Then why the legend? It is really a new soft pillow to make sensitive capitalists feel at ease in a critical world. Once the soft pillow was philanthropy; then, settlement work; then, a Message to Garcia; now it is service.

In spite of digressions and repetitions Mr. Wood's book is a stimulating contribution to contemporary thought. Eloquent exhortation, witty paradox, a quaint turn of phrase, a novel point of view enliven its pages. Perhaps the most original thing in the volume is its assimilation of machine industry to Christian ethics. Mr. Wood has baptized the machine. In throbbing steel he beholds a universal power for the welfare of mankind; hence it is the greatest of all spiritual forces.

Portrait of a Young Woman in New York

Andy Brandt's Ark. By Edna Bryner. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

THE mystery of Althea bulks large in this book; but its kernel of gold is the portrait of a young woman who has lifted herself by her bootstraps out of the slough of despond, lower middle-class and somewhat subhuman, in which Althea is still struggling, to the dizzy heights of a large well-lighted attic studio in New York, furnished with the latest thing in furniture and the latest thing in books. Sitting on these dizzy heights, new enough evidently so that she is continually overwhelmed by them, though at the same time she has the sensation of being "fixed in her familiar surroundings like a specimen, some species of hardy winged creature of good warm brown touched with gold, settled by a cunning intent hand for the truth of its being amid its precise field of flowers"—sitting exultantly on these heights, Andy Brandt gets a letter that draws her back into family complications. Her younger sister Althea is in serious trouble. It is a good deal of a hardship to leave New York and Michael and the opera and theater and supper parties and luncheon parties and tea parties, but Andy Brandt gets on the train.

Miss Bryner uses various of the ratiocinative methods of Conan Doyle and Henry James. She adds to their devices her own interesting one of unraveling her plot through an individual's discovery of the family out of which she has grown. So interesting that I read patiently on to discover what or who was to blame for the Brandts in spite of the difficulties of the thick and at times almost unintelligible style that has borrowed the worst features of half a dozen experimenters. "Lean darkness with its fresh English air infused with oriental luminousness met swelling roundness crackling points of light over its strong soft texture," Andy says succinctly of her husband and herself.

In her sleuthing visits she makes herself as common as the brothers and sisters-in-law she investigates. They find to their joy that she can talk their language and that although she is a writer the underclothes she hangs out on the line are silk and colored. But this commonness is outside. Inside she is looking down on them from the secure heights of her New York apartment. Seen from those heights the emotional entanglements of a lower middle-class family are maddeningly trivial, and need only the sharp sword of common sense, which she unsparingly applies. In her world such complications do not arise. She and Michael have learned to live without drudgery, to be married without children, and to keep from knowing all the people they don't want to know. This last knowledge they continue to practice even when swayed by knight errantry. For when Andy fails to interest her brothers in assuming the responsibility for the deserted father, she does not ask him to live with her. Family responsibilities evidently belong to those already inured to them. The idea that she might take the old man does cross her mind, but she reassures herself that he would be lost away from his woods, forgetting that woods are to be had at New York's back door for a few dollars down. And when she wonders if she is not endangering the peace of her older brother's home by shipping her mother to him, it does not occur to her that she herself, armored as she is in success and urbanity and a knowledge of modern languages and modern psychology, and possessed of a husband who understands all things, should be the one to assume the risk. Again, when Althea comes to her a second time for succor, she receives that budding clinical case with enthusiasm, saying, you are made of silk and you are trying to live with people who are made of cotton. Until Althea turns her fault-finding talents on Andy too and is promptly told that she is a silly little fool who has a good husband and no real troubles in the world.

Andy is an engaging young person, with all the zest and naivete and courage and endurance that belong to pioneers. The book in which she records herself is full of honest attempts to reproduce moods, ideals, remembered incidents, and real people. From it one learns a great deal about how a fairly typical young woman of the newest vintage thinks and feels.

Unamuno's Epilogue

L'Agonie du christianisme. Par Miguel de Unamuno. Traduit du texte espagnol inédit par Jean Cassou. Paris: F. Rieder et Cie.

UNAMUNO has told us in one of his best essays that as a youth he walked far and wide through the fields of European culture, but after a weary excursion he could not find anything of interest in them. In "The Tragic Sentiment of Life," however, he has also told us that the gnawing doubt which forms the substance of his thought, and which has obsessed him for so long, was a struggle between the heart and the mind, between faith and reason. This struggle, which constitutes Unamuno's main claim to the attention of the world—because his importance as a Spaniard rests elsewhere—has naturally been supposed by its readers to be a sincere one. We thought it was a struggle in which Unamuno himself stood as a dispassionate spectator, tragically torn it is true by the possibility of the defeat of any one of the antagonists within his mind, but unwilling in any case to show for either of them —faith or reason—any partiality.

There were, however, some indications which made one suspect at times that Unamuno was not, as he claimed to be, an impartial spectator to the struggle enacted in his mind; that he was, though perhaps unwittingly, partial to his faith; that he owed it a loyalty he had never denied it in the depths of his heart. In a review of "Essays and Soliloquies" I have already implied my doubts as to his intellectual impartiality. But I did not have then sufficient evidence for a radical criticism. There was, however, the whole subtle trend of Unamuno's thought, a consideration of which led one to suspect his intimate sincerity. There was also the intimation he frequently gave of his ideals and desiderata, which were not impartial to the struggle within his mind. For as far as the reader was able to discern, these appeared addressed apologetically to one of the forces which contended within him, his faith. There were besides, dating from his early writings, those expressions for which Unamuno had become famous in Spain: "let them invent" (referring to Europeans), "that dirty logic," "what is science to me?" He who had traveled through the fields of European culture had evidently never been more than an unsympathetic tourist. Emotionally and intellectually, by training and by temperament he had always been more adapted to understand "his great African, Augustine," than the cold calculation of the physicist or the inhuman analysis of the biochemist. But there was yet another fact, much more telling than these, though more intimate; and that was, that while he was telling his readers he was the victim of the struggle of his reason and his faith, he was engaged in the composition of a strange mystic poem, "The Christ of Velazquez," which showed, better than his own pronunciamentos, where his loyalties rested.

These facts, significant as they were then for the proper interpretation of "The Tragic Sentiment of Life" and for the immediate evaluation of his ideology, assume now a much greater importance in view of the present book. In this book Unamuno can no longer conceal his real preoccupations. Insincere one may not call, of course, so impulsive a man. But certainly he cannot now escape the accusation of blind ignorance of his own heart. He has already left behind the tragic sentiment of life. He comes out now with what one had already suspected was his real problem: a purely religious struggle, "the agony of Christianity" within himself. The philosopher is here entirely eclipsed by the mystic. The "logic of passion," the meaning of which he leaves the reader to interpret for himself, the avalanche of his paradoxes, and the impact of his epigrams are now totally directed toward the problem of his faith as a Christian and a Catholic. The intellectual problems of modern Europe concern him no longer, except in so far as they may be vaguely present to the introvert religious consciousness. And as to immortality, the doubt of its possibility no longer drives him to despair; he now accepts immortality on faith.

"L'Agonie du christianisme" is a strange book, worth reading even if one is not especially interested in the self-inflicted tortures of the mystic. It is the passionate explosion of a noble mind in which intellectual harmony has disappeared and in which the search for truth no longer obtrudes its cacophonous note upon the tortured song of a fervid soul in the throes of one of its raptures. It obviously embodies glaring flashes of a consciousness on the edge of dissolution. And for those who have been interested in the career of Unamuno as the most prominent figure of the generation of '98 in Spain, or as a philosopher of despair, it is of the greatest importance because it is not only the epilogue to "The Tragic Sentiment of Life"—it seems to be Unamuno's swan song as well. The incidents which have been recently tearing at his heart—his exile, the tragedy of his country—have, one must say, broken the intellectual resistance of a man who, in his day, yielded to no one in daring and courage. Impotent in front of tragic circumstances, he has chosen the easier way, and has abandoned himself entirely to the arms of mysticism. At last he has found peace.

ELISEO VIVAS

Poet of Intricate Conceits

7 P. M. and Other Poems. By Mark Van Doren. Albert and Charles Boni. $1.75.

THE poetic performance of Mr. Mark Van Doren has been steadily limited, but it is neither unpretentious nor slight. He knows his own mind, accepts certain formal limitations, and refuses to amplify his poems beyond the point where their perceptions would perplex his sense of order. Some of his poems, as a matter of course, are less interesting than others. In all of them, however, he knows definitely what he is doing. This quality alone, of poise, of self-direction, would be enough to set him apart as an anomaly among contemporary poets. When the unusual which is not at the same time the novel rears up its head among us, the conspiracy of ignorance settles quietly upon our heads: poetry these days is seldom read with attention. In the case of Mr. Van Doren, the upshot of the anomaly is that he is called an unambitious singer of country matters. It is the opinion of this reviewer that Mr. Van Doren is one of the most ambitious poets now writing, and that the course of his poetry, in two volumes, is a growth in intensity, complexity, and range.

To assign any poetry to its niche in the halls of the literary psychologists is a dangerous, a little presumptuous, and often a meaningless affair; yet it is fairly clear that Mr. Van Doren's poetry appears in terms of the intellect. In the last ten years only the poets who are difficult, or who suffer an inarticulate pessimism, have been described as intellectual. The intellect of W. B. Yeats's later poems has evidently not been consulted. There is no criticism, likewise, for a style like Mr. Van Doren's, which, without having been in the least influenced by Yeats, displays much of the same sort of approach to poetry as Yeats's work since about 1912. The singular smoothness and surface clarity of his verse are due to a rigorous confinement of the material to a definitely conceived and arbitrarily limited plane. The plane is that of ideas, toward which, after careful eliminations, the mixture of experience that the poet must share with other men is gathered up. The elusive quality which his poetry has at its best emerges usually in visual terms, but its effectiveness is due to sudden, almost violent contrasts in image, and Mr. Van Doren, far from being a poet of simple vision, is often the poet of intricate conceits. Take his Inference, one of the best:

> Who made the evening made the fear
> Of horse and bird and snake and deer;
> Of all that do not learn they live
> Till light itself, grown fugitive,
> Goes breathing by—but turns about,
> And the black pouncer puts it out.
> Then bird and horse and deer and snake
> Go posting home, before they break
> The line that leads them; and their eyes
> Hold all the day that slowly dies.

There is more here than bucolic sincerity of feeling, of which Mr. Van Doren has been frequently accused; there is a deft, consciously sustained technique.

So far is Mr. Van Doren from being the swain of a New England farm that his chief defect as a poet, as I see it, lies in his technical virtuosity. It would be hard to find in this book a single obvious failure. But there are a few unsatisfactory poems. In these there is a certain monotony of rhythm, even when, as in the short quick line, the rhythm is varied. Mr. Van Doren's rhythmical skill occasionally blinds him to the internal direction of the poem itself; we get a poem perfectly rounded out on the surface, but somewhat obscured internally. It is Mr. Van Doren's paradox to be superficially most lucid when he is fundamentally most obscure. The title-poem, in which the last line, simple in itself, is to me on close reading unintelligible, and a poem like Dilemma, are instances of Mr. Van Doren's occasional weakness for letting the poem get out of hand, and lost under a beautifully organized surface. The poem in this volume which seems to me to be in every respect the most distinguished is Memories; it is difficult (the reader should not be drunk, ignorant, or asleep when reading it), but it has none of the structural obscurity of an "easy" poem like Dilemma. Here the images are not carried forward by the external momentum of the verse; the internal impulse pushes out and finds its own pauses and accents; the rhythms are quite special to the intention of the poem, observing at the same time the definite stanzaic pattern of the lines. In this poem, in passages of others, Mr. Van Doren seems to have found his own equivalent for the later technique of W. B. Yeats. His general outlook and poise, moreover, have much in common with Yeats: he has held consistently to the provincial scene of his childhood, and he remains untouched by the assumptions of the megalopolitan society in which he lives.

ALLEN TATE

Books in Brief

Aspects of Science, Second Series. By J. W. N. Sullivan. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

A number of very brief, journalistic essays on the theory of relativity, mathematics, the structure of the atom, psychoanalysis, etc. The attempt to popularize technical works is here brought to its perfect reductio ad absurdum. No background, knowledge, intelligence, or thought is demanded, and in return no information or insight is given. In addition to the technical articles are a number on different topics such as art, Herman Melville, On Being Oneself, etc., which are as significant and penetrating as those usually found in the Sunday magazine sections.

Issues of European Statesmanship. By B. G. de Montgomery. Henry Holt and Company. $5.

Mr. De Montgomery starts off in a very formidable way. He proposes, the preface runs, to discuss the rights and duties of the modern state, and, in the second half of his book, the major problems of foreign policy at the present time. It cannot be said that he is very successful. Much of his discussion consists of simple assertion, and large parts of it, the last chapter in particular, consist of that peculiarly irritating form of rhetoric which consists in abusing plaintiff's attorney. Mr. De Montgomery has done much better work than this. It is to be hoped that he will return to his earlier standards. And he may perhaps care to note that the conclusions of the National Industrial Conference Board are not usually accepted as either impartial or significant.

Music

Sensations—Good and Bad

THE visit which the Rochester Opera Company has just paid New York for a week under the auspices of the Theater Guild ranks in importance with the success of "The King's Henchman." If Mr. Taylor has paved the way for the American composer, the Rochester Company has done the same for American opera itself. This company is the offspring of the Eastman School of Music. Its members are students of the school, its stage and musical directors, Vladimir Rosing and Eugene Goossens, members of the faculty. The end of four years of cooperation finds all concerned able to give a popular Puccini opera, "Madame Butterfly," and two Mozart operas, "The Marriage of Figaro" and "The Flight from the Seraglio," and to give them in such a manner as to charm sophisticated New York. The Puccini was not as happy a selection as the Mozart, while of the latter "The Marriage of Figaro" stood out. Nevertheless, certain surprising qualities ran uniformly through each: fresh, pretty voices, an excellent stage manner, perfect diction, artistic staging, and last but not least, fine stage and musical directing. The diction was not only the best heard now in this city on the operatic stage, but it was in English, quashing the myth that English cannot be sung. The English librettos were also the best adaptations of foreign operas yet heard here in any language, quashing the other myth that operatic librettos do not sound well in English. As a result the audience enjoyed itself thoroughly, guffawing its way through all the jokes, and chuckling comprehendingly at situations. "The Marriage of Figaro" seemed to be a constant delight; and even the rather dull "Flight from the Seraglio," the first English production in this country and the second in any language in New York, furnished its amusing moments. Perhaps the secret of the company's success was that it made no attempt to do Mozart in the grand manner, but did him simply and naturally. Mr. Goossens contributed largely to this by treating the score lightly and holding down his orchestra, at the same time keeping up the effervescent spirit of the music by an unflagging rhythm. Altogether, the quality of the productions was higher than that found in the small opera houses abroad, and yet not beyond the reach of any first-class conservatory. Nor should the financing be beyond the means of any of the cities where such music schools exist. The Rochester Company is the first practical step toward municipal opera in this country on a permanent and artistic basis. And as such, another example to the Juilliard Foundation of how to spend its thirteen-million-dollar trust fund.

George Antheil is too gifted a musician to allow either himself or his works to be presented as a circus attraction. Doubtless his management meant well when it announced him as the "musical sensation of the year" and, after dwelling pointedly on the riots attending similar performances abroad, invited the same by "wondering" obviously what New York would do. New York did the obvious thing by flocking to the concert and, promised a "sensation" by Mr. Antheil and his management, coming in a corresponding mood. The composer had promised much. Discounting a string quartet which opened the program, there was to be a jazz symphony, originally written for Paul Whiteman and now introduced instead by Handy's famous Negro Orchestra from Tennessee; a sonata for violin, piano, and drum; and, as the pièce de résistance, the music for a "Ballet Mécanique," scored originally for electric pianos, but now containing only one, manipulated by Mr. Antheil himself, and supplemented by some half-dozen others played by human hands, to say nothing of xylophones, sirens, alarm clocks, and even an aeroplane propellor. Under these circumstances it was not strange that the audience paid scant attention to the opening quartet. The sonata, which came after, proved better game, being a medley for the fiddle on familiar tunes from "tin-pan alley," and for the piano a steady crescendo of jazz, ending with the drum substituting for the piano. The next "kick" came when the curtain rose on a backdrop in black and white depicting two huge Negro figures of a woman in a chemise and a man in familiar vaudeville guise grabbing her even more familiarly around the waist. By the time the curtain rose again on the last backdrop, with its black and white design of steam shovel, piston, skyscraper, "El," and subway, the audience was quite ready for the steady roar and clang of steel that followed. During the intermission directly preceding almost the whole of downstairs had trooped out en masse into the lobby to talk it over. It now showed the result. It booed, whistled, clapped, and even hissed. A feeble attempt was made to start the hoped-for riot with a few rattlers, but it died out. In the midst of the din one man furnished comedy by hoisting a handkerchief tied to a cane. A good time was being had by all! One can scarcely believe, however, that this was the composer's chief aim. The string quartet, excellently played by the Musical Art Quartet, and more or less lost in the huge hall, showed an interesting departure from what the composer calls the usual "orchestral writing." The sonata offered a clever and often beautiful treatment of cheap, hackneyed themes and astounding qualities of the piano as a percussion instrument. The symphony was the most unified form of jazz yet heard, reaching a climax through a change of rhythm by dropping suddenly into a swinging waltz; while the ballet itself displayed a singularly coherent exposition of modern life in a modern city, with all its steady monotony and roar, and all its dynamic energy. The composer's claim that "today machinery has entered the imaginations of men" is undoubtedly borne out by the life about us; and just as the romantic composer of the nineteenth century tried to imitate the sounds of nature, so the realist of this has tried to embody the Age of Steel. No one has succeeded in doing this better than George Antheil. Whether one wishes to listen to it is not so important as that, if one does, one listens to it seriously. Because of this, Mr. Antheil's presentation was much to be deplored.

HENRIETTA STRAUS

Drama

Comedy of Manners

IT would be easy, and perhaps not entirely unjust, to dismiss S. N. Behrman's tenuous little comedy "The Second Man" (Guild Theater) as no more than a bit of inconsequential fluff kept pretty constantly amusing by the expert direction of Philip Moeller and by the suave acting of an excellent company—among the members of which Alfred Lunt seems particularly at home in his role. The plot, concerning itself with the successful effort of an honest and amiable but indolent short-story writer to disentangle himself from the determined embraces of an infatuated flapper in order that he may marry an old friend with an income, is developed with liveliness rather than with any remarkable inevitability; and so, I say, one might dismiss the piece with no more than what has already been said. Yet it would, I think, be more profitable to consider it rather in connection with the thing which it and many other similar plays are striving to be and which it in a measure succeeds in being; for it is, in effect, sentimental comedy on the point of becoming that much higher thing, pure comedy.

Mr. Behrman, it is to be noted first of all, has chosen as his milieu the American equivalent of the smart bohemia so extensively and so cheaply exploited by that nine days' wonder, Noel Coward. Occupied exclusively by well-decorated studios, inhabited by a race of near-artists and their semi-fashionable hangers-on, and dedicated less to the practice of the seven arts than to fastidious experimentation with both the Ten Commandments of Moses and the ten thousand of the social code, it is a semi-mythical region not unanalogous to that which constitutes the scene of the plays of Congreve, but it has a sort of ideal existence. Its denizens, all well enough off to be pleasantly irresponsible, represent rather the ideal aspired to than the actuality achieved by the class of real people from which they are imitated, and their artistic function is to strive to create a comedy of manners in the old sense, a comedy, that is to say, which takes its rise from the fact that its characters order their lives by their minds rather than by their emotions and frankly acknowledge prudence rather than sentiment as their guide. They are the representatives of those who think as opposed to those who feel; of the two masks by which the Greeks symbolized the two possible attitudes toward life they wear the one with the smile; and they are serenely integral because they have resolved once and for all the conflict between what romantic feeling prompts and what analysis reveals. At the time of the Restoration the characters of such comedy were drawn from the most fashionable society because the most fashionable society was that which approached nearest that ideal; today they are drawn from the smart bohemia because "society" today is predominantly sentimental in its ideals if not in its practice.

Mr. Coward's comedy was, as comedy, completely destroyed both by the extent to which he introduced sentiment and by a half-hypocritical, half-muddle-headed tendency to conventional moralizing which gave his plays a tone quite as much suggestive of nurse-maid literature as of high comedy; but from this Mr. Behrman has entirely escaped. He has, to be sure, satisfied the sentimental half of his audience by disposing of the little flapper safely in the arms of the romanticist who really loves her, but he preserves the comic spirit of his hero intact and he shows no moralistic incapacity to accept that hero, for he leaves him, not as Mr. Coward would have done, desolately aware of the charming romance he has thrown away, but contentedly talking over the telephone to the amiable lady with the amiable income who will serve to make him comically content. Moreover, to say that Mr. Behrman's lines are bright is not enough. We must revive the distinction which seventeenth-century critics made between wit and humor, a distinction which may be translated into the modern vocabulary as the difference between that kind of comic writing which consists in giving to the personages lines which are funny because they are in character and that kind which consists in allowing everybody without distinction to indulge in some current form of wise-cracking. Most of Mr. Behrman's characters are fairly conventional types, but his hero is individually conceived and his lines amusing because they serve constantly to define his point of view. "It is terrible," he remarks, "to take money from a woman. But then for the life of me I can't see why it is any worse than taking it from anybody else."

Very few writers, and those few are among the greatest that the world has produced, have ever succeeded in completely accepting and completely expressing the comic attitude. It requires a sophistication, a disillusion if you like, far deeper than that which can be acquired by a little free thinking and a little loose talking, for it is a difficult philosophy of life and one very easy to corrupt by ever so little concessive toying with romantic sentiment. No one (not Goldsmith, not Sheridan, and not Wilde) has written pure comedy since Congreve, and certainly Mr. Behrman does not do it; but he is just a little bit better than most of the Americans and Englishmen who are struggling toward it and that little bit is important. The English-speaking theater still awaits a writer with the complete clarity and strength necessary for a perfect comedy of manners; probably it also still awaits an audience which would find such a comedy without romantic concessions endurable; but there is already a society from which it might ultimately spring.

As its annual bill "Lyric Drama" the Neighborhood Playhouse is presenting two "dance designs" to music by Charles T. Griffes, a Commedia dell' Arte, and a "Dance Romance" to music arranged by Bela Bartok. All are interesting and one, "The White Peacock," is especially beautiful. "Hearts Are Trumps" (Morosco Theater) is a rather ponderous piece with Alice Fischer, Frank Morgan, and Vivian Martin. It deals with the complications arising from the alleged fact that according to French law a man may find himself married to a woman because an impostor has married her under his name.

Germany's War Guilt

By ALFRED VON WEGERER

IN countries outside Germany one continually meets with articles, many of them by eminent journalists, expressing the opinion that the pacification of Europe is being thwarted by the continuance of the controversy over the war-guilt question. Some of these journalists think that the time has not yet come for any final judgment on this vexed question and that the eternal discussion of opposing views with regard to it merely hampers the policy of peace which is so essential for Europe's welfare. On the other hand they grant that in spite of all attempts that have been made to smooth over the difficulties that divide Europe the protests against the Versailles view of Germany's responsibility are being urged with the same emphasis and stubbornness as ever.

Attempts to bring about a Franco-German understanding make so little headway mainly because the great bulk of the French nation still imagines that the Germans systematically planned and prepared the World War and that in 1914 they would have fallen upon France without any action whatever on the part of Poincaré and Isvolski. This belief alone renders it possible for the French Government of today to cling to Poincaré's policy of keeping the French garrisons in the Rhenish occupied provinces despite the Treaty of Locarno and the meeting at Thoiry. At the same time France's own war equipment, which is such a constant menace to Germany, is kept almost undiminished. An understanding between the Germans and the French, however, is impossible as long as French soldiers are stationed on the Rhine and the German civilian population is again and again irritated by the verdicts of French military tribunals. Only by getting rid of the prevailing French ideas concerning the outbreak of the war can a new mood be created in that country. Some such change of mood is essential as a preliminary for a withdrawal of the Rhenish garrisons.

A second consideration which makes the revision of the war-guilt dogma necessary is the fact that among the Germans it is now increasingly recognized that the burden laid upon the German nation by the Dawes Plan and the tribute that has to be raised for the most part by the self-sacrifice and hard work of the German laboring classes represent a demand unjustly made upon Germany, a demand moreover which the Germans themselves will eventually not be able to tolerate. There is a very strong sense of right and wrong among the Germans, and when once the masses of the workmen and peasants, as well as the army of unemployed and the lower grades of the proletariat, have really come to understand that the payment of two and a half milliard marks ($500,500,000) which Germany has to raise every year is based upon an unjust award, the consequences may be serious.

In German and foreign intellectual circles there is now a conviction that the Versailles dogma of Germany's sole responsibility for the war is without scientific foundation. In saying this we must remember that the mistaken verdict of Versailles was itself the result of a scientific investigation undertaken by authorized persons belonging to the Peace Delegation appointed by the Entente. This delegation pronounced its judgment, however, on the basis of material that was incomplete and in part even falsified. The procedure was, in short, as follows:

In 1919 the so-called Preliminary Peace Conference sat in Paris and at a full session on January 25 resolved to appoint a committee of fifteen members who among other things had the task of drawing up for the conference a report on the responsibility of those who began the war. On this committee there were representatives of the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, Greece, Poland, Rumania, and Serbia. The whole world in fact was represented. Among the Americans Lansing and Scott were conspicuous, while among the English Sir Gordon Hewart and Sir Ernest Pollock may be mentioned; M. Tardieu was one of the French delegates, while Signor Scialoja represented Italy and M. Politis Greece. The committee presented its report to the Peace Conference on March 29, 1919. In the report itself the committee arrived at the following conclusion:

> The war was premeditated by the Central Powers as well as by their allies, Turkey and Bulgaria, and was the result of acts deliberately committed with the intention of making it inevitable.
> Germany in accord with Austria-Hungary deliberately worked to set aside the numerous conciliatory proposals put forward by the Entente Powers and to bring to naught their repeated efforts to avoid war.

For the conclusions stated in this report the delegates used chiefly the so-called Color Books, published by the European governments in 1914 and containing the diplomatic correspondence that had taken place between the European cabinets before the outbreak of the war. From the Russian documents published since the war by the Soviet Republic it is clear that the Russian Orange Book of 1914 was not only incomplete in every respect but that a great number of its documents were forged. That the documents published by France in 1914 contained considerable gaps and were in part forged is also sufficiently notorious. Another proof of the insufficiency of the Color Books of 1914 is afforded by the recently issued British Documents on the Origins of the War. This collection of documents shows that the Blue Book of 1914 contained only a fragment, a mere quarter of the documents actually available, and that through its omissions and alterations of sequence it could not but lead to conclusions which were in no way in keeping with the actual state of affairs at the outbreak of the war.

The new British documents demonstrate moreover various falsifications of the French Yellow Book that had hitherto remained unnoticed. By means of these falsifications the French aimed at creating the impression that Germany's military preparations shortly before the outbreak of the war were far in advance of the corresponding French measures. In reality the exact contrary was the case. In order to attain their end the publishers of the French Yellow Book did not hesitate to employ the crudest form of falsification by altering certain dates in their own favor.

From this brief statement of the facts it will be clear that the committee appointed in 1919 by the Entente to examine the question of war responsibility drew up its report on the basis of an insufficient, incomplete, and falsified mass of material.

It goes without saying that no reproach is to be made against the members of the committee for this state of affairs. At the time the members could not doubt the official material placed at their disposal for the purpose of their investigation. The members of the committee themselves had no opportunity of checking the genuineness and completeness of the documents by consulting the archives of the various governments. The blame therefore rests not upon the members of the committee but upon the governments concerned.

The practical question now arises: What is to be done in order to make good this glaring injustice? In our opinion there are two alternatives.

As it is impossible to doubt the good faith of the members of the committee, it is to be expected that as soon as they are informed of the facts as cited above they will notify their governments that they can no longer identify themselves with the report in question.

Should, however, the members of the committee not take this view, a strong appeal should be made to the public in the countries in question with the object of getting the governments concerned to recognize the necessity of revising the verdict as to Germany's war guilt and of annulling the report as early as possible. This argument gains added weight when we consider that Germany up to the present loyally fulfilled all the obligations forced upon it by the Treaty of Versailles.

Italy and Bessarabia

AT the last session of the Council of the League of Nations in March the Italian representative surprised everyone by announcing that the Fascist Government of Italy had finally decided to ratify the annexation of Bessarabia by Rumania. Immediately following this announcement, an exchange of formal notes between Mussolini and the Soviet Ambassador to Italy, L. B. Kamenev, took place.

Following is a translation of the two notes from the Russian text as they appeared in the Soviet press in Moscow on March 20:

THE NOTE OF THE ITALIAN GOVERNMENT

On October 6, last, Your Excellency's predecessor addressed a letter to me wherein he explained the viewpoint of the Government of the USSR on the question of Bessarabia and informed me that, on the basis of the letters exchanged between myself and the Chairman of the Rumanian Council of Ministers in connection with the signing, on September 16, 1926, of a treaty of friendship between Italy and Rumania, the Government of the USSR noted with regret the probability of the ratification by Italy of the treaty on Bessarabia concluded on October 28, 1920, between Italy, Great Britain, France, Japan, and Rumania.

I was regretfully forced to state at the time that, irrespective of the essence of that communication, the point of view of the Italian Government on this question was not considered, a point of view which the Royal Government has had occasion to express before.

The Italian Government has never intended not to confirm the action of its plenipotentiary representatives, who, with the proper authorization, had signed in Paris the treaty of October 28, 1920, nor has it been its intention to avoid the fulfilment of the obligations assumed on the strength of that treaty. Since the Government of the USSR had expressed a negative attitude toward that treaty, the Royal Government has considered it necessary to postpone the act of ratification solely in the hope that direct negotiations between Russia and Rumania, such as were conducted between the two Powers both in Warsaw in 1921 and in Vienna in 1924, would lead toward an agreement satisfactory to both parties. It was also its hope that the good relations existing between Italy and the USSR could indirectly contribute toward the reaching of such an agreement in an atmosphere of clear and correct understanding of mutual interests.

This has been the sole consideration of the Italian Government in determining its actions up till now.

However, since the present position of Italy in regard to the treaty of 1920 cannot be continued indefinitely and since, on the other hand, there are no indications of the possibility of a friendly settlement of the question in the near future—a settlement which Italy has hoped for and is still hoping for—the Royal Government has decided not to postpone the ratification of the above-named treaty any longer.

In informing Your Excellency of this decision the Royal Government is of the opinion that the Government of the USSR will not view this as an unfriendly act toward Russia but solely as the desire of Italy to remain faithful toward the international obligations assumed in agreement with other Powers, signatories of the Paris Treaty of October 28, 1920.

March 7, 1927 MUSSOLINI

THE NOTE OF THE SOVIET GOVERNMENT

In reply to your note of March 7 I have the honor to communicate to you the following:

The Government of the USSR has energetically and repeatedly declared before the whole world, and before the governments which had signed the Paris Treaty of October 28, 1920, and also in the note of October 6, 1926, addressed to the Italian Government that the annexation of Bessarabia by Rumania was an act of brutal seizure of territory against the will of the population involved, a seizure which is a flagrant violation of the indisputable right of each people for self-determination. In view of the fact that the Italian Government refers to the negotiations which have taken place in Warsaw and in Vienna, I must remind you that in all negotiations concerning Bessarabia the Soviet Government has always held that the fate of this territory can and should be decided solely by the free expression of the will of its population. The very fact that the Rumanian Government has declined the proposal of the Soviet Government for a plebiscite more than anything else shows that the Rumanian Government is fully aware that it is maintaining its authority on the territory of Bessarabia only through military occupation and without popular consent. This fact cannot be changed either in the consciousness of the people of the USSR or of Bessarabia by any agreements of third Powers or by the ratification of such agreements by anyone.

The signing of the Paris Treaty of 1920, which is definitely hostile to the USSR, took place at a time when the signatory Powers not only had no relations with the Soviet Union, but had actually carried on a war of intervention in the Soviet Union, even having occupied its territory with their troops. The ratification of the treaty three years after the establishment of normal diplomatic and economic relations between the two countries can have no justification either from the point of view of international law or, still less, from the point of view of the interests of the peoples of the two countries.

I cannot refrain from pointing out, also, that the ratification of this act by Italy at a moment when public opinion considers war to be dangerously imminent can only serve to make the situation even more acute and contribute toward the forces directed against the USSR and, consequently, against the peace of Europe. Announcing, in the name of my Government, a determined protest against the act of the Italian Government,

A Life of the Author of The American Commonwealth

JAMES BRYCE

By the Rt. Hon. H. A. L. Fisher

LORD BRYCE, the former British Ambassador at Washington, "emerges from these entertaining and luminous pages, and the biographer's access to many personal letters, written from far places, reveals the man with an intimacy that brings him close to us . . . Through this Mr. Fisher permits Bryce to depict himself. In these letters we become familiar with his tastes, his antipathies and partialities, his methods. The work is exceedingly well done. Many pages are deep with charm. All throw a white light on the personality and mental processes of the author of The American Commonwealth."

The Macmillan Co. • New York

I, therefore, consider it necessary to reassert to Your Excellency that the USSR continues, as before, to consider the annexation of Bessarabia by Rumania an act of flagrant violence, and that the protocol of October 28, 1920, now ratified by Italy and concluded without the participation of the USSR and without consulting the population of Bessarabia, is, in the opinion of the Soviet Government, an act which has no legal significance and which, contrary to the view of the Italian Government, not only cannot insure peace in the East of Europe, but is in sharp contrast to the principles of peace.

An Appeal to Murder

THE following plea, said to be taken from the Torchio, official organ of Fascist journalists, is here translated from a bulletin issued in Paris by Henri Barbusse's Committee for the Defense of the Victims of Fascism and of the White Terror:

RALLY TO US, FASCISTS, AND KILL!

The International Blackhand Society is composed of the plutocracy, the exiles, the freemasonry, the banks, the Jews!

Oh, Fascists, you who love the Duce with a passionate devotion, cross the frontiers—by tens, by hundreds, by thousands.

Travel all the roads of the world, into those countries which think it an act of friendship to Italy to give hospitality to our bitterest and most vigorous enemies; seek out the countries which have been soiled by their anti-Italian blasphemies; plunge the tips of your bayonets into the sewage of the French bordels. There you will find the assassins. Your arms will be soiled by manure and blood and poison, but you will have an opportunity to cleanse them later on.

What we must do today, what must be done in the sacred name of Italy and the Duce is to strike. Mercilessly and ceaselessly, cruelly and finally, we must hunt out all the assassins and their agents, all the false Italians and all the ex-Italians. Wherever they may be they must fall. The extermination should be inexorable and complete. The very memory of these men must be wiped out.

Thus and only thus can we free Italy from her present nightmare and save her from the abyss into which they wish to plunge her.

The safety of the Duce requires it.

Fascists, rally to us, and kill!

EDITOR OF THE NATION

Of the first edition of this book, Robert Morss Lovett wrote: "Mr. Villard is unusually well fitted for his task. He inherited the ownership of a great newspaper. No one ever questioned his journalistic ability or his high view of the responsibilities of the profession, to which he was willing to sacrifice material success. . . . Undoubtedly the chief interest in Mr. Villard's book is in the narratives of successful struggle and the vivid portraits which lend to his subjects the interest of drama and character. He shows how practically all the great newspapers of his country owe their origin to some dominating individual, the New York Times to Ochs, the World to Pulitzer, the Herald to Bennett, the Chicago Tribune to Medill, the Louisville Courier-Journal to Watterson, the Kansas City Star to Nelson."

WE SINCERELY TRUST that there will be an immediate and worthy response to the appeal of the Red Cross and the President for the relief of the flood sufferers in the Mississippi Valley. There is a completeness about an inundation which is appalling; even an earthquake usually leaves the fields and plantations unaltered. To reestablish the homes that have been destroyed will be a tremendous task and, until Congress convenes, the generosity of the American public must meet the need. We trust that the rousing of public opinion will not end there. These floods can be stopped by modern engineering, but ever since 1879 the Federal Mississippi River Commission has carried out its "levees-only" theory—the theory that the only aim should be the confinement of the river between levees, although levees always break in flood times. It is charged that under this policy some 27,000 square miles of bottom lands, natural auxiliary reservoirs, have been taken from the river and nearly all the natural relief outlets have been closed, while forests have been cut from the watershed so that the run-off of water into the river has been greatly accelerated. The National Flood Commission, a civic organization, insists that beginning three hundred miles north of the mouth, controlled spillways are possible and practical and that flood levels in the delta of the Mississippi can thus be so completely controlled that no more breaks in the levees need be feared. We need immediate, independent engineering inquiry as to whether it is not time for the federal commission to reverse its position once for all.

OUT OF MEXICO comes dangerous news. Bandits attacked a train running from Guadalajara to Mexico City, and killed at least 100 persons. It was one of the most brutal and bloody of bandit outrages in the history of Mexico—and, according to testimony of some survivors, it was led by three Catholic priests. The Mexican Government asserts that the priests were acting at the instigation of the hierarchy, and has accordingly deported six archbishops and bishops. The Government says that the prelates were given a choice of trial or deportation; the deportees assert that they were ordered to leave without being granted time to pack fresh clothes. There seems to be little doubt that three priests—Fathers Vega, Pedroza, and Angulo—took part in the raid; and that the bandits shouted "Long Live Christ the King" as they robbed and killed; but no proof has yet been published of the statement, denied by the prelates, that these men acted upon order of the Catholic Episcopate. Eighty-nine-year-old Archbishop Mora y del Rio, however, faced the Minister of the Interior after the outrage and declared dramatically:

> We have aided no revolution. We have plotted no revolution, but we do claim that the Catholics of Mexico have the right to fight for their right by peaceful means first, and with their arms in an extremity.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH in Mexico, revolted by President Calles's anti-Catholic crusade, has clearly assumed an attitude of toleration if not of approval of revolutionary activity. It is not possible to believe that the church could organize such bloodshed as that on the Guadalajara train; but its sense of right and wrong seems to have been dimmed by its suffering under persecution. It is, for instance, with amazement that one reads the cool statement about these train murders made by Archbishop Ruiz y Flores in behalf of the Mexican Episcopate. "If priests participated," he said, "they did so without permission of the Episcopate"; he added:

> If it be true that the assailants of the train committed the cruelties credited to them in the official bulletin issued by General Jose Alvarez, President Calles's chief of staff, they deserve the reproach of the entire world; but in no case is the church responsible for their actions, but those who have brought about this situation, and have given and are giving an example of similar attacks.

NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER has done well to call attention to the remarkable proposal made to the American people on April 6 by M. Briand, the French Foreign Minister. "France is willing," he said, "publicly to engage itself with the United States to put war as between the two countries outside the pale of the law." Dr. Butler declares that M. Briand could not have made such a statement without the previous knowledge and consent of the French Cabinet to this utterance. This may or may not be the case, but we emphatically agree that there should be an immediate and prompt American response to this offer, whether it be official or unofficial, inspired or made on the spur of the moment. Senator Borah should be the first to accept this challenge of M. Briand. Every advocate of the outlawry of war in this country should foster this proposal; it would mean removal of the possibility of war between the United States and one of its most steadfast friends in the family of nations. Incidentally, it is a complete vindication of the wisdom of the Arbitration Crusade, recently started by William Floyd, the editor of the Arbitrator, for he urged the making of treaties like this between the United States and all nations, not half-way arbitration treaties with ifs and buts and exceptions, but hard-and-fast agreements which would make war impossible as long as a vestige of honor survived in the governments and peoples affected.

WE TALK PEACE AT HOME, but we drift toward war in China. The State Department, apparently impressed by the unanimity of American opinion against intervention there, has acted as a mildly restraining influence upon the allied alien Powers in China, but on the spot the ever-ardent marines are always eager for excitement. Americans scaled the wall of the Soviet Legation in Peking and occupied one part of it, not content to wait until the Chinese police found the keys to the buildings they had raided; American warships join in convoying British merchant ships on the Yangtze; American marines "rescued" three Americans from the Hankow picket-police. Imagine the excitement in this country if Chinese marines should land at St. Louis and forcibly take three of their countrymen away from an American police station! The Associated Press correspondent at Shanghai has computed that American vessels in China inland waters have been fired at 26 times within six weeks; and 15 times the American ships returned fire. It is now the official policy to engage in battle when fired upon. It sounds like bravery—but isn't it about the kind of bravery displayed by a young man who boldly demolishes a hornet's nest with his fist? Incidentally, we now have one warship at Hankow for every seven Americans remaining there, and we shall soon have thirty Americans in unform defending each precious civilian life. It sounds expensive. If the Americans are not wanted in Hankow why don't they get out?

ALWAYS, IN TIME OF CRISIS, the foreigners in China look to a "strong man" for salvation. And always the strong man turns out to be stuffed with straw. It was so after the Taiping rebellion a half century ago, when the foreigners helped restore the tottering Manchu power; it was so in 1911, when they lent Yuan Shih-kai millions to crush the democratic South; it has been so successively with Chang Tso-lin and Wu Pei-fu and Sun Chuang-fong, and now with Chiang Kai-shek. Chiang is of different stuff, indeed, from the bandit generals against whom he has fought; but he has broken with the civilian government to which he owed allegiance and is seeking to establish a new government which will be as directly dependent upon him as recent governments in Peking have been upon Chang Tso-lin. Upon the labor unions which had been his civilian allies he has turned with a ruthlessness which none of his rivals has ever surpassed. Two hundred union leaders have been slain by Chiang's men at Shanghai, and their organizations suppressed; and similar tactics have been followed by his allies in Canton and at Nanking. This is something else than "crushing communism," and it is a poor record with which to proclaim oneself heir to the democratic nationalism of Sun Yat-sen. Foreign aid and sympathy may help Chiang to victory today, and tired Chinese business men may conclude that the time has come for compromise with the Powers behind the warships, but the popular forces which carried Chiang to victory will finally submerge him if he continues to tread the worn path of military dictatorship.

VOLCANIC JAPAN is likely for a time to be a land of economic and political earthquakes as well. So thoroughly has she asserted her right to a position among the great Powers of the modern world that we easily forget how sudden has been her leap from the feudal Middle Ages into the industrial Twentieth Century. Maladjustments are inevitable; and other formidable crises may follow the present. The great banks of Japan stand in intimate relation to the state at all times, and since the earthquake of 1923 have been even closer tied in. The Privy Council in mid-April refused to approve the Government's plan to advance large sums to rescue the Bank of Formosa, caught both in the earthquake aftermath and in the bankruptcy of the great Kobe house of Suzuki and Co., which recently failed with liabilities of $250,000,000. So Mr. Wakatsuki's Kenseikai Government fell, and a new Seiyukai Government—the Kenseikai draws its main strength from business groups, the Seiyukai from the landlord class—took its place. But neither party alone has a majority in Parliament; both rely on the uncertain alliance of the Seiyuhonto, a group with few fixed principles except to get as much power as possible. Both parties fear a general election, for since the last election manhood suffrage has come into effect, enlarging the electorate from 3 to 15 million voters, and the result is unpredictable. Japan is becoming too great a nation to be controlled by a paternalistic group of elder statesmen, and the present crisis—which has led to a bank panic, a series of bank failures, and a twenty-day general moratorium—is a part of the inevitable growing pains.

SINCE THE UNITED STATES "sold" to its puppet president of Nicaragua $217,718 worth of arms and ammunition—payments to begin after his term of office expires—Don Adolfo Diaz has been doing pretty well. The Liberal forces opposing him have not been captured or defeated, but as a rule they have found it safer not to attack. When they have ventured to attack, as at Matagalpa, Admiral Latimer's marines have stepped in conveniently and declared the prospective battleground a "neutral zone." Even so, things have dragged. So President Coolidge, who already had the regular quota of diplomats, several score business men, and a few thousand marines and marine officers on duty in Nicaragua, decided that the best next step was to send down a "personal observer." He chose Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War in Mr. Taft's Cabinet, and Mr. Stimson accordingly added himself to the company of Americans engaged in studying Nicaragua. He plans, he says, "to study the entire situation impartially." He began by calling on Adolfo Diaz, the Conservative "President." As to the Liberals, the Associated Press correspondent reports: "If Dr. Juan Sacasa, the Liberal President, or General Moncada, the chief Liberal commander, desires to communicate or visit him, Mr. Stimson says that he is ready to receive them, but that he is not suggesting such a step." Mr. Stimson is hardly likely to have his impartial mind sullied by contact with the Liberals so long as he waits to receive them close to the storehouses where Don Adolfo keeps his $217,718 worth of arms and ammunition.

> The Fascist regime upholds the doctrine of private property and favors private initiative in the field of production. . . . Strikes, lockouts, boycotts, obstructionism, and sabotage are absolutely forbidden, being considered rebellion against the state.

THESE ARE THE CORNERSTONES of the new Fascist Charter of Labor, made public at the recent celebration of Rome's 2,681st birthday. In addition to this forthright declaration of principles, in which the state is seen to be head, there are all sorts of regulations, as yet not formulated in detail, for cooperation between capital and labor. Each is organized in associations called syndicates; each has its own restrictions and privileges. There will be no strikes, but capital must protect the worker in case of accident, sickness, or unemployment. Labor is guaranteed a six-day week—but without specifications as to the length of the day—extra pay for night work, an annual paid holiday, and indemnity to the worker's family in case of death; but on the other hand, it is solemnly warned that "employees are responsible to the state in helping toward an increase in the value of the products and a reduction in their costs." In case of a dispute between the laboring syndicate and the employing syndicate, a labor court will render a final decision in the controversy. In short, the workers may play at bringing their demands before the proper branch of the employers' organization, and the employers may pretend that they have the power to refuse or grant such demands. In reality, the state controls the industry, top and bottom—the Little Father protects his children, the Benevolent Despot watches over his subjects. A splendid game to play, particularly if you can be the Despot.

THOSE WHO HAVE SEEN on Fifth Avenue the sign "Oriental rugs made to order" will not be surprised that we also make "Swiss" cheese in this resourceful country. Chiefly it is in Wisconsin and Ohio that, with the assistance of machinery to supply the holes, we produce the genuine imitation article. And the United States Tariff Commission has accordingly been laboring for more than two and a half years to determine whether the present 25 per cent ad valorem duty could not be increased, better to protect the native imitation. About two-fifths of the round Swiss cheese Americans eat is imported, and the imported cheese sells readily at higher prices than the domestic—any one of four senses will tell one that it is a different product. The Tariff Commission, however, heeds only the fifth sense, that of hearing; and its ears have been assailed by highly vocal Congressmen from the imitation-cheese-producing States. At last, after years of labor, the mountain has brought forth a mousy report. And as Mr. Coolidge is to spend his summer in the West, he will find it cooler, we suspect, if he promptly makes effective the suggested increase in the subsidy to American "Swiss" cheese-makers.

THE MORE WE READ of Governor Smith's reply to Mr. Charles C. Marshall's challenge to him to state his position as to his church and its relation to the political government of the United States the better we like it. There are those, we know, who feel that ten lines would have sufficed for the reply, and there are plenty of others who will not be convinced by it or by anything else that the Governor could say. As for the first, the reply is that ten lines would not have made a magazine article; as for the second, Governor Smith will simply have to count on the hostility of this group of men whose minds are closed. We are of course particularly pleased with his utterance on Mexico, which is of enormous importance to liberals everywhere. As to that country he writes: "I believe in peace on earth, good-will to men, and that no country has a right to interfere in the internal affairs of another country." This ought to be one of the foremost planks in his platform if he seeks Progressive votes for his nomination and election. It should, of course, be strengthened by specific statements. If the Governor is nominated and should challenge Coolidge and Kellogg by positively declaring that he will not interfere with the laws of Mexico or with internal disturbances in Nicaragua or any other country, that he will take American ships and American marines out of China as soon as all Americans have been given opportunity to withdraw to another country, and warned that they stay at their own risk; if he will declare that under him the American flag will not follow every investor who has a claim, honest or dishonest, against a Caribbean Government, or for that matter any government anywhere, the Governor can render a tremendous service to the United States and the entire world.

WE CONGRATULATE the Jewish Daily Forward upon the thirtieth anniversary of its foundation, for which celebration it did the country the service of inviting Ramsay MacDonald to visit us—Mr. MacDonald's unfortunate indisposition kept him from attending the celebration and delivering the commemorative address. We have frequently stated our belief that this Jewish daily is one of the most interesting and challenging in the United States because it is run on a non-profit-making basis. Nobody owns it. Title to it is held by a group of some two hundred members of the Forward Association, but all the profits made above expenses go to the causes in which the paper and its backers are interested. No one has, therefore, any personal motive to suppress news or to alter it for fear of an unfavorable effect upon circulation or advertising. The Forward has always been a genuine Americanization agent in the best sense, while others have merely talked about helping the immigrant. While it sometimes seems faulty in taste and methods, its influence on the whole has been thoroughly beneficial among the community which it has expressed. We most cordially wish for it increased vigor and increased patronage.

"SPREAD EAGLE" is the latest play to draw fire in New York, not because it is salacious, but because it is a stirring and ably acted anti-war play. The result is that our naval and military censors are reported to be at work in protest; it is even stated that the District Attorney is considering whether he cannot bring some kind of action against it. To our minds it is one of the most useful and most educational plays ever put on, and we rejoice to hear that it is playing to crowded houses. It simply pictures the ease with which war upon Mexico could be provoked by a single rich capitalist. But there is more to it than that; it is really a representation of what has happened in the Caribbean, and indicates clearly how, once there is an excuse for rousing the people, the press, the films, and all the patriotic catchwords are utilized to throw the country into a crusade for revenge or for "teaching a lesson" to a neighbor whose methods and morals we do not like. Everybody opposed to war and to the drugging of the American people should support this brilliant performance.

To the Governor of Massachusetts

SIR: You have won a reputation in your State for independence and courage, illustrated by your refusal to be a blind follower of your party and by your declaration, contrary to Republican policy, in favor of the League of Nations. These, and other facts within our knowledge, embolden us to believe that as an honest and fearless man you will face the great issues presented to you in the Sacco-Vanzetti case without shrinking and with a determination to get at all the facts. That it is an issue of tremendous moment you are well aware. In your future political career you are not likely to meet with another situation which will so deeply arouse not only great masses of your countrymen, but millions all over the world who see another Dreyfus case in the plight of Sacco and Vanzetti. We do not believe that you desire sympathy for the difficult position in which you are placed. A brave and a big man welcomes every genuine test of his judgment and his courage, and rejoices when the opportunity comes to him to do justice. Your responsibility for the life or death of these men is great, indeed, but it is as nothing compared to the satisfaction and the distinction which will come to you if you decide this case and decide it rightly.

There is, as you must be aware, far more at stake than the lives of two foreign-born men. Precious as existence is to them and to those who hold them dear, vastly more important is the fact that the judiciary, not only of Massachusetts but of the United States is on trial. You are being urged, and you will continue to be urged, by many ignorant, passionate, or prejudiced persons to let the law take its course and thus to "uphold the majesty of the courts." Even the proposal that you should appoint an unbiased commission to review the evidence is being assailed as a blow at the authority of the courts and the superseding of the judicial system. The men, you will be told, are worthless; the need of the hour, it is asserted, is to let radicals the world over know that the courts of America will be sustained without question. There are actually judges in Massachusetts and eminent members of the bar who are counseling this. They are the worst enemies of the judicial system they seek to uphold.

No judiciary in the world is beyond the possibility of doing wrong. There is none which will not suffer deadly hurt if it is sustained in injustice. Not even a judiciary which has stood as high as that of Massachusetts can do a colossal wrong and retain its prestige or public respect. It will then become infamous throughout the world, precisely as did that travesty of French justice which condemned the innocent Captain Dreyfus to Devil's Island. It will become all the more infamous should the miscarriage of justice be due to the fact that the judicial system of Massachusetts is so organized that men may be sent to death merely because a trial judge has refused to consider new evidence. Contrary to the rule in the courts of New York and many other States, the courts of appeal in your State cannot take cognizance of new facts, or alleged facts, offered by the convicted men. As a keen and successful business man, you will appreciate the necessity of leaving no stone unturned to make certain that not the slightest injustice has been done. If the millions who are watching Massachusetts should witness the death of these men and remain convinced that they were innocent victims of legal procedure or of prejudice our entire American judicial system would rock upon its foundations and people would recall anew that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and the ex-President of the United States, William H. Taft, has declared that "the administration of criminal law in the United States is a disgrace to civilization."

The doctrine that the courts must be upheld at any cost is merely a revival of the medieval principles that the king can do no wrong and that the church must be held infallible and must be sustained, no matter how many innocents it might torture or burn to death. It is another form of the doctrine which would sustain in its every act any political system that calls itself a state, whether that state be right or wrong, no matter how great the injustices with which the temporary administrators of that state may stain their hands. This doctrine is in itself a confession of weakness. A system of government which is rooted in equity and inspired by justice needs no such defense. It needs to ask of no one that error be overlooked and crime condoned lest its prestige be impaired. On the contrary, it is ready to admit that fallibility which is inseparable from every human institution. The very fact that courts of error and appeal exist is proof that no judge, or set of judges, is beyond mistake. Yet, as the matter stands, Sacco and Vanzetti may be executed because the evidence in their case has come only before one judge, and he a judge whose prejudice and passion in the case leap forth from the record for anyone who takes the trouble either to read the text or the masterly analysis of the case made by Felix Frankfurter of the Harvard Law School.

Since the upper Massachusetts courts are debarred from examining the new evidence it has become your solemn duty to do so, either alone or with the aid of an unbiased commission, as Bishop Lawrence has urged. But you have a greater duty than that. It is to examine also the original trial, the evidence submitted at that time, and above all the manner in which it was conducted by Judge Thayer. It is our sincere belief that if you do so you will without hesitation set the convicted men free. This is not because, as some distinguished lawyers and jurists are saying, men whose lives have been in judicial jeopardy for seven years ought to be released whether guilty or not, but because of what seems to us indisputable proof that the trial judge was biased to an amazing degree and that his conduct of the case was obviously inspired by malice, fear, and bitterness. You cannot, of course, order a new trial for these men; that power does not belong to the Executive. We sincerely trust that nothing will induce you merely to commute their sentences. These men are guilty or they are not guilty. If they are guilty commutation would indeed seem a concession to clamor; if they are innocent they cannot be set free too soon—to doom them to a life in prison would be no act of kindness. We know that their release from unjust imprisonment will strengthen the prestige of Massachusetts rather than injure it.

With complete faith in the integrity of your intentions, we are,

Respectfully yours,

THE EDITORS OF THE NATION

Mr. Coolidge Defends

IT is to President Coolidge's credit that his defense of his foreign policy at the celebration of the twentieth anniversary of that most useful news organization, the United Press, was straightforward and frank. It was, moreover, plainly meant to be couched in a conciliatory tone. His announcement that he has had an assurance from the Mexican Ambassador that there will be no confiscation of American property and that the dispute between the two countries seems, therefore, in the way of amicable settlement, is most gratifying. Indeed, it offsets the unfavorable statement with which it was coupled, that despite the contrary assertions of more than one hundred of the foremost law teachers and international lawyers the issues were not clearly arbitrable. His assurance that his Administration looked with most friendly eyes upon Chinese national aspirations and upon the effort to build a sound Chinese republic evoked perhaps the warmest and most spontaneous applause of the evening.

It is necessary to point out, however, that the speech began with a thoroughly vicious premise, namely, that the newspapers of the United States ought not to criticize the government in its undertakings in foreign countries. Repeating remarks made to the press correspondents in Washington some months ago, Mr. Coolidge dwelt on the freedom of the American press from government control and interference and declared that in return the press should back the government because when it dissents its utterances are the most effective material for the governments with which we may be at loggerheads, and therefore "attacks our own forces in the rear." What preposterous nonsense this is! There has not been one moment in American history from the days of Washington down when there has not been vigorous opposition to the foreign policies of the administration which temporarily happened to be in power, opposition in the Congress and in public forums quite as much as in the press. Mr. Coolidge has never learned American history. Had he done so he must have recalled the fact, for instance, that Abraham Lincoln never hesitated to assail his government on the Mexican question even when our troops were in the field and under fire. There could be no worse fate than for the country to accept Mr. Coolidge's confusing of a temporary political administration with the government of the United States, or rather with the true spirit of our republic, and his desire to do away with criticism. We should then be on the direct road to despotism. Mr. Coolidge calmly assumed that every American government is always right in its dealings with foreign countries instead of very often wrong; that is the measure of his naivete.

As for the speech itself, it was imperialistic to the core; it virtually declared that we had taken over the Caribbean countries as mandataries and went to the most dangerous lengths in evolving the doctrine that the flag must follow the American wherever he goes to protect him and his property—an untenable, unmoral, and un-American doctrine which would forever keep us in hot water, necessitate standing armies and navies for all time, and involve us in constant interference in the internal concerns of other nations. The latter intention Mr. Coolidge, of course, disavowed. So does every imperialist; but only a Machiavelli could attempt to prove that our intervention in Nicaragua to protect American lives and property was not interference in Nicaraguan domestic affairs. Altogether, Mr. Coolidge harked back to the diplomatic language of twenty-five years ago, proving himself to be another statesman who has learned not one thing from the World War.

Finally, we would point out that while many of his phrases were sound and many of his words well buttered, it is the execution of these policies which counts. The troops in Nicaragua, the warships at Hankow and elsewhere on the Yangtze, the constant menace to Mexico—these are the true tests of whether we are or are not an imperialistic Power. They count infinitely more than a hundred speeches by Mr. Coolidge.

Old-Age Pensions Coming

THE movement for old-age pensions on this continent has suddenly come to life and achieved some interesting results. A measure has been adopted in Colorado and approved by the Governor, whereas the Governor of Wyoming vetoed a bill passed by the legislature of that State. The committee of the Illinois House to which a pension bill was referred has favorably reported the bill, and the prospects for its passage seem good. In Pennsylvania, on the other hand, after a most bitter struggle, chronicled on the front pages of every newspaper in the State, the proposed constitutional amendment was defeated two weeks ago, only because of the most determined opposition on the part of the Republican political machine, Mr. W. L. Mellon, the State Manufacturers' Association, and the State Chamber of Commerce.

In Canada a measure has been passed which ends the matter so far as the federal government is concerned. The value of the victory has, however, been greatly exaggerated, since the new regime will not come into effect in any province until that province through its own legislature has accepted the law and put it into effect. None the less there is jubilation, for in 1926 a Tory Senate defeated the bill after a special committee of the House, appointed in 1925, had reported in favor of a plan to be administered jointly by the federal government and the provinces. Last month the Senate yielded, despite the many conservative voices raised in opposition to the proposal, and passed the bill. The Senators frankly concede that public opinion won the victory.

The act as passed provides that the "indigent poor," upon reaching the age of seventy years, shall receive pensions of $20 a month. There are many provisions, such as reductions for ability to earn money and for the possession of private income. Where a home is owned by a pensioner it must be sold after his death in order to reimburse the state. If the pensioned person is a British subject he or she must have resided in Canada for at least twenty years; if a naturalized citizen, the pensioner must have resided twenty-five years in Canada and been a citizen for fifteen. Furthermore, while the federal government may assist the provinces in carrying out the scheme, the provinces must administer it and pay half the pensions and all the costs of administration. This is in accord with a legal opinion handed down by the Canadian Department of Justice to the effect that the subject matter of pensions was intrusted under the British North America Act to the provincial legislatures rather than to the Parliament. The Deputy Minister of Justice has specifically held that federal legislation may not obligate any province or person to contribute to a pension plan.

When we examine the record of the provinces it becomes apparent that the Ottawa act just passed is merely a beginning, and that it may take many years to accomplish the real purpose of the legislation. British Columbia is the only province that has approved of the plan thus far; New Brunswick, it is reported, "does not disapprove of the principle of old-age pensions but . . . is considering the establishment of widows' pensions." Prince Edward Island, having no municipal government, is already offering direct assistance to indigent aged persons. Quebec deems it impossible to adopt a law establishing pensions at this time because of the heavy financial obligations already imposed upon or carried by that province. Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and Nova Scotia either think that the federal government should assume the whole undertaking or at least are not prepared to act at the present moment. For the present, therefore, the new law may remain little more than a pious gesture. Yet it is a beginning, and it now gives the opportunity for public opinion in the provinces to arouse itself and compel the provincial legislatures to take advantage of the new legislation.

To return to the United States, a strong society has lately been formed called the American Association for Old Age Security, with headquarters in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania. Bishop Ethelbert Talbot of Pennsylvania is president and Abraham Epstein is executive secretary. It is this organization which fought so good a battle in Pennsylvania. It will, of course, encounter the opposition of all the forces of conservatism and reaction. We shall be told once more that the proposal strikes at self-reliance, thrift, and industry, and makes for waste and extravagance. That will be of no avail in the long run. No one in England or in Germany or in Australia would think for a moment of abolishing the pension schemes in force in those countries, and nobody there today is seriously saying that they undermine the character of those who participate in them or expect to participate. It is refreshing, indeed, to note how readily the plan went through in Colorado and the apparent readiness of Illinois to take this forward step.

Our Morning's Mail

WHAT is an editor? Now and then every member of the craft asks himself that question—critically, a little resentfully. He constantly hears editors attacked as simpletons and mountebanks; he is assured that facts, not opinions, count nowadays and that the influence of the editorial page is not what it was; he sees evidence that the worst-edited publications often attain the largest circulations.

What is an editor? Perhaps the answer is in the pile of mail unloaded each morning on the editorial desk. Let us see. A heap of proffered manuscripts, beginning with "The Future of China"; a release from the Department of Commerce on the market for radio sets in Liberia; advance copies of a dozen speeches by Senator Puffball and others to be delivered before a series of annual meetings, beginning with the Daughters of the Wooden Nutmeg in New Haven, Connecticut, on May 16; an invitation to a dinner to commemorate the sixtieth birthday of the Rev. Dr. Loud Speaker (at $4.50 a plate); bulletins from the Department of Agriculture on the prospects for the lima-bean crop in southern Oklahoma and other fascinating subjects; announcements of lectures on "The Will to Achieve," and—but the personal letters make the editor's day. Here's a closely-penned one from "Rte. 3, Pound, Wis."

> Kindly let me know from whom can be purchased at a reasonable price a tiny instrument by the help of which you can, when put to the ear or otherwise, hear and distinguish whisperings. It might be domestic or imported.
> From whom can be purchased at a reasonable price genuine imported best quality German pocket mirrors of all existing kinds or models, pocket combs, etc.
> Should you be unable to give the desired information, then tell me to whom else to apply.

There's a man who has a proper, old-fashioned appreciation of the omniscience of an editor! This reader warms our hearts although he appals our brains. We go on with the mail, finding requests to recommend schools for backward or forward children, to draw up arguments for debates, to identify quotations, to recommend investments, as, for instance, this, from Bismarck, North Dakota:

> In The Nation of March 9 an article entitled The Mortgage Bond Industry appears. This article would lead one to believe that investments with bondhouses are somewhat risky.
> I have been contemplating the investing of surplus funds (which are not very much) with some such house as the Strauss Co., the Geo. B. Foreman Co., the F. H. Smith Co., the Commercial National Co. of Detroit, Michigan. The houses pay all the way from 6 to 10 and 11 per cent, the latter amount being that offered by the Commercial National Co. As an ordinary citizen with no money to lose would I be fairly safe in investing with some such company as those listed above?
> I would appreciate a reply from you by an early mail and am inclosing a stamped envelope for your convenience.

These evidences that some people think editors know something tickle our vanity. They are more pleasing than letters of praise, which sometimes accompany manuscripts, thus suggesting flattery, and sometimes felicitate us for articles which in fact appeared in other periodicals.

Toward the bottom of the heap of mail comes a letter, the envelope of which bears a strange postage stamp. It is from a lawyer in a city of Latvia, and runs as follows:

> Being an old reader of your paper and knowing how ready you are to assist anyone, I kindly beg you to supply me information in the following: A man was killed in an auto accident in Connecticut; his dependents live here; when does the statute of limitations of Connecticut begin to run against the dependents in their right of action for damages against the automobile owners?
> If you cannot give me this information, possibly some one on the staff of your attorneys can supply it.

These are all bona-fide letters from a single morning's mail. Among his readers, at least, an editor is neither a simpleton nor a mountebank, nor is the day of his influence passing.

What is an editor? One can only conclude from the requests made of him that the public regards an editor as an information bureau of infallible resource, an encyclopedia of general knowledge, a dictionary of quotations, a research librarian, a financier, a lawyer, a philanthropist, a friend, and a counselor-at-large. That's no small reputation, fellow-occupants of the sanctum! In moments of depression we may feel that we know next to nothing. But 365 days a year our readers give proof of their conviction that we know practically everything. After all, who are we to dispute that verdict? The voice of the people is the voice of God.

Ramsay MacDonald

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

WHENEVER I see Ramsay MacDonald my mind goes back to the days at Paris when the Treaty of Versailles was being forged in the fires of hatred, bitterness, revenge, and injustice. So far as the treaty-makers were concerned, and especially those from his own country, no one had the slightest use for Ramsay MacDonald. He was a pacifist; he had opposed the war from beginning to end. Why should the makers of peace speak to him? Few did. They knew him to be a man of parts, of great human understanding. But for them he was forever in the outer darkness. Had anybody suggested that MacDonald within five years would be the ruler of Great Britain he would have been laughed out of court.

Paris, for those of us who foresaw what kind of treaty it was to be, was a pretty unhappy place. So those who could, drifted to Berne to take part in or report the meeting of the Second International. I shall always be grateful to Colonel House for his hearty insistence that I should go as a press observer, for there I found a true peace conference, made up not of statesmen, generals, and professional diplomats, but of ninety men and women of flesh and blood. Yes, there were women taking part in the proceedings; and for the first time after the war French and Germans and British and Russians sat together and struck hands in amity. Only one head of a state was there, I believe—Kurt Eisner, President of Bavaria. He made the best speech of the conference, declaring that it was the duty of Germany to reconstruct the devastated districts in France and offering to head an army of builders, architects, and workmen for this purpose. Two days later he left Berne, saying: "I've an idea that all will be over with me in nine days." Just nine days later he was shot from behind by a cowardly titled assassin, who has escaped the just penalty for this crime.

There Ramsay MacDonald stood out as the leader he is. I find in my notes on the conference that he stated the position of the International on the question of bolshevism "with great force and real eloquence"—and that he was as much in opposition to the Communists as he is today. For the rest he spoke with strength and vision in favor of immediate reconciliation, the restoration of good-will, the rebuilding of wasted Europe without annexations, indemnities, or penalties. At this conference it was the spirit that counted. It was not that they were Socialists, but that they were, as I have said, human beings, with sane emotions and noble impulses unfettered by the paralyzing influences of official life. Some of the things they proposed were: a league of peoples, an international court, the immediate abolition of all armies and navies, free access to all countries, and international control of all world-thoroughfares. Had these men and women been the makers of the peace, Europe would have been spared endless suffering and loss. This fact no one can question; it is only necessary to remind the reader that peace did not come to Europe until one member of that Berne Conference reached a commanding position in European affairs and put into practice the spirit of that human and humane gathering.

That man, of course, is Ramsay MacDonald, he who was ignored and slighted in Paris and who spoke so truly and eloquently at Berne. I have just been glancing at Frank Simonds's new book: "How Europe Made Peace Without America." Reviewing the brief Labor Government in England he writes:

> . . . but, thanks to MacDonald, British foreign policy had won new influence and British position in Europe had been restored. Moreover, the supreme service of Ramsay MacDonald lay in the fact that he had not merely created a new atmosphere in Europe, but he had also revived Continental confidence in British good faith. . . . Moreover, Baldwin and Chamberlain wisely adopted both the policies and methods of the Labor Prime Minister. Thus, the credit for the larger part of the later success of British policy and diplomacy belongs rightfully to Ramsay MacDonald. He, and not Chamberlain, was the true architect of Locarno. Without his contribution European anarchy might have been much more dangerously protracted.

True—God's truth! And Mr. Simonds might as truly have added that Locarno could have been born at Berne and that MacDonald was as ready for the task at Berne as when he became Foreign Minister.

> Today [MacDonald wrote on August 12, 1924] we are all as friendly as though there never had been a war and a vile press propaganda, and we shall go our several ways this week feeling that the conditions of friendly negotiations have been reestablished in Europe. It is really a satisfactory piece of work. . . .

It was a glorious piece of work and it will stand for all time as a proof of the contention that the most practical men on earth are not your realistic professional diplomats but the men who, with peace in their hearts, refuse absolutely to compromise with war or to accept it at any time or any place.

To me Ramsay MacDonald's career is also proof, if anybody needs it, that in this workaday world romance is no more banished than in the days of chivalry. What could surpass the romance of those five years from Paris in January, 1919, to 10 Downing Street, London, in January, 1924? And now he is in America—as unspoiled in 1927 as in 1919, simple, unaffected, modest. His heart and mind are as intimately concerned with art and literature as with political affairs. At least so it seemed to me during a couple of memorable days with him in New England. Battle scenes interested him scarcely. But he was full of Hawthorne and Emerson and Thoreau and the lesser lights of Concord. He knew where they had lived and where they were buried and had read, I think, every word they ever wrote. He motored thirty miles for one-half hour in the House of the Seven Gables, and felt wholly rewarded for that rush across country. This bookish trait is characteristic of the best English statesmen.

Fire and power are still in MacDonald. The zeal of the crusader is unquenched, the desire to serve unabated. Lust for office there is none; there were times in plenty while he was Prime Minister when he would have been glad to lay down his office. The chances are that he will bear these burdens again. If he does his steel will still flash. Speaking the other day, he met the old argument that you cannot change human nature, by telling of the advances made through the abolition of clan feuds and the duel, thus controlling the desire to kill. But he added, with a smile and a flash of the eyes, "I must admit that I, a MacDonald, still have a queer feeling when I meet a Campbell." For those who choke the world with officialism and still believe that might makes right and that civilization can be conferred by force upon backward peoples—usually "backward" because they have not yielded themselves to the brutal industrialism of today—Ramsay MacDonald still has queer feelings. Long may he hold them, and long may he be able to exemplify and apply in public life the spirit of Berne that became the spirit of Locarno!

For the United States one can have no warmer wish than that when Ramsay MacDonald comes again he may be able to give us eleven months instead of eleven days. There is no country that needs his teachings more and I can think of no one who could present them as well.

The Collapse of the Needle Trades

By BENJAMIN STOLBERG

1. The Genealogy of Tailors' Morals

PROFESSOR DIOGENES TEUFELSDRÖCKH once turned a corner in Edinburgh and ran into the sign of a pantsmaker. On it "stood painted the Effigies of a Pair of Leather Breeches, and between the knees these memorable words, 'Sic itur ad astra.'" The inharmony, so droll and so tragic, of this classic cry of the freeman on the shield of a tailor "rent the soul" of the professor-at-large and converted him into the immortal Dr. Faust of the needle trades. In this high moment he resolved to study mankind by the cut of its clothes and to look for the nature of man into the soul of the tailor; whose lot, he decided, reveals with grotesque emphasis "our dislocated, hoodwinked, and indeed delirious condition of Society."

Sartor Resartus is still with us, in need of the same humanist sympathy for his all-too-human perversities. Just now he is so sadly in rags that his further repatching seems dubious. Our needle trades are in desperate shape. Some are too "hoodwinked" to know it. The United Garment Workers (presumably 50,000), confined largely to overalls and a few shirts, have deteriorated into a mere vested interest of their leaders. The United Hatters (presumably 11,000) exist on the sale to the boss of their union label, which guarantees him their benevolent neutrality. The Journeymen Tailors (presumably 9,200) are peacefully dying of hardening arteries in the passing custom-tailoring trade. A few hundred glovemakers form a ladies' auxiliary to the American Federation of Labor, in testimonial to the gentility of the Women's Trade Union League. These unions, with the rest of our craft-tight labor movement, are dues-collecting agencies of organized contract labor. Their registrations suffice for official salaries, putative expense accounts, primitive business routine, and the convivial conventions of intimate delegates for the reelection of the oligarchy, occasionally tempered by rotation in office. These arrested "business unions" play an important psychological role in the needle trades. They are the decadent descendants of the American tailor of the last mid-century. Today they are the orthodox American Federation of Labor bloc among the progressive "social unions." And when the progressive unions are weakened by factional strife, the atrophied unions inflame and threaten their whole social program. The present intervention of the A. F. of L. in the needle trades, irritated by an irresponsible "left" virus, is guided by Messrs. Woll, McGrady, and Frayne. But behind them, of course, is the long reactionary experience of the stagnant needle trades, especially of the United Garment Workers.

The progressive needle trades are engaged in five industries, if we omit the thousand-odd neckwear workers confined to one New York local. The two dominant unions are the International Ladies' Garment Workers (87,000) and the extra-A. F. of L. Amalgamated Clothing Workers (150,000). The furriers' union (12,000) is at present in chaos. The cloth hat, cap and millinery workers (11,000) are in the pleasant habit of signing agreements with their petty employers which are too good to be true, and hence unenforceable, but which serve the excellent purpose of keeping factionalism to a minimum. The pocketbook workers (6,000), under the tired but wise leadership of Shiplacoff, are too small for serious disunion. Accordingly this melodrama of labor, industry, politics, Lenin's ghost, good citizens, gangsters, detectives, graft, and criminal folly deals with the shooting up of the women's garment workers' and the furriers' unions, and with the hair-breadth escape of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, who were badly rumpled in 1924 but have been cleaned and pressed since.

Among the approximately 70,000 workers in the atrophied needle trades no more than about 12,000 are Jews. Among the 266,000 workers in the progressive needle trades are almost 170,000 Jews, mostly from old Russia. The union leaders, very wisely, avoid stressing this racial complexion. A trade union is not a racial benefit society or a church. Also, an ever larger number of Slavs, Americans of both colors, and especially Italians is constantly seeping in. The simplification of production processes in the clothing unions is attracting the flapper, who is as American as baseball. But the cultural heritage of these progressive needle unions is Yiddish. Der ewige Jude is still in the seams of our union-made clothes. And without due analysis of his stellar role in these trades, their present internecine struggle is incomprehensible.

Down to the seventies about 35,000 Russian Jewish workers settled in New York. The majority went into the sweatshops. Most of them were illiterate, full of ritualism, sub-proletarian migrants to a "promised land," not of freedom but of wealth. They had no inner powers of organization. But among the millions of immigrants during the next twenty-five years the growing revolutionary consciousness in Russia brought a much finer type. Thousands more crowded the sweatshops, to be exploited by fellow-countrymen of the preceding immigration and by a deeply disappointing alien environment, whose industrial, tenement, and Tammany outrages carried the best of them into the vague Socialist and labor beginnings of the eighties. In 1888 the United Hebrew Trades was founded. It was Morris Hillquit and Abraham Cahan who started the Jewish workers toward organization. The American Federation of Labor later on took them over by crafts. And they have formed the bulk of the Socialist opposition within the federation ever since.

The two decades from 1888 to 1908 were years of fermentation. Will-o'-the-wisp unions lit up here and there in dark back rooms of the Ghetto, flickering fatuously from anarchist Left to Lasallian Right, reflecting European revolutionary splits and reechoing their philippics. But by 1908 a third type of Jewish immigrant worker was making himself felt. In 1897 the Arbeiter Bund, the Social Democratic society of Jewish workers in Russia, superseded the nihilist phase of the Russian revolution. Thousands of these new immigrants were Bundists. Hundreds had participated in the soviets of the revolution of 1905-1906. They had faced cavalcades of Cossacks, and gangsters, police, and injunctions did not impress them very much. Finally, in 1909, the "uprising of the 20,000" shirtwaist makers in New York City broke out. Bessie and Beckie scratched the "gorillas" and talked back to the police, disregarded food and injunctions with a picturesqueness and nerve which roused the public into wild acclamation. Professional men, "good" citizens, social reformers, the minister with the stereopticon vision of social good and personal publicity, silk- and lisle-stocking suffragettes, all jumped on the band-wagon and helped "the girls" lay the foundation of the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union. This strike, only half won, led to the "great revolt" of 60,000 cloakmakers in 1910. The men finished the job, established the union, and the famous Protocol of Peace was signed. The protocol was an elaborate machinery of obligatory arbitration, precluding strikes and lockouts. Though abrogated in 1916, it opened the way for all subsequent arbitral judiciaries in the needle trades. It is this expert and realistic attitude toward the industry as a whole which is the essence of the progressivism of these progressive unions.

In 1910, 41,000 men's clothing workers struck in Chicago against intolerable conditions, both in the industry and in the United Garment Workers. Again the best public opinion joined the picket lines. An impartial machinery was established at the Hart, Schaffner and Marx factory, spreading gradually through the Chicago market, and from there to the other men's clothing centers. In 1914 practically all but the overall seamsters left the Rickert machine of the United Garment Workers and launched forth as the Amalgamated Clothing Workers. The collective-agreement machinery was set up in the fur trade after the strike of 1912. The cloth hat, cap, and millinery workers and the pocketbook makers were held back for a few years by the "jurisdictional" perversion of the A. F. of L., but they, too, finally became established in much the same fashion. These unions were through with the "safe and sane" A. F. of L. method of a perpetual dog fight for a daily bone. They fought for the "radical" innovation of a permanent machinery for collective agreement.

The years 1917 to 1920 were years of "expansion and reform." Week work, the 44-hour week, a middle-class wage, "the right to the job" were won in successive struggles. The two garment unions, especially the women's-wear workers, were also developing the "new unionism." Workers' education, summer camps, medical attention, and later on genuine business enterprises were started. This "new unionism" is extremely interesting, for it had a double motivation. Consciously, it was an expression of exhilarated and successful unionism. Unconsciously, it grew ever more into a psychological compensation for the gradual weakening of the clothing crafts, especially in the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union. To some degree the "new unionism" was a species of advertising to break down union apathy. Nonetheless, in 1920-1921 the progressive needle trades were still far in the vanguard of American labor.

During the liberation strikes of 1909-1912 the employers, the vast majority of whom also were Jews, fought union beginnings with gangsters, injunctions, and an intransigent callousness which proved their boomerang. But once defeated, the Jewish manufacturer developed into a fairly willing collaborator in the arbitral machinery. Deep down in his commercial medulla he sensed that the Jewish worker, for all his radicalism, would be a pragmatist in a laboratory of industrial relations, on which his living depended. And, indeed, his ancient bargaining culture helped the worker build his union into a board of trade. In the sweatshop he had been a mere peddler of his skill. Under the new system he tended to become a collective merchant prince of his labor power. In time both sides came to regard the arbitral machinery as a living justiciary, protecting the worker from the manufacturer, and hence the manufacturers from each other.

This duality of the Jewish temperament, this stark blending of opposite characteristics, always determined the politics of the progressive needle trades. The Jewish worker is at one and the same time an intense collectivist and an intense individualist. When cultural forces in American life were evolving the uncontrollable sweatshop into the more controllable big "inside" shop, roughly from 1900 to 1917, the revolutionary crescendos in Russia, from the late nineties to the Communist coup d'état, gave him just the right emotional afflatus to control this economic development. But since 1917 the big factory, in the field of women's wear, has been retrogressing into the sweatshop as we shall see later. Other reactionary industrial changes have set in; while the revolutionary spirit in the European homeland has become crystallized into a doctrinaire ideology, which does not fit his present industrial difficulties and their correlative union problems. Hence his "radicalism," which had made him the paragon of progress in American labor, is now turning against him as his own Frankenstein.

2. The Collapse of the Cloakmakers

Eighty per cent of women's coats and cloaks are made in New York. When, in 1910, 60,000 cloakmakers went on strike, they were none too many for the American market. In 1926 33,000 cloakmakers walked out. It is estimated that they are 12,000 too many for the demand of almost 4,000,000 more women. The reason is style. Women's garments, even coats, constantly tend toward simplification. In 1910 the American woman was still holding on to the disappearing frills and ruffles of a preceding generation, courting the envy of her own and the admiration of the other sex with camouflage bust and other artifices which called for the imagination of a skilled craftsman. Also her coat had to last, with French stitches and much handwork. The rapid advance of feminism changed the strategy of style. To step into a car, for its manifold uses from transit to affection, requires comfort and ease. The American woman of today hangs on a strap, works and plays everywhere. And she permits her figure to speak for itself.

But unfortunately this highly commendable simplification in cut has been accompanied by a nervous sophistication in style. While the designer simplified the garment a hundredfold, the salesman sensitized the buyer to its minutest changes a thousandfold. The differences in style are small, but important. The fashion fever roused has shortened the seasons and crazed the competitiveness of the industry.

This simplification in style resulted in the multiplication of production units. The garment was sectionalized, and the sections sent out to different shops. The large factory retrogressed into a number of old-fashioned sweatshops. The jobber, who today controls 70 per cent of the cloak-and-suit industry, sends out his work to the submanufacturers, of whom there are almost 2,000 in Greater New York. The submanufacturer is a completely irresponsible unit. He lives by cheating the jobber and the consumer on materials, specifications, and workmanship; by cheating the union on rulings, hours, and wages; and by cheating the public on sanitation and industrial decency. The number of these bootleg shops is constantly increasing, but their size is decreasing. In 1925 the workers in these small shops averaged only 26.8 weeks of work a year, averaging through the year $26.40 a week.

This disintegration in the economics of the industry was bound to corrupt the union. It requires an army of prohibition agents—walking delegates—to "enforce conditions" in these industrial speak-easies. In 1925 the cost of such enforcement amounted to somewhere around $1,000,000. It frequently called for strong-arm methods, which do not look well on the books; which means graft; which means a corroding machine, which is oiled by more graft. The machine in the International was partly kept in office by a system of disproportional misrepresentation, by which conventions could be loaded with artificial delegates from rotten boroughs. Benjamin Schlesinger, president of the International from 1914 to 1923, was an honest and able official, but temperamentally too much of a prima donna to cope consistently with boodle and sloth. Toward the end of his administration a strong left wing of disaffection was rapidly developing. In January, 1923, Schlesinger impulsively resigned. Much to his surprise his resignation was accepted. And Morris Sigman was called by Rights and Lefts from his Iowa farm to clean up the mess.

Sigman has an excellent labor record. In 1915 he had stood in the shadow of a framed electric chair for his militant leadership. Originally an I. W. W., he has never been in the inner councils of the powerful Socialist influences in the union. He has character, and detailed knowledge of the industry. He has intelligence, but not acumen. He is honest, but stubborn. He is courageous, but not tactful. Needless to say, he is incapable of building a machine of his own. With bare hands he tried to break a corrupt right wing against a bigoted left wing without further endangering a rapidly disintegrating industry. He removed some of the worst politicians from power. But since he had no machine of his own, most of the walking delegates kept their beats. Then he turned on the Left.

Of the 87,000 members in the union, probably no more than 1,200 are Communists. The vast majority, however, is disgusted. In disgust, many of them turned to the opposition. And the organized opposition in Socialist unions is, of course, Communist. The Communists differ from all previous left wings in that they are avowedly under the strict discipline of an outside political party, the Workers Party, whose economic branch is the Trade Union Educational League, organized in 1922 by William Z. Foster. The majority of the leaders, both in the party and in the league, are comparatively unknown in the labor movement, having risen to Communist leadership within the last one to three years. Both the party and the league are admittedly under the direction of the Communist International and the Red Trade Union International.

This is not the place to evaluate the influence of the Bolshevik revolution on American labor. Suffice it to say that, however profound the effect of this cultural experience upon Russian national life, the strict realities of the Soviet revolution cannot be exported into a culture as disparate as ours without changing doctrines into philippics and tactics into fantasies.

The effects of the Bolshevik revolution reached our Socialist Party by 1919. In 1921 the split was complete. In 1922-1923 it began to break up the Socialist unions, especially the economically weakening Ladies Garment Workers. The Communists began a campaign of vilification against the Sigman administration, which for recklessness, falsehoods, absurdities, and sheer psychiatric mud-slinging is almost unbelievable. Their organ among the Jewish workers was the daily Freiheit. The Forward, which had its Socialist counter-ax to grind, tried to reciprocate in kind. And the Jewish workers were constantly kept in turmoil. In 1925 Sigman sanctioned the suspension of 68 Left-wing officials in Locals 2, 9, and 22, asserting that they were Communists.

No move could possibly have been more inept. Most of the suspended officials were easily able to show that they were not Communists at all. Besides, a union should never withhold its economic protection from any worker, no matter what his political beliefs might be. All it can demand is union loyalty. Expulsion strategy invites all kinds of outside interference, ranging from the reactionary intervention of the A. F. of L. oligarchy and spreading over into the editorial columns of the daily press. It is likely to carry factional struggles into the courts. It rouses the ire of liberal opinion. And, of course, it strengthens the opposition immeasurably. These suspensions led to the capture of the New York Joint Board by Lefts under Communist control, though its new manager, Louis Hyman, is not a Workers Party member. The Joint Board and the Sigman administration proceeded to spend most of their time fighting each other. Finally, a special convention was called to meet in Philadelphia in December, 1925. The problem of proportional representation was adjusted by a compromise, but union discord prevented its application. Both factions also patched up a program with which to meet the three associations of employers—the inside manufacturers, the jobbers, and the submanufacturers.

Sigman, on coming into power, had made certain recommendations for the improvement of the industry. His program called for the limitations of submanufacturers to each jobber; no submanufacturer was to employ less than fourteen operators with the corresponding complement of other workers; no jobber was to change submanufacturers without good reason. During slow seasons, the jobber was to divide the work equally between his submanufacturers, who in turn, were to divide it between their workers. Union conditions must be guaranteed by the jobber. The industry must guarantee 32 weeks' work a year (both the Rights and the Lefts have variously increased this figure since then), and a 40-hour week. In 1924 the union was about to call a general strike for this program when Governor Smith appointed an advisory commission to investigate the industry.

In May, 1926, the Governor's commission made its final report. It granted the chief union demands concerning the limitation and control of the jobbers and a permanent Research and Control Bureau to enforce them. It granted wage increases over the minimum rates, ranging from $2.50 to $6.00. It urged the payment of unemployment insurance by the submanufacturers, and in many other details tried to make the submanufacturer a responsible unit. But it failed to grant the guaranteed period of employment and the 40-hour week. And it gave to the employer of more than 35 workers the right to reorganize 10 per cent of his shop once a year.

The Governor's report was a victory for the union under the circumstances. Sigman advised its acceptance as a basis for negotiation; he felt that the union was in no position to undertake a strike. But the Joint Board decided to strike. The strike lasted from July 1 to November 13, 1926. Never in the history of American labor has a strike been more incompetently, irresponsibly, and wastefully managed. Its three leaders, behind the vacillating chairmanship of Hyman, were Zimmerman, Boruchovitz, and Portnoy, whose strategy seems to have been determined in daily Communist caucuses. The Joint Board sidetracked experienced leaders for "left-wingers," who dominated every committee. During the strike the strong-arm methods of the employers were met with similar tactics. But the inexperienced leadership finally lost control over its hired strong-arm men, who engaged ultimately in factional warfare. The Right met gangsters with gangsters. The Picket Committee, headed by an inexperienced Left, spent $200,438.06, only half of which was used for salaries. Scabbing was rampant.

The Hall Committee spent $100,554 in addition to the large outgo for rents. The Law Committee spent $302,379, of which only $68,299 went for court expenses and bail. The entire strike, itemized only in such lump figures, cost about $3,500,000. Only about $1,500,000 went for strike benefits. Nine hundred thousand dollars of the employers' securities were also spent. Previous strikes in the industry have cost from 50 per cent to 200 per cent less.

Of the 33,000 cloakmakers more than 20,000 work under the jobber-submanufacturer system. During the first ten weeks of the strike the General Strike Committee settled with independent submanufacturers employing 16,000 workers. These workers actually overproduced for the market during the rest of the strike. The settlements made with these independent speak-easies included the 40-hour week, an average 10 per cent increase in wages, a 30-week employment guaranty, and limitation of contractors, in principle. But this mid-strike settlement turned the struggle against the Industrial Council of the big inside manufacturers instead of against the jobbers-submanufacturers system, leaving out also the organized jobbers and submanufacturers, who employ 10,000 workers.

The leading intermediaries between the General Strike Committee and the various groups of employers were Rubin Sadowsky, who was running a non-union shop throughout the strike, and Arnold Rothstein, who some years ago had been implicated in a baseball scandal. It is rather amusing that the revolutionary idealists who scorned "class collaboration" with Messrs. Battle, Lehman, Shientag, Wolf, and Rogers of the Governor's commission, could work with Messrs. Sadowsky and Rothstein.

Finally the strike against the Industrial Council was settled. The inside manufacturers won the right of a 30 per cent reorganization during the period of eighteen months between June, 1927, and December, 1928. The union won a guaranty of 32 weeks a year based on the 42-hour week until July, 1928, and a 40-hour week after that until June, 1929. But since the average work-year in these large shops is about 38 weeks based on the 44-hour week, this gain is quite metaphysical. The union received certain increases in the minimum wages in various operations above those of the Governor's report, but these operations affect only about 800 out of 7,000 workers. The union also won the limitation of submanufacturers employed by the big inside manufacturers, but since the inside manufacturers send out little work, this victory is also rather academic.

On December 13 the General Executive Board of the union suspended the Joint Board's right to conduct the strike. Finally Sigman settled with the organized jobbers and submanufacturers without giving them the right of reorganization.

Since then the Sigman administration, with dubious legality, has suspended the left wing Joint Board entirely. There can be no doubt that the Sigman administration won. Nine-tenths of the rank and file of the cloakmakers have registered with the reorganized right Joint Board. The suspended Joint Board fought this registration with violence and, naturally, tried to hamper the International in every way, claiming the right to collect dues and to perform all the other legal functions of the Joint Board. But though Sigman won, he won a Pyrrhic victory. A union is effective to the degree to which it can enforce its standards. In this sense there is hardly anything left of the old International Ladies' Garment Workers Union. The union is so weak that the Industrial Council also has weakened, for many manufacturers do not feel the pressure to stay in. The jobbers give out their work almost to whom they please. The submanufacturers practically do as they please.

In the next article I shall deal with the fortunes of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers and the Furriers' Union; and take a brief look into the future of the American tailor.

Biography

By JESSICA NELSON NORTH

There was a man could summon without toil
Beetles out of the brown wall crevices,
The horned toad and startled mantises
And dry Arachne spinning in her coil.

And whether Francis wound him in a cloak
Jeweled with pity, or Merlin as some guess
For whom the acorns sang, nevertheless
He bent his brows upon the earth and spoke.

And sparrows fell about him like a cloud—
Sparrows and linnets, twittering of peace,
And the tall grass sighed "brother" at his knees
And every sapling bowed.

He walked serenely in the world of men
With late adventure shining in his eyes.
He died as gently as a linnet dies
And spring closed round again.

Modern Gipsies

By LOIS E. BURIFF BROWN

IN March the first line of straggling cars runs north from California. By June twenty thousand tent ropes are tied across automobiles every night. Women are stopping in good camps to do their washing and bake a pie. Women uncombed, with big coats on, sauntering to the dressing-rooms in the morning, look curiously at licenses from Louisiana and Alaska; and sunburned country-folk, with packs on their running-boards, nervously and happily break the traffic rules of new cities.

The large camp where forty thousand people with fourteen thousand cars register in one season and the small camp one discovers unaided are both as natural for the American nomad as his wild huckleberry patches and his crowded dancing grounds to the Indian. There are two kinds of large camps, the holiday and the hard-working. The latter is the fifty-cent city camp, chained and fenced from the dust of curious outsiders, with a policeman by the turnstile through which campers saunter at evening with bread and hamburger from the stores across the street.

Then there is the holiday large camp. Take, for example, the one on Mount Rainier on Saturday night. A white mist blurs the camp. Flames of camp-fires for half a mile around. Chopping. Shouts. Engines of cars toiling in from the last relay up the mountain. Voices hunt and call through the thin mist. "Over here, Harry. Here's a good place to pitch the tent." "Where can you get water?"

Late suppers all over the camp. It is an unguarded army of week-enders on the flank of a mountain with the darkness of firs around the edges, and in the mist above the hidden presence of the mountain. Figures move near each camp-fire. It is cold. Beams from the automobile searchlights send long edges into the air. Now tiny tents far around glow and the camp-fires get dim. Carelessly, the army is going to bed. A voice calls and plays alone at yelling. Then unknown voices yell answeringly. Barbaric, unarticulate cries howl from the shelter of tents. Then silence.

Fourteen thousand feet up in the morning sunshine, the mountain lies radiant. Small paths lead up through green and firs. By eight the camp is deserted. By ten the people are trickling back with handfuls of snow and sticks whittled for alpen-stocks. "Well, we've seen the mountain. We might as well be going."

By Tuesday all these local people are gone and the spirit of the camp is changed. From Monday to Friday the hard-working tourists from British Columbia and Minnesota, from Alberta and California keep a quiet camp, changing, animated, but unhilarious. A car with "Frum Mizzoury, by heck," chalked across the back, struggles up to a high camping place. On a knoll arrives a man from Pennsylvania. He says: "I made good money for four years. Now we're taking a year off on the road." He is generous about showing his camp equipment. The metal bed poles support the tent. His wife's cooking utensils all fit into one another. In the morning he calls us to see him take down the tent and fit together his pack.

A Tyrolese woman, whose husband brought her to his farm in California five years ago, says: "I just sit and look at the mountain. It is grand. These people who come and look at it and go away—!" Her dark eyes laugh scornfully.

A beautiful roadster runs easily up to the Pennsylvania man's deserted knoll. Two tall slender girls in khaki, school-teachers from Texas, get out and set up camp in ten minutes. They have been on the road for two years.

"Hey, there's a car stuck." Strangers from nearby camps gather, unasked, to push it up the steep place, with the same family spirit in which they will diagnose your engine trouble and admire ingenuity in your equipment.

The small camp has another flavor. We drive all day, and toward evening begin to look for a public camp. "This one looks crowded. Let's go on." The sun has set, and we have entered the forest reserve. A lonely boulevard flows around the edge of a mountain lake. We sweep along with an anxious eye, doing our duty by the sunset, but we are looking for a stopping-place. A solitary car passes us unlighted, like a twilight bird.

At last, "There are lights!"

"It's somebody's private place. See the boat tied."

But then a rustic arch, a name. "There are people. Get out and read the sign."

It is a free government "forest camp." We sign in the visitor's book. We camp on shingle, with the lake lapping in the dark below us, hunt water contentedly in the strange camp, cover our bread for the night from possible squirrels, and locate the east to set our strawberries out of the morning sun. In bed in the car we watch our neighbors. It is a small camp, with few voices and the rush of a little cascade silencing the air. The lights of the cars here and there among the smooth tree columns make a yellowness out of which the cedars rise indefinitely.

"Do you want a light to get your supper by?" A stranger adjusts his searchlight for a group making the small, laborious motions of camp meal-getting. Their faces are white in its light.

Sunrise and shadows of mountains launched into the clouds. Small, idle splashings of children, of face-washers in the lake. A scurry of two bathers.

"Are you going out, stranger? Would you mail a couple of letters for me?"

"How's the road to the ocean?"

"Don't go up to the hot springs. Nothing to see when you get there."

"How far are you figuring to make today? Let's see your road map." Long-winded talks with strangers, one foot on the running-board.

Most of the cars in camp are medium and small. Cadillacs tour, too—but with suitcases, not tents. They pass on the road closed, with their small roomful of people conversing, whose memories are of good and bad hotels, who are ignorant of waking at sunrise and being out-of-doors, of cooking breakfast in the shady air and living in an unslackened intimacy with the planet that enriches one with unregarded acquaintances and with unprevisioned moments of beauty. The adventure of the random camp is not for them. As when we rushed over a divide on a one-way twist of road in a blinding rain at twilight and down to a green government camp, where a woman came over from the only other car there and offered: "Do you want to make tea on our fire?" She kept a grocery in Seattle. Or when, out of a stormy night, there greeted us the long shed at Wilbur, electric lighted, with people sitting around a range in the light. It looks infinitely cozy. With delicious snugness, we back Lizzie into a chosen stall. Mother takes the damp pillows and sits by the range, too, letting them toast in the oven, while I make camp. We discover showers, hot water, and electric ranges as well, for our fifty cents a night.

But it is not all leisure and gaiety in the camps. Before daylight in a pay-camp comes the sound of hacking wood. A man with a Ford squats holding his hands out to his fire in the cement stove. Monotonous whimpering. His wife appears and then one child after another. In the gray light the top sags, the pack seems to overflow rags and nothing else; there is no apparent place for the children to have slept. Oklahoma is the license. But in another camp a fine car from Florida, with a complement of eight children, has an outfit that the owner happily expects you to admire and himself to explain to you. And, frying bacon in the open cook pavilion, with its spokes of huge brick stoves around the single chimney, we joyfully hail that bride and groom from Canada whom we met three weeks ago.

Dolly, a horse we had in pre-Ford days, used to stop calmly to look around at the view from hills, and many a time I have felt that Lizzie, too, deserved to enjoy a fine view with us. One has all kinds of odd car feels, sprouts in the psychology of the machine age. For instance, two little girls were on a sand-pile by the road at dusk. One stood still. Why was she not afraid of a monster like me, with my long black snout and my two great eyes goggling her? For a dreamy moment, the nose, the headlights were felt as if projections of me. Once we passed a big car boiling up a steep grade.

"No wonder it's steaming," I said. "There's a tent roll on each side of the hood."

"Ah!" mother exclaimed with intense pity, then smiled at herself. "My first thought was that the poor thing couldn't breathe."

In three years the aspect of the camps has brightened and grown unconventional. The white and khaki tents hanging on from the days of long, stable camping are leavened by gay pavilions, green or striped with red or blue. Nothing looks wilder or more alien than the auto camp at Mount Baker at dusk, when the log fires are reflected in the dark glacial pond, and beyond the few storm-bitten fortresses of firs the irregular plateau plunges into blueness with dark blue ranges beyond and the high wall of talus like the abomination of desolation at one side of the camp. Then, in the cold July air khaki and red-kerchiefed figures hold one's eyes like a foreign novel, as small activities group and rearrange them between the water, the fires, and the striped pavilions.

It is an alien scene. But it is alien from all the world, from New Jersey as well as from Europe. It is a scene from the new world of a nation of gipsies, friendly with machines instead of horses. And distinguished Britishers from standard sleepers, limousines, and hotel lobbies view America disparagingly all the way from New York to Sioux City, find it much the same, and go home to their own land of "hole and corner variety," never knowing that America begins beyond the Rockies, with a tin Lizzie or a Buick and no particular goal for the night.

The Story of Tom Tynan

By CELIA BALDWIN

ALL capital punishment is tragedy; but nowhere has it resulted in more heart-breaking tragedy than in the State of Colorado, where it has caused the downfall of Tom Tynan—once one of the bravest and most humane men alive.

In the spring of 1909 Tom Tynan was made Warden of the Colorado State Prison at Canon City, and in three years he had earned the honorable and affectionate title of "A Mender of Men." Everywhere his name was known as a worker almost of miracles with "society's mistakes." Today Tom Tynan is gone. Within a few months he has been forced to resign because of his cruelty to prisoners.

How did this change come about? In my mind there is no doubt that capital punishment is largely responsible for the transformation. The warden of the prison must act as executioner for those doomed to be killed by the State. For this service to society he is paid $50 for each man he hangs and the sheriff is paid $25 for looking on.

Up to August, 1912, Tom Tynan had somehow avoided acting as man-killer. Not long before that date, however, a murderer was sentenced to be hanged at the Colorado State Prison. Louis J. Wechter had held up the cashier in a restaurant and a man who interfered in her behalf was shot dead. There seemed to be no doubt as to Wechter's guilt. But Tom Tynan was well known as an earnest opponent of capital punishment. What would he do? Some said he would resign rather than violate his principles. A few of his friends urged that course while others advised against it; but it was finally announced in the newspapers of May 8 that "Warden Tynan said yesterday that he would execute Wechter on August 25, and that the execution would be witnessed only by those authorized by law." But his well-known antipathy to capital punishment left a feeling of hope with one side and of uneasy doubt with the other. Newspapers discussed the probabilities and feeling on the subject ran high. Was ever man put to harder test than Tom Tynan? He chose. He kept his position and let his principles "go hang"—with Louis Wechter.

Not long after the hanging came rumors of insubordination among the prisoners followed by brutal reprisals on the part of the warden; but many doubted the truth of them. His three years as a "Mender of Men" had won him such a warm place in the public esteem that he was almost idolized; and we all want to keep our idols. Nevertheless, the rumors persisted with such frequency that finally, while William E. Sweet was Governor, an investigation of the prison resulted in an effort to remove Tynan. Legal obstacles prevented his dismissal at that time, and he remained in office until recently when his resignation was finally forced.

Sometime ago an editorial in one of the Denver dailies said of Tom Tynan's collapse:

> When he took office and for sometime thereafter he was given praise by experts for reforms he introduced and for humane practices he put into effect. . . . Of recent years, however, what has escaped from inside the penitentiary has been of another character. . . . Environment, association must have their influence upon those in responsible positions in such a place.

To my mind Tom Tynan is more to be pitied than the various persons he has done to death at the bidding of a vengeful society. And even more is that society to be pitied. No wonder gunmen can be hired to shoot a stranger on sight for $5 when a civilized government pays a prison warden only $50 for hanging a man he has cared for in sickness and health through weeks and months. To shoot and run must be easy compared to standing by and watching one of your wards kick and strangle.

As long as governments set the example of wholesale and retail murder in war and capital punishment, so long shall we have lynching and private murder. Lawmakers must reform themselves before they can expect even the beginning of reform among those who have a right to look up to them as examples. Murder, legal or otherwise, will not bring respect for human life. In the fate of poor Tom Tynan is a lesson that cannot be too deeply pondered.

In the Driftway

"PROCRASTINATION is the thief of time" is an old adage. For all the Drifter knows it is out of the Bible or was invented by the Chinese, which would establish its respectability but not necessarily prove it to be true. In the Drifter's experience procrastination is often a saver of time, although it is generally annoying to others. It is told of W. S. Gilbert that upon arriving on the dot for a rehearsal of one of his plays he was congratulated for his promptness. "Don't congratulate me," he answered. "I've lost more time through arriving at places promptly than in any other way in life."

* * * * *

TAKE the answering of letters. If you let them wait long enough, many letters answer themselves—or don't need to be answered. The Drifter speaks from abundant experience. In self-depreciation he sometimes calls himself a "bad correspondent," yet he knows in his heart that he is an efficient one. Like most other people he receives by mail enough appeals for money for various causes to bankrupt Henry Ford—or even a bootlegger. But it would be heartless to throw them away on the spot. So the Drifter lets the letters lie around on his desk for a week or so in the pretense that he may send something. Then when they are covered with dust he furtively pushes them into the waste-basket to make room for a new pile.

* * * * *

RECENTLY, though, an appeal arrived which he couldn't refuse. The Crippled Children's Relief Association sent him three handkerchiefs with his initials on them. The Drifter expected that the letter accompanying would ask for a check or the return of the handkerchiefs. He was preparing to follow his usual course of throwing both handkerchiefs and letter into the waste-basket at once and forgetting about them. But the letter did not say that. It asked him to accept the handkerchiefs as a gift. If he wanted to do something for the crippled children, a contribution of a dollar or more would be thankfully received. This was first-class strategy. The handkerchiefs were cheap and worthless, but the Drifter realized that he could not forbear to send that dollar. As usual, though, he procrastinated for a week or so, before mailing it. A few days later he read in the newspapers that the scheme was a fraud. The Crippled Children's Relief Association consisted of some sharpers who had rented an office, sent out their appeal, mulcted a gullible public, and then disappeared with a small fortune. The Drifter thought the joke was worth a dollar and was willing to let it go at that. But the other day an envelope arrived from the dead-letter office in which the dollar was returned intact. Owing to his happy habit of procrastination the Drifter's letter had arrived after the swindlers had skipped, and was therefore not delivered. Thus the Drifter has had the satisfaction of philanthropy, the pleasure of a joke, and his dollar is back in his pocket. Or was. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

A Cabled Appeal

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I urge you to assist in arousing and organizing the American people against participating in the threat of imperialist aggression against revolutionary China. The American cruiser Cincinnati with nine other American warships is part of the imperialist fleet of thirty-five vessels here with guns directed against the only Government of the Chinese people. The Nationalist Government and the Chinese people are displaying wonderful ability in organization and leadership. They are crushing the militarists who have kept China in a condition of feudalism and are rebuilding China on progressive lines. The greatest forward step in the history of a great nation of four hundred millions is menaced by imperialist intervention. The shameful participation of American forces must rouse the indignation and protest of every friend of China and of human freedom. Intervention is a threat not only against China but also against world peace. All the forces of peace must be mobilized to prevent disaster by withdrawing American armed forces from Chinese waters and territory.

This Foreman

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I inclose a copy of my letter to Mr. Bellew, who wanted to know what This Foreman was about:

MY DEAR MR. BELLEW:

It's rather dangerous to attempt to explain any poem. I feel that a poem must be experienced as it occurs (I prefer experienced to understood) and that we can go little farther than build up associations common to both writer and reader.

Digressing from This Foreman for a moment, I believe that those of us who love poetry do so in spite of our academic education. At least educational methods do little more than inform us that poetry exists and that it has been a force in the world. The classroom, it seems to me, implies translations equivalent to alchemy. We stress one aspect, the meaning, out of proportion to its value by assuming that every poem has a prose equivalent. A passage is read, and the instructor says to the student: "Now put that into your own words," which is nearly as absurd as asking him to change Chopin into a Fordson tractor.

I am trying, not to defend obscure poetry, but to protest against "explaining" in the all too familiar sense that it robs the poem of its identity as poetry and develops specious appreciation by analogy.

To me my foreman is a modern manifestation of what the ancients expressed in such gods as Vulcan. In the poem we find an honest man ridiculed in court for telling the truth. He saw a workman fall from a steel building frame and heard the foreman sing a malevolent, ironical song. Some sort of litigation, say insurance, is under way. The foreman has just testified, lying superbly to the effect that

> He slid like a flash to the dead man's side
> And gave the dead first aid.

The witness, however, sticks to his story that the foreman sang like a swan. I repeat the classic convention about the swan purely as a convention to intensify the foreman's supernaturalness amid realistic characters. The whole business is ridiculous. When the bailiff pounds for order anybody with a sense of humor would have shouted, "Tin, tin, come in" or something equally childish, but the court proceeds in its orderly way. The spectators are fascinated by the foreman who "licks the slit in his crooked head." Well, they try to find out what the song is about, although nobody believes that the foreman sang; so the poor witness sees it through, describing the song as best he can.

The force of the song is something like this: that the colossal modern buildings are steel traps that destroy their eager, sincere builders—not specifically the steel workers themselves unless they be included in the vast number of human animals whose passion is to live their business.

> For he sang of the living lives of men
> As if the steel had spanned
> Their lives with something true and cold
> That nobody had planned.

The foreman was delighted when a workman fell dead. This man was simply a symbol of the building's countless victims of the future. The foreman, of course, knows that the witness is telling the truth. They walk down the hall together to get their fees. The witness wants to know more about the song:

> "Explain the hounds to me."
> "Not here, fool, climb the steel tonight,
> The moon goes down at three."

The lovers referred to in the song are any lovers and the hounds are any hounds, depending on the reader. The important thing is simply that passion is being ensnared by a steel net. To me, of course, the lovers are Venus and Mars and the hounds are the hounds of love always associated with the Cyprian goddess.

A Different Decade?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I hastened to read "The Mauve Decade" because I thought the period of 1890 deserved something hard for its twittering sentimentality, its "ginger-bread" architecture, its political corruption. But why this reiterated furore about Frances Willard and Louisa Alcott? With all the author's humorless scorn he has shown up these poor girls as no more harmful, say, than Alice Paul or Florence Kelley. And what is the author's age—19 or 20?—that he, apparently, hates a man because he is old?

Should not complacent and vainglorious Americans of any decade thank God for a critic like Henry Adams? Yet this mauve author refers to him as obscenely as an unsober freshman. Let us hope that some balanced author will show up the manias, the ugliness, and the infantile tantrums of this decade.

Friendship and Intermarriage

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Suspecting a slight sympathy on my part toward friendliness between white and colored college students, an American lady told me with some heat that all kinds of friendliness ought to be opposed which might possibly lead to intermarriage.

What is the answer? I can conceive three lines of argument: (1) That the biological evil of intermarriage, between persons similar enough to attract each other, has yet to be scientifically proved; (2) that social intercourse has not in fact increased intermarriage; and that the social gulf in the old South did not in fact prevent the begetting of children of mixed race; (3) that the maintenance of a social cleavage through the heart of the nation and the nation's schools would be too expensive insurance against a doubtful evil. Which is right?

Why Was the Book Published in Paris?

Why Not?

Have Not Great Books Originated in Paris Before?

"The Case of Mr. Crump"

BY

Ludwig Lewisohn

(author of Up-stream, Israel, Roman Summer, etc.)

is one of such great books brought out in Paris, in beautiful generous format, on choice Holland paper, with large margins, in the true French bibliophile manner, limited to Five Hundred numbered copies, signed by the author.

Golden Praise from Great Writers:

H. L. MENCKEN, in the March American Mercury:

"It is a capital piece of work,—and the publisher has printed it beautifully. Lewisohn has achieved a portrait of an indelible reality and poignancy."

SINCLAIR LEWIS:

"The Case of Mr. Crump is to me very remarkable in its strength, its lucidity and that nobility which distinguishes authentic literature."

CARL VAN DOREN:

"Powerful and masterly."

THEODORE DREISER:

The vivid, incisive style . . . its facility, its compelling interest are undeniable. The work must prove arresting to many—very many."

PROF. WILLIAM ELLERY LEONARD:

"The work is Ludwig Lewisohn's biggest and best."

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH, in The Nation:

"Mr. Lewisohn's book challenges comparison with various ultra-modern novels, but it is set apart from them all by two faiths—the one artistic, the other moral—that its author has managed to retain. . . . Perhaps Lewisohn is the only man alive capable of writing such a book and capable at the same time of maintaining that the world which it describes is something more than sound and fury."

A small number of remaining copies of The Case of Mr. Crump (already a collectors' item) may still be had at $12.00 the signed and numbered copy, from the publisher, to whom checks are to be made payable:

Epitaph on a First Citizen

By GWENDOLEN HASTE

Here lies the pride of our metropolis
Now headed for the shadowy halls of Dis,
Rich in those things man sells his life to own:
Item—a swelling fortune out on loan,
Item—one bank, solvent, serene, and Greek,
A rotund dowager, massaged and sleek,
Item—some tidy firsts, a farm or two,
One pressed brick mansion, landscaped, with a view,
Item—two bovine daughters, big with child,
Item—one son, reported very wild,
Last heard from somewhere in Afghanistan,
Item—two maids, chauffeur and handy-man,
One dim old master, several antique chairs,
A Moslem rug adorned with Moslem prayers,
Item—one soul hidden beneath this clutter.
Death, mend its wings a bit and let it flutter.

First Glance

"WE all piled out of bed about the same time and while I took in the furnishings of the room and gazed through the window at the sun peeping over the hill, the sound of the bell still ringing in my ears which reminded me of the Angelis. It gave me the feeling of awakening in a foreign land. I was three miles from town, but felt like I was three thousand miles from friends and country. I suppose the atmosphere of the place had penetrated my brains during the night giving me the feeling of a total stranger." Thus Ed Sweeney, author of "Poorhouse Sweeney: Life in a Country Poorhouse" (Boni and Liveright: $2.50), on his first morning in the poor, weak world his book describes. Theodore Dreiser, who contributes a foreword, promises the reader that "the author does somehow infuse into this narrative the glow of reality—the strangeness of a world one has never penetrated, yet which can no longer be wholly strange once one has read this." Mr. Dreiser is right. It is a unique and real book, and curiously enough, considering the meanness of the material, it glows—though the light it casts is pale and is mingled with the pale, dead, disinfected odor of county institutions. One cannot doubt for a moment that this is life, even if it is life in its lowest terms, at its lowest ebb—with most of the water shrunk from the shore and with the smell of slowly rotting creatures everywhere. Ed Sweeney is only half aware of the human bareness of his scene. Were he altogether so, he not only would be elsewhere but would consider the place beneath anyone's notice. Were he not aware at all, he would be incapable of a book. So we have, doubtless in exactly the proper light, paupers dragging out the remnants of their lives in mutual distrust and loathing, in the midst of ignorant laughter, mechanical desires for food and rocking chairs, and pitiful thoughts about justice and sex. There are other realms of reality; but this is one. And it is fitting that Mr. Dreiser, who represents "realistic" fiction at its best, should recommend it.

The first chapter of "An American Saga," by Carl Christian Jensen (Little, Brown: $2.50), explores another realm of reality, and explores it gorgeously. Mr. Jensen, who grew up in Denmark and after some years at sea landed in New York and became an American, begins his book with an account of The Old Country which would be difficult to match in all this branch of literature for vividness, color, and speed. Going to the old saga-writers for technique and plunging into his own memory for material, he gives us thick and fast the data for reconstructing a world which is of course no more true than Ed Sweeney's, but certainly a thousand times as vigorous. There was his towering grandfather, for instance, who to others was angry and terrible but to this boy was the only affectionate person in Denmark. "He liked to have me visit him on the farm. At night we slept together, the old giant and I. A piece of rope hung from the ceiling over his bed, by means of which he would raise himself in the morning. He lay there the night long, embracing me with his huge, muscular arms, while I snuggled up to him hungrily." But then in the second chapter Mr. Jensen tells how he grew sentimental about the sea, and before long he is in America—which, for all the philosophy he pretends to have found there, ruins his book if it has not ruined him. The viking grows tame, and from having talked like nobody else talks like everybody, except that he is a little more incoherent. After page 70 I was not interested—nor, I suspect, was that portion of Mr. Jensen which writes sagas.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Men Nobody Knows

Business and the Church. Edited by Jerome Davis. The Century Company. $2.50.

FOOLS we were to think that He was the Man of Sorrow. Of course now we know better. If Bruce Barton and not Judas had made His contacts there need have been no Calvary. For the Man Nobody Knew was a good mixer, who could tell a parable or two and is now breaking through the sales resistance of over nineteen centuries. Today "those employers . . . who dare to be experimental in creating industrial brotherhood" recognize that His is the best policy; so Mr. Jerome Davis informs us. Accordingly, Mr. Davis dedicates this book to the authors of these Acts. This modern Hieronymus vulgarizes for our guidance the spirit of the Lord as it shines through the martyred lives of high-powered executives. "This collection of sermons and facts from business men" satisfies in him "a crying need . . . to get away from mere platitudinous idealism to its practical translation in the working realms of day-by-day life." "All honor to the brave group" of apostles "who are making their business accord with their ideal," thereby laying "concrete the Christ way!"

The first apostle on this macadamized via dolorosa startled me a bit, I must confess. He is an old acquaintance. John Calder, after years of self-denial as manager of the Remington and Cadillac works, began his active ministry at Swift's, among the simple herdsmen of the Stockyards. I dealt with his ministry at length in The Nation of January 25, 1922. The theme of my then heathen commentary was the stock-yards strike; how he broke its pagan spirit and then perfected a covenant to keep it broken; how the compelling power of his revelation spread like wildfire among the Big Five packers; how he suffered at $100,000 annually for his vision of the perfect company union. Now, after five long years, we can still hear his prophetic voice: "Is there balm in Gilead? Yes! Is there a physician? Yes! I believe the answer to the Sphinx is still the same: 'Man! Man! Man!'" Finally this apocalyptic cry rises to ecstasy: "The Christian liver . . . demands social justice for his fellowman, but refuses it for himself, as his Master did." I bow my head in shame. Forgive me, St. John Calder, for I knew n t what I did when I counted you among the strike-breakers.

My higher criticism of the other epistles is complicated by the certain knowledge that quite a few of them were not written by those who signed them, an exegetic problem especially difficult for the practicing journalist, who is apt to be prejudiced against apostles who write their messages through "ghosts." Still, it is the spirit of these messages which counts. So we go on. Next comes Henry Ford. He signs an Act on The Need of Social Blue-Prints. These are fundamentally the same as he uses in the Rouge River plant. "Humanics," the sympathetic editor explains. Social ethics can be automatized, measured, and its measurements enforced. All else is "platitudinous idealism."

John D. Rockefeller, Jr., is introduced by the enumeration of splendid gifts from his father's money. He recapitulates his well-known revolutionary doctrine of the John D. Junior Republic. The constitution of this industrial commonwealth was born of his vicarious revolutionary experience in the Rockefeller properties at Ludlow, Colorado, on April 19, 1914, when men, women, and children were shot down in their tents by machine-guns. It was framed in the constitutional convention of Curtis, Fosdick, and Belknap. "The parties to industry are four in number. They are capital, management, labor, and the community," Mr. Rockefeller posits with the lucidity of greatness; which leads him to conclude for the American plan: the self-determination of the Rockefeller plants. Of course, the founding fathers of this constitution in the offices of Curtis, Fosdick, and Belknap took all possible precautions against the industrial rotten borough. How?

The answer is supplied by Arthur H. Young, one of the "Industrial Relations Counselors" in these offices. Mr. Young broke the strike at the International Harvester Company soon after Mr. Calder brought peace to the packers. It was out of this experience that he developed his plan of industrial democracy. To prevent further trouble at the International Harvester he established such a scientific suffrage method that by its use the workers are enabled to outlaw their own grievances—to the satisfaction of their other "partners" in industry. They vote on "data" furnished by the company "research" staff. These experts—psychologists, economists, "social engineers" of all kinds—furnish them with Job Analyses, Mental Tests, Production Costs, studies in the physiological chemistry of fatigue, in the physics of light and plumbing, in the statistics of waste. The workers are presented with the findings of the Taylor Society, the American Management Association, and the National Industrial Conference Board. Whereupon they check up all these "data" against the latest theory of wages. By this deductive process they realize the fallacy of trade unionism, and vote themselves a wage cut and an increase in hours whenever necessary.

Among the other followers of Christ is Mr. Edward A. Filene, the Boston department storekeeper and industrial aesthete, who pleads for more beauty in business, since beauty, he holds with Hegel, is also truth and goodness; Mr. Sam A. Lewisohn, psychoanalyst to big business, who would sublimate its labor complex into taking over the functions of the labor movement; Mr. Whiting Williams, an overall-sociologist, tells of his tramping on industrial life (with letters of credit) until he discovered that labor is quite human under the skin; President Green of the American Federation of Labor pleads for "life more abundantly." Of all the twenty-three articles on attitudes and experiments in "creative good-will" only those dealing with the efforts at Hart Schaffner and Marx, at the Dennison Manufacturing Company, at the Columbia Conserve Company, and at the A. Nash Clothing Company are not specious.

But the noblest contribution comes from the pen of Mr. Roger W. Babson, the St. Francis of "The Babson Statistical Community." "Do Praying Fathers Have Preying Sons?—No!" is the topic of his discourse to the birds and trees of Beverly Hills. The burden of his talk is that religion and success go hand in hand. "The great packers are intensely religious men. Mr. Louis F. Swift supports . . . an institution for preparing young men for the Presbyterian ministry. . . . The McCormicks, of harvester machinery fame, founded a great theological school. Mr. Henry P. Crowell, head of the Quaker Oats Company, has for years been the head of the Moody Bible School. . . ."

By this time even the moles come up to listen. "There may be many collars that are as good as Arrow collars," our St. Francis dubiously continues, "many breakfast foods that are as good as Toasted Corn Flakes. . . . However, Mr. Cluett of Cluett, Peabody and Company has been president of the Y. M. C. A. of Troy for many years, Kellogg is probably the leading Seventh-Day Baptist in this country." Many other great business leaders either spring from theological loins or patronize theological works. The conclusion is irresistible: "Prayer and religion, as developed by our churches, are the foundations of achievement in . . . modern American business."

Of course it is a silly book. Its economics is pure bunk, its psychology is hokum, it is naive in its social politics, it is unbelievably confused. Yet it is quite significant in its liberal pretensions. Mr. Davis appreciates that the Babbittry is not confined to the conservative sections of society. He sells a liberal Bartonism to the simpletons in liberal and radical circles, to the undiscriminating followers of all left theories, no matter how mutually exclusive these might be. Lenin's writings on the eternal Menshevik analyze with wonderful acuteness the vagaries and intellectual fears of this type of mind, whose tolerance springs from a wish to eat and have the cake of intellectual courage.

But the most difficult thing to forgive is all this trading in the name of Jesus. One need not believe in His divinity, or even in His social doctrine or psychology, to feel a sense of outrage at this performance. He went forth to reconcile virtue and reason, and He discovered that they could not be found except in tragedy. To compare the terrible road of his brief ten-months' ministry, which led straight, ineluctably, and consciously into the swords of power, with the ways of the company union and all its rationalized cavortings is incredibly stupid and execrably vulgar. The company union is successful for a very simple reason. Modern industry cannot function under the antiquated, craft-jealous trade union. And since the trade union is too impotent to modernize into an industrial union, the employer is introducing it—to his own advantage.

BENJAMIN STOLBERG

A Brilliant Beginning

Migrations. By Evelyn Scott. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.50.

EVELYN SCOTT'S new novel is, according to the critical analysis on the jacket, a study of the effect of the idea of freedom introduced into the community of Mimms, Tennessee, in 1850. Because of it the society of the ante-bellum South undergoes a complete disintegration and that disintegration is typified in a single family. Its head dies, one of the slaves runs away north, and of the two sons each breaks in his own way with the traditions of his race, the one wandering across Panama on his way to the gold-fields of California and the other turning to trade in his native village.

Those who have read Mrs. Scott's previous novels do not need to be told of either her power to evoke an exotic scene or her capacity for the minute analysis of character. In her hands the present romantic, almost epic story becomes a series of intimate experiences, and where one would expect large sweeping gestures one gets instead intense, minutely developed scenes and brilliant bits of realistic character analysis which suggest anything but the romantic or the epic tradition. Considering her characters not as heroic figures but as essentially ordinary people who happen to have been born at a time when circumstance forced adventures upon them, she has written a historic novel as though it were a modern one, and as a result she has made of it something which is colorful without being, as most colorful things are, remote.

Yet for all the admiration which the fine texture of the book must arouse it cannot be denied that the author has neither fitted her material to the conventional form of the novel nor found a new and satisfactory one of her own; the further one proceeds in the reading of it the more scattered the interest becomes and the less possible it is for the author to draw the threads of her narrative into a single strand. Her story grows like a tree, branching out in every direction and becoming every instant more obviously incapable of being brought to any conclusion. New stories are continually begun before the previous ones have been even well started upon their way—fifteen pages near the end of the book are devoted to a detailed account of the ancestry and early experiences of a new character—and when one comes suddenly to the last page one seems merely to have finished the first volume of some gigantic work.

"Migrations" is, then, at once brilliant and disappointing. There is hardly a chapter, hardly a page even, that does not reveal talents amounting almost to genius, and yet the total effect is of something which failed to realize itself. In it is the material for half a dozen brilliant short stories and a score of vivid sketches, but there is no climax whatever and scarcely any cumulative effect, so that any one of the parts is more effective than the whole, and one is left with a never-to-be-satisfied interest in six or eight diverse people scattered over the whole face of America. Its theme is, to be sure, announced by the title. Its characters are wanderers diffusing themselves throughout the country and finally to be swallowed up by its vastness; but they are made too vivid to be thus vaguely disposed of. Mrs. Scott has made them individuals, she has caused us to feel for them an intimate concern, and one seems to have been deliberately cheated when they are left in mid-career with their fates not even foreshadowed and with decisive turnings yet to be taken. From a novelist who knows them so intimately, who has described in such details their minds and their actions, one has a right to expect some sort of completeness; it is merely irritating to have every conclusion withheld.

The Hindu Bible

The Religion and Philosophy of the Veda and Upanishads. By Arthur Berriedale Keith. Harvard Oriental Series. Volumes 31 and 32. Harvard University Press. $10.

PREVIOUS books in English on the religion and philosophy of the Veda have lacked either the scope or the exactness of this one. Some of the German and French treatments are almost as full, but each by its devotion to some theory of its own that has since been shown untenable is now suspect. And more important yet is the fact that Vedic studies have progressed so much since the publication of the last such work that a new discussion is pertinent. Keith's work, therefore, is timely both for non-specialized English-speaking readers in the history of Indian religions and also for that more limited group of whatever tongue that is constantly on the alert for a solution of some ancient puzzle in Vedic philology.

The Vedic period actually begins before the Aryans invaded India and ends by about 500 B.C., when the principal Upanishads had been composed. As it closes, the great heresies of Jainism and Buddhism enter upon their conquering career. It is the period when the Indo-European naturalistic anthropomorphism that deified the sky, the wind, the dawn, and other phenomena developed into—or was supplanted by—the pessimism and acute and highly speculative metaphysics that to this day characterize India's religions and philosophies. Its literature includes the great hymn collections, the so-called "four Vedas" of which the "Rig Veda" is easily the eldest and the chief, with the "Atharva Veda" running next in importance, and the subsequent ancillary texts on theology, ritual practice, law, philosophy, with certain minor subjects, like grammar, thrown in. Collectively, under the term "Veda" used in its widest sense, it is the bible of Brahmanism and Hinduism, a bible never formally canonized yet more to the Hindu than the Bible is to the Christian, for it is the Bible and the Greek philosophers combined. It is the most important body of all Indian literature for the study of the country, modern as well as ancient.

The great merit of Keith's treatment of this period is his careful discussion of all disputed points, with plentiful reference to pertinent passages in the texts and the printed opinions of other scholars. If his work lacks a scintillating imagination that reinterprets the material on the basis of some new and brilliant theory, it also avoids the pitfalls that lie in the path of such theorizing. For the treatment is eminently sober, with the restraint that marks the best English scholarship as contrasted with the greater daring of the Continental. His feet never leave the earth. This conservatism makes the work thoroughly reliable, while those who wish the higher flights may be guided by the citations in the footnotes.

If this judicial reserve has a fault, it may lie in the reluctance to move ahead of one's time. Yet who will cast the stone here? To do so renders one liable to an avalanche in reply. Take, for example, the matter of non-Aryan, "Dravidian," elements in the formation of Indian thought. Shall we believe that the marked difference between the naive early Rig-Vedic faith and the subtleties of the highest Hinduism, which is for the most part under the spell of the Vedanta philosophy, is the result of a slow intellectual development wholly within the pale of Aryan culture, beginning with the skepticism and faltering speculations of the philosophical hymns of the later "Rig Veda," carrying on through similar hymns in the "Atharva Veda," then into the "Brahmanas," budding in the "Upanishads," and coming to full flower in the systems of Shankara and Ramanuja? Or shall we think that the pre-Aryan inhabitants of India were possessed of some fairly well-conceived notions of the universe; and that they, though conquered, civilized their conquerors and gave them these notions, which attained their complete form later when the two peoples had blended? Keith, with his eye on the preserved records, rejects the latter theory; for such positive evidence as they offer is all in favor of the former. And no one can justly blame him. Yet, negatively, there is something to be said for the theory of Dravidian origin of the most important Indian metaphysical concepts. Not by any means is Indian civilization solely a product of Aryan genius. Dravidian India, as well as northern India, has long had a civilization; while the recent excavations in the Indus Valley already show that there existed in India a well-developed culture long before any date which most reputable scholars would set for the Aryan irruption. Nevertheless, it must be admitted that advocacy of the Dravidian theory is likely, in the present absence of mathematical proof, to smack of prophecy rather than of science, and to be liable ultimately to the fate of other notable theories of even such distinguished scholars as Bergaigne and Oldenberg. And Keith is too sound to be a prophet.

It is indeed in many cases a comfort to find a theory examined critically and set aside as undemonstrated. If other scholars have done the work they are given the credit; if not, the errors are likely to be exposed anyhow. Thus, for example, there need be no regret that Deussen's neat schematization of Upanishadic thought should be rejected, or that other theories, some of lesser age, should be as cleanly brushed away, such as the numerous recent and ingenious ideas of Hertel concerning the door of heaven, the heavenly fire, and other matters. The ideas were doomed from birth, but a quick scotching is all the more welcome.

Keith's book has become, immediately on publication, the standard reference work on the thought of the Vedic period. We should like to couple it with a smaller and older work, Bloomfield's "Religion of the Veda" (1908). The latter with its luminous method, sparkling vocabulary, arresting phrase, and clear exposition is a literary achievement as well as a work of scholarship, and sketches in admirably the broad lines and contrasting colors of the picture. W. NORMAN BROWN

Strindberg the Sufferer

Strindberg, Leben und Dichtung. Von Erik Hedén. Aus dem Schwedischen von Julia Koppel. München: C. H. Beck'sche Verlagsbuchhandlung. 13 marks.

THIS excellent German version of a Swedish life of Sweden's greatest dramatist should find a sale in America, especially since it is not likely that we shall soon have anything equal to it in English. Strindberg has been played in Germany more than in his own country, and a number of his plays were produced in German before they were given in Swedish. But his ecstatic probings of aching hearts have left France, England, and America for the most part puzzled and cold. At the time of his death the New Statesman called him a "fifth-rate writer"; and if I am not mistaken there was no public commercial performance of a Strindberg play in the United States—there had been modest parlor performances—before 1912, the last year of the poet's life. Anglo-Saxons dislike him because he is outspoken and painful. Frenchmen dislike him because he is chaotic and unequal. But if it be true that he is a great writer who feels deeply and speaks his feelings truly and eloquently, Strindberg ranks with the great writers.

Erik Hedén has brought to his task an admirably complete and intimate knowledge of his subject's troubled life and his voluminous writing. He is almost too complete, one feels at times, for the purposes of a popular biography. These endless analyses, with their constant cross-references, like a dictionary of the characters in the "Comédie Humaine," will sometimes prove to the reader who is not already himself a Strindberg specialist to be dark with excessive light. The monotonously recurring conjectures as to what particular exterior events of the writer's life are embalmed in particular passages of his noble writing—the finest Swedish, says the philologist Adolf Noreen, which was written in Strindberg's generation—are wearisome many times and many times unconvincing. Strindberg was always writing about himself, we know; but his dealings with his pathetically misunderstood and misunderstanding dream-children, although no doubt set off in most cases by his dealings with his own flesh-and-blood children and his succession of flesh-and-blood wives—poor creatures!—and his other long-suffering terrestrial associates, would be several degrees more difficult to account for on the basis of physical experience than the dreams of the sane and stupid. Strindberg's literary output is the record of a long nightmare. Probably no other modern writer lived so completely in a world of his own.

Yet, though a playwright deals with stubborn facts, not with one man's dreams, Strindberg was a great playwright, one of the most effective of all the powerful modern group, richer in creative power than his magnificent rival Ibsen, though less influential because less rational. And he was an effective realistic novelist. Ludwig Lewisohn is probably right—and to that extent Erik Hedén wrong—in finding his most compelling work in the nervous naturalistic interval of the eighties rather than in the loose romanticism of the earlier and later periods. Like poor, demented Cassandra, discerning signs of events which escaped the wisest and sanest of her open-eyed countrymen, Strindberg has a frequent clairvoyant vision of the world of phenomena. When the Swedish people, in the year before his death, rose with a generous enthusiasm and gave this impecunious, much-divorced, quarrelsome, ungrateful, eccentric little

History of Socialist Thought

By HARRY W. LAIDLER, Ph. D.

Executive Director, League for Industrial Democracy
700 pages, 8vo. 16 portraits. $3.50

"THIS BOOK presents the history of socialist thought and of movements for its practical application. Major emphasis is given to the period beginning with the rise of so-called scientific socialism, and especially to developments during and since the World War. The various contemporary doctrines and movements are expounded with particular thoroughness and insight. The treatment is based on a thorough examination of the source materials on the history of socialism. By virtue of these and other features, the book is easily the best single source of information on this important subject published in the English language."

quill-driver the noblest ovation ever accorded a writer of their race, they did instinctive homage, not only to an artist but to a prophet and a lover of mankind. Through the welter of violence and contradiction in this man's endless output of plays, novels, pamphlets, extravagant quasi-philosophy and quasi-science there runs a thread of real inspiration for which Sweden had come to be grateful.

All discussion of Strindberg must, of course, concern itself largely with his hysterical anti-feminism. Yet the conflict of the sexes is only one phase of the individual's struggle to adapt himself to his environment. Strindberg, one of the saddest cases in the history of the race of a square peg transferred from the structure of some other planet to a round hole in this terrestrial machine, eternally brings home the great lesson of tolerance and sympathy. We are all having a hard time here. It is impossible to read Strindberg's work or his life without a great swelling of the heart. That may be why a kind Providence allowed him to suffer so hideously.

ROY TEMPLE HOUSE

Books in Brief

The People Next Door. By George Creel. The John Day Company. $4.

A sympathetic rendering of Mexico's political history from Cuauthemoc to Calles. Chiefly a rehash of what others have written, and better for the recent years on which less has been printed. Most valuable are the remarks in the foreword on intervention, directed at those "who have preached it so glibly" and "cannot possibly have thought it through."

The Parnell of Real Life. By William O'Brien. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 7/6.

These reprinted essays and reviews throw light on some of the dark corners into which the Home Rule tangle drew both English and Irish politicians, but Mr. O'Brien, like his chief, was a "political animal," and in these days of psychological biography his book seems strangely old-fashioned in its absorption in politics and its failure to reveal anything of the inner Parnell.

Julia Marlowe: Her Life and Art. By Charles Edward Russell. D. Appleton and Company. $5.

A welcome and informed if somewhat stodgy biography by one whose admiration for Miss Marlowe is ardent and unending. Off stage he makes the lady appear as a rather amusing bas-bleu who "repeatedly pointed out" that free verse was only masquerading prose and who enriched the books of her library by such annotations as "Most Remarkable!" She doubted the uplifting effect of much modern drama but considered that she best expressed her disapproval by her "adherence to the role of the woman who does not fall when tempted." "The dramatic attraction of the woman who stays pure," she added, "is a subject in which I have always been interested." Such dicta give no pause to Mr. Russell's admiration.

Yerney's Justice. By Ivan Cankar. Vanguard Press, Inc. 50 cents.

Yerney, the peasant, had for forty years worked his master's farm. He had built the barns and the fine white house; his sweat was plowed into every acre. In the evening he had smoked his pipe in the chimney corner with the other men. But his master died and his master's son, the idler, whom Yerney had ordered about and driven to work, became the master. Yerney was dismissed, sent out into the world without job or home—Yerney, who believed himself the rightful master of the land he had tilled, the house and barns he had made. So Yerney set forth to look for justice. He stated his case to the mayor, to his fellow-villagers, to the urchins of the neighborhood; he told it to the district judge and to the officials in the big city. He even went to Vienna to tell the Emperor, and found himself lodged in jail among people who could not speak his Slavic tongue. Yerney died without finding justice. But his story, as simple and almost as moral as a fable, has been told and retold in nearly every European language and is given the credit for various agrarian reforms in Central and Eastern Europe. Its author, Ivan Cankar, is known chiefly as Jugoslavia's greatest writer, a realist without ulterior purpose; but "Yerney's Justice," like Anatole France's "Crainquebille," is a powerful revolutionary tract.

Willobie His Avisa. Edited by G. B. Harrison. The Bodley Head Quartos. E. P. Dutton and Company.

This poem has won, because of the mystery that attaches to it, an attention from scholars which on aesthetic grounds it is far from deserving. It is the dull and dreary story of the pursuit of a virtuous woman by various suitors. But among the rejected suitors is a young man whose initials are "H. W." and who turns in his disappointment to his friend "W. S." The four letters are sufficient to provoke a mass of commentary. Apart from them it is evident to any reader that there is more in the poem than appears on the surface, and that its popularity for thirty years after its appearance was due to general knowledge that it possessed a secret meaning. Mr. Arthur Acheson's interpretation, involving "the dark lady of the sonnets" and the problem of Sir William D'Avenant's parentage, and much else, is well known. Mr. Harrison now offers a rival interpretation. He connects the chaste Avisa with a locality in the southwest of England which in turn is connected with Sir Walter Raleigh, and says that "Willobie His Avisa" is a reply to an attack upon Raleigh made by someone belonging to the circle of the Earl of Southampton. That "someone" may have been Shakespeare, and that "attack" may have been "The Rape of Lucrece."

The Preliminaries of the American Revolution as Seen in the English Press, 1763-1775. By Fred J. Hinkhouse. Columbia University Press. $3.50.

Professor Hinkhouse has searched, with commendable industry, the files of a considerable number of English newspapers and magazines of the early Revolutionary period in the hope of discovering what the average intelligent Englishman knew or thought about events in America and the course of the government in dealing with them. The results of his inquiry, while they add appreciably to our knowledge, do not materially change the view which later historians have taken of the English attitude toward the American controversy. Both the government and the opposition spoke of the war as a civil war, although they did not always use the phrase in the same sense, and the conception of the dispute as a struggle between two ideals of government as well as a test of strength between the colonies and the Crown appears to have been widely held. In England as in America, too, the landed and ecclesiastical interests sided generally with the prerogative, whereas the English nonconformists inclined to sympathy with their American brethren. Professor Hinkhouse does well in pointing out, however, that the opinion of the provincial press, as evidenced particularly in the contributed letters which largely took the place of editorial expression, was mainly a reflection of opinion in London. One cannot be sure, accordingly, even after reading the provincial papers, that the majority of intelligent Englishmen outside the capital were greatly concerned about the American controversy as either a political or an economic issue.

The Theater of George Jean Nathan. By Isaac Goldberg. Simon and Schuster. $3.

A slapdash production which nevertheless contains some interesting facts and a series of interesting documents—e.g., letters from O'Neill and Gordon Craig to Nathan; three scenarios of plays projected by Mencken and Nathan; and the text of Nathan's suppressed play "The Eternal Mystery."

Drama

A Folk-Tragedy

"IN ABRAHAM'S BOSOM," Mr. Paul Green's "biography of a Negro in seven scenes," aroused in me no great enthusiasm. In spite of the excellent material which it contained it was feeble in construction and I saw no reason for confusing the issue by praising the absence of conventional Broadway technique in a play which was, in itself, no more than merely ineffectual. This same author's latest effort, "The Field God" (Greenwich Village Theater), seems to me, however, to mark an enormous advance, for though it is as far removed as its predecessor from both the subject matter and the method of our popular young playwrights it is, in addition, quite capable of standing firmly upon its own dramatic legs.

Even in the former play there was no mistaking either the author's knowledge or his sincerity. Here, obviously, was no suggestion of that mere vulgarization of a current interest in the Negro which results in such a play as "Lulu Belle," no trace of the clever young playwright condescending to see what could be made out of a picturesque people for the entertainment of jaded spectators. Here instead was the genuine understanding and love of a man who had studied his subject long before he had ever dreamed of using it, and here in consequence was a play which, effective or not, could never be confused with the product of a superficial and purely professional interest in exotic material. Now its author, turning his attention to the white farmer of North Carolina whom he obviously knows no less intimately than the Negro, has produced a play equally genuine and decidedly more mature—one which serves, indeed, definitely to raise him out of the ranks of promising beginners and to make him a man to be watched with more than that dutiful but none too hopeful interest which one bestows upon the man who shows signs of talent usually destined not to be realized.

Evidently the numerous short folk-plays which Mr. Green has written have served him well. The image of a primitive society which he projects upon the stage with an apparently effortless ease has an extraordinary depth and solidity, and the minor characters who create it are all conceived with an incisive yet natural humor. But it is not with this that he stops. The wildly passionate story which he tells of a conflict between a primitively powerful love and the religious fanaticism of a remote community is one which is firmly rooted in the manners and traditions of that community. It is no conventional stage plot foisted upon a certain set of characters but something which grows out of the people and their ways—a genuine folk-tragedy. Richly complicated, it is never confused and its climaxes rise, as those of the former play most conspicuously did not, in a steady crescendo. Many of its scenes, notably that in which the drunken and disappointed lover swaggers before his successful rival and that in which the preacher prays over the agonized skeptic, are boldly conceived with an apparently complete disregard for all the tricks of the trade but with a fresh and thrilling power. The play is unusually well acted, particularly in respect to certain of the minor characters and to that of the hero whom Mr. Fritz Lieber portrays; but it is not upon the production alone that its great effectiveness depends, for "The Field God" is at once skilful and genuine. Other plays of the year have been more ingenious, but I doubt if any other has had more life in it.

Inevitably Mr. Green's work will be compared with that of O'Neill, not only because he has dealt with a theme and a setting somewhat analogous to that of "Desire Under the Elms" but also because there is a certain resemblance arising from the fact that both men dare to use violent scenes and to pitch their climaxes in a very high emotional key. The comparison is not wholly unwarranted, but the difference in the work of the two men will be found, I think, to arise chiefly from the fact that Mr. Green is by far the more objective of the two. Among whatever people O'Neill has set his scene he has always been in search of an image of himself. If he has been interested in sailors or farmers or artists it is chiefly because he has seen in their passions something which corresponds to his own; no matter what mask he has assumed self-expression has been his aim. Mr. Green, on the other hand, chooses his people because he was born among them. The subject matter, for and in itself, concerns him most, and he works through sympathy, not through identification. Far more than O'Neill he is a recorder or a historian, and in that fact lies both his strength and his weakness. He knows his people perfectly, knows them better perhaps than O'Neill knows his, but he neither knows himself half so well nor so certainly possesses a self half so well worth the knowing.

At the Garrick Theater the Theater Guild is reviving Milne's charming comedy "Mr. Pim Passes By" in a delightful production graced by Helen Chandler and Laura Hope Crews and marked by an unusually fine piece of acting on the part of Erskine Sanford as Mr. Pim. "Rapid Transit," staged very effectively upon the tiny Provincetown stage, is an ingenious if not always consistent allegory in expressionist form dealing with the adventures of an inhabitant of this world who finds himself in another more advanced one where the inhabitants worship the Great Wheel and have pushed such human follies as war, industrialism, money madness, and speed to limits more extraordinary than ours. "The Comic" (Theater Masque) is a slow-paced and conventional Hungarian farce in which actors who should have known better dawdled plaintively through their parts.

The British Anti-Strike Bill

THE Trade Unions and Trade Disputes Bill has been introduced in Parliament by the Attorney General, with the support of Neville Chamberlain, Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Solicitor General, and the Lord Advocate. It is therefore a government measure, and ordinarily such a measure would be certain of passage. The background of the bill was described in an editorial, Trade Unions and the Law, in our issue of March 16. It has aroused a torrent of criticism in England. Labor of course denounces it; the Liberal Nation (London) calls it "the most wanton contribution to social discord that any government has made in modern times"; even the Tory Spectator says that "the one essential of such a bill, which is clarity, is absent," and fears that it may merely "reunite the scattered factions of the Labor Party." The text printed below is taken from the Times (London) for April 5.

A bill to declare and amend the law relating to trade disputes and trade unions, to regulate the position of civil servants and persons employed by public authorities in respect of membership of trade unions and similar organizations, to extend section five of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, and for other purposes connected with the purposes aforesaid.

Be it enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

ILLEGAL STRIKES

1. (1) It is hereby declared that any strike having any object besides the furtherance of a trade dispute within the trade or industry in which the strikers are engaged is an illegal strike if it is a strike designed or calculated to coerce the government or to intimidate the community, or any substantial portion of the community, and that it is illegal to commence, or continue, or to apply any sums in furtherance or support of any such illegal strike.

For the purposes of the foregoing provision a trade dispute shall not be deemed to be within a trade or industry unless it is a dispute between employers and workmen, or between workmen and workmen, in that trade or industry, which is connected with the employment or non-employment or the terms of the employment, or with the conditions of labor, of persons in that trade or industry.

(2) If any person declares, instigates, furthers, or takes part in a strike declared by this act to be illegal he shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding ten pounds or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, or on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years.

(3) The provisions of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, shall not, nor shall the second proviso to subsection (1) of section two of the Emergency Powers Act, 1920, apply to any act done in contemplation or furtherance of a strike which is by this act declared to be illegal, and any such act shall not be deemed for the purposes of any enactment to be done in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute.

PROTECTION OF PERSONS REFUSING TO TAKE PART IN ILLEGAL STRIKES

2. (1) No person refusing to take part or to continue to take part in any strike which is by this act declared to be illegal, shall be, by reason of such refusal or by reason of any action taken by him under this section, subject to expulsion from any trade union or society, or to any fine or penalty, or to deprivation of any right or benefit to which he would otherwise be entitled, or liable to be placed in any respect either directly or indirectly under any disability or at any disadvantage as compared with other members of the union or society, anything to the contrary in the rules of a trade union or society notwithstanding.

(2) No provisions of the Trade Union Acts, 1871 to 1917, limiting the proceedings which may be entertained by any court, and nothing in the rules of a trade union or society requiring the reference of disputes to arbitration shall apply to any proceeding for enforcing any right or exemption secured by this section, and in any such proceeding the court may, in lieu of ordering a person who has been expelled from membership of a trade union or society to be restored to membership, order that he be paid out of the funds of the trade union or society such sum by way of compensation or damages as the court thinks just.

(3) As respects any strike before the passing of this act which is declared by this act to have been illegal, this section shall have effect as if it had been in operation when the strike took place.

PREVENTION OF INTIMIDATION, ETC.

3. (1) It is hereby declared that it is unlawful for one or more persons (whether acting on their own behalf or on behalf of a trade union or of an individual employer or firm, and notwithstanding that they may be acting in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute) to attend at or near a house or place where a person resides or works or happens to be, for the purpose of obtaining or communicating information or of persuading or inducing any person to work or to abstain from working, if they so attend in such numbers or otherwise in such manner as to be calculated to intimidate any person in that house or place, or to obstruct the approach thereto or egress therefrom, or to lead to a breach of the peace; and attending at or near any house or place in such numbers or in such manner as is by this subsection declared to be unlawful shall be deemed to be a watching or besetting of that house or place within the meaning of section seven of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875.

(2) In this section the expression "to intimidate" means to cause in the mind of a person a reasonable apprehension of injury to him or to any member of his family or of violence or damage to any person or property, and the expression "injury" includes injury other than physical or material injury, and accordingly the expression "apprehension of injury" includes an apprehension of boycott, or loss of any kind, or of exposure to hatred, ridicule, or contempt.

(3) In section seven of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, the expression "intimidate" shall be construed as having the same meaning as in this section.

(4) Notwithstanding anything in any act it shall not be lawful for one or more persons, for the purpose of inducing any person to work or to abstain from working, to watch or beset a house or place where a person resides or the approach to such a house or place, and any person who acts in contravention of this subsection shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months.

PROVISIONS AS TO POLITICAL FUND

4. (1) It shall not be lawful to require any member of a trade union to make any contribution to the political fund of a trade union unless before the date upon which the contribution is levied he has delivered at the head office or some branch office of the trade union, notice in writing in the form set out in the first schedule to this act of his willingness to contribute to that fund and has not withdrawn the notice in manner hereinafter provided; and every member of a trade union who has not delivered such notice as aforesaid, or who, having delivered such a notice, has withdrawn it in manner hereinafter provided, shall be deemed for the purposes of the Trade Union Act, 1913, to be a member who is exempt from the obligation to contribute to the political fund of the union, and references in that act to a member who is so exempt shall be construed accordingly:

Provided that, if at any time a member of a trade union who has delivered such a notice as aforesaid gives notice of withdrawal thereof, delivered at the head office or at any branch office of the trade union, he shall be deemed for the purposes of this subsection to have withdrawn the notice as from the first day of January next after the delivery of the notice of withdrawal.

For the purposes of this subsection a notice shall be deemed to have been delivered at the head or a branch office of a trade union if it has been sent by post properly addressed to that office.

(2) All contributions to the political fund of a trade union from members of the trade union who are liable to contribute to that fund shall be levied and made separately from any contributions to the other funds of the trade union and no assets of the trade union, other than the amount raised by such a separate levy as aforesaid, shall be carried to that fund or directly or indirectly applied or charged in furtherance of any political object to which section three of the Trade Union Act, 1913, applies; and any charge in contravention of this subsection shall be void.

(3) All rules of a trade union made and approved in accordance with the requirements of section three of the Trade Union Act, 1913, shall be amended so as to conform to the requirements of this act, and as so amended shall be approved by the Registrar of Friendly Societies (in this act referred to as "the Registrar") within six months after the commencement of this act or within such further time as the Registrar may in special circumstances allow, and if the rules of any trade union are not so amended and approved as aforesaid they shall be deemed not to comply with the requirements of the said section.

(4) If the Registrar is satisfied, and certifies that rules for the purpose of complying with the provisions of the foregoing subsection have been approved by a majority of the members of a trade union voting for the purpose or by a majority of delegates of such a trade union voting at a meeting called for the purpose, the Registrar may approve those rules and those rules shall thereupon have effect as rules of the union notwithstanding that the provisions of the rules of the union as to the alteration of rules or the making of new rules have not been complied with.

(5) Section sixteen of the Trade Union Act, 1871 (which provides for the transmission to the Registrar of annual returns by registered trade unions), shall apply to every unregistered trade union so far as respects the receipts, funds, effects, expenditure, assets, and liabilities of the political fund thereof.

REGULATIONS AS TO ORGANIZATIONS OF WHICH ESTABLISHED CIVIL SERVANTS MAY BE MEMBERS

5. (1) Among the regulations as to the conditions of service in his Majesty's civil establishments there shall be included regulations prohibiting established civil servants from being members, delegates, or representatives of any organization of which the primary object is to influence or affect the remuneration and conditions of employment of its members, unless the organization is an organization of which the membership is confined to persons employed by or under the Crown and is an organization which complies with such provisions as may be contained in the regulations for securing that it is in all respects independent of, and not affiliated to any such organization as aforesaid the membership of which is not confined to persons employed by or under the Crown or any federation comprising such organizations, that its objects do not include political objects, and that it is not associated directly or indirectly with any political party or organization:

Provided that the regulations made in compliance with the provisions of this section shall not prevent:

(a) an established civil servant from remaining a member of any trade union or organization of which he had, at the commencement of this act, been a member for more than six months if under the rules thereof he is or may become entitled to any payment during incapacity, or by way of superannuation, or on the death of himself or his wife, or as provision for his children; or

(b) a person who in addition to being an established civil servant is, apart from his service as such, also engaged in some other employment or occupation from being any member, delegate, or representative of a trade union or organization, of which the primary object is to influence or affect the remuneration or conditions of employment of persons engaged in that employment or occupation.

(2) If any established civil servant knowingly contravenes any of the provisions of the said regulations he shall be disqualified for continuing to be a member of the civil service.

(3) In this section the expression "established civil servant" means a person serving in an established capacity in the permanent service of the Crown, and includes any person who, having been granted a certificate by the Civil Service Commissioners, is serving a probationary period preliminary to establishment.

PROVISIONS AS TO PERSONS EMPLOYED BY LOCAL AND OTHER PUBLIC AUTHORITIES

6 (1) It shall not be lawful for any local or other public authority to make it a condition of the employment or continuance in employment of any person that he shall or shall not be a member of a trade union, or to impose any condition upon persons employed by the authority whereby employees who are or who are not members of a trade union are liable to be placed in any respect either directly or indirectly under any disability or disadvantage as compared with other employees, and any condition imposed in contravention of this section shall be void.

(2) There shall be added to section five of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, the following provision, that is to say:

"If any person employed by a local or other public authority wilfully breaks a contract of service with that authority, knowing or having reasonable cause to believe that the probable consequence of his so doing, either alone or in combination with others, will be to hinder or prevent the discharge of the functions of the authority, he shall be liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding ten pounds or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months."

RESTRAINT OF APPLICATION OF FUNDS OF TRADE UNIONS, ETC., IN CONTRAVENTION OF ACT

7. Without prejudice to the right of any person having a sufficient interest in the relief sought to sue or apply for an injunction to restrain any application of the funds of a trade union in contravention of the provisions of this act, such an injunction may be granted at the suit or upon the application of the Attorney General.

In the application of this section to Scotland there shall be substituted therein for references to an injunction references to an interdict, and for the reference to the Attorney General a reference to the Lord Advocate.

SHORT TITLE, CONSTRUCTION, INTERPRETATION, EXTENT, AND REPEAL

8. (1) This act may be cited as the Trade Unions and Trade Disputes Act, 1927, and shall be construed as one with the Trade Union Acts, 1871 to 1917, and this act and the Trade Union Acts, 1871 to 1917, may be cited together as the Trade Union Acts, 1871 to 1927.

(2) In this act the expression "strike" means the cessation of work by a body of persons employed acting in combination, or a concerted refusal, or a refusal under a common understanding of any number of persons who are, or have been employed, to continue to work or to accept employment.

(3) This act shall not extend to Northern Ireland.

(4) The enactments mentioned in the second schedule to this act are hereby repealed to the extent specified in the third column of that schedule.

SO THE "WHITE HOUSE SPOKESMAN" is dead—or is he merely dormant? We wonder. He can readily be resurrected and reincarnated. What happened at the biweekly conference at which Calvin Jekyll Coolidge announced the disappearance of his Dr. Hyde no one is supposed to know—it is a secret of state. Perhaps the President got tired of a deception which deceived only distant yokels. Perhaps it came to him that it is far more dignified and honest for the President of the United States to stand up and father any statement he may choose to make than to speak behind a lay figure of his own creating and to pretend that he did not say what his fictitious alter ego voiced. But the compelling motive is suppressed, and we only know that the Marine Corps band did not play at the funeral. There were, of course, apologists for the lamented Spokesman—apologists in the royal manner; for Mr. Coolidge can, as everyone knows, do no wrong. It was explained that the President must have the chance to inform the correspondents of the tone and temper of his policies without being held responsible for his every utterance. Very adroit, indeed, but not convincing. The press is not there to be the means of floating trial balloons and, for the sake of its own dignity and independence, it ought to receive no statement from any high official unless that statement is signed.

SENATOR NORRIS, in an interview in the Baltimore Sun, has come out flat-footedly against the renomination of President Coolidge for a third term. He is one of the many who feel that we should hold to the two-term tradition of the republic and he insists that the violation of that precedent will take us far along the road to a Mussolini or a king. The younger generation will hardly be as stirred as Senator Norris over this issue because this is a tradition-smashing age, and there is scant memory today of the feelings aroused by the third-term candidacies of President Grant and of Theodore Roosevelt. Whether one agrees with Senator Norris's views or not, we cannot see that Mr. Coolidge has a single claim to an honor which George Washington declined out of loyalty to his government, which was denied to every one of his successors. Especially valuable in this connection is Senator Norris's reminder that any President can force his own renomination if he or his representatives round up the corrupt Republican delegates from the Southern States, and use the Presidential patronage elsewhere. Actually the President is in the position of being able either to dictate his renomination or to name his successor, and his power has lately been enormously strengthened by the administration of the income tax. Senator Couzens is quoted by Frank R. Kent in the American Mercury for May as saying if you give him control of the internal-revenue office he will control the country. Herein lies the gravity of the situation to which Senator Norris calls attention. Anything that can be done to break the Presidential power of succession should be acclaimed by all Americans independent in politics.

RICHARD T. OULAHAN, of the New York Times, having announced on the authority of a member, or former member, of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, that the late President Harding was an imperialist at heart who intended to plant the American flag all the way from the Rio Grande to Panama, a chorus of indignant denials has arisen. Foremost among the defenders of the late President is Frank B. Kellogg. He is sure that nothing was further from Mr. Harding's thoughts. Well, for once, we are in agreement with the Secretary of State. We do not believe that so easy-going, amusement-loving, and kindly a man as President Harding lay awake wondering how soon he could hoist the Stars and Stripes over the City of Mexico and all the capitals to the south of us, or spent any of his waking hours planning a monstrous act of international aggression. Yet he was an imperialist, precisely as is President Coolidge. Both favored the doctrine that the flag follows every investor; both were ready to impose their will by force on the weaker nations; both were—and Mr. Coolidge still is—of the belief that the United States has a mandatory control of our Caribbean neighbors. If that policy is persisted in ruthlessly, it is only a question of time before the countries to the south of us are subjugated to precisely the degree which Mr. Oulahan says Mr. Harding desired—whether we hoist the flag or not. The newest technique is to lend money, then protect it with marines, then instal a puppet president—and thus obtain the benefits without the fuss of hoisting the flag.

DOES ANY BRIGHT BOY with a long memory recall that when American marines went ashore at Puerto Cabezas as a sort of Christmas present to Nicaragua, on December 24 last, President Coolidge assured the American people that we were not intervening and not participating in a political movement, but merely protecting American lives and property? It is a long way from Christmas to Mayday. Today our marines occupy the principal cities and ports as "neutral zones," in order to keep the Liberals from capturing them. Every day marines flying over the country in their bombing-planes are sniped at, and no one pretends that Diaz could hold office for an hour without American support. So thorough is American control that when Mr. Stimson, the President's observer in Nicaragua, decided that he really wanted to see representatives of the Liberal President, Sacasa, he sent for them on an American warship and gave them a safe conduct into the capital of their enemy! Mr. Stimson is reported to have evolved a "peace plan," which includes a new election under American auspices. If the Liberals win that election they could then begin paying the bills for the munitions with which Diaz fought them—bills conveniently post-dated by the Washington authorities so that payment becomes due immediately after the end of Diaz's term of office!

"GETS LIFE FOR TURNING KNOB"—thus a headline in a New York daily. One Gerardo Fonseco turned the door-knob of a room in the Hotel Navarre on January 24, and was caught in doing so. Turning a knob legally constitutes the crime of breaking and entering. Had the door been ajar, so that he could have entered the room without touching the knob, his act would have been a misdemeanor instead of a felony, and he would have received a sentence of not more than three years. "I must give you life imprisonment," said Judge Collins; "that is unfair, but it is prescribed by the law passed in the hysteria over a crime wave." What could be more uncivilized? Undoubtedly Fonseco's was a third offense; undoubtedly the criminal is likely to become an habitual one. But in this case he obtained nothing, subjected no one to injury, and at thirty-one he goes to prison for the rest of his life. Society washes its hands of him because it is too lazy, too stupid, too uninterested to take him in hand and rebuild him. In another case a Brooklyn judge, Mr. Martin, in accepting a plea of guilty of second-degree robbery from a boy seventeen years of age, whose mother died while he was a baby and whose father is an habitual drunkard, said to him:

> You are just a poor derelict. At a tender age, when loving arms ought to have been stretched to you, you have been kicked about, neglected, and uncared for. It is no wonder you finally have landed in a criminal court with a serious charge against you.

It would be "no justice at all," Judge Martin said, to sentence the boy without thought of the handicap under which he had spent the whole of his life. The boy may go to prison for fifteen years. Why should anyone care? Does anyone really feel, aside from this humane judge, that society should pay the penalty rather than the boy?

TEACHERS FROM THREE different parts of the country—Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, Minnesota—sent us articles last week. Each was an arraignment of the school system; each described the teacher's position as one which exacted impossible conditions from the incumbent and, because these conditions were impossible, nurtured deception as a matter of course. Sycophancy, conformity, piety; no smoking, drinking, swearing, dancing; no "radical" ideas; bed at ten o'clock or explain why; church every Sunday; no bad companions, which is to say, none suspected by the Board of Trustees. And the most interesting thing about each of these articles, and about similar articles that reach us regularly, is that each author says: "But you must not print my name. I would lose my job if it were printed."

JAMES R. NUGENT, the former New Jersey Democratic boss, whose death followed that of his old friend and associate, ex-Senator James Smith, by a month, was, like Mr. Smith, a good Democratic boss as long as he stuck to Woodrow Wilson and a very bad one when he came to oppose the Governor of New Jersey. That was one of the delightful things about Mr. Wilson; he simplified the commentator's task. If you were for Woodrow Wilson you were good; vice versa, and you were an enemy of your country. While the alliance between the two men lasted, Mr. Nugent admired Mr. Wilson profoundly; he always felt that Mr. Wilson soared to heights unobtainable by ordinary mortals. Nugent himself was far better than the average politician. College-trained, an able lawyer, who long paternally administered the affairs of the city of Newark with skill and unusual knowledge of the workings of a municipality, he made a distinct contribution to the government of that city. It was not easy to get him to come out for Mr. Wilson, but when he did he worked the future President hard and often persuaded him to speak by threatening, as James Kerney records in his "The Political Education of Woodrow Wilson," to make the speeches himself if Wilson did not. Nugent and Smith did their best to prevent Wilson's nomination for the Presidency and, as every one knows, they nearly succeeded. Yet when, after Mr. Wilson's death, it came to the raising of the New Jersey quota for the Woodrow Wilson Foundation, Nugent himself raised $6,000, a rare piece of magnanimity for a politician who had repeatedly been denounced and abused by Woodrow Wilson.

DEAN JOHN H. WIGMORE, of the Northwestern University Law School, has gone to war again. He wrote for the Boston Evening Transcript a letter attacking Felix Frankfurter's résumé of the Sacco-Vanzetti case as "dangerous," "neither fair nor accurate," "worthy only of unscrupulous yellow journalism," "consummate misrepresentation," "a gross libel and a cruel falsity," and suggesting that Mr. Frankfurter's work was inspired by the "sinister influences" of "the most extensive system of international terrorism that the world has known for a century past." Dean Wigmore writes with a fine passion and a resounding rhetoric; he is mad; he nowhere names Professor Frankfurter but always calls him "the plausible pundit."

UNFORTUNATELY FOR HIS REPUTATION, Dean Wigmore was consistently and almost incredibly wrong. Mr. Frankfurter replied:

> I say without fear of contradiction that Dean Wigmore could not have read with care the opinion of Judge Thayer, on which his own article is largely based, could not even have examined my little book, to which he refers as "a longer pamphlet publication" of my Atlantic article.

Mr. Frankfurter proceeds to show that statements are in the record which Dean Wigmore said were not there, and pointedly asks Dean Wigmore on what page of the record he found some of the statements which he said were there. The unfortunate dean seems to have assumed that Judge Thayer had quoted the record accurately, without bothering to check his references. Ellery Sedgwick's comment on the controversy was:

> The demonstrated inaccuracy of Dean Wigmore's facts seems at this pregnant moment singularly unfortunate. His contention follows Judge Thayer's expressed opinions with such devotion, and his lack of information regarding the official record of the case is so marked that only confidence in the scrupulous fidelity of the judiciary to the tradition that a judge shall confine his influence to the court-room prevents all suspicion as to the prime source of Dean Wigmore's information.

So far as we know, Dean Wigmore has not yet apologized or resigned as unfit to be dean of a school of law.

SACCO AND VANZETTI may be disturbing Massachusetts, but that great State progresses none the less. The legislature has passed, and the Governor approved, a bill establishing a standard for ice-cream and regulating its manufacture. There seems not to have been a dissenting voice. All Massachusetts is for bigger and better ice-cream cones. So far as we are aware no voice of conservatism is roused to declare that this was an infringement of the personal liberty and the inborn right of the manufacturers to create and to sell as poor and unsanitary ice-cream as they see fit. Heretofore, of course, there have been municipal enactments to protect America's favorite dessert, but that was not enough. Ice-cream is something too directly and too intimately connected with the life of every American citizen to make it possible to intrust its regulation and supervision to local authority, which might or might not act. So Governor Fuller, by attaching his signature to the bill, has come to the rescue of childhood in particular, but of the adults of his State as well. We trust that "Al" Smith will take note of this epoch-making event. Let him put a plank in his platform for pure five-cent nationally regulated ice-cream, and he will sweep the country.

ENGLAND, LIKE JOHN ROACH STRATON, is worried about the evil influence of American movies. British stolidity seems to have been dizzied by the swirl of jazz. British moralists deplore the lure of American amusements for the youth of England, British statesmen squirm at the growing preference for things American, and British film industries find it impossible to survive in the face of American competition. Hence the new patriotic Film Bill, which provides a quota plan for the compulsory showing of British films. This bill has the support of Premier Stanley Baldwin, who feels the danger of American influence not only in movies, but in jazz music, the Charleston, and in another dance which the poor man says "I cannot bring myself to name." Meanwhile, behind the safe barrier of this Film Bill, canny British business men are hoping to revive an industry which has been dying through its own incompetence—and, as far as one can discover, their chief program is to naturalize the custard pie and other Hollywood horrors. It is the old story of the protective tariff, with only the stage disguise of a yearning to safeguard public morals.

Sabotaging America?

JOHN VAN ANTWERP MACMURRAY, United States Minister to China, Frank P. Lockhart, United States Consul General at Hankow, and Admirals Hough and Williams on the Yangtze River act as if they were engaged in a conspiracy to sabotage Washington's effort to keep out of too entangling alliances in China. They want us to join with Britain and the other Powers in an ultimatum-and-gunboat policy. They want to deliver a note to the Hankow Government, giving it forty-eight hours to sign on the dotted line, and to blockade the whole Yangtze River region if it refuses to comply. They have told the newspaper correspondents and their British friends where they stand, and the result is, of course, a howl of protest from China.

Obviously, a diplomatic or naval official has a right to his own views. We would not deny him the right to express them, to his Government and even—in ordinary times—elsewhere. But when a man whose salary is paid by the people of the United States devotes his time not merely to attempting to convince his Government of its error, but to public propaganda and official action contrary to its policy, he belongs in another category. Ambassador Page used his official position in London in an effort to sabotage the Wilson policy in the early years of the war; and most people today agree that his course was shocking if not actually treacherous, however sincerely he believed in it.

There is, of course, the sinister possibility that Washington is speaking one language to the American people, and another in private dispatches to its representatives on the scene of action. President Coolidge told the American people that he regarded Hankow's reply on the Nanking incident as "conciliatory and to a certain extent responsive"; Mr. MacMurray, while instructed not to join with the other Powers, is reported preparing another note of protest. Meanwhile the admirals act as if in alliance with the British. American warships convoy British merchant ships up and down the Yangtze; American troops in China act not only in cooperation with the British but on occasion under command of British senior officers. Is this local insubordination, or has Washington a double face?

Mr. Thomas Steep cables to the New York Herald Tribune that while the United States has only 6,000 troops at Shanghai, compared with 21,000 British, we have more airplanes than they and twice as many trucks. Our 16,000 tons of equipment, including guns and ammunition, he says, exceeds that of the British. What is it all there for? We have even sent, California papers assure us, a shipload of coffins, as part of our extraordinary preparedness. The friendly missionaries have been instructed to abandon their posts, and only a handful of hostile business men remain above Shanghai. There are as many American troops in China today as American civilians—and more are arriving every day. For protection only?

A frightened little foreign community in Shanghai seems to be stampeding half the world. Many Americans on the spot have succumbed to the panic; the American Chamber of Commerce has even ousted the brave American editor, J. B. Powell, who objected to the provocative policy of Shanghai's Municipal Council. But the American people as a whole, it is plainer every day, do not want to be drawn into intervention. Will Washington not heed them, and put a check-rein on the hotheads in China?

Mississippi—Father of Waters

IF it were not for the floods there would be no Mississippi Valley. Those rich bottom-lands from which the pitiful stories come were laid there by the river. The whole delta is a product of torrential floods, carrying down the sand and silt of the uplands and depositing them closer to the Gulf. The river which takes away has also given; it is not only the Father of Waters but the Father of Lands. All that the valley is or does is of the river's making.

New Orleans built its first levees in 1717. In Audubon's day, a century later, the levees reached north to the mouth of the Red River. Today the vast system of dikes is almost comparable to the Great Wall of China; its double length, on the two sides of the river, would provide a dam crossing the United States from New York to Los Angeles, and starting back again. But they are not, they never have been, they never will be high enough. There was a great flood in 1785, a greater one in 1828, and greater floods still in the forties. The record of the river stages at Cairo, Illinois, where the Ohio pours its vast burden of water into the Mississippi, read 49.53 feet in the unprecedented flood of 1858; it topped that mark in 1862, went higher still in 1867, set new marks in 1882, 1883, 1897, 1912, 1913, 1922; and this year's flood, with its high stage close to 56, marks the highest water in the history of the mighty river. As Mr. Parker's article, elsewhere in this issue of The Nation, shows, the levees, reducing the width of the available channel, seem progressively to increase the flood danger against which they are supposed to guard.

We are face to face here with forces of nature which make man seem a puny, helpless thing. China has struggled for four thousand years to guard her fields against the ravages of the Yellow River, "the Curse of China," in vain, and all our vaunted engineering progress has not sufficed to harness these waters. Sixty years ago the Yellow River calmly shifted its course and poured into the sea two hundred miles north of its ancient mouth. The Mississippi has been less fitful, but scarcely less destructive. It has been reshaping its course for millenniums. The original site of Hard Times, Louisiana, is now in Mississippi—the river, in one of its capricious moods, moved its course a few miles west. Scores of once prosperous riverside towns for decades have sat in silence with miles of hard ground, newly deposited, between them and their river. Mark Twain reckoned, fifty years ago, that the Mississippi, breaking through its own meanders, had reduced its length between Cairo and New Orleans from 1,215 to 973 miles in 176 years. Since his day government efforts have tended to keep the river in its old channel, but even today there is no engineer who can calculate with certainty when a levee will yield or what a dynamited crevasse may mean.

Mark Twain was on board the first ship to attempt one of the Mississippi's new channels and he gives a vivid picture of the birth of a cut-off:

> When the water begins to flow through one of those ditches it is time for the people thereabouts to move. The water cleaves the banks away like a knife. By the time the ditch has become twelve or fifteen feet wide the calamity is as good as accomplished, for no power on earth can stop it now. When the width has reached a hundred yards, the banks begin to peel off in slices half an acre wide.

In the great flood of 1882 Mark Twain went up-river in one of the relief boats. The river, between Fort Adams on the left bank and Rapides Parish on the right, flowed sixty miles wide; its normal course could only be guessed by the lines of tree-tops barely rising out of the water. People were living on rafts tied to these tree-tops, or were gathered on the Indian mounds which are havens of refuge again today. Some who had moored their cattle on huge rafts paddled about in canoes, stripping the trees of leaves to feed their stock.

"Someone's house passed through Memphis today, bound for the Gulf of Mexico," a reporter noted this year. Mark Twain too noted the barns, the hen-houses, the neatly split fence rails floating down the devastating river—and the lithograph of a soldier on horseback, mute witness of some hearth invaded and despoiled. John James Audubon saw a more primitive Lower Mississippi:

> All is silent and melancholy [he wrote], unless when the mournful bleating of a hemmed-in deer reaches your ear, or the dismal scream of an eagle or a raven is heard, as the foul bird rises, disturbed by your approach, from the carcass on which it was allaying its craving appetite. Bears, cougars, lynxes, and all other quadrupeds that can ascend the trees are observed crouched among their top branches. Hungry in the midst of abundance, although they see floating about them the animals on which they usually prey, they dare not venture to swim to them.

Audubon tells of seeing a cow swim through the second-story window of a house, seven feet from the ground and sixty-two feet above the normal level of the Ohio River, in the great flood of 1828.

But the floods of Audubon's day and of Mark Twain's were small compared to the disaster which has overtaken the valley States in 1927. More people dwell on the bottom-lands today, and there is more water on the rampage. Already ten million acres are flooded; the damage may be more than a billion dollars; a hundred and fifty people are dead, and 200,000 are refugees from their homes. There is worse to come. Secretary Hoover watched the waters pouring with their terrific silent mass past Memphis, and calculated that then, when the floodtide had not yet been reached, ten times the volume of water which pours over Niagara at its fullest was rushing by.

How vast the damage will be when the full flood-tide reaches the Lower Delta no man yet knows. But we know enough already. We stand face to face with one of those awful cataclysms of nature which overwhelm the calculations and responsibilities of men. We must, and soon, face the problem of flood control as this country has never faced it before. We shall need the best engineering advice obtainable; we may have to give back to the river reservoir-lands which had been reclaimed for cultivation; we may need long-range programs of reforestation. But in the immediate present we have the emergency problem of relief. We gave in war time; we gave for the Russian famine and the Japanese earthquake. Perhaps we are a little tired and cynical today. Collections lagged when the President called for a first $5,000,000, and now he asks $10,000,000 for the Red Cross. Surely whatever is needed will be poured forth.

Translated Literature

THE steps by which the literature of one country becomes available to the readers of another must always be more or less random and blundering. Europe's choice of American books is difficult for Americans to understand, and the European has much to complain of when he considers which of his native authors we seem to prefer. Often, to be sure, our preferences are merely seeming—we can choose only among those books which get translated, and the accidents governing translation are many. Translators cannot be found for books we ought to know, payment for the arduous task being proverbially small; or publishers cannot be convinced that the enterprise will pay; or the books do get translated and published, only to meet with the cold eye of a country which has no basis in emotional or intellectual experience for understanding the medium out of which the writers speak. It is all as uncertain as the question whether in any country at any time its best native literary talent is discovered or encouraged.

Still we do pretty well; a glance over the announcements of the present season reveals the fact that we are getting a goodly number of important and interesting books from abroad. Out of the list of Notable Spring Books printed in the recent book number of The Nation one can extract a special list of fifty translations from the French, the German, the Russian, the Scandinavian, the Italian, the Dutch, the Chinese, and the Japanese which, if it is not a list truly representative of those literatures, is yet a list of distinguished works in many fields. Of 50 titles thus examined we observe that 19 are French—the largest number contributed by any nationality. Germany comes next with 13, Russia follows with 9, the Scandinavian countries with 4, Italy with 2, China with 1, Japan with 1, and Holland with 1. Fiction predominates as a type, but literary criticism and biography come not far after, with history and politics close behind. It is perhaps unnecessary to remark that The Nation's list did not include titles of technical works in the various departments of scholarship; and it is not claimed that the list was a perfect one within any limits.

We should say that the most striking contribution of the season was made by the French in the department of literary criticism. Paul Valéry's "Variety," Ramon Fernandez's "Messages," and Pierre-Quint's "Marcel Proust" are all works of the first importance, and each of them was overdue. The last of the three, incidentally, contains most of the details which a foreigner would want to have concerning the most singular literary life of the twentieth century—details which are almost necessary for an understanding of the endless masterpiece which Proust remembered out of his lost years. But France also sends another volume of Romain Rolland's new great novel, "The Soul Enchanted"; and Germany with Thomas Mann's "The Magic Mountain," Russia with Gorki's "Decadence," Norway with the third member of Sigrid Undset's brilliant trilogy, and Japan with one more volume of "The Tale of Genji" in the flawless English of Arthur Waley help to distinguish the spring output of fiction. In the firmament of biography there is, of course, the bright star of Emil Ludwig, whose long but very rapid and readable books on the Kaiser and Napoleon come to us this year after an easily comprehensible success in Germany.

Albert J. Beveridge

"THE boy orator" they called him when he was chosen to the United States Senate at thirty-seven, and in some respects the title fitted Albert Beveridge. A plow-boy at twelve years and a logger and teamster at fifteen, he was gifted with unusual eloquence. But he did not at first always think his dicta through. Indeed, within him the progressive and the conservative fought at all times; at times one was uppermost, then the other. During the Roosevelt days he was Progressive to the backbone and in his latter years he supported Coolidge, in his opinions the antithesis of the Roosevelt who went down to defeat at the Armageddon of 1912. Because he was not clear-cut enough, Mr. Beveridge lost his last race for the Senate in 1922, a year when other Progressives won easily. None the less, the failure of Indiana to return Mr. Beveridge to his seat—especially when, four years later, it reelected the incredible James E. Watson—was regrettable enough. There were certain issues which he saw correctly; at all points he had matured. On foreign questions he was sound and far-reaching. He even honorably earned the epithet pro-German because he went to Europe in the early days of the war and viewed events beyond seas without putting on the spectacles of hate and fear and ignorance worn by most American observers. He kept his head then, and so did he in dealing with after-the-war problems.

As to these he had incisive opinions and let who would know them. He opposed the Treaty of Versailles and the League of Nations and clearly understood why Europe failed to recover its economic and spiritual health as quickly as it should have. Again, he spoke out fearlessly upon the domestic attacks on our ancient liberties; he believed that constitutional guaranties were guaranties and meant what they said. Yet, when it came to a choice between the Progressivism of La Follette and the reaction of Coolidge he chose the latter, and only recently he expressed himself as favoring the reelection of the President to a third term.

In his later years Mr. Beveridge turned with greatest satisfaction to the historical field, in which he won such deserved honors by his "Life of John Marshall." Made somewhat difficult by its heavy style, it yet won as wide acclaim as any historical work of recent years. The Pulitzer Prize was but one of the many deserved honors bestowed upon its author. That he could not live to complete the similarly monumental work upon Lincoln, upon which he had for years been engaged, is more than a personal tragedy; it makes his death a doubly profound loss to the whole world of history and of letters. For there exists no such life of the Emancipator as his was sure to be. The deeper he delved into his materials, the more he probed into unpublished data, the more convinced he was—like many another historian—that the true Lincoln, the politician and statesman, is yet to be portrayed; that some of the standard works are as determined to exalt their subject unduly as was Sparks when he wrote his life of Washington. It will be impossible to find anyone else so peculiarly fitted to complete this work. To his great knowledge of public affairs at home and abroad, his historical talent and oratorical ability, there were added a breath of view and a personal charm that made Mr. Beveridge the warm friend of political opponents as well as allies.

On account of the intellectual and literary gag-laws of Massachusetts Harvard University will shortly move shop and transfer its activities to Dayton, Tennessee.

Curbing the Mississippi

By WALTER PARKER

THE federal government's "levees-only" or "confinement-only" policy of flood control, developed and adhered to for forty-eight years by the Mississippi River Commission, has gone bankrupt. The levees are almost completed to the full size approved by the commission. Yet, were they all built to that size, without a single low spot, and were they all to hold, the 1927 flood in the Mississippi River would go over the top of every one of them.

Floods occurred in the Mississippi Valley before 1879. But those early floods spread out over the bottom lands which, to the extent of thousands of square miles, acted as natural reservoirs. At that time there were many auxiliary outlets, as far up as Arkansas City. In time of flood, relief came to the overcharged river through these outlets which led by shorter routes to the Gulf. The forests along the source streams and the grass mat under them made the ground porous. The trees themselves consumed much water. Here and there towns and plantations were protected by levees which today would be considered inadequate.

Congress, appealed to for safety measures, in 1879 created a Mississippi River Commission to develop a comprehensive plan for flood control. The plan when completed was known as the "levees-only" or "confinement-only" plan. It proposed to close all the outlets of the Mississippi except the passes at the mouth of the river, and to build a solid line of levees from the head of the passes to Cairo. It included no relief works of any kind—just confinement between earth dikes.

That the forests were being cut from the watershed, that low places were being drained, marshes and lakes destroyed, sewerage systems installed, drainage run-off hastened in every way throughout the drainage basin—these facts were not taken account of in the plan. The planters and townsfolk knew nothing about source-stream control; they were told that by closing the auxiliary outlets the river itself would bore a channel large enough to take care of any floods that might come down. The idea of relief in the lower valley through controlled spillways was not entertained.

To keep the flood drainage of one set of States off the farms and towns of other States was not openly talked of. Originally some 30,000 square miles of natural reservoirs existed in the Mississippi Valley. Of these some 27,000 square miles have been partially reclaimed by levees, largely at the expense of the federal government. One effect of this reclamation throughout the upper half of the Lower Mississippi Valley has been to throw a greatly increased flood burden on the long-cultivated lands of the lower half of the lower valley. Thus the process which enriched the Northern landowner has resulted in the destruction of many valuable Southern plantations.

For a long time Congress appropriated meager sums for levee-building and bank-revetment work for the purpose of improving navigation. Meanwhile, political levee boards, with local taxing powers, in the States of Tennessee, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana began to name Congressmen and Senators. These boards needed help from the federal government in their efforts to build their levees higher and wider to take care of the flood levels, which increased as the levee lines were extended.

In 1912 a great flood swept over Bolivar County in Mississippi, and for the first time organized opposition to "levees only" developed. But the Mississippi River Commission, the political levee boards, and the "levees-only" politicians decided to demand $10,000,000 annually from Congress for five years, against which the localities would match $5,000,000 with which to build the levees higher and wider. Congress was told that if this fund were provided the levees would all be raised to the Mississippi River Commission standard and that thereafter the valley would be safe from floods.

But the "levees-only" advocates found that a strong opposition party had grown up in Congress, and that this new group, while advocating liberal sums for levee-building and bank-revetment, insisted that through a Congressional act provision be made for the development of a broader and more effective plan of flood control. To this end they proposed a bill creating a commission to make a comprehensive study of all drainage basins and to bring forward a plan providing for the use of the water resources of the United States for beneficial purposes—irrigation, navigation, power—in place of their waste in destructive floods; for relief by spillways and other works; and for the creation of adequate levees and bank protection to keep the remainder of the interstate drainage off the lands that were to be protected.

In 1917 the "levees-only" members, under pressure, agreed to vote for the constructive measure in exchange for votes for the "levees-only" fund of $10,000,000 a year for five years. Both bills passed, the constructive measure as Section 18 of the Rivers and Harbors Bill of 1917, carrying an appropriation of $250,000 for investigation and report. Unfortunately, in that year the chief proponent of the measure, Senator Francis G. Newlands, died, and in 1919 the "levees-only" people, who had their big appropriation, brought about the repeal of Section 18.

Another great flood came down the Mississippi in 1922 and broke all previous high-water marks. In 1912 the Cypress Creek outlet into the Tensas Basin, near Arkansas City, had relieved the Mississippi River of some 300,000 cubic feet of water per second, confirmed by a measurement in 1916. After the flood of that year the outlet was closed. Denied that relief, and encountering stronger levee resistance, the 1922 flood climbed higher than did the 1912 flood. Again the levees broke.

And again the advocates of the "levees-only" plan went to Congress for another appropriation of $10,000,000 a year for six years. They said: "The 1922 flood has forced a change in levee construction. More yardage is required. The levees must be higher and larger than we calculated when we came here before." Congress gave them the additional money.

Part of the money was used to close five of the eight miles of outlet from the Mississippi into the Atchafalaya River in Louisiana. In 1912 and again in 1922 that outlet had relieved the Mississippi of some 400,000 cubic feet of water per second at the crest of the flood, and sent it direct to the Gulf by a shorter route than down the Mississippi. (How important such relief is, is shown by the fact that only 280,000 cubic feet per second pass over Niagara Falls.)

And now, with the greatest flood on record, there is no outlet at Cypress Creek and only a partial outlet into the Atchafalaya. The levees are higher and wider than ever before. Less natural reservoir capacity remains available to the great river. So there is nothing left for the Father of Waters, called upon to carry more flood drainage than can be contained between the earthen levee lines, but to climb higher and higher until broken levees give it relief.

The effect of the 1927 flood will be to convince the people of the valley that "levees only" cannot protect them from great floods; that levees plus controlled spillways are essential on the southern half of the river, and that levees plus source-stream control must be relied on north of Vicksburg. The first need is competent engineering investigation. The Newlands-O'Connor Bill (H. R. 5025), providing for a commission including the Secretaries of War, Agriculture, and the Interior, and competent engineers would have helped solve the problem; it should be passed at the next Congress.

In spite of the disastrous failure of their policy as demonstrated in the present flood there is small doubt that the next move of the "levees-only" politician will be to ask for more federal money with which to build the levees higher and wider than before.

These Modern Women

Free—For What?

ANONYMOUS

[We print herewith the fourteenth of a series of anonymous articles giving the personal backgrounds of a group of distinguished women with a modern point of view. The next article will appear in The Nation for May 25.]

I WAS born in a British colony and transported early to the Middle Western part of the United States, where I have lived most of four decades. My witty, well-educated, clerical father moved his family frequently from one home mission field to another to the joy of his gipsyish offspring and the distress of his wife, who wished to settle and rear their large family where good schools and gracious people were. We had to restrain the baby from saying in public: "Papa, I want to move again. When are we going to move?"

The philosophy of family life as enunciated by my father ran something like this: Because we were superior people—just why I did not know—we must behave extremely well. We must get the best grades in school, we must be mannerly and well informed, we must, while on duty as clergyman's children, conceal the spirits that were endured —and sometimes enjoyed and fostered—at home. Some important things to know were: Only badly informed persons believed in a protective tariff. Parnell was magnificent and when he fell the world was set back fifty years. Woman suffrage was right and girls were as clever as boys, but they must prove it. Prohibition probably never would come but one should work for it, and the saloon was evil. Europe —Sweden especially—managed the liquor question better. People who believed in the millennium were asses. The plutocracy of the United States is far more dangerous, as time will show, than is the aristocracy of Europe. Americans are fine hospitable people who have not read history or studied logic. One must learn to argue, and if worsted must not lose one's temper or cry.

My mother bore too many children. Her daughters were fairly well treated, but she was too Christianly submissive. She did not have the joy in battle that most of her offspring had. Her children were always fiercely her partisans but grew to think her troubles were of her own making, though inescapably so.

My mother was a pretty literal Christian. She grieved when we told lies. She talked to us about turning the other cheek and sometimes for love of her we tried this experiment. Once I asked her if I could ever be beautiful like my lovely sister, and she said I could not because my eyes, my hair, my skin could never equal Jane's. I could, however, be remarkable for goodness. I tried for twenty-four hours to practice this awful goodness in which you search your wicked heart for evil thoughts. I wound up by throwing a fork at a brother and rejoicing that it stood up on his coat shoulder with the prongs in the cloth, maybe even in him. I was completely done with such goodness. In order that we might look well-dressed mother turned, dyed, remade, and ornamented clothes for years. We did not, as mother would have, tell inquisitive people, a clergyman's affairs being everybody's business, that our aunts sent us clothing, blankets, table linen. Instead, my sister and I would reply to questions with a succession of contradictory fibs and titter, "One of the answers is true. Guess which."

Because we never remained long in one place we escaped much conformity. We enjoyed the histrionic aspect of our lives. Clergymen and their families can never be as righteous as they are supposed to be. When my father peevishly went back on his principles and treated us unjustly, we told him he was a hypocrite; but when he attempted for the sixth time to give up his secret smoking his children urged him not to do this.

There was often excellent talk at home. The educated and freethinking men and women of the community frequented our place. My father argued on all sides of every subject. Usually, we had the best library in the small towns in which we lived. The village atheist and my father had a covert fondness for each other. I still wonder why this skeptical, able man was not more ambitious. Why was he content to be a home missionary, wasting his energies on the aid society, the choir, the missionary society? It may have been an Old World delight in leisure, in freedom to read and to meditate. Maybe he was one of the thousands of seeming misfits in life, whose misplacement was heightened by a dependence upon the Lord, which is only a disguise for laziness. He had not always been lazy. He had left Ireland when twelve years old and had earned his way by teaching through Knox College in Toronto and through Princeton in the United States. He had felt "called" to home missionary work and it seemed to me had failed to do much for himself or for others in it.

Much that was joyous in life we early learned must be arrived at deviously. Every congregation had its cranks who supped at our house and aired their theories. The godly might not dance, flirt, or play cards. Did my parents know that I read George Eliot, an author who was a disreputable woman, such a guest inquired one night. Horror made my food tasteless. My father said he did not disapprove of this reading although he had not known of it. After supper he would read to the guest some pages showing her how moralistic this author was. I had to kneel and endure the indecency of hearing my brother prayed over by a caller who had come to complain that Duncan had fought when "preacher's son" was called after him in a new school. After the sudden death of this brother my father no longer asked his other sons not to defend themselves.

We children became adepts at selecting our kind in each new town into which we moved. Our kind were the lively and loyal, whose environment was like ours or who could be counted on to join us in concealing a common guilt. We fetched treasures with us which made for popularity—a strangely marked cat, a tailless hen, white mice, a lame dog, a canary, and seven and finally eight of ourselves. Sometimes while paint was drying in the parsonage we were distributed as guests in various homes. When we foregathered again my second brother had the nucleus of his gang, my pretty sister her following, and I, the oldest, had learned who were the unco guid and who might be fellow-sinners.

Because I must not dance the dances that I went to can never be equaled on this side of paradise. Once after choir practice the beau whom my mother most approved called to get my raincoat and to tell her that I was spending the night with Mary Cleveland, an elder's daughter. I did go, but not until 4 a.m., after a dance, and I woke jerkily at intervals to wonder what would happen should a pillar in the church tell my father on me.

I read much. I perceived hypocrisy speedily and despised all but my own practices of it. I did my duty by the Sunday school, the Christian Endeavor Society, and prayer meeting because I tacitly admitted that these were my jobs and not bad ones when embroidered with sociability. I learned not to repeat my father's remarks after observing his handsome apology occasioned by my babbling. He had made, he confessed, the remarks about Mrs. Jordan's purple hat and triple chins. It was not Christ-like and it was ungentlemanly. He asked her pardon for this and hoped she would blame him entirely and not his little daughter, who had told only the truth. He walked into his study after the episode without reproaching me and left me stricken with shame and moved to my depths with admiration. For weeks I did not say he was a hypocrite.

When I finished high school at sixteen there was no money to send me to college, so I taught a country school and met with what I then thought a burning injustice. This was supposed to be a difficult school and the directors doubted if a woman could manage it. The sons of two of these trustees jumped out of a window when kept after school for some disobedience. My discipline was wrecked if I could not dominate the situation. After the morning exercises I sent the two muscular young corn-huskers to get a switch. They brought a proper one, but the more knavish boy would not, for half an hour, let me punish him. Everyone knew that, strong young tomboy that I was, I could not thrash him unless he would consent. I conquered him by sticking to the project until he gave up and agreed that he was in the wrong. I punished him hard, and then more lightly hurt his disciple. I was sick at heart about it all day because I had played pull away and other games with these boys daily, and their folly was mere boyish bravado. However, there was no doubt in anyone's mind that this affair was intended to try me out. The farmer at whose house I boarded had told me, what I sensed myself, that I must win in the struggle or resign. The next day, a peaceful one, the three farmer directors stalked majestically into the schoolroom. After the pupils left, the father of the more stubborn boy scolded me for whipping his son. He conceded grudgingly that the boy should not disobey and that he should be punished, but he growled sullenly that I should not have done it. I was amazed to hear myself saying passionately: "You talk to me like this because I am a woman. A man would knock you down." My three guests filed mutely out. The director could not endure the laughter that followed the story as embellished by his associates and he resigned.

Later I went to one of the dismal normal schools that flourished throughout the country twenty years ago. I had read more widely than most of my instructors. The "bunk" in education bored me. Twittering about squirrels and birds, sentimentalizing over flowers, being sweet over nothing—this was nature study. I worked at mathematics and Latin and helped my fellow-students creep out of the dormitory. I did not myself steal out because it was not exciting enough in comparison with the life of intrigue against social pressure that I always led. One dormitory head was not nearly so hard to manage as were the several persons I had always heretofore needed to build defenses against.

When, at last a responsible person, I was teaching school away from home, life was less zestful and thrilling than in my parents' house. Here were no rules to break. I played cards gladly for one winter and have since then found them boresome. Dancing and flirting charmed me then and do still, but then as now I regarded them as trifles, not essentials. I was unmotivated and, except when I worked and played myself weary, a little unhappy. What was life for? Where was beauty? Where significance? I wanted children, but not marriage. I wanted men about me who were like my father, but more patient. I attract and like rascals, but villainy is not enough.

I taught for a while in the State Normal School from which I had graduated. The head of the English department got $1,500 a year for teaching two classes, while I got $900 for teaching four. He read, he boasted, nothing since Carlyle and Emerson. Between classes he raised pigs, played politics, grew rich. I liked Meredith, Henry James, Ibsen, Shaw, and wanted to stir student minds with them, but I had too little influence against my chief's inertia, partly because I was a young woman, and partly because I had no degree. Presumably more education would mean more salary, too. I hied me to college, after borrowing money from a stranger.

Life at the reputedly heretical university that I chose was useful. Sociology met needs in my mental make-up. Service as interpreted by sociology had meaning for me that organized religion never had. Suffrage enthusiasm was pleasing to me, but only the enthusiasm was unusual. I belonged at sight to all the liberal thought in the atmosphere.

I observed girls getting with delight what I had been brought up on. Sex, which we read about, talked about, studied about, was absorbing, but the frank and sensible modern reaction to it was not startling to me. I was indignant when my attitude toward it shocked listeners.

I returned to teaching and to social work with a purposefulness that I had not before had. Joining the Women's Trade Union League and the Teachers' Union brought me into touch with organized labor. This contact has captivated and held me. Like everything else that I have gone in for it is not enough, but I can find nothing better or more fundamental in our national life to which I can be attached.

I have run for office unsuccessfully on a progressive ticket. I am used to being punished for being a woman, a progressive, a scientifically minded educator, and, most of all, a person aware of corruption and graft.

I feel no need for more freedom, but I want a world in which the freedom I now have can be used. We women are free, but free for what? I move from disillusionment to fresh illusions. To be free makes life what it has always been, enticing. But my adventurous and questing mind was never so thwarted as it has been since I got my citizenship. The industrial and political world is in hands like mine today. Are we, while I live, going to get courage and wisdom to match our freedom? I am hopeful that we shall, but I suspect that I shall be disappointed as usual.

The Collapse of the Needle Trades

By BENJAMIN STOLBERG

3. The Luck that Goes with Brains

"OUR organization is stronger at this moment than ever before," President Sidney Hillman of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers informed me with an air of finality. This is fundamentally true, in spite of much gossip to the contrary in the other progressive needle trades. The indubitable recovery of the union from its somewhat run-down condition between 1920 and 1925 is due to three factors—to its inheritance, to the nature of its industry, and to the tactical genius of Sidney Hillman.

The Amalgamated split from the United Garment Workers in 1914, with the bulk of its membership. This split was not fundamentally along lines of economic and social radicalism. The rank and file objected to the Rickert machine in the United Garment Workers because it offered no protection and was incapable of organizing the vast unorganized market. By and large, the original Amalgamated membership, with the exception of the Jewish New York tailors, was a typical "pure and simple" trade-union constituency. From the very beginning the Amalgamated leadership has been in the vanguard of its rank and file.

Hillman was one of the original leaders in the Hart Schaffner and Marx strike of 1910. He is a member of Chicago Local 39. And Chicago is the strategic base of the union, for Chicago is the market of the largest and hence most controllable factories. Following the formation of the Amalgamated, Hillman spent a great deal of time perfecting the Chicago organization. It is the strongest section in the union. It sustained the New York organization during the great lockouts of 1918-1919 and 1920-1921. It supplies much of the sinews of war in most strikes.

It is fashionable to praise Sidney Hillman for his successful cooperation with the employers in the industry. Nothing could be further from the truth. The Amalgamated has conducted more strikes in a briefer period than any other union in America. Hillman does not cooperate with the employers, but with the economics of the men's clothing industry, of which the employers are a part. The central policy of the Amalgamated is to organize the unorganized shops, a strategy in which it has engaged without the slightest let-up since its foundation. Every other policy is subservient to this practical ideal of achieving a national closed-union market. In 1925 the Amalgamated conducted a costly strike at the Curlee shop in St. Louis, partly because the non-union St. Louis territory is dangerous to the organized Chicago field. It is because the Amalgamated conducts strikes with an eye to the correct economic direction of the industry as a whole that its strikes never deteriorate into dog fights, but are in the nature of clean-cut, scientific surgical performances. Like all great fighters Hillman is quite ruthless, though he seldom stoops to conquer, simply because stooping is not the way of permanent conquest. Of course, when the employer uses gangsters, Hillman does not send him tracts on tolerance. The Amalgamated when it strikes an employer tends to paralyze him. It lost the Curlee strike, but it weakened the Curlee shop for later attack. In the strike against the International Tailoring Company it was the Amalgamated which supplied the factory with "scabs" and tore into it with such fine frenzy that the management simply had to give in. The whole program of the Amalgamated is to extend its organization and then to improve the economics of the industry, which it constantly studies. It never makes demands on the employer which he cannot meet.

Hillman's attitude toward factional struggles within the union is equally anti-opportunistic and realistic. He cares nothing, and he is shrewd enough to be honest about it, for the political beliefs of an Amalgamated member, who may be an anarchist, a Coolidge Republican, a Fascist, or a "Leninist." The member must be "responsible" in his relations with the union. The administration is strictly centrist; it is not in the dangerous center between the anvil of reaction and the hammer of radicalism. It is neutral because the American industrial scene demands of an economic organization a strict economic program. And such a program, consistently devoted to swift combat with industrial forces, naturally tends to liquidate political factionalism.

This policy of realism, both in facing the economics of the industry and political factionalism within, has enabled the Amalgamated to arrest the disintegrating factors in the industry which set in after the 1920-1921 lockout in New York City and lasted until after the settlement of the International Tailoring Company strike; and to stamp out the Left-Right war which raged from 1922 to 1925, especially in New York City.

On the whole, the men's clothing industry is still an "inside shop" industry. Men's styles seldom change. In the women's wear industry, the cloak- and skirtmaker who can start a submanufacturing hole-in-the-wall on $500 credit is a congenital enterpreneur, constantly in and out of the union. But the men's clothing tailor is a fairly static type, even though his skill also has been largely taken away through sectionalization of industrial processes. It takes thousands of dollars to open even a small men's clothing shop.

Hence, in the men's clothing industry the tendency, so marked in the women's garment trade, of the big "inside shop" to regress into the sweatshop has not been an important disruptive factor. The New York market is still infested with small contractors of coats, pants, and vests. But they are the heritage of the old sweatshop days. The lockout of 1920-1921, which the union won, left the New York industry in a badly crippled state. Much of the local business went to other centers. It left the union with lessened control. The machinery of collective bargaining disintegrated completely. And the manufacturers began using contractors indiscriminately. The Amalgamated tried to force the registration of the contractors with the manufacturer; but it was only after the walk-out of 40,000 workers in 1922 that the union succeeded in making the manufacturer responsible for his contractors.

From 1921 to 1925 there was also a tendency on the part of the more troublesome employers to leave the great organized clothing cities for unorganized centers or to maintain satellite scab centers. The Communist attack on the International Ladies' Garment Workers began soon after the organization of the Trade Union Educational League in 1922. But the Amalgamated leadership was so obviously on the left of its own rank and file that the Communists did not dare attack it, until the growing industrial confusion in the New York market encouraged them to make the attempt. Following the participation of the Amalgamated in the 1924 Cleveland Conference for Progressive Political Action, which indorsed the La Follette campaign, and after the Communist-controlled Joint Action Committee had captured the cloakmakers' joint board of the Ladies' Garment Workers Union in New York, this same committee turned against the union administration. The Freiheit and the Forward jumped into the fray and the Right-Left struggle was projected into the Amalgamated as bitterly as in the other progressive needle trades. The gains of the strike during the summer of 1924 were squandered through bitter factionalism. During the strike against the International Tailoring Company in 1925 the Communists definitely sabotaged the administration. Factional demoralization was beginning to spread to other centers, though it could not break through the strong Chicago organization. The Joint Action Committee, practically in control of the men's clothing Joint Board, began to approach the employers as the legitimate union organization and even collected funds from the membership.

Finally, the general executive of the Amalgamated decided to act. The children's and men's clothing workers had operated through separate joint boards which led to industrial confusion and so encouraged factionalism. The two boards were merged. The executive board of New York Local 5 was suspended for constitutionally specified illegalities, and the three worst offenders on that board were suspended from the union, not as Communists, but for specified, constitutionally prohibited disruptive activities. However, what really won the day for the administration was the perfect strategy with which it took the rank and file into its confidence, frightening it into the realization that factionalism was destroying the union.

During 1925 the administration rapidly gained the upper hand. The favorable renewal of the agreement in the Chicago market, the victories in the strikes against the International Tailoring Company shops in New York and Chicago, the arrest of the movement of the industry into unorganized territory, the organization of the Nash plant in Cincinnati, the growing effectiveness of the reestablished impartial machinery in New York City under the able chairmanship of Jacob Billikopf, the stabilization of the larger New York employers under the new Clothing Manufacturers Exchange—all these reconstructive factors contributed toward the gradual elimination of the Right-Left struggle. And by the end of 1926 Hillman's slogan of "Policy versus Politics" had won.

[The situation in the Fur Workers' Union will be described in a later article, and a postscript added on Where the Needle Trades Are Going.]

The Newest Profession

By MORRIS L. ERNST

OUT of the terrific and recurrent losses falling to investors in stock-market securities there has emerged a new profession, "investment counsel." The ordinary investor today purchases securities from stock-exchange houses or through banks. From such sources he seldom can get entirely disinterested advice. Most stock-exchange houses are members of syndicates organized to float securities; many in addition are traders in the very securities which they offer to their customers. This leads to substantial but usually undisclosed conflicts of interest, and the investor, asking advice from a stock-exchange firm, is never quite sure that it may not be influenced by the facts that certain securities are lying heavy on the firm's shelves, that others will yield wider profits to a firm which is itself a member of the underwriting group.

At his bank the investor is faced with the same situation. Most of the larger banking institutions run separate security companies and are members of the underwriting syndicates. Many large trust companies seem to be more interested in developing their securities-sales departments than in the profits that can be derived from an ordinary banking business. Hence the need for and the appearance of professional advisers who have had experience in appraising properties, analyzing financial circulars, and watching market tendencies. Their fees are not contingent on the success of their advice or on the amount of turnover, but are proportioned to the amount of the capital fund which is to be invested. The fee charged usually covers all services rendered for a period of a year. Now a stock-exchange house lives by creating turnover. The more it can persuade its customers to sell securities and rebuy others, constantly changing their list of holdings, the greater its gross income. The professional adviser, however, whose fee is based only upon the capital fund to be invested, with no relation to turnover, has no incentive to urge needless shiftings of market positions. To remove any criticism as to conflict of interests he should invest all his own personal funds in such securities as Liberty bonds or mortgages on real estate which are beyond the realm of advice which he may give to clients.

This new profession may have significant results. When a single firm of advisers acts as consultant for securities totaling a hundred million dollars—as many of them soon will—its clients will have a chance to become articulate. Situations have already developed where financial advisers representing only two or three million dollars have been able to call the president of a large corporation into conference. No one of their individual clients could have got past the outside door of the third assistant to the second vice-president; no ten of them together could have obtained one-tenth of the information given to the firm of advisers. Moreover, none of the individual stockholders would have the experience necessary to know what questions to ask of the president or to analyze the information after it was received. Thus the investment counselor may help to solve the much-discussed problem of stockholders' control.

Should this new profession develop and expand it may make possible a reduction in the cost of the distribution of securities, and eliminate the wasteful thousands of bright-faced college graduates who spend their days persuading investors to sell one stock and buy another. Professional advisers are free to state and publish their opinions on any subject on which they are called upon for advice. In the United States we have not yet reached the stage of full and free comment in regard to financial problems. For example, recently a new security was issued. It was underwritten by leading bankers. The announcement made by these most reputable bankers was honest as far as it went, but it was thoroughly dishonest in that it failed to set forth further essential facts. Today the newspapers do not dare to comment frankly upon such new underwritings; their advertising columns are too closely involved. The large daily newspapers could hardly accept advertisements for the distribution of new securities and, in the next column or in the editorial section, criticize the statements made in them or the fundamental merits of the security offered. But the public has a right to know the relation of assets to the selling price of securities, the defects and merits of the issues, and the powers of the bankers who control them. The professional financial adviser can give such advice and make disinterested, impartial, critical examination of financial circulars and statements, and, since he gets no commission for sales made following his advice, it is likely to be heeded.

Today these advisers operate only for large investors. Clients with capital funds of less than $100,000 are not very welcome. It may be that the cost of rendering such advice in connection with smaller funds will always be too costly. But a few years ago it was considered impossible to sell bonds to workers, and today the business flourishes; a group of advisers may arise whose main clientele will be workers and persons of limited means. The Labor Bureau, Inc., is already advising labor unions, cooperatives, and other social agencies on matters involving the collective interests of the members, and the individuals who make up such organizations can use and pay for advice directed toward the investment and safeguarding of their assets.

For the time being these professional advisers are not being fought by the larger financial interests. But if the system develops, keeping its advice clean of profit-influence, the large financial interests will have to fight against its growth. Banking houses that wish through a few shares of voting common stock to control tremendous issues of preferred and non-voting common stock, distribution-houses which seek to distribute securities on a commission basis on the theory that the more their clients shift their investments the richer the house will be, stock-exchange houses engaged in the underwriting of securities and in selling these same securities to their clients—all of these institutions will diminish in power if the professional-adviser system develops. It may be an exciting battle.

In the Driftway

A KIND correspondent, Aubrey H. Straus of Richmond, Virginia, calls attention to a proposal in that State to preserve a bit of genuine Americana that seems otherwise to have been neglected. He sends a cutting from the Times-Dispatch, in which James O'Meara of Burkes Garden, Virginia, suggests that the art of eating with the knife as practiced in the Old Dominion be filmed and passed on to posterity before it becomes as extinct as the making of flint arrowheads. The Virginia antiquarian describes in some detail the intricacies of the art as he has observed it. The artist starts with a plate of dry cornpone, butters his bread, then carefully presses it flat.

> He then inserts his knife under the bottom of the compacted layer, holding his fork down close at the other side of the plate. You wait, breathless, for the result: he loads his knife with a quick jerk of the wrist, lifts the implement, and deposits the mass of bread behind his teeth, without losing a crumb!

* * * * *

THE Drifter was not aware that eating with the knife was in danger of passing out, or that the technique of Virginia was superior to that of the rest of the country. He has seen Sinclair Lewis do a wonderful imitation of the art as practiced in the logging camps of the Northwest and has himself observed excellent examples of native skill in many parts of our glorious country. He has fondly supposed that the art would endure as long as food and knives remained to make it possible. But let us take no chances. In a day of national competitions in steer-roping, hog-calling, and black-bottoming, why not an all-American tournament in eating with the knife? Surely, such a contest would be more thrilling than an attempt to stay up a little while longer than someone else in an airplane. In earlier days, when it was a question with most aviators whether they could stay in the air at all, an endurance test had some point as a demonstration of skill. Now it is solely an engineers' problem in which the only apparent prowess of the aviators consists in their success in getting untold columns of advertising for the manufacturer of their airplane.

* * * * *

BY all means, then, let us have an all-American tournament in eating with the knife. Let the Fast Flying Virginians prove that they are better in form and finish than the loggers of the Northwest, the hog-raisers of the Mississippi Valley, or the stalwart Puritan progeny of New England. The Drifter will donate the knife. What equally generous philanthropist will provide the food, the stadium, the traveling expenses, and the prize money?

What Happened at Nanking

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In personal interviews with friends and relatives who went through the incident to the final evacuation, I have gathered some highlights on Nanking's "Black Thursday."

1. The soldiers belonged to a semi-independent force of Nationalist troops composed of rabidly anti-foreign Huanese and pig-tailed bandits, formerly belonging to Chang Hsun's gang.

2. They were permitted to loot and evidently told to drive foreigners out of Nanking—the murders being individual abuses of authority but considered inconsequential by their leaders.

3. Rich Chinese suffered as well as foreigners—soldiers forcibly billeting themselves in the better-class dwellings.

4. The Nanking Kuomintang was not responsible—in fact, its members tried to stop the violence and even aided foreigners to hide or escape.

5. The lower-class non-combatant inhabitants extended aid to the foreigners, voluntarily hiding them in their houses.

6. The attack on Socony Hill was precipitated by a marine guard firing on and killing three of the mob, contrary to the instructions of the United States Consul.

7. We suffered for one day the sort of banditry that Chinese in many parts of the country suffer almost every day.

8. The shooting of Chinese (Northern) soldiers by British troops in Shanghai on the previous Tuesday added greatly to the violence, the number of killed being, as usual, greatly exaggerated.

The looting was done by practiced looters. The case of W. F. Hummel is typical. When the soldiers appeared at his door he came downstairs to extend a cordial welcome, realizing the futility of defensive tactics. They pointed bayonets at him, and went through his pockets like practiced detectives, even taking the spectacles off his face. Backing him away to one side of the room, they deliberately smashed every piece of furniture in the room, taking the pieces away in bundles, evidently for firewood. In the midst of the hubbub he heard several of them raise a cry of "Fah Yang Tsai" ("Let us grow rich off the foreigners"). Wherever they found sufficient kerosene and other combustibles the looters made bonfires in the houses as a final stroke.

In the case of the murder of Dr. Williams, there is little clear evidence. He was walking with three or four others when a group of soldiers passed by. Nothing happened until he turned about to talk with them. One grabbed at his watch chain, which hung from a lapel. Within a few seconds, his companions heard a shot, and turned to see him lying on the ground. The soldiers were brandishing their guns as gymnasts would manipulate wands, but with crazed gestures and antics. One guess is as good as another; one of the soldiers may have waved his rifle muzzle in Dr. Williams's face and by accident pulled the trigger. Malicious intent does not seem substantiated when it is noted that the soldiers did not attempt to rob or fire on the other foreigners. The bullet is said to have entered the right cheek from below and passed out through the top of the head. This would not be the course of a bullet if the rifle had been aimed.

A number of refugees from the United States Consulate walked and ran about a mile and a half across open country to the Socony Hill. The Consul says the soldiers fired at them all the time. But if the soldiers had intended more than to frighten the runaways there would have been greater casualties. Only one marine guard was hit, and he is reported to have fired from where he lay, killing three oncoming soldiers. The guard had been requested not to fire under any circumstances.

The firing on the British consul and party appears to have been more deliberate, the intention evidently being to kill.

Several days before, one of the leading men of the Nanking Kuomintang body had been arrested by the Northern general in occupation of Nanking. His execution was expected instantly. Hearing of his arrest, Dr. Bowen, president of the Nanking University, at which the arrested man had studied, went to the Northern headquarters and promised to guarantee this man's good behavior if he were released. This saved his life. At a crucial moment, when the soldiers were threatening violence to Dr. Bowen and some of the faculty in the university compound, this man, in a disheveled condition, rushed into the compound and waved the soldiers back. "Don't shoot, don't shoot; this man saved my life!" he shouted.

Several other Kuomintang men were heard to declare during the looting: "If this is Nationalism, we don't want any of it." Many members helped foreigners to hide on the Thursday, and freely gave them money and other assistance.

The lower-class people, knowing they were secure from looting, voluntarily hid foreigners in their houses. Indeed, the Nationalist authorities, when faced with an ultimatum, had the greatest difficulty finding them. The gunboats had threatened to shell the important places of the native city unless the Nationalists delivered up every foreigner by 3 p. m. on Friday. This was extended, upon the earnest pleas of the Nationalist authorities, to 4, then to 5, finally to 6 p. m. The Nationalists swore they could not find the men—that they were hidden away.

That the shooting and killing of Fengtien soldiers by British troops in Shanghai on the previous Tuesday inflamed the soldiers in Nanking is generally believed by foreigners. Many Chinese were heard to speak of this "atrocity" on Wednesday, when the news reached Nanking. The first report said thousands had been killed. Similar exaggeration was applied to the shelling of Socony Hill. It was reported in Shanghai that 2,000 Chinese were killed; in Wuhu the figure was set at 200,000.

There is no means of telling how many Chinese were killed in the bombardment, but since it is known that the gunboats fired shrapnel as well as plain percussion shell into a mob of possibly more than a thousand, some place the killed at approximately one hundred and fifty.

How Hester Won Her A

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: When the movie perversion of "The Scarlet Letter" was shown in Philadelphia, the manager engaged a lot of pretty girls, dressed them in Puritan costume, each with a big red A on her breast, and had them stroll up and down the principal streets. A friend of a friend of mine is said to have said: "If Hawthorne were writing that book now, he would call it 'How Hester Won Her A.'"

Alice M. House

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Alice M. House, of Cincinnati, died two and a half years ago, and when her will was probated it was learned that, after making provision for some relatives, a few boys in whom she had been interested, and other bequests, the residuary clause provided that the remainder of her estate was to go to "those organizations working for civil liberty and peace." Application was filed on behalf of the American Civil Liberties Union, the Woman's Peace Society, and the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, no others appearing, and when the estate was finally settled $5,000 went to each organization.

Miss House belonged to one of the old Methodist families of Cincinnati. She was actively interested in and worked for the cause of free speech and against war. She was one of the charter members of the first women's peace organization, which subsequently became the Women's International League. Her home, her energies, and her pocket-book were at various times requisitioned for these causes which meant so much to her.

Democracy and Nationalism in Czecho-Slovakia

By G. E. R. GEDYE

"WE are being forced against our will," said a prominent Czech to me in Prague the other day, "to recognize that we shall have to develop as a state of nationalities and not as a national state." It is only one round of the contest between the Czech racial chauvinism which was born with the republic and the determination of the non-Czech subjects to secure cultural liberty—a determination given force by the recent entry of Germans and Slovaks into the Cabinet.

The present situation in Czecho-Slovakia is the reverse of that commonly met with in older countries. Here far-sighted leaders find themselves unable to pursue freely the progressive policies which they realize to be essential, largely because of the unschooled, reactionary nationalism of the Czech masses. The Czechs, as most of their political opponents readily admit, have been gifted with statesmen of a caliber seldom met with in modern Europe. M. Benes (whether you like him or not) has a flair for foreign policy which helps him to keep his place in the forefront despite the bitter hatred of which he is the object. First praised lavishly abroad and then unduly depreciated, his stock of statesmanship is now taken at its true value, which is at least far above the average. The estimates of President Masaryk's prescience have never varied much. The political ability of M. Svehla, the Prime Minister, has shown itself in the skill with which he has effected the desired combination of parties after protracted negotiations, and is evidence of the shrewdness of the peasant stock from which he springs. These and many other Czech pioneers have a vitality and talent for statecraft which seem to be rooted in the revolution, for the younger generation shows no sign of developing anything more exceptional than reliable rule-of-thumb bureaucrats to serve the state.

Czecho-Slovakia has not been favored beyond her needs. All the qualities of her statesmen are called for to keep the ship of state on her exceptionally difficult course. The start gained by racial hatred when unwilling Germans, Slovaks, Magyars, and Ruthenians were forced willy-nilly into the new republic in 1918 and remorselessly "put in their places" has never been retrieved. The far-sighted political leaders long ago realized the hopelessness of the Czech dream of a highly centralized state of Czech or Czechized nationals—a dream which most of these leaders had themselves encouraged in revolutionary days—and for which Dr. Kramars and his National Democrats still fight with conviction. But Germans and Slovaks, composing the two important minorities, sank class and party differences in the racial emergency and, each in the national camp, stood together to defend their educational, language, and general cultural freedom against the organized attempts of the Czechs (particularly of the Czech bureaucracy) to destroy them in the interests of "Czechization." The closing of German schools, the creation of artificial Czech minorities in purely German districts by introducing large numbers of Czech officials with their families, the use of land reform to "de-Germanize" and "Czechize" the land, the prohibition of the use of German signs by shops, banks, and other non-official concerns—these and a dozen other intolerant methods of procedure created bitterness for which the state now has to pay dearly. Most regrettable of all is the discrimination which was undoubtedly often shown against Germans and Hungarians in the execution of the land reform, in itself an urgently desirable and entirely justifiable measure. Yet the Czech chauvinists were foreordained to lose the battle—the population figures alone prove it. Out of some fourteen million subjects of the republic, the Czechs number some six and a half millions—less than half. The balance is made up of three and a half million Germans, two million Slovaks, and one and a half million Poles, Ruthenians, Magyars, and Jews.

Last year, when Czecho-Slovakia was ruled by a "Cabinet of Officials," the question of agrarian duties became urgent. For the first time in the history of the state, the German bourgeois parties, in order to secure a high protective tariff on agricultural products, voted with the Government. This was the thin edge of the wedge with which M. Svehla has now succeeded, after months of negotiation, in prying open the door leading to full interracial political cooperation. The final argument he used was: "If you stay outside, I must seek my majority in the old direction—with the Socialists and Czech National Socialists." Class interests finally triumphed over racial interests, and the German and Czech Agrarian and Clerical parties united with the National Democrats of Dr. Kramars to form the Cabinet which the Slovak Peoples' Party (predominantly Clerical) has now entered. For months the Czech Right parties tried to oust Dr. Benes (Czech National Socialist), their bitter foe, but President Masaryk insisted on retaining the man who is the exponent of his own views in foreign affairs. Should Masaryk actually have refused to accept reelection to the office of President, as it is stated he threatened to do in the event of Benes being driven out of office, in all probability an attempt would have been made to elect a Clerical. The Clerical parties are more reactionary than the Agrarian, and therefore more opposed to the basic ideas of the Czecho-Slovak state as expounded by Masaryk and Benes. M. Svehla, himself an Agrarian, succeeded in averting this danger. Benes is still Foreign Minister, although his old party is in opposition, but the campaign against him has not been finally abandoned. His main support is the Czech Legionnaires, who, with their own subsidized newspapers and their own banks, form a powerful body of personal supporters; the majority of them will stand by him in or out of office; the minority incline to the Fascist movement headed by General Gajda, the late chief of the Czech General Staff.

How long the present condition will last is uncertain. It is made up of so many mutually hostile groups that it appears to lack every element of permanence. As for the Opposition, it has not yet achieved even the semblance of unity. The German Social-Democrats are reluctant to combine with the Czech Socialists of either the "Democrat" or "National" brand, because they still see in them the exponents of racial oppression in matters of schools and of the use of their native tongue which they experienced under the late (Left) Government, the inheritor of the revolutionary nationalism of 1919. Nevertheless, steps toward establishing a united Left Opposition have already been taken. It seems probable that a gradually developing cooperation in opposition will form a body more stable than that produced by the opportunism of the Clericals and Agrarians who are nourishing, not abandoning, antipathies temporarily kept out of sight. If this proves to be the case, the present Cabinet may before long be succeeded by an "interracial," moderate Left group.

If one looks solely at Czech and German, this development appears inevitable. When one considers Czech and Slovak, the element of doubt creeps in. The Slovaks, held for generations in something like bondage by the Hungarians, are largely a backward peasant people to whom democracy is little more than a word. The Hungarians assert that they were not discontented under Magyar rule, and it is only fair to admit that, to a large extent, this is true. The high-handed way in which the Czechs have conferred "liberty" on their racial cousins, combined with assiduous Magyar irredentist propaganda, has produced great discontent with the present state of affairs. But freedom to speak and teach their own tongue has at least been conferred upon them; what they fear is the freethinking element among the Czechs, for they are devout Catholics. If the Czech Right parties have the good sense to concede their reasonable demands for complete school and religious freedom and for the full autonomy promised them in the so-called "Treaty of Pittsburg," it will be many years before the Slovaks will be found in a democratic coalition.

Though a simple folk placing their affairs entirely in the hands of the priests, the Slovaks, curiously enough, have done better than the Germans, for they have come into the Government on terms which go a long way toward satisfying their determination to secure autonomy. The Germans still complain bitterly of racial oppression and their ministers will have to fight within the Cabinet to obtain a degree of satisfaction that will assure their electoral supporters that they have not betrayed the German cause by joining the Government without having received a mandate to do so. But it is hard to imagine that they will obtain much from a government which comprises Dr. Kramars, that sincere and intransigent exponent of Czech nationalism.

It is to the urgent interests of the state that consolidation and internal peace should be secured through decentralization and the adoption of a federalist system. Economically, Czecho-Slovakia is suffering seriously from hostile tariff walls. Only because she is a richer country than Austria is so little heard about her economic difficulties. These are sufficiently serious for me to have been told by a well-informed person in Prague—not a Czech: "You will not be allowed in any periodical in Great Britain even to hint at the existing difficulties." The root of the trouble is, of course, that, with Austria, Czecho-Slovakia was the manufacturer for a nation of 52 millions, and has now a nation of 14 millions only to supply. How bitterly must the great Czech leaders rue today their insistence in 1919 on the break-up of the economic unity of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy. This bond of economic suffering, together with that of democracy struggling to maintain itself against the aggressive absolutism of neighboring states, tends more and more to bring into harmony the policies of Czecho-Slovakia and that little Austrian Republic which she treated at first as a peril to her independence, but which more and more she is being forced to recognize as a fellow-sufferer (to a far greater degree than herself) from the earthquake of 1919. The inevitable complete Franco-German agreement will force Czecho-Slovakia to cultivate good relations with her great neighbor, Germany, who is her principal customer. The existence of the present reactionary regime in Hungary (whose subsidized press has just greeted with typically vitriolic abuse the peaceful advances of Dr. Benes) is a standing threat to her frontiers.

The Czecho-Slovak state has within it the germs of consolidation. The economic interests of the Germans of Bohemia and Moravia have forced them to recognize that their future is bound up with the Czecho-Slovak state and not with the Reich. But they will never accept their present condition of second-class citizenship; and as long as the Czech feels he is a better man than the German in the Czecho-Slovak state, so long will German irredenta flourish. The economic interests of the Slovaks draw them toward Hungary as much as those of the Germans bind them to the Czechs, but the Slovaks have tasted a degree of political liberty that the Hungarians refused them for centuries. Even the organ of Father Hlinka, the Slovak Clerical and anti-Czech leader, has recently expressed horror at the very idea of ever again coming under the rule of those responsible for such a cynical mockery of democracy as the last Hungarian elections. If they have not yet buried the hatchet with the Czechs, at least the grave has been dug.

Czecho-Slovakia is passing through a trying and bewildering period, but even though the life of the present Cabinet of the Right should be a short one, it has demonstrated at least the possibilities of racial union. Those who distrust absolutism and Fascism can be thankful that the Czecho-Slovak Republic, essentially democratic as it is, has every prospect of surviving in a Europe which, in the distress of its political malaise, is still inclined to experiment in quack dictatorships. The future belongs to that group of parties, of the Right or of the Left, which shows the greatest courage in sweeping away the barriers to consolidation created by national chauvinism. Under the pressure of external reactionary influences seeking the break-up of the state, the necessary reforms are bound to be effected.

Recent Spanish Literature

By ELISEO VIVAS

WE must consider, first of all, the generation of '98, already well known to us in America through the translation of representative works. It has shaped and directed Spanish culture for the last thirty years, but some of its members may no longer be thought of as active factors in the creative life of the country. It is certain, for instance, that Benavente has already exhausted himself. For although his last drama—"La mariposa que voló sobre el mar"—is said to have been very well received, his recent work, taken as a whole, even if judged sympathetically, has lost the power and depth of "Bonds of Interest" or "Passion Flower." Unamuno, too, has not been able to maintain his old prestige. "De Fuerteventura a París," published shortly after his arrival in France and characterized in the subtitle as "an intimate diary of exile rendered in sonnet form," is a book painful to read; for its obvious vulgarity cannot be accepted as satire. His last book, "L'Agonie du christianisme," clearly shows signs of disintegration. Baroja seems also incapable of anything worthy of his great name. His last published books—"El gran torbellino del mundo," "Las veleidades de la fortuna," and "Amores tardíos"—are formless, endless monologues (he calls them novels), vicariously expressed through the mouths of characters which have no other personality than their names. These books are, furthermore, a long catalogue of all the prejudices and hatreds of the author. He appears to have discovered recently that he had been read because of his brusque and independent temper of mind. Unaware that this quality in him was respected because it was the outcome of a legitimate and rational reaction against his environment, he dedicated himself to the careful cultivation of a scoffing attitude and of a shallow pessimism which it is difficult to take seriously. He reminds one of those medieval beggars who fostered their sores artificially as a profitable source of income. Baroja hates the new psychology, he hates contemporary French literature, he despises the English, the Jews, the American tourists, the German nation, the Russian exiles, the Bolsheviks, the socialists, Nietzsche—there is, indeed, no one or nothing he does not fling mud at.

On the other hand Valle Inclán has lately given proofs of a vitality, a power, and a depth of which the reader of his decadent work would never have suspected him capable. The "Comedias barbaras" initiated this new development. The precious aestheticism of his "Sonatas" is utterly forgotten in the "Comedias"—in reality intense tragedies—and a strength and a concern with real human values, newly acquired, gives him easily the first place among contemporary novelists. His latest book, "Tirano Banderas," is a satire on South American revolutionists—bitter, cruel, pitched in a high key, exaggerated, no doubt, but if the phrase be allowed, transcendentally true. Azorín also shows undiminshed vigor. Never able to handle dialogue successfully in his novels, he has tried the drama, and last year wrote a very lively comedy. Perez de Ayala is another of the older men—since he must be considered as belonging to this group—whose work retains its old excellence of style and gains in intellectual comprehension of men.

There is a group of younger men of whom we have heard very little in America. We know of Marquina, of Ardavin. We know of Salvador de Madariaga, who also writes in English. But of Moreno Villa, Pedro Salinas, Ramón de Basterra, and their generation very little has been written in our critical reviews, so far as I know. Of these writers Moreno Villa seems to me the outstanding personality. Critic of art, scholar of considerable erudition, prose writer and poet, he brings into Spanish literature a lyric note seldom struck by moderns. A large number of fine but ephemeral lyricists may be found in Spain today as in other countries. But poets possessing solid powers of intellection and exquisite sensibility at the same time are rare. Moreno Villa possesses these two qualities and something besides. For there is in his poetry a popular tendency; he is an Andalusian by birth, and some of his lighter poems reproduce not only the form but the spirit of the popular songs of his land. Since he is a scholar, however, his work has a distinction and a rich diction which carry it beyond the current poetical fads, and which may account for the fact that he is relatively less known than several other of his contemporaries whose work cannot, severely examined, compare to his. Pedro Salinas must, above all, be mentioned for his successful rendition of the "Poema de Mío Cid" into modern Spanish verse. The work was difficult, for the poet sought strict fidelity to the original. Salinas has also published a book of short stories, "Víspera del gozo," hailed as the earnest of a man who will finally justify the radical innovations attempted within recent years. Basterra is one of those rare spirits—rare in our romantic age which boasts of its moral and intellectual confusion—who seek perfection through their art. The poetry of José María Balbotín contrasts sharply with Basterra's. Balbotín stands aloof from the aesthetic concerns of his contemporaries. He is a civic poet, as was Marquina in his "Eglogas." But unlike Marquina, from whom, in more than one respect, he stems, he has a wider range of interests, although he lacks, on the other hand, the finish and spontaneity of his master. Ramón Gomez de la Serna, though young, has to his credit more than a score of books. He is now one of the most popular authors in Spain. His latest, "El torero Caracho," relates, in a tragic-comic manner, the life and glorious death of a matador. De la Serna is but a minor, yet he veils, behind a flashy wit, a keen blade of satire.

Besides these two groups of writers there is a large group of still younger ones—younger not only by virtue of their age, which goes over thirty in few cases only, but also by virtue of their literary radicalism. As elsewhere in Europe after the war, the intellectual youth of the country formed schools and literary cliques and started short-lived movements and small magazines which saw four or five numbers at best. There was, of course, an imported Dadaism, but there were also a few fancy brands of native theory such as ultraismo, creacionismo, superrealismo, in which a foreign name was merely adapted to an original tendency. But the impetus of these young radicals did not carry them very far, and little is heard of these movements today. They served, however, to introduce many young authors. Among these the name of Gerardo Diego stands out. With Rafael Alberti, author of "Marinero en tierra," Diego shared the "National Literary Contest" prize for 1925; but although his book bears the title "Versos humanos" (Human Poems), it is difficult to see the propriety of this. In fact, Diego's predilection for Góngora, who is deemed by the younger men "the most refined of Spanish poets of the classical period," and whose mannerisms they have tried to revive, is sufficient to indicate that his uppermost preoccupation is aesthetic, hardly human.

Benjamin Jarnés and Felix Urabayen hold in the field of the novel a leadership similar to that of Diego and Alberti in poetry, within their generation. Jarnés is the more literary of the two. His "Profesor inútil" is the introspective biography of a dreamer who chooses to write prose, probably because it gives him greater freedom than poetry would, in order to follow the thread of his reminiscences. His book calls to mind Marcel Proust, although it is without the overwhelming accumulation of detail of the Frenchman. Urabayen is a Basque transplanted into Castilian soil; he blends in his tales the energy of his race and the austerity of the Castilian. In "La vida de un claro varón de Escalona," his last book—hardly more than a lengthy short story—he tells a modern picaresque tale in which the starkness of the prose serves to bring out the powerful sardonic bitterness which animates the author.

There are, besides these, a large number of novelists of considerable promise, not all of whom can be noticed. Marío Verdaguer, author of "La isla de oro"; Aguado de la Loma, whose "Su mundo aparte," his second book, is sufficient evidence of an unusual mastery of technique; Antonio Espina, author of a collection of short stories entitled "Pájaro Pinto," which has caused a small stir; Claudio de la Torre, José María Bergamín—these are only a few of the younger generation who, last year, published works of such exceptional merit that no account of recent contemporary literature would be complete without their names.

New Books in Germany

By D. T.

Berlin, April 1

SINCE "Der Zauberberg" ("The Magic Mountain"), by Thomas Mann, no German book has appeared which obviously towers above all of its contemporaries. On the whole this has been a prolific and more or less mediocre season, though it is extremely interesting for the tendencies which it shows. It is a phenomenon rather curious to the Anglo-Saxon literary world that in Germany writers seem to feel the necessity of a cult: there are few who cannot be classified as belonging to a particular literary sect.

"Expressionism," which in letters as in painting and even in music has been the ruling cult of younger artists for the last fifteen years, is moribund or is passing into another phase. Expressionism was first of all a political movement paralleling the social revolution, but it was also a reaction from the preceding literary forms, and from overanalysis of the individual soul. There seemed to be a feeling that that form of the novel which reached its zenith in the great Russians had become turgid and cloaked. Expressionism caught a bluer ether of impersonalism; had a passion for ideal constructions; and took its material from ideas and principles rather than from human experience. The new realists, as we might call the successors of the expressionists, do not represent a spiritual counter-revolution, but they return to the familiar face of things and reaffirm living experience. The tendency in German letters today is to reinterpret life and personality, with the times in which we live very much in view. There is no slacking in the movement against literature for literature's sake.

The passion for biography and for the historical novel illustrates the tendency to revaluate historic personalities and events for this age of Freud and Einstein. Germany, the most pious of Western nations, is dusting off the statues of her own and Europe's great and is trying to see what kind of faces they really had. And very characteristic is the attempt to break down the wall between the different ages which for the previous period of historicism seemed rigid and absolute. The historical play is used as a criticism of life today; the most actual plays on the Berlin stage this winter were Wolfgang Götz's "Gneisenau," Fritz von Unruh's "Napoleon," and Alfred Neumann's "The Patriot," all of which are reincarnations of historic personalities and events written in full consciousness of present problems. (The attempts to modernize classic drama—the much-mooted Jessner performances of "Hamlet" and of Schiller's "Die Räuber"—are evidences of effort to demythologize the past.)

The biographies most talked about are those of Emil Ludwig, some of which are already known in the United States through translation. The first of this series was "Goethe." Ludwig really reincarnated for the masses of people in Germany the great European whose personality was fading into a dusty relic, the exclusive property of professors of literature. It is significant that Ludwig's "Goethe," which is not the best biography of the poet (we think of Gundolph's work), is far and away the most popular. In "Napoleon," "Wilhelm II," and the last of the series to appear, "Bismarck" (a leading publication of this season), Ludwig adopts much the same attitude as that of Lytton Strachey in "Queen Victoria"—which book, incidentally, has been only recently translated here, with notable success. Actually this biographical method is vastly more revolutionary in Germany than in France or England, because the pious cult of the great is more rigid. Ludwig is the most-talked-of biographer partly because he took sensational material and because of his method of ignoring achievement as the outstanding element in a life. But other biographers equal or surpass him in psychological analysis. Walter Harich's "E. T. A. Hoffmann" and "Jean Paul" might be quoted as illustrations.

Alfred Döblin is another of the earnest younger writers who probe into the past to find a message for the present and into the psyche of real and imaginary men to find a better way of controlling life. Döblin's great experience was the World War. In his "Wallenstein" and in "Berge, Meere und Giganten" ("Mountains, Seas, and Giants") we feel that he is haunted by a sense of mass catastrophe, and feels a mission to help avert it. Not a person but an epoch is the hero of "Wallenstein"; it is an analysis of the Thirty Years' War—the story of the debacle of a whole culture, wrought by subaltern factors in the service of an inevitable fatality. In "Berge, Meere und Giganten" Döblin feels the pressure upon Europe from other continents. The novel is a monumental fresco of the oncoming debacle when he foresees Africa overriding the European continent and European men marshaling all the hosts of science to build a new world for themselves further north—a world peopled by fantastic animals and more fantastic men. His point of view might be called planetary!

Actually, Döblin is a conscious European, suffering from the general European malaise of fear. Fear of Africa, of Asia—and of America. Simultaneously with the growing interest of Germany in American intellectual life and with the rapid translation of the newest American books—John Dos Passos, Theodore Dreiser, Sherwood Anderson, and Carl Van Vechten are among the late discoveries—a group of writers whose most outspoken members are, perhaps, Döblin and the Austrian Stefan Zweig are setting their faces sternly against what they call "the Americanization of intellect," which to them is synonymous with standardization. To Stefan Zweig's militant Europeanism the German reading public has much to thank. Himself one of the finest contemporary writers, he has set his talents in the service of his European colleagues, especially the French; has translated them, and has written much criticism and biography. His "Erinnerungen an Emil Verhaeren" has recently appeared, printed on his own press, and is available for the first time to a larger public. These "Reminiscences" appeared as a private printing of one hundred copies in 1917, when the "enemy" was not allowed publicly to display any virtues. Now ten years later the little volume again appears in 440 copies—with a promise of a popular edition. The work contains more than personal reminiscences; it is an account of the spiritual influence of a great poet. A new collection of "Novellen," "Verwirrung der Gefühle" by the same author, is one of the five books of the year. Especially the last story, which gives the book its title, is beautiful and strong. Zweig shows himself again a poet who sees beyond the visible and for whom the form chosen is always the inevitable expression, part and parcel of the mood and the content. Thomas Mann's "Unordnung und frühes Leid" ("Disorder and Early Pain") is a novel of youth in the depressing environment of the post-war period. Germany's first man of letters is perhaps made more acutely aware of the problems of this youth by his own talented son, Klaus Mann, who leads a little clique of his own among very young buds of German literature, and who recently had a public controversy with his father over "Parents and Sons."

The best seller of the season is, I believe, Alfred Neumann's "Der Teufel" ("The Devil"), a well-told tale not without psychological depth which recounts the story of Oliver Necker, "Le Mauvais" whom we have met before in Victor Hugo's "Notre Dame de Paris." Neumann's treatment of the Ghent Barber, the intimate of Louis XI, is a dramatic, not undistinguished study of the demonic.

Arthur Hollitscher's "Das unruhige Asien," a travel book describing the restless East from Cairo around the Indian Ocean and through China to Russia, is brilliantly written and rich in fascinating information. It must be read with the consciousness that the author is a convinced Communist, but this problematic bias does not prevent him from seeing more than most and telling it better than anyone yet. Especially valuable is his description of the new Jewish state, with the gathering clash between the new rich exploiters, the speculating population of Tel-a-viv, and the idealistic socially and nationally minded "Chaluzim," who set up an intellectual leadership for the workers in whose ranks they themselves are enrolled. Hollitscher is a poet; his book, written in almost notebook form, is more than journalism. He has poetic penetration.

New Books in France

By RENÉ LALOU

Paris, April 2

THERE has been no slackening in French production this winter. Of course fiction has brought its due share of novelties. A young writer, Julien Green, created a sensation with "Mont-Cinère," a study of Puritan America in the eighties, while Etienne Burnet offered us in "La Porte du Sauveur" the first impartial picture of bolshevism. To their former work Paul Morand and Roland Dorgelès have added "Rien que la terre," an impressionistic round-the-world voyage, and "Partir," a novel of cosmopolitan life on board a liner; to François Mauriac we are indebted for "Thérèse Desqueyroux," another powerful study of provincial life; Georges Duhamel has brought to an end the career of his Salavin in a curious diary which is both a praise and a subtle parody of sainthood. The Jewish problem has inspired "Nicolo Peccavi," in which Armand Lunel paints the Affaire Dreyfus as seen from Carpentras, "l'Enfant prophète," where Edmond Fleg preaches a generous conciliation between Israel and the modern world, and—last but not least—"le Fléau du savoir," by André Billy and Moïse Twersky, a vivid description of the adventures of a Russian Jew.

Among the new poems we must mention Soupault's "Georgia," wholly dedicated to the joy of stumbling through the wonders of life, and Salmon's "Créances," which will be numbered among our truest songs of unrest. In Romains's "Dictateur" and Bloch's "Dernier Empereur" we welcome two noble dramas of ideas, dealing with today's political problems—which have also been adequately treated by Lucien Romier in "Nation et Civilisation," a defense of Europe and an analysis of the traditional part played by France in the formation of a European aristocracy.

Though the number of essayists is increasing daily, few of them are endowed with the natural charm of Louis Aragon, as shown in his "Paysan de Paris," an evocation of the marvelous in contemporary Paris, the most successful work of the sur-réalistes to date. As witness of a French interest in English literature we must mention the competent study of Abel Chevalley on Thomas Deloney; it is also noteworthy that in "Messages," by Ramon Fernandez, an attempt at philosophical criticism, half the torch-bearers are English writers. The Nouvelle Révue Française has offered a popular edition of Debussy's "Monsieur Croche antidilettante," the best vindication of the qualities of French music since Rameau, and an interesting novelized life of Talleyrand by Jacques Sindral, an original variation on the theme of the modern Machiavelli. A good memoir of Proust by one of his oldest friends, Robert Dreyfus, deserves a careful reading; the same may be said of the "Letters" that passed between Jacques Rivière and Alain Fournier, a very important document on the tendencies of French students a few years before the war. And André Gide has published at last "Si le grain ne meurt," a moving confession in which he explains how he was brought by his sensual experiences, as well as by a personal reading of Blake and Dostoevski, to the idea of a divorce between the flesh and the spirit, of a gulf that can be bridged only through a new interpretation of the teaching of Christ.

The first fruit of the spring crop will be "l'Honneur de

Souffrir," a book of lyrics by our great romantic poetess, Mme de Noailles. Thus will Grasset bring to a close the first series of his Cahiers Verts, the sooner to start a new one with Benda's "Trahison des clercs." As usual, he promises many novels, the chief titles being "Aline," by Ramuz; "Eglantine," by Giraudoux; "Cœur d'or," by Souphault, and "le Bouddha vivant," by Morand. He will also bring a contribution to exegesis with "le Scandale de Jésus," by Father Allo. In religion, we shall read new studies in Rieder's "Christianisme" and "Judaïsme," under the competent management of Couchoud. But the novelists will not leave that field untilled: at Plon, Billy will go on with the epos of Menaché Foïgel, and the brothers Tharaud score another success with their "Rose of Sharon." The same publisher is responsible for the Golden Reed Series, which will include works by the two rising Catholic novelists Green and Bernanos, together with "Défense de l'Occident" and "Frontières de la poésie," in which Massis and Maritain, the leaders of the neo-thomist movement, will "measure the city and the gates thereof." Gates that have suddenly shut so as to exclude Maurras. Among the many echoes of the controversy around the Action Française is the announcement by Crès of a Maurrasian gospel under the form of a dictionary resembling Voltaire's "Dictionnaire philosophique."

Interesting novelized lives will be Maurois's "Dickens" (Grasset) and "Disraeli" (N.F.R.), as well as Pourtalès's "Chopin" (N.R.F.). For real criticism we must rather look to Arts et Livre and Kra. From the first firm we shall expect the masterpieces of Descartes and Bergson studied by Alain (whose essays, "les Idées et les ages," will appear at the N.R.F.) and Thibaudet; it will also issue, in twenty volumes of studies followed with anthologies, a complete picture of the French nineteenth century drawn by the best critics of the twentieth. Paul Souday (whose "Voltaire" will soon be out) is to publish a book on Gide, Proust, and Valéry (Kra), while Royère and Valéry will study Mallarmé and Soupault will freely interpret Lautréamont and Rimbaud; to its successful anthologies of modern verse and prose Kra will add a third one, dedicated to contemporary critics and essayists.

Travels are another form of criticism, as shown by Gide's "Congo," shortly to be published at the N.R.F. Maeterlinck will speak about Sicily, Chateaubriant about Holland, Kessel about Syria (Kra); Rieder's list of forthcoming "Témoignages" promises that Bonardi will solve the Syrian imbroglio and Scheffauer delineate the figure of contemporary America, whose literary features will be painted by Michaud in the collection of synopses started by Kra. Under the title of Visage de la France, Emilé Paul has asked several writers to depict their favorite town; after the "Lille" of Jouglet and the "Marseille" of Jaloux we may expect much from this series.

Never did the past look more vividly present than in The Unpublished, a collection in which Kra has revealed three chapters of Stendhal and will go on with stories by Sade, Constant, and Gobineau (his "Nicolas Belavoir" is on the list of the N.F.R.), and with letters by Rimbaud. Crès is soon to give a complete diary of Delacroix, Kra a hitherto unknown diary of Queen Marie-Antoinette, and Plon the memoirs of Queen Hortense. Our contemporaries are not so slow: we shall soon know all about the lives of the great surgeon Jean-Louis Faure (Arts et Livre), of the cabaret-singers Yvette Guilbert and Maurice Chevalier (Grasset), and of the world-famous Josephine Baker (Kra).

A Frenchman Takes a Look

America Comes of Age: a French Analysis. By André Siegfried. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

THIS book is so good that it seems almost incredible. From end to end of it I can't find a single misstatement of fact, and in even the most Gallic and unaccustomed of its opinions there is a searching and disconcerting plausibility. By what process Dr. Siegfried amassed his materials I don't know. He has been in the United States at various times since 1898, and the last time, two years ago, he made a very extensive tour. His eyes must have been open very widely, for they saw not only what was plainly in front of them but also many things that were shadowy and occult, even to the overwhelming majority of Americans. He would have made the most competent newspaper reporter ever heard of in this world—a champion related to Ray Stannard Baker as Baker, in the days before the Wilson blather fetched him, was related to the average Washington correspondent. For he went home to his stool in the Ecole Libre des Sciences Politiques with the most accurate, penetrating, and comprehensive treatise on the United States ever written, whether by a native or a foreigner. Compared to it the celebrated tome of the lamented Bryce sinks to the level of a textbook, and the works of the Stracheys, Bennetts, and other such soft-soapers become mere trash.

Dr. Siegfried is happily free from the romantic optimism that is so copiously on tap among us. He yields to no man, as the campaign orators say, in his respect for the diligence and ingenuity that have brought the United States to its present high place among the nations, but neither is he blind to the difficulties ahead. Internally, he believes, they revolve mainly around the bitter and apparently irreconcilable conflict between the so-called Anglo-Saxons and the newer varieties of Americans. This conflict, he sees clearly, is at the bottom of most of the political combats that wrack the country, and in the course of time it is bound to have serious industrial consequences. The Anglo-Saxon, clothed in his "self-satisfaction as a member of God's elect," simply refuses to go into his own melting-pot. That vessel is reserved for the exclusive use of the Americans of other races. It is their duty to enter it docilely, and to come out as Nordics and Protestants. And having emerged, it is their further duty to take their place at the second table, leaving the original Protestant Nordics in front of the soup-bowl.

Dr. Siegfried, as a Frenchman, is unable to grasp the equity of this arrangement, nor does he believe that it will long endure. The non-Anglo-Saxon, non-Protestant, non-Puritan Americans are not actually inferior; on the contrary, many of them are clearly superior. They have certain qualities that the Anglo-Saxons lack, and some of those qualities are immensely valuable. Thus they begin to sweat under the disadvantages that lie upon them, and to resist violently every effort to make those disadvantages greater. The crusade against all the varieties of hyphenism save the English that went on during the late war certainly did not abolish hyphenism: it only made it more resolute, as in the case, for example, of the emerging Negroes. What is the net effect of prohibition? Obviously, its net effect has been to set up a desperate rebellion, not only against prohibition, but also against the whole Puritan Kultur. And it is surely no mere accident that the Ku Klux uproar has been followed by the first really serious and determined effort to put a Catholic into the White House.

Dr. Siegfried ventures upon no prophecy as to the ultimate issue of this conflict. What will come of it, indeed, no man can know. The Anglo-Saxons, if the Negroes be counted out as incapable of producing a national hero, have the advantage of numbers and the support of tradition, but they show a decreasing capacity for genuine leadership. Put Coolidge beside Al

Smith, and a certain difference begins to be palpable—or, if you choose, put Dr. John Roach Straton beside the Irish archbishops, or Booth Tarkington beside Dreiser, or R. A. Millikan, with his lingering theological sentimentality, beside, say, Jacques Loeb. The new immigration laws will hold down the influx of Loebs and Dreisers, but what of their effect, in the long run, upon the lower orders of Anglo-Saxons? What will happen when the Mexican Landwehr, now manning the ditches, is exhausted? The answer, perhaps, is to be found in the South, whence the blacks have begun to flee. The Anglo-Saxon, though Protestant and imperial, already has the hoe in his hands.

Dr. Siegfried is an economist, and is thus greatly interested in our mass production. Its virtues are manifest: it has brought us the greatest prosperity ever recorded in history. But in the long run it may carry us into very serious difficulties. Its excess profits we now invest in loans to Europe, and at the same time we shut our doors to the goods which represent Europe's only capacity to pay us our interest and refund our principal. Obviously, the money must be raised by selling those goods in other markets. But, soon or late, our ever-increasing production will force us into those markets ourselves, and then will ensue a gigantic struggle. If Europe wins, we'll lose the markets but get our money. If Europe is beaten, we'll win the markets but lose our money. Dr. Siegfried apparently suspects that we'll be beaten. The machine has conquered in America, but the rest of the world still distrusts its products. In any case, there will be hard problems for the Coolidges and Mellons of the next generation.

"America Comes of Age" is far too complicated a book to be summarized. The thoughts that I have dredged out of it are not adequately representative of it. Dr. Siegfried must be read at length. He has crowded an enormous mass of facts into his volume and illuminated them with an unfailing sagacity. There is no evident intent in him to argue anything or to prove anything, but nevertheless he argues with great skill and proves a lot. Behind even his lightest obiter dicta there lies a background of sound and extensive knowledge. He has a prejudice, I suspect, against Puritans, but it certainly does not cause him to underestimate them. The American spectacle plainly exhilarates him. He is sensitive to its novelty, to its romantic charm, and to its overwhelming dramatic intensity. He must have enjoyed himself superbly when he was in our palpitating midst. But he was not fooled.

Along the Rhine

The Rhineland Occupation. By Henry T. Allen. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $5.

The Struggle for the Rhine. By Hermann Stegemann. Translated by Georges Chatterton-Hill. Alfred A. Knopf. $6.

GENERAL ALLEN'S first book, "My Rhineland Journal," rendered fine service to the cause of truth and international understanding. The present volume is a valuable companion. With the detachment of the historian and with military clarity of style, General Allen here sets forth the events of those critical days when the American forces in Rhineland (together with those of Great Britain) stood in the eyes of the world for fair play. It was then the difficult role of the leaders to act as a brake on headstrong French imperialism. The present reviewer, who played a minor role on the same stage as General Allen, can testify to the general accuracy and impartiality of his record. It is easy to see that he tends to find the French attractive and the Germans the reverse. He enters Rhineland as a victorious soldier, prepared to apply a rigorous system of military rule to the defeated population. His very freedom from "pro-German" and pacifist sentiments adds weight to the damning indictment of French policy which his sense of justice compels him to set forth here with admirable detachment.

"The Left Bank of the Rhine," writes General Allen in his introduction, "had been the subject of a secret agreement between France and Russia in February, 1917. By the terms of that agreement, this territory was to be completely separated from Germany and be made an autonomous or neutral state and also occupied by French troops until all the terms of the final treaty had been fulfilled." This is, of course, the key to the whole history of the occupation, both as described in General Allen's book and as it developed after the date—February, 1923—where his book leaves off. The author records the steady but unobtrusive political encroachments of the French, who never once lost sight of their objectives as set forth in the abortive secret treaty. They extend their military jurisdiction from occupied territory into the "neutral zone" beyond it on the flimsiest excuse. They wreck the Germans' customs system by their notorious "Hole in the West," through which enormous quantities of luxury goods are poured into Germany without duty. They set up a special department at Coblenz to persuade these inhabitants of "the cradle of the Germanic state" by means of French plays, newspapers, and books that they are really Frenchmen. Again and again they attempt to get the Rhenish railways into their hands. The sittings of the Inter-Allied Rhineland High Commission are here frankly revealed as a succession of hard-fought battles, in which the French fought steadily, with the Belgians as their often reluctant allies, for the dismemberment of Germany.

America's non-ratification of the Versailles Treaty naturally lessened the influence which she could wield in Rhineland, and Britain's power of resistance varied according to the caliber of her several representatives on the High Commission. The Anglo-Saxons, of course, were fighting a losing battle. The ordinances of the High Commission became the successive lines of consolidation of the French advance toward the objective; originally six in number, they increased to 67 in 1920 and by 1922 totaled 167. In their endeavors to emasculate the press in preparation for the invasion of the Ruhr and the setting up of their dummy Separatist "Republic," they prohibited or suspended 42 publications in 1920 and 94 in 1922. By vetoing appointments of officials and school-teachers and "combing out" prominent patriots by expelling them from occupied territory, they sought to prepare the soil for their Tag, which dawned in January, 1923. When in that month the Ruhr action began, the printing machines of the High Commission poured forth a ceaseless string of ukases, the press practically ceased to exist, and expulsions were well on the way to reaching their final total of 140,000.

In his chapter on Separatism he shows the firm stand made from the start by American headquarters against the various puppets of the French. The first chapters give an interesting and generally accurate picture of conditions at the start of the occupation though it is surprising to find General Allen going as wide of the mark as to assert that the bread and potato ration in the war years was sufficient, and that there was no actual starvation when the Allies reached Rhineland. He explains how the broken and starving population amazed the world by extending something like a welcome to the American forces, and how hard put to it were the military authorities to check the friendships which everywhere sprang up between the two nationalities whose duty it was to continue hating one another. This was exactly paralleled in the British Zone.

"The Struggle for the Rhine" is a translation of the work published under the same title in German in 1924. Also written with considerable detachment—considering its German authorship and the original date of publication—this work traces the history of the Rhine and the conflicts which have centered around it since the dawn of history. The author upholds his thesis, that since the days of imperial Rome the Latin races have ceaselessly endeavored to wrest this river from its Teutonic possessors, with skill and learning. The book will prove valuable to historians, and merits a longer notice than space allows.

Vsevolod Meierhold

The Theatrical October. By Various Authors. Book I. Leningrad and Moscow.

ONE of the most significant facts in the theatrical life of Russia today is the prominence achieved by Vsevolod Meierhold. Though his theater is only a few years old, Meierhold himself is no newcomer to the Russian stage. One of the original members of the Moscow Art Theater's company, he early rebelled against its creed of realism and, as director to the late Vera Kommisarjevsky in her small theater in St. Petersburg, launched (1906-1908) a series of productions which started the insurgent movement against the realistic theater. A mystic tendency in the repertory, with a preponderance of plays by Maeterlinck, a decoratively stylized treatment of the setting, and a conventionalized acting characterized Meierhold's work in that period. There was a startling novelty and boldness in his experiments which made them the subject of heated controversies. But Meierhold was not daunted by criticism. Transferring his activities to the imperial theaters in St. Petersburg, he went on with his search for new forms.

There was nothing in the stage, he declared, that it had to be ashamed of. It needed no disguises. It was the medium of an independent art and as such was entitled to shape the dramatic spectacle in accordance with the laws of its own nature. Being a stage it presumed the existence of the spectator and had frankly to recognize his presence in the theater. Similarly, the actor on the stage was there to act; therefore he had to appear as an actor playing a part and not as an incarnation of the portrayed character. These ideas, embodied by Meierhold in a number of remarkable productions, the first of which was Molière's "Don Juan," ushered in a movement the full significance of which was revealed only after the revolution.

Of all the arts in Russia the theater has been the only one to thrive not merely in spite of the revolution but largely thanks to the stimulus which has been provided by the advent of an essentially democratic audience. Unsophisticated and lacking in culture this audience undoubtedly was. But it had other qualities of exceptional importance. It brought to the theater a virile robustness of attitude and an outlook upon the theater untrammeled by the established conventions. These qualities had an especial appeal for Meierhold, as sympathy with the revolution in his case was reinforced by an enthusiasm for the folk-theater—the old platform stage of the fair and the market-place. "The Theatrical October"—a volume of essays by various authors—provides a most absorbing account of how Meierhold's attempt to find an expression for his two interests has resulted in productions which have made his theater famous.

A difficult problem was that of finding for the new ideology a fitting form of dramatic spectacle. Meierhold's first attempts were made in the direction of drawing the audience into the action of the play. This did not prove particularly successful and was gradually abandoned. In the meantime a new theory, formulated by a group of artists and christened "constructivism," was given a friendly try-out. Constructivism does not recognize art as a form of aesthetic experience—which, it declares, is a purely bourgeois method of intellectual self-indulgence. Communist or proletarian art has no use for aesthetics. It is merely everyday life organized in a manner that enables every element of that life to function with the utmost ease and efficiency. Thus the stage was bared of all that was not fulfilling the purely utilitarian function of assisting the actors in their movements. The front curtain, already done away with in the Meierhold theater, was joined in the store-room by painted scenery and stage furniture. Instead of these there was raised on the stage a bare scaffolding with platforms at different levels and various contraptions for acrobatic movements. As performance in the theater was only a form of "labor process," the actors, too, could be only dramatic workmen. Accordingly they were all dressed in workmen's overalls of a uniform pattern—this also in order to submerge individual actors in the collective unity of the whole company. Without going into further details, it is sufficient to note that after two years of practical application the theory of constructivism completely broke down. The theater as a medium of art reasserted itself in every direction. The actor cast off his workman's uniform and became again a performer. The gaunt scaffoldings gave place to the moving screens, the revolving floor, and other devices which, while giving a dynamic character to the setting, also unmistakably proclaimed their essentially theatrical origin. Yet something has remained from constructivism. First of all there is the abolition of painted scenery. And second, there has survived a peculiar style—sharp and staccato—which has given Meierhold's productions an exceptional virility and pungency of form. The old folk-theater has thus become modernized. But this modernity rests on methods that go back to the very sources of the theatrical art and that found their most brilliant expression in the Commedia dell' Arte.

Meierhold is not to be judged by his profession of this or that theory. He is an artist of rare sensitiveness, and the fertility of his imagination, which never ceases throwing out new ideas, is almost such as to inspire one with awe. In the whole world of the theater today there is no more potent or more significant force than he. For those who are interested in his work and are familiar with Russian, the book under review will prove a store-house of valuable information and exciting theories.

Latin-American Emancipation

Diplomatic Correspondence of the United States Concerning the Independence of the Latin-American Nations. Selected and arranged by William R. Manning. Oxford University Press. Three volumes. $15.

EIGHTEEN years ago a group of distinguished American historians, acting under the auspices of a governmental committee, prepared a report entitled "Documentary Historical Publications of the United States Government." They pointed out that the manner in which our government had published its records was haphazard, disjected, and unsystematic. Further, they maintained that there was in government archives a vast quantity of material which ought to be printed. Not only has our government failed yet to publish documents from its archives; it has also sadly fallen behind in the publication of its diplomatic papers known as the "Foreign Relations of the United States."

In 1916 Dr. Alejandro Alvarez, a widely known Chilean publicist, proposed to the director of the Division of International Law of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace that this corporation should publish documents from our archives concerning the liberation of the Latin-American peoples from European rule. With the aid of the Department of State the task was completed, and the series under review is the fruit.

Considerable pains have been taken to make the contents of these volumes available to readers. Each volume contains a careful list of the papers printed within its covers. A footnote to each document gives a specific reference to the respective volume of the "American State Papers" where it is already printed or to the particular series of the American archives where the original is found. There is an analytical index. But the collection would be still more useful to neophytes in the study of Latin America if it contained a bibliography of the literature respecting the important epoch with which it is concerned. And it is to be regretted that in the case of certain documents the editor did not print the Spanish or the Portuguese originals instead of the English translations which also repose in the State Department. For not only do the official renderings frequently lack finish; occasionally they are obscure or misleading.

To the increasing class of students in the United States who are interested in that vast domain often designated as Hispanic America, a veritable treasure of historical stuff is now made available. This material spans the years from 1809 to 1830. It includes letters from agents of the United States in Argentina, Brazil, Central America, England, France, "Great Colombia," Mexico, the Netherlands, Peru, Russia, Spain, and Uruguay, as well as the corresponding communications from Washington. Incidentally the work also contains some evidence respecting the revolutionary period par excellence in Bolivia and Paraguay.

There are illuminating documents about such heroic figures of the Latin-American struggles for independence as José Bonifacio, Pedro I, Artigas, O'Higgins, Sucre, San Martín, and Bolívar. Obscure emissaries from Latin-American countries may now be more fully envisaged. Scattered through the volumes are many suggestive papers regarding the policies of divers European Powers toward the rising nations of Latin America. Sidelights are afforded on the mysterious association of monarchs known as the Holy Alliance and on the famous pronunciamiento known as the Doctrine of Monroe.

In fine these substantial volumes contain a bewildering array of documents concerning the transformation of the continental American colonies of Spain and Portugal into independent nations—a transformation which John Quincy Adams extravagantly characterized as the most important event in modern history. The collection will be most highly appreciated by students of history in South America, where the separatist movement from Spain has long been a favorite field of investigation. Supplemented by documents from the rich archives of England, France, and Spain, it will aid the historian of the future to write a comprehensive narrative of the Spanish-American Revolution. The editor, the State Department, and the Carnegie Endowment have performed a valuable service to historians in both America and Europe.

WILLIAM SPENCE ROBERTSON

The Glory of the Purple

Byzantine Portraits. By Charles Diehl. Translated by Harold Bell. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

LIKE most French scholars, M. Diehl bears his knowledge lightly. For many years professor of Byzantine history at the Sorbonne, he has published the usual number of monographs and delivered the usual number of lectures; but, if this work is typical, they are monographs and lectures very different from the ordinary sort. It is apparent that he has every essential fact—economic, historical, and artistic—at his pen's point, yet his decorous verve, his dry wit, and his luminous perspicacity never desert him. M. Diehl even invests his occasional footnotes—for he is imperturbably orthodox—with an almost poetic charm.

This "history of a vanished society" is not concerned overmuch with wars and the revolutions of dynasties. Rather, it portrays "the varying aspects of daily life, the different ways of living and thinking, the manners and customs—the civilization, in short." Delving into the period that includes the fifth to the eleventh centuries A.D., M. Diehl has extricated a round dozen age-encrusted medallions of empresses, emperors, more or less exemplary middle-class people, and folk of low degree, and, twirling them between an expert thumb and finger, he gravely exhibits their exotic shapes and dazzling shades to those who care to see. The manifold accomplishments of the Pagan-Christian poetess Athenais, the lapis-lazuli splendor of the viciously virtuous Theodora, the muddled theological speculations of Justinian, the drab indecencies of Zoë Porphyrogenita, the Cato-like maxims of the indefatigably loquacious Cecaumenus, now carefully cleansed from the dust of ages, shine forth as they shone in life. Sometimes he rubs out the defacing lines that other artists have etched, and repairs the gap by a deft

A new and original study by Emanuel Kanter, author of THE AMAZONS. It explains in a novel fashion the economic and social causes that produce war. It points out the weakness of present-day pacifism, and shows the social changes that must precede the complete elimination of war. Ample historical data are cited to support the author's theories.

stroke of his own. "It must not be forgotten that Procopius has a habit of investing his characters with an almost epic perversity; and although he tries hard to determine to a hair's-breadth the lowest point to which Theodora fell, I for my part regard her—though her interest may thereby be diminished—as the heroine of a less extraordinary tale. She was a dancer who, having led the same life as the majority of her kind in all ages, tired suddenly of her precarious amours, and, finding a sensible man [the Emperor Justinian] who could provide her with a home, settled down to married life and conjugal devotion—an adventuress, perhaps, but at the same time astute, quiet, and clever enough to be able to keep up appearances; one who could marry even a future emperor without a fearful scandal."

That is scholarship—the rare scholarship that is graced with the addition of art and judicious wit. It must also be said that, as M. Diehl tells the tale, Theodora's fascination is in no whit diminished. If this twenty-one-year-old work, now for the first time rendered into English, has also been translated into the language of the spirits, one fancies that the lascivious ghost of Procopius is somewhat ill at ease.

Freud's Latest Contribution

Hemmung, Symptom, und Angst. Von Sigmund Freud. Internationaler Psychoanalytischer Verlag. Leipzig, Wien, Zürich.

SINCE 1920 Freud has added a series of volumes to his previous papers on metapsychology and has arrived, in his investigations, at a synthesis which represents the new methodology in psychoanalysis. These volumes are: "Beyond the Pleasure Principle," "Group Psychology and the Ego," and "The Ego and the Id," the last being a synthetic study of the topical and dynamic mechanisms operating in the formation of the neurosis. The present and latest volume is an application of these concepts to the major problems in the psychoneuroses.

"Inhibition, Symptom, and Anxiety" begins with an analysis of the phenomena of inhibition and symptom formation in terms of the Id, Ego, and Super-Ego, and proceeds to a study of these forces in relation to the basic psychical functions. Four primary functions in particular are selected for consideration, namely, the sexual instinct, nutrition, locomotion (muscular activity), and creative effort. Investigation of mental disorders reveals the presence of conflicts between the primitive urges of the Id (among which sexual and asocial predominate) and the opposing forces of the Ego, which, though derived from the Id, represent the ethical personality and are a kind of guardian for maintaining the equilibrium of the mind. Additional conflict is caused by the governing forces of the Super-Ego, which represents the sum total of parental and educational influences, derived not only from individual experiences of the past but also from racial heredity. Conflict may take place between these aspects of the psyche, so that the Ego must simultaneously appease these opposing forces: the Id and the Super-Ego. In such a case the development of a neurosis may be the best solution. (From the beginning Freud called attention to the fact that the neurosis was the result of unsuccessful efforts of self-cure.)

Another problem discussed in detail is the role of the Ego in anxiety and repression. New light is thrown upon the formation of anxiety which constitutes one of the salient points in the investigation of the neurosis. Here Freud reconstructs some of his earlier conceptions. The former phenomenological point of view, which conceives that under conditions of frustration the invested libido (katexis) undergoes an automatic transformation, is discarded, and for it is substituted a metapsychological exposition in harmony with the new development. This exposition conceives of the Ego as the locus where anxiety is formed. At the outbreak of the neurosis, anxiety is not an entirely new

THIRD ANNUAL SUMMER CONFERENCE
(Formerly held at Olivet, Michigan)
UNDER THE AUSPICES OF Fellowship for a Christian Social Order
ON THE CAMPUS OF HILLSDALE COLLEGE
HILLSDALE, MICHIGAN, AUGUST 1-27, 1927

Nature of the Conference

THE discussion method will be used throughout the conference. The themes will be: International Relations, August 1-6; Economic-Industrial Relations, August 8-13; Family Relations, August 15-20; Educational Method, August 22-27.

There will be two sessions each morning and one each evening. The conference leaders, together with members of the conference who wish to share in building the program will, at the close of each session, plan for the next in the light of the preceding discussions. From six to ten persons with special knowledge or experience relating to the theme of each week will be present to contribute democratically, as called upon, to the discussion.

Rest and Recreation

Hillsdale College, with its beautiful sixty-acre campus and attractive residence halls, offers a delightful setting for the conference. Afternoons will be free for relaxation and recreation. Tennis courts, an athletic field and a new gymnasium are available. Registrants will be privileged to use near by golf links at a small cost. A group of lakes, easily accessible by auto, offers excellent facilities for bathing, boating, rowing and canoeing.

Rates and Registration

Hillsdale College will operate its dormitories and dining room on a cost basis for the conference. Adults (two in a room), including conference fee of $1.00 per day, $19.50 per week; transients (less than six days), $3.50 per day; single rooms, $2.00 per week extra. Children, ages 6-12, $8.50 per week; ages 3-6, $5.50 per week; under three, special rates. Good dining room service is assured.

The conference is open to all who care to come. Registrants are strongly urged to remain throughout the month as the program is cumulative. Discussion of a new theme begins on Monday. Registrations should be in by July 15th, if possible.

The conference seeks to combine physical recreation, wholesome social contacts, mental stimulus and spiritual regirding.

All inquiries should be addressed to creation, but a reproduction based upon a past memory. Freud also clarifies the relation between anxiety, the primary trauma, and the situation of danger which urges the individual to a neurosis as the only way out. Anxiety is represented as a panic-reaction to the original trauma, which now, in a new danger situation, is used as a signal for help. In man and the higher animals birth is the first anxiety experience. It furnishes a kind of model after which subsequent expressions of anxiety may be patterned. But one must not assume that in each case of anxiety the birth experience is relived. In this connection Rank's "birth-trauma theory" is considered and largely rejected.

If "Inhibition, Symptom, and Anxiety" is a further evidence of Freud's searching intellect it is even more remarkable as an example of his creative art. For here we have combined in one the scientist and the artist. He not only discovers the mine but with his own hand shapes the rough stone into the precious object. Step by step we see him unearth the material he is seeking and watch him put the material together; and we lose sight of the laboring hand in our fascination with the emerging form. In his hand the material is not inanimate; by a kind of magic it becomes part of the creative molding tool itself.

Freud's task ends here. We have the feeling of going through a quarry rather than of being shown through a museum. Freud attaches no labels to his work. He has never attempted any philosophic evaluation. Always others have formed a philosophy of life out of his work. Now he specifically states what was always apparent to those who knew his work at first hand: "I am not at all desirous of manufacturing a philosophy of life. One may leave that to the philosophers who confessedly see no way of journeying through life except with a Baedeker that gives information on everything." This book, together with the previous ones on metapsychology, constitutes a foundation of a new "Physiology of the Psyche." It presupposes a thorough knowledge and understanding of the author's previous work. But, above all, it calls for a certain mental ruggedness. At last psychoanalysis has reached that stage of development which discourages the exponent of superficial popularization and attracts the student who approaches it as the natural scientist approaches bacteriology or micro-biology.

DORIAN FEIGENBAUM

Books in Brief

Walpurgis. Zur Kunstgestalt von Goethes Faust. Von Julius Frankenberger. Leipzig: Ernst Wiegandt, Verlagsbuchhandlung. 3.50 marks.

A conscientious effort to prove that the Walpurgisnacht episode from the first part of "Faust" is not, as many even of the poet's admirers have conceded, a random and impertinent interruption, but a careful and wisely planned part of a symmetrical whole. Walpurgis, explains this apologist, is a much-needed intermission in the exhausting Gretchen tragedy, and is conceived on the plan of the French "revue-ballet," very shrewdly and purposely chaotic.

Charlotte de Belgique, Impératrice du Mexique. Par Comtesse H. de Reinach Foussemagne. Paris: Plon-Nourrit.

It appears to be beyond doubt that if it had not been for his wife, Maximilian would at the first prospect of the withdrawal of the French army have abdicated and fled, saving his life at the expense of his honor. Charlotte was more than a pathetic sufferer in the Mexican fiasco. She was the protagonist of the tragedy. The government of Francis Joseph guarded its secret archives jealously, but the present Republican government is much more liberal, and much new light has been shed upon European affairs since the historians have had a free hand at Vienna. The Comtesse de Reinach Foussemagne has made free use, on the one hand, of this official Austrian material, and on the other of the personal recollections of the Belgian royal family, who also are freer-spoken concerning the whole matter than was the generation before them, and has written the completest and most authoritative life of Charlotte to date.

Villa U. S. A. Von Otto Flake. Berlin: S. Fischer Verlag.

The unconventional moralist who wrote "Ruland" and "Der gute Weg" has produced another record of emancipated women and strong men seeking they know not what. This time the main theme is a sort of trial marriage between two superior beings who finally settle down to Philistine domesticity, one scarcely understands how or why. Flake grows harder and harder to read. A book of his is a complicated fabric of texts and musings, intense, unsparing, and oracular as a novel of Goethe's, and a hundred times more baffling. But he is always profitable reading.

Sœurs de Grands Hommes. Jacqueline Pascal, Lucile de Chateaubriand, Henriette Renan. Par Victor Giraud. Paris: Crès. 10 francs.

These rapid sketches bring no information which could not easily be found elsewhere. Two of them cover ground which Victor Giraud has himself already traversed, but the third is interesting as a completely successful effort to show that 50 per cent of Ernest Renan's spiritual autobiography is totally unreliable. It was not the philological studies of his manhood but the metaphysical speculations of his early youth, and more than anything else the perhaps unconsciously uncandid honeycombing of his faith by that admirable deist his elder sister, the sister who fed him both materially and spiritually (although he complacently assures us that she always refrained completely from influencing him in matters of conscience), that made a skeptic of him.

Brücken über den Atlantik. Beiträge zum amerikanischen und deutschen Geistesleben. Von O. E. Lessing. Stuttgart, Berlin, und Leipzig: Deutsche Verlagsanstalt.

A number of Professor Lessing's previously printed essays on a variety of subjects, most of them studies of writers—Thoreau, Whitman, Mark Twain, Howells for German readers, and Treitschke, Görres, Goethe for American readers—are here collected and given a certain air of unity by inserting into each one of them, if it did not already possess it, a bitter reference to the recent war. Most of what Professor Lessing says about the sorry business is true, although his way of saying it may not help Germany's cause with honest but prejudiced American hundred-percenters. There is ingenuity as well as perfect justice in his successful demonstration of the fact that the never-to-be-sufficiently-execrated Treitschke held identically the position for Germany that thousands of respectable advocates of preparedness in this country hold this minute for America.

Amerika ist anders. Von Arthur Rundt. Volksverband der Bücherfreunde. Berlin: Wegweiser-Verlag.

The German dearly loves a problem. But his efforts to reduce Uncle Sam to a formula have thus far but confounded confusion. Thus Arthur Rundt, starting out in the spirit of his title, undertakes to show that Americans are different from Europeans, not merely in some incidents of government and table etiquette but in the very roots of their being—"nicht nur staatsbürgerlich, sondern auch geistig, seelisch." But by the time he has reached his last page he has discovered that just as Europe is constantly Americanizing, so America is becoming daily more European, not merely in outer form but in inner substance.

Dorothea Angermann. Schauspiel von Gerhart Hauptmann. Berlin: S. Fischer Verlag.

"Dorothea Angermann" is in form a return to the problem-play of Hauptmann's audacious youth. There are even some definite reminiscences of "Vor Sonnenaufgang" and "Die Weber." But the mill can never grind with the water that is past. Hauptmann is no longer a naturalist; he has no power even to simulate naturalism except to the extent of cementing an occasional stone from his sordid youthful tragedies into the eerie structures he builds nowadays. Dorothea is a denatured Tess, a vulgarized Ophelia; but the brutal bludgeon which the sexagenarian Hauptmann handles somehow softens into thin air when it strikes.

Der Aufruhr um den Junker Ernst. Von Jakob Wassermann. Berlin: S. Fischer. 3.50 marks.

Wassermann is proving that German prose is capable of the most telling simplicity. There is not a sentence from the beginning to the end of this desolately, yearningly beautiful tale of superstition, courage, and devotion in the broken Germany of the Thirty Years' War and the plague of witch-finding which needs a second reading; and there is not a sentence which would not repay it.

Unordnung und frühes Leid. Novelle. Von Thomas Mann. Berlin: S. Fischer Verlag. 3 marks.

In this quiet record of a few hours from the average day of a modest post-bellum German professor's family—twelve or thirteen thousand words of conventional German, with no phrase-making and a minimum of philosophizing—Thomas Mann has put more of Germany's constraint and discomfort, of the younger generation's disquieting iconoclasm, of a father's puzzled tenderness, of a little girl's touchingly tragi-comic forewarnings of womanhood, more, incidentally, of warm humor and vivid artistry, than any thick volume of German fiction has offered in a long time.

Strategie der männlichen Annäherung. Von Dr. med. Heinrich F. Wolf. Wien-Leipzig: Ilos Verlag.

This physician claims to have produced the first systematic study of the devices by which men deceive women. The virtuous maid armed with this valuable treatise will thereby have acquired a sort of moral jiu-jitzu which will reduce all designing males to innocuity.

Carmina Cantabrigiensia. Edited by Karl Strecker. Monumenta Germaniae Historica Series. Berlin: Weidmannsche Buchhandlung. 8 marks.

The Carmina Cantabrigiensia are a group of forty-nine medieval Latin songs, including several excerpts from the classics, that are preserved in a huge eleventh-century manuscript (Gg 5.35, pp. 432-441) in the Cambridge University Library. The collection is of German origin and is of considerable importance for the study of the medieval lyric, both Latin and vernacular. In 1915 Professor Karl Breul published a sumptuous edition of the poems, under the fanciful title of "The Cambridge Songs, a Goliard's Song Book of the XIth Century." Though valuable, his edition is not irreproachable as a piece of scientific editing. The present edition is a model of exact, heroically thorough scholarship.

Drama

A Well-Made Play

IN the theater students and practitioners alike may be significantly divided into those who seem to rejoice in the limitations of their medium and those who rebel against them. Perhaps Aristotle, first of dramatic critics, gave unintentional support to the former class when he analyzed the structure of the Greek tragedy, and certainly whatever society has been sophisticated enough to discuss its drama has been plagued by those who delight to see it stereotyped and limited. From the Scaligers of Italy and Hedelins of France on through the Rymers of England and down to the Clayton Hamiltons of America they are one and all members of the same tribe. At their most gravely pedantic they talk of those mysteriously sacred unities of time and place, and sometimes, turning from manner to matter, they remark conclusively that this subject or that is "not suitable for the stage"; at their most vulgar they formulate the exigent standards of Broadway; but whether their conversation is concerned with the nature of the scène à faire or with the ineluctable necessity of sex appeal they are alike in one essential respect: they rejoice to see plays maintaining the slightest possible contact with life and to see playwriting reduced to a mechanic art. Nor does the exceeding mutability of their immutable principles appear to disconcert them. Faced with the triumph of Shakespeare, Rymer calmly proceeded to analyze "Othello" as a typical example of a bad play, and faced with the triumph of Shaw, Clayton Hamilton calmly continued to maintain that Pinero was a greater because a more popular dramatist in spite of the fact that today it is Shaw who fills theaters and Pinero who empties them. Doubtless the stage has its limitations and art its rules, but the first are less narrow and the second less accurately known than those who delight to formulate them are aware, and the men who, daring to violate have succeeded in enlarging them, are the ones to whom belong its greatest triumphs. "When I am amused," wrote Lope de Vega scornfully, "I do not ask if the rules of Aristotle forbid me to laugh," and when Ibsen heard that the somberest tragedies of modern society were not subjects suitable for the stage he proceeded to make them so.

The mechanic dramatist and the critics who praise the complacent timidity of his reiterated formulas have their reward because the former enjoys an immediate triumph not to be hoped for by the playwright who imposes upon his audience the disconcerting necessity of laughing at a new joke, feeling in a new way, appreciating a new technique, or enlarging its imagination to include the perception of a new situation or a new acceptance of some fact of life, and both because he and his defender are more often than not welcomed into those legions of honor and academies of immortals which seem to have been founded for the particular purpose of affirming the enduring greatness of all things whose littleness it takes only time to reveal. But the other camp has its surest triumph when some half-forgotten chef-d'œuvre of "technique," some masterpiece by one of the dramatists who "knew his theater," is dragged from limbo and presented before an audience which has become habituated to other conventions and other fashions. Nothing could have more surely demonstrated that Pinero was dead beyond any possible hope of resurrection than the attempt two seasons ago to revive "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," and nothing could show better how utterly the best "well-made" plays must now fail to arouse our enthusiasm than the production of that once sensational drama by Henri Bernstein, "The Thief" (Ritz Theater).

"The Thief" is not, like Pinero's plays, merely boresome. Whatever principles of "construction" as applied to drawing-room drama can be reduced to a few simple rules Bernstein had completely mastered. He knew how to make an unobtrusive and yet significant "plant," he knew just how an artificial suspense can be created by withholding one bit of information while supplying another, and he knew how to manipulate his situations so as to bring about a conclusion in which praise and blame, happiness and misery are distributed in a way calculated with the nicest exactitude to satisfy the audience's conventional sense of what is just and fitting. As a result the play succeeds even now in maintaining a sort of temporary and artificial interest; but how poor and bloodless a thing it seems with its stereotyped passions and its neat little ethical problems so carefully ticketed and so thoroughly predigested. How poor a substitute is the technique which it parades for the life which it lacks; how thinly mechanical are its characters; and how timidly conventional the treatment of its "daring" theme. Perhaps it will enjoy even now a certain success, but even to the most naive audience it cannot seem so moving and so dazzling as once it did, for even in the cheapest of our plays we have grown accustomed to something which carries with it a greater suggestion of the complexity, the warmth, and the unexpectedness of life. Shaw once said that though the English public had not been taught to like Ibsen it had come away from his plays incapable of continuing to enjoy the fare with which it had once been satisfied, and a similar effect has been wrought upon this side of the Atlantic by a whole generation of playwrights whose aim has been to widen, not restrict, the possibility of the theater. Even our bad or trivial plays must be bad or trivial in a new way.

Doubtless "The Thief" was revived in despair of finding any suitable play for Alice Brady, and her warm and skilful playing gives to the piece whatever humanity it has. During the past few years Miss Brady has appeared in a number of plays, some good and some bad, but not even the best have proved popular, and she still waits for the opportunity which will bring her the wide acclaim which she deserves as one of the most ingratiating as well as one of the most powerful and versatile actresses now appearing upon the stage.

"Goat Alley" (Princess Theater) is a sordid and moving naturalistic tragedy somewhat unevenly acted by a company of Negro players; "Wall Street" (Hudson Theater) an elaborate melodrama in which the effect of certain powerfully conceived scenes is marred by the continual intrusion of extraordinarily banal situations, characters, and motives borrowed from the melodrama of our fathers. "Hit the Deck" (Belasco Theater) is a pert and tuneful addition to the season's musical shows which provides any jazz band with at least two new dance hits.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

Unless the Nationalist authorities demonstrate to the satisfaction of the interested governments their intention to comply promptly with these terms, the said governments will find themselves compelled to take such measures as they consider appropriate.

THIS WAS THE CONCLUDING PARAGRAPH of the joint note sent by the Powers to Eugene Chen, Foreign Secretary of the Nationalist Government, on April 11. When Mr. Chen replied asking for a neutral inquiry into the happenings at Nanking all the foreign offices involved, except our own, intimated that the note was entirely unsatisfactory and all the bellicose foreigners, civilian or military, in Shanghai licked their chops in anticipation of an immediate cutting apart of China by a gunboat patrol of the Yangtze and the closing of the port of Shanghai. Fortunately, Mr. Coolidge, having heard from the country in no uncertain terms, declined to give his assent either to the use of force or even to another note. That knocked the bottom out of the coalition and led to the fiercest kind of denunciation of Mr. Coolidge and the United States at Shanghai, where the belief was openly expressed that good old John Bull would see it through by himself if need be. Alas, for these seekers after Chinese blood! When Mr. Chamberlain got up in Parliament on May 9 to explain his Government's decision he cooed as gently as any sucking dove, saying that his Government deemed it "inexpedient" to apply penalties just now for the Nanking outrage. It had, he said, every right to do so; justice was on England's side; it could take back the Hankow concession by force if it chose, for the troops and ships were there, but it seemed wisest not to do so. And anyhow, Mr. Chamberlain asserted, the Hankow (Cantonese) Government had so lost its power and prestige that it was nothing more than the shadow of a name. Finally, he admitted, the crimes against foreigners "had been punished with a severity and speed impossible from any other Power."

FOR ALL OF THIS WE GIVE our profoundest thanks. We do not care what face-saving devices Mr. Chamberlain has resorted to or will attempt to use. We do not believe that the Cantonese movement is spent, nor can we fail to smile at his assertion that the outrages in Nanking were the work of the Third International in Moscow. The point is that the Powers have abandoned the blood-and-iron policy which their identic note, by the severity of its tone and its threat, implied. Something has made the Powers come to their senses. If it was Mr. Coolidge whose refusal to go along stopped the plan for a nice little war in China, we salute him most warmly and extend our most cordial congratulations. Even if the other Powers might have come to the same decision, he deserves all credit for having disregarded the advice of our Minister, Mr. MacMurray, and our Admirals. The former, who should now be allowed to resign gracefully, not only joined the other Peking diplomats in drafting the note which was to have preceded the punishment of China, but forwarded it to Washington for adoption, if press reports are correct. Mr. Coolidge's next step should be to recall the marine regiments and reduce the fleet. The Americans who now remain in the dangerous districts know that they do so at their own risk. Let us follow up this good work by getting out of China and ceasing to intervene in her unhappy domestic concerns.

THE NICARAGUA CRISIS seems to have been ended by the mission of Colonel Henry L. Stimson, but by a most dangerous means. Even Mr. Kellogg admits that the personal representative of Calvin Coolidge—he holds no government office or commission—warned the Liberals that our policy of "safeguarding" American property would be changed into one of deliberate military attack if the Liberals did not at once lay down their arms. In return the Conservatives have been induced to agree to the following acts of conciliation: Their forces are to be disarmed, as well as those of the Liberals; amnesty is to be granted all around; the Liberals will participate in the present Government which will hold office until the regular elections of 1928, when the United States will supervise the elections and recognize the winner, whoever he may be. Meanwhile, however, the United States marines will continue to police the country and prevent a further outbreak, besides standing guard over the ballot boxes more than a year hence.

AS WE GO TO PRESS, the period granted to the Liberals for the acceptance of these terms has not expired. General Moncada seems ready to yield, but Sacasa is rightly outraged by the Stimson proposal. Nonetheless we trust he will accept. Any further bloodshed could only have the most disastrous consequences for all concerned. But even Mr. Coolidge will not now be able to deny that this is intervention in the domestic affairs of Nicaragua of the most thoroughgoing kind. Well, for the moment at least, it seems to terminate an adventure which has done incalculable injury to the reputation of the United States throughout South America because of the blundering and the deliberate misrepresentations of the Coolidge Administration. It got itself and the United States into a dreadful hole and knew no way to extricate itself until it sent this unofficial plenipotentiary down to rattle the saber and threaten both sides. This may bring peace to Nicaragua, but we deny that it adds to America's reputation, or that it reflects the slightest credit upon the Coolidge Government. We are certain that the effect it will have upon all Latin America can be nothing else than bad. Indeed, our intervention made the struggle far longer than it would otherwise have been, kept in power a puppet President who obviously would have been driven from office but for us—if it has not added to the number of lives lost. This is called statesmanship and convincing evidence of our love for our Central and South American neighbors. And on top of this "peace" move comes the news that we are rushing 800 more marines to Nicaragua!

SWIFT AND PROPER retaliation for the cowardly and boorish refusal of President Coolidge and Secretary Kellogg to permit Madame Kollontay, the Soviet Ambassador to Mexico, to pass through United States territory has been made by the Soviet Government. It has refused permission to Rear-Admiral Mark L. Bristol to traverse Russian territory in traveling from Constantinople to China, where he is to take command of our Asiatic fleet. He must, therefore, catch a steamer in the Mediterranean. Since, however, Mrs. Bristol is an invalid, and could not stand the extra travel the Admiral must endure, the gentlemen in charge of the Soviet Foreign Office have very courteously permitted her to go direct to Peking across their country. What an extraordinary difference it would make in our relations with all the world if we could get some gentlemen into our State Department who were not routinized out of good manners, common sense, and decent human emotions!

THE SPECTACLE of a few thousand human beings throwing up poor human fortifications against the crest of the flood that is thundering down from Natchez is at once gallant and pitiful. Red River Landing is the center of activities as we go to press. There, where the powerful Red River flows into the Mississippi, is a key triangle from which—if the levee holds—the Mississippi will continue southeast on its way to New Orleans, already partially protected by the dynamited Poydras levee, and if the levee breaks—as it seems distressingly likely to do—two million acres in the south central portion of the State will be under water and 160,000 additional persons rendered homeless. Red River Landing: it is not hard to picture the feverish activities that are going on there, the sandbags, the stone fortifications, the earthworks, and, in addition to these, the grim preparations of the Red Cross—boats to ferry refugees, tents, bedding, supplies, as if confidence in the strength of the levee were faint indeed. This has been the worst flood that history records. Perhaps it will be bad enough to teach the lesson that Walter Parker made clear in last week's Nation: Levees are not enough. They never can be enough. The more the river is confined the higher it will rise. It is significant that for the dynamited levee at Poydras the city of New Orleans will be forced to compensate residents of the inundated region to the extent of $15,000,000; yet when, four years ago, New Orleans asked permission to make an outlet at Poydras at a cost to the city of $5,000,000, the federal authorities refused permission. A gigantic relief program demanding millions of dollars for some half million homeless persons must be attended to first. When the waters recede there will be land to plow again, houses to build, crops to resow, and all the details to attend to that mean subsistence for so many thousands. Then it will be time to think seriously of the future.

PARIS TODAY—NEW YORK TOMORROW: that was the ambitious plan of the French fliers, Coli and Nungesser, as they took the air for their conquest of the Atlantic last Sunday. But the Atlantic is a jealous ocean and does not yield lightly to ambitious plans. We do not yet know what has become of the two men; we may never know. The solitary white bird that took flight so bravely may have come down with a broken wing, may have been unable to buffet wind and rain or to see its way through clinging fog; all around it miles of ocean lay waiting to defeat its passage, miles of eager waves that prey so gladly upon brave birds. The plane, we are told, carried no wireless and discarded its landing gear as soon as it flew above the ocean. It is constructed of water-tight wood and can float about twenty-four hours before becoming waterlogged. Forty hours of flying will have used up its supply of gasoline. Thus the margin of safety is already passed, but miracles do happen, and a miracle is what millions of persons at this moment of writing are hoping for. In Paris crowds saw the fliers off at dawn; in New York the Battery was black with people watching all day Monday. Wherever they are now, whether the White Bird is flying or floating or sunk beyond the reach of rescuers, the thoughts and the anxious regard of millions accompany it. There is something heart-warming about this sort of daring; it is not quite necessary—yet sometimes on it depends the progress of the race.

NEWS POURS IN EVERY WEEK of brutal oppression in Central European and Balkan dictatorships. Mass arrests, prison tortures, and inhuman sentences are still the order of the day. "Disappearance without trace" after arrest is a common fate, not only of workers but of leading political opponents of the Government and well-known professional men. Since the Tirana treaty between Italy and Albania last November, which intrenched Achmed Zoghu more firmly in power, persecution in Albania has been more ferocious than before. The dictator of this impoverished little country, who appropriated for the expenses of his "court" one-eleventh of the budget, has sold out the resources of the nation to Italian capital and is devoting his energies to getting rid of those who oppose him. Death sentences have been passed on intellectuals, editors, and deputies. Fan Noli, democratic Premier from whom Zoghu seized power, has been sentenced to death. Don Gazulli, a priest, was hanged because he criticized the government for allowing old men, women, and children to die of cold and hunger in the prisons. Similar tales can be told of Bulgaria and other countries. Last month the protests of intellectuals and of workers' organizations throughout the world succeeded in obtaining a transfer of the trial of thirty Hungarian labor leaders from the military court, where an unfavorable verdict would have meant hanging, to the civil court. Such conditions exist only as long as they are tolerated by world opinion.

A CLEAR-CUT INSTANCE of radio censorship was given by Station WGL on May 2. At a dinner of the All Nations Association in honor of Mrs. Mille Gade Corson, who is about to leave for England to attempt to swim the Channel again, Mrs. Mary H. Ford made an address in the course of which she began to congratulate Mrs. Corson upon coming from a country, Denmark, which was pacifist during the war and is leaning toward the abolition of all military force. She had hardly touched upon the subject when she was deliberately cut off. The station manager, a Mr. Isaacson, gave the usual declaration of his belief in free speech but said that "there are certain things which are dictated by good taste. This was not the time nor the occasion for such a speech." But what right has a station manager to assume that his judgment as to what is fitting is superior to that of Mrs. Ford or any other speaker? We admit that there are difficulties in the situation and that the broadcasting stations will be at times the victims of abuse or misrepresentation or bad taste. But there can be no stopping the fight for free speech over the radio until it is won. It would never have occurred to Mr. Isaacson to censor a speaker demanding more armaments and virtual war in China, Mexico, or Nicaragua. He must be taught that no excuse can be accepted for cutting off a speaker except the one that that speaker breaks the laws of the United States.

AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP FOR HINDUS was the subject discussed at a dinner given for Senator Copeland recently for his sponsorship of the Hindu Citizenship Bill. Senator Copeland declared himself in favor of a change in the immigration law, basing restrictions not on national or geographical quotas or on color but on the physical, mental, and moral qualifications of the immigrant. Hindus at present are refused citizenship in the United States because they are not white, although they claim membership in the Caucasian race. The retroactive feature of the law is its worst aspect; naturalized Hindus who have believed themselves to be citizens and who have been so considered for more than ten years, in some cases, are now deprived of citizenship rights. Senator Copeland, in his fight for his bill, deserves the thanks of every American citizen. Whether or not the Hindu is a Caucasian is beside the point; he has proved to be a good citizen; there is no likelihood whatever that a rush of Hindus will come clamoring at our doors for admittance—if they did, our quota restrictions would take care of any such emergency. Those who do come—students, scholars, men and women of education or in earnest search of education—should not be forced to maintain the status of aliens all their lives. Above all, this Government, which charges Mexico with breaking its word to American citizens domiciled there, should be the last to break its faith and word with men honestly admitted to citizenship years ago.

"YOUNG PEOPLE are without indecency. It is only when their elders slather into a furore over indecency that they are made indecent." John Erskine, author of "Helen" and "Galahad," said this publicly the other day in the course of a protest against the action of the customs authorities in holding up shipments of unexpurgated editions of "The Arabian Nights" and the "Decameron." If more persons as eminent as Mr. Erskine would talk like this—pointing to the simple truth that indecency is rarely in a book or a thing, but in a mind—something might be accomplished against irresponsible censorship. But not many do. Other professors, for instance, asked to comment on the violence done "The Arabian Nights" and the "Decameron," merely deposed that these are venerable books and therefore ought to circulate. The question, which Mr. Erskine answered emphatically, is whether any book shall be suppressed which is not clearly within the statute governing obscenity. He might have added that there is an amazing inconsistency in the minds of newspaper editors who clamor for certain plays to be extinguished or books to be suppressed and then fill three pages daily with verbatim reports of testimony in the latest nauseating murder trial.

EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON'S eminence among contemporary American poets has been recognized in various ways since the occasion of his fiftieth birthday eight years ago, when a page of tributes in the New York Times revealed the high opinion of him which his fellow-poets entertained. He has twice received the Pulitzer prize, and his "Collected Poems" has become a standard work both here and in England. But the public reading of his new poem, "Tristram," on the eve of its issue by the Macmillan Company and the Literary Guild of America, was a tribute of a special kind, and one which makes literary history. Mrs. August Belmont (Eleanor Robson) read the second half of the poem to an audience which overflowed the Little Theater in New York, and the reception was one which proved not only that Mr. Robinson has a devoted following but that good poetry has a public importance. We do not know of any other major American poem which has been thus honored. Mr. Robinson, who insisted beforehand that the occasion be called a "reading" and not a "tribute," did not appear until it was all over—when the welcome given him, he preferred to say, was inspired by this latest work rather than by the whole of his long and admirable career.

TO THE GROWING LIST of former college presidents who have recently died must now be added the name of Benjamin Ide Wheeler, for twenty years, until his retirement in 1919, president of the University of California. A gentle, scholarly personality, of broad range and vision, he valued freedom of opinion in his own case as well as in that of his faculty. Thus he warmly supported Theodore Roosevelt for the Presidency in 1912 despite wide criticism, and his tolerance of dissenting opinion and refusal to hate and be bitter when the United States entered the World War in 1917 gave great offense to the hundred-percenters of the day. Indeed, the charge that he was too friendly to the Germans was then raised against him. Had he not received an honorary degree from Heidelberg and been Roosevelt exchange professor for a year at Berlin? Under him the University of California grew from 2,391 students to nearly 20,000, while its plant was correspondingly enlarged and its teaching force grew both in numbers and in high scholarly standing. Rightly did the university announce with the news of his death that Dr. Wheeler more than anyone else was responsible for its present fine position in the field of American university education. Rarely, we believe, has a college president been held in warmer personal regard by faculty and students.

Judge Thayer Revealed

EVER since the conviction of Sacco and Vanzetti in Dedham, Massachusetts, six years ago, there have been disturbing stories in circulation in regard to the biased and improper conduct of Judge Webster Thayer, who presided at the trial. Most of these stories were told privately by reporters of Boston newspapers in attendance at the trial—men who had no use for the defendants or their beliefs but were amazed, and in some cases disgusted, by the judge's animus. A little of this judicial partisanship is to be found in the record of the case, but for the most part it consisted in words and acts of the trial judge when not on the bench. The Sacco-Vanzetti defense has been well aware of this conduct, but has not dared to stress it because under the curious judicial procedure of Massachusetts Judge Thayer is practically the court of appeals which reviews his own acts, and the counsel for the defense did not wish further to excite his hostility while praying to him for a new trial.

Now that the case is finally out of Judge Thayer's hands, six affidavits have been obtained, any one of which should be sufficient to establish his unfairness. Taken together they blast completely his reputation as a judge and a man; they shrivel him into a contemptible mixture of vanity and vulgarity who was not only guilty of grossly unjudicial conduct but who seized what was probably his first widely reported trial to curry public favor by pandering to the worst mob instincts then prevalent.

The affidavits are contained in a statement submitted to Governor Fuller of Massachusetts in behalf of Vanzetti. Sacco did not sign the statement. Depressed and broken in spirit by seven years of prison and unsuccessful appeal, Sacco seems to want to die; he almost courts martyrdom and absolutely refuses to ask for mercy. Vanzetti is equally set against any plea for mercy but still demands justice. Vanzetti, in his own part of the statement, brings out some damaging evidence against Judge Thayer:

> The District Attorney used as an Italian interpreter a man named Ross, who is now serving a sentence in the House of Correction for having attempted to sell to ignorant people his supposed influence with judges. You will find that our lawyer several times objected to Ross's translations of our cross-examination, and at one time had to get another Italian interpreter to protect us.
> Ross, who was in close relation with the District Attorney, took Judge Thayer to and from Dedham in his automobile almost every day during the trial. What he said to Judge Thayer we do not know; but as the affidavits show beyond a doubt that Judge Thayer was in the habit of talking about us and our case outside of court, and of allowing other people to talk to him about it, and as Ross was evidently doing what he could to help the District Attorney, you will excuse us for having great fears as to what he said to Judge Thayer on those automobile rides.

George U. Crocker, a distinguished lawyer and citizen of Boston and a fellow-member of Judge Thayer's in the University Club there, states that the jurist repeatedly discussed the case with him in the course of the trial. Of one occasion Mr. Crocker says:

> On this morning he either came to the table where I was sitting and asked if he could have breakfast with me or he called me to his table and asked me to have breakfast with him. He immediately began to talk again about the case, and pulled out of his pocket a portion of the charge which he was to deliver, as I understood it, on that day. He read parts of it to me with comments like this: "Counsel for defense said so and so yesterday, and this is my reply." He then read a part of the charge and said: "I think that that will hold him, don't you?"
> I do not remember how many times Judge Thayer talked to me about the case during the trial, but it was, I think, three or four times, and each time showing what appeared to me clearly to be bias against the defendants.

Lois B. Rantoul, who attended the trial as a representative of the Greater Boston Federation of Churches, cites two occasions when Judge Thayer talked with her. One was just after George Kelley, Sacco's employer, had testified in his behalf. Judge Thayer asked Mrs. Rantoul what she thought of the testimony. She said she thought it important. Then, says the affidavit:

> I well remember Judge Thayer's reply and the manner in which he gave it. He expressed scorn and contempt for my view, and told me that Kelley did not mean what he said because he (Judge Thayer) had heard that on the outside Kelley had said that Sacco was an anarchist and that he couldn't do anything with him. I told Judge Thayer that I had never before realized that it was fair to judge a case by what the witnesses said outside of court, and that I had supposed that the only proper way to judge a case was by what the witnesses said in open court. Judge Thayer's manner and expression of face expressed dissent from this view, but he made no definite statement of dissent.

In Boston Frank P. Sibley of the Globe is not only a reporter; he is an institution. For more than a score of years he has reported leading news events, and his reliability, intelligence, and independence are unchallenged. He describes how Judge Thayer gossiped with reporters:

> During the early stages of the trial when the talesmen were being examined and during one of the walks from the Dedham Inn to the Court House Judge Thayer proceeded to discuss Attorney Moore, one of the lawyers representing the defendant, Sacco. This subject seemed to excite him considerably and, among other remarks, he exclaimed: "I'll show them that no long-haired anarchist from California can run this court!" During the progress of the trial he frequently referred to the counsel for the defense as "those damn fools." On several occasions he said: "Just wait until you hear my charge."

John Nicholas Beffel, correspondent of the Federated Press, also tells of Judge Thayer's talks with the newspaper reporters. In one instance: "As he turned to leave the room he shook his fist and said to the other newspaper men: 'You wait till I give my charge to the jury. I'll show 'em!' "

The correspondent at the trial of the International News Service, Elizabeth R. Bernkopf, declares that Judge Thayer generally referred to Fred Moore of the counsel for the defense as "that long-haired anarchist."

Robert Benchley, dramatic editor of Life, tells of visiting his friend Loring Coes of Worcester (Judge Thayer's home) during the trial. Mr. Coes came out of the Worcester Golf Club and reported what Judge Thayer had just been saying inside:

> Mr. Coes told us that Judge Thayer, whom he referred to as "Web," had just been telling what he (Judge Thayer) intended to do to Sacco and Vanzetti, whom Judge Thayer referred to as "those bastards down there." Mr. Coes said that Judge Thayer had referred to Sacco and Vanzetti as Bolsheviki who were "trying to intimidate him," and had said that "he would get them good and proper."

Mr. Coes said that Judge Thayer had told him and the other men that a "bunch of parlor radicals were trying to get these guys off and trying to bring pressure to bear on the bench," and that he "would show them and would get those guys hanged," and that he (Judge Thayer) "would also like to hang a few dozen radicals."

Mr. Coes has since denied making such a statement, but he denial is not convincing in view of his previous deliberate refusal to try to recall what happened.

The six affidavits in the hands of Governor Fuller strip udge Thayer naked of decency and justice. They ought to orce his immediate resignation or lead to his speedy impeachment. A comparison between Webster Thayer and ontius Pilate is all in the latter's favor.

Art and the Municipality

HENRY RUTGERS MARSHALL, who died in New York on May 2, was an unusual type of public servant. n architect of high standing, a distinguished critic, a niversity lecturer, an author of six important works on esthetic and philosophical subjects, he spent the last eight ears of his life as secretary of the Municipal Art Commission of the City of New York. An humble job? By no eans. An inconspicuous one? Yes, if one measures the mportance of an office by the publicity a man achieves. ut if it be gauged by the service rendered to the community, it is one of the most useful, one of the most essential. Here was a man who could have taken his otium cum ignitate years ago; who could have lived in a rare country ome filled with heirlooms of Revolutionary days that many ould give a fortune to possess. Instead, he devoted himself to the difficult and often trying labor of passing upon ll the architectural and communal undertakings that came efore the Art Commission of the metropolis for approval.

There under the tower of New York's beautiful City Hall e sat, passing upon the plans submitted for public buildngs of every type, for water-works, for bridges, for police nd fire stations, for every sort of construction for which ublic money is expended. He it was who weeded out the ood from the bad before referring matters to the commission of which he was the executive. During these eight ears, therefore, the seal of his approval was stamped upon l the construction of our greatest city. He himself largely reated the standards to which municipal building is now eld. More than that, he accumulated plans and designs ntil, as the daily press has pointed out, his office became a eritable museum of public architecture which has only to e kept up to be of increasing value. To his task he brought o agreeable, so honest, and yet so tactful a personality that he president of the Art Commission, Mr. Robert W. De orest, has been compelled to say that while "the office will e filled by some successor, no one can be found qualified o take the place which Mr. Marshall made for himself"; hat "it is rarely that any man of talent finds a position for hich he is peculiarly fitted, and it is still more rare that uch a position finds such a man."

The services to the city of Mr. De Forest and Mr. Marhall and others since the founding of the Art Commission re invaluable, whether one agrees with all their rulings or not. Its existence guarantees that not only architectural but also sculptural monstrosities will die aborning and not be permitted to disfigure streets or parks. If in the last thirty-five years New York has grown from an ugly and stereotyped city, distinguished only by Washington Square and a few other oases, into one of often extraordinary beauty, the credit is not all due to the invention of the skyscraper, or to Beaux Arts teachings, or to the architects who are working out the complex problems of modern municipal life with their new materials used in huge dimensions. Some credit must be given to the standards set by the city itself and some to the new ordinances which compelled the "stepping back" of the gigantic structures and gave rise to the amazing towers which are creating in New York a majesty and a romance of building never seen before.

Yet the cry once was that if the municipalities undertook to interfere in construction, art and architecture would be pinioned and bound and be at the mercy of mere bureaucrats. They have been freed, instead, and will surely continue to be well guided and supervised as long as men of the breadth of view, the tolerance, the vision, and the professional skill of a Henry Rutgers Marshall can be enlisted in the public service. We go still further. We venture to prophesy that the time will yet come when all communities, urban or suburban, will take it upon themselves to regulate the erection of private and business dwellings not merely from the angle of sanitation and public safety, but from that of fitness to their surroundings and beauty as well. It is done abroad and it will yet be done here.

"The Greatest Secretary Since Hamilton"

SOMEBODY once said in Wall Street that Andrew Mellon was "the greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Hamilton"—and everybody in that charmed financial district has called him that ever since. Why not? He is one of the five or six richest men in America—and wealth worships wealth. He has done everything that Wall Street could possibly have asked him to do. Next, we in America live and prosper on catchwords and slogans, without which we should perish, for we might be compelled to do a little thinking on our own, and that would be fatal. So everybody in the moneyed world chimes in and forgets men like Salmon P. Chase and that extraordinarily brilliant Secretary, Albert Gallatin.

The truth is that Andrew Mellon is not a great man, but the most timid and shrinking figure in Washington, who is establishing a record beyond any Secretary "since Hamilton"—for his blundering and his wild guesses as to our annual income. As to that, he has never come within $100,000,000 of guessing correctly and he has at times (as in 1923) been as much as $1,132,000,000 out of the way. In his correspondence with Senator Couzens, Mr. Mellon, or rather those subordinates who write his letters and his rare speeches for him, erred so egregiously that Congress passed a resolution for a real overhauling of his Internal Revenue Bureau. But he, or his assistants, show off best their gifts for making mistakes when they deal with the question of foreign debts. His last incursion into this field has not only brought a serious official protest from the British Government but has convicted him of at least one absolutely erroneous statement.

That, the greatest Secretary declares, was due entirely to a stenographer's error, which, it is stated, anybody who read should have perceived and understood—except apparently the Secretary of the Treasury who signed it and his assistants who wrote it. But this is not the only blunder in his letter in reply to President Hibben and the Princeton professors of which the Secretary stands convicted by the British Chancellor of the Exchequer. Mr. Mellon's writers declared for him that the British Government profited greatly by purchasing supplies here and reselling them to the American forces abroad. Mr. Churchill, who has right along opposed this contention, is able to cite Mr. Albert Rathbone, a former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, who proved the British case in an article in the American Foreign Affairs for April, 1925, by pointing out that the Allies did not obtain a double bargain at our expense but that the American cash purchases abroad were distinctly to the advantage of the United States, for the dollars thus obtained were spent here by the Allies for our goods. A letter of Mr. R. C. Leffingwell, also a former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, of December 3, 1917, is further cited by the British Government as proof of its contention. In this connection it is interesting to note that the entire British press, with one exception, is satisfied that their Government has proved its case to the hilt. Among those outspoken in their approval of the Churchill case is the Liberal Manchester Guardian, the most independent of the British dailies, long an outspoken friend of the United States, to whom Churchill is usually anathema.

So the "greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Hamilton" has not only brought down upon himself and the Coolidge Administration this severe rebuke but has compelled Secretary Kellogg to another exhibition of rudeness in this curt reply to the British note: "The Government of the United States regards the correspondence between Mr. Mellon and Mr. Hibben as a purely domestic discussion, and does not desire to engage in any formal diplomatic exchanges upon the subject." Naturally this is accepted in London as a mere avoidance of the necessity of a reply in defense of a bad case. Certainly, when it is considered that this is the second time Mr. Churchill has had to charge Mr. Mellon with false statements—last July he went fully into other statements of Mr. Mellon; when it is remembered that if his statements to Mr. Hibben were to go unchallenged, it would seriously affect the position of Great Britain with her Ally creditors, we cannot see why this Mellon correspondence was not a proper subject for a British governmental remonstrance. Mr. Mellon cannot assert that it was plain Andy Mellon, the Pittsburgh multi-millionaire, who wrote to the Princeton professors. He wrote as the Secretary of the Treasury, not on a purely domestic issue, but on one of the gravest international issues which confront the American people.

So the greatest Secretary since Hamilton gets us into one mess after another because of the general unreliability of the gentlemen who write his letters for him. On May 20 last he assured the American people that the value of the proposed French payments was $2,734,000,000, of the Belgian $302,000,000, and of the Italian $782,000,000. Less than two months later he gave out these figures as being for the French $1,681,000,000, for the Belgian $192,000,000, for the Italian $426,000,000—over a billion and a half dollars had slipped through his fingers in seven weeks! In any other country he would be regarded as a joke.

The Neighborhood Playhouse

THE evening of May seventeenth will be the last first night at the Neighborhood Playhouse. The swan song will be a gay one, for the production is the fourth annual edition of "The Grand Street Follies," but the occasion must, nevertheless, have its melancholy aspects and it is worth while to recall the history of this, one of the most remarkable institutions in the recorded annals of the American theater.

The Misses Alice and Irene Lewisohn inherited from their father not only great wealth but an interest in social welfare which was more than merely a perfunctory expression of that uneasiness which so commonly affects the conspicuously rich. It occurred to them that such an institution as the Henry Street Settlement might minister to the artistic as well as the physical needs of the community which it served, and for a number of years "festival groups" at the Settlement gave amateur entertainments of strictly local interest. By 1915 these productions had reached a point which seemed to justify a permanent playhouse. The little theater on Grand Street was opened and, among other things, presented during its first season the first of the little plays to introduce to New York the dramatic fantasies of Lord Dunsany. A production of Galsworthy's "The Mob" in 1920 marked a definite stage in the history of the organization's conquest of a larger public, and then, after a year spent in reorganization, the company reappeared in a semi-professional guise, still maintaining a school and still depending, to a considerable extent, upon the talent which it was developing, but calling to its aid also more experienced players. Since then it has developed steadily until it has become, in spite of its remoteness from the center of the city, one of the most important institutions in the theatrical capital.

Though it has never made any pretense of calling itself a national or civic theater, it has, nevertheless, come nearer to being that than have any of the other more ambitiously named enterprises. No other was actually so firmly rooted in a community and no other showed so great a capacity for steady and healthy growth. Its greatest achievements—"The Little Clay Cart" and "The Dybbuk"—were not only beautiful productions of beautiful plays but projects of a sort which no other producing organization was either willing to undertake or capable of accomplishing so admirably and with such art.

If the Neighborhood Playhouse has not been financially self-supporting this has been, in a large measure, due to the fact that it has outgrown its quarters. In a large and centrally located playhouse its successes would undoubtedly have gone far toward wiping out the deficits accumulated by less popular productions; but no large profits were possible under any conditions in its tiny house. Under the circumstances it is not strange that the Misses Lewisohn have decided to pause and consider. The institution which they founded and nourished has grown until it demands a reorganization. Just what form that reorganization will take is as yet undetermined, but that the spirit of the Neighborhood Playhouse should never be reembodied is not to be thought of. We hope before long to record its reincarnation at the hands of its noble-spirited creators. If they should not be able to resurrect it, we are sure that there are many who will be eager to aid.

China's Revolution: History and Prophecy

By THOMAS F. MILLARD

Shanghai, April 8

ALREADY it has become customary to date the present phase of the Chinese Revolution from May 30, 1925. On that day (the occasion being a straggling procession, usually termed a "demonstration," composed of some two or three hundred Chinese students) disorders occurred in Nanking Road, Shanghai, that culminated in the police of the International Settlement firing into the crowd and killing and wounding a number of people, all of them Chinese.

For about one month after that incident Chinese shops and banks in this Settlement remained closed as a protest. Chinese laborers quit work, almost completely tying up the port and compelling all important industries to suspend. Chinese employees of essential municipal services—water, light, posts, telephone, tramcars—went on strike and those functions for a while were carried on by foreign volunteers. In some foreign clubs members had to act as bartenders and waiters. Many domestic servants left their employment and foreigners had to shift for themselves.

Repercussions of the incident were felt in all parts of China in the form of demonstrations, strikes, and boycotts. Evidences of a genuine national feeling were unmistakable. It was some months before the explosive manifestations quieted; indeed, they never ceased altogether. It is significant that demonstrations of Chinese for some time after the Nanking Road incident almost invariably were directed against the British, who were held responsible for what happened then and for the immediate aftermath.

Chinese local reactions to the incident of May 30 sizzled down to demands for modifications of the status and administration of this International Settlement. One demand was for rendition of the Mixed Court (taken into foreign quasi control during the revolutionary upheaval of 1911 and held ever since) which meant that China's jurisdiction over Chinese living in the Settlement would be restored. Another demand was for Chinese representation on the Municipal Council of the Settlement.

About 800,000 Chinese live inside the International Settlement at Shanghai. Another 250,000, or thereabouts, live in the adjoining French Concession. (The French Concession has a different status. There are Chinese members of its Council, and it escaped almost entirely the disagreeable consequences of that occasion.) Another million or so live in adjoining Chinese towns, composing the port. Chinese realty and other investments here are estimated from 80 to 90 per cent of the total and Chinese pay that proportion of taxes. Chinese are about 96 per cent of the population of the Settlement.

None of the demands of the Chinese was conceded at the time. A state of emergency (local euphemism for a condition tantamount to martial law) continued for more than two months. Questions of changes in the Settlement's administration were referred to the foreign Diplomatic Body at Peking, where they still rest. Concessions to Chinese indignation were implied promises to give them representation on the Council, to return the Mixed Court, and resignations of the superintendent of police of the Settlement, and of the police inspector who ordered the firing on May 30. Both received liberal retirement bonuses.

At the urgence of the Municipal Council of the Settlement a "judicial inquiry" was made into the causes and consequences of the incident. The inquiry was conducted by a commission composed of one American, one British, and one Japanese judge, none connected with Shanghai. Chinese would not participate as members of the commission or give evidence before it. Lawyers of the Council tried to confine the inquiry to immediate and proximate causes, a desire in which the British and Japanese commissioners were disposed to acquiesce. But the American commissioner (Justice Finley Johnson of the Philippines Supreme Court) gave a wider interpretation of the instructions and went into, and reported on, the "causes of many years' standing." Justice Johnson's findings brought out officially what already was obvious, that the incident of May 30 was not the beginning of, but was an exclamation point of this modern phase of anti-foreignism in China.

That incident at once had an effect on relations of the treaty Powers with China. It startled the signatories of the Washington Agreements of 1922 into doing something about putting them into effect. For one reason and another more than three years had passed without action; the stock diplomatic explanation was that the carrying out of the Washington Agreements was held back by lack of a stable government in China. That amounted to saying that treaty revision or modification must await completion of the revolution, which might take twenty years or longer.

Item: In November, 1925, a conference under terms of the Washington Agreements to revise China's maritime customs status commenced sitting at Peking. After months of fruitless argument the Peking Government of that time dissolved, leaving the foreign delegates without negotiators on the Chinese side. They waited for a while and adjourned without definite action. That fiasco enabled foreign standpatters in China to say: "I told you so! You see the futility of trying to do anything about treaty revision while China has no stable government"

Item: Early in 1926 a foreign commission to study the question of extraterritoriality in China made investigations and afterward reported unfavorably to a change of that status now. Chinese Nationalists therefore could say: "You see! The Powers have no intention of keeping their promises and meeting our wishes for treaty revision. They always find excuses for delay. We must follow the example of Turkey and force revision. Or better still, we should abolish the old treaties forthwith."

The diplomatic impasse about treaty revision stimulated manifestations of extreme Chinese Nationalism and drove it steadily along an anti-foreign course. The Powers became uneasy and began to grope for a method of satisfying Chinese aspirations without waiting for a "stable" and unified national government to deal with. Hardly a week went by without some unpleasant clash between Chinese and foreigners.

It is worth noting that from the shooting on May 30 until the incident at Nanking ten days ago (with the exception of a fight between armed British and Chinese forces at Wanhsien last autumn) only two foreigners were killed in China and in neither case was a political motive involved. Not until early in 1927 did a widespread desire to attack foreigners appear. Its development can be traced.

It properly would have been the function of the American Government, as protagonist of the Washington Agreements, to initiate action to end the impasse and to arrest ominous tendencies. But Great Britain acted.

Coincident with arrival in November, 1926, of a new British Minister in China, Sir Miles Lampson, the British Government made it known that thereafter it would negotiate treaty readjustments with regional governments in China about matters in their jurisdiction. Thus was the "wait for a stable government" policy cast overboard by the Western nation having the larger trade and vested interests here.

The British Government lost no time in acting on the new policy. Sir Miles Lampson went to Hankow and conferred there with officials of the Cantonese, or Kuomintang, regime which, after it established itself in Middle China, assumed the name of National Government and made its capital at Wuchang. It soon appeared, however, that that amicable gesture was too late to tranquilize the situation. Hardly had Sir Miles Lampson gone on to Peking than events occurred at Hankow which resulted in the Chinese taking control of the British Concession there; this was followed at once by a similar occurrence at Kiukiang. Even those events did not prevent the British Government from going forward with the new policy. Negotiations were undertaken which resulted in agreements amounting to relinquishment of the British concessions at Hankow and Kiukiang to Chinese authority, with a limited British participation.

Soon after the quasi-violence whereby the Chinese obtained control of British concessions at Hankow and Kiukiang, the British Government ordered the dispatch of a division of troops and additional naval forces to Shanghai. Chinese Nationalists construed that as a threat and for a time it seemed as if negotiations at Hankow would be broken off. They did proceed, but from then it was evident that a new and very disturbing factor had been injected. Some effects of that action on Chinese mass psychosis could be foretold at once. The day it was known in Shanghai that the troops were ordered here I telegraphed to the New York Times that the action would cause deep resentment among Chinese, and if the Powers intended or contemplated forcible action to sustain the treaty status quo they should first allow time to evacuate foreigners from the interior and to concentrate them at points where it is possible to protect them. It was evident that measures for the defense of the foreign settlements at Shanghai might react strongly against the security of foreigners in other places.

We have already witnessed some results and there may be other tragedies to report before foreigners are completely withdrawn from the interior. But there never will be agreement as to cause and effect of these events. A majority of foreigners at Shanghai point to what has happened elsewhere and say: "That or worse would have happened here if the troops and additional naval forces had not been sent." Others, including many refugees from exposed places, say: "Was it really necessary to bring troops to protect Shanghai? Would not the forces usually available have been sufficient now, as they were on previous occasions? Except for this demonstration of force at Shanghai we might have remained unmolested at our stations."

Consider Shanghai in detachment from the remainder of China. The importance of this place is indisputable. It is China's greatest seaport. It is by way of becoming for the time being, and perhaps indefinitely, a port entirely under foreign military control. Shanghai may determine, even may decide, policies of the United States, Great Britain, and Japan; whether there will be peace or war in Asia; whether the political and diplomatic hegemony of Europe, lost during the World War, will be revived to dominate, possibly, the Pacific Ocean Era.

After the events of May 30, 1925, the municipal authorities of the International Settlement were advised by the Diplomatic Body at Peking to make concessions calculated to placate local Chinese sentiment. Our city fathers were averse to that, but belief that the home governments would not support them in a standpat position caused the adoption of a conciliatory attitude.

At the annual rate-payers' meeting of 1926 a resolution was adopted inviting Chinese residing in the Settlement to elect three members of the Council. The Council is composed of nine foreign members, and by that resolution the membership would be in proportion of three foreigners to one Chinese. As the responsible Chinese bodies were on record as insisting on equal representation, the passing of that resolution was an empty gesture. The Chinese ignored the offer and took no steps to elect three members. So the Council stands composed of five British, two Americans, and two Japanese. One Japanese was added lately to replace a Britisher, an obvious concession to international politics. One thing the Chinese wanted was done. An agreement for rendition of the Mixed Court was negotiated at Peking and went into effect January 1, 1927. But by that time the Chinese were not satisfied with halfway measures. An anti-foreign disposition on the part of the Chinese judges of the new Provincial Court became evident at once.

After the agreements for rendition of British concessions at Hankow and Kiukiang were signed, the Chinese at Shanghai nominated a committee to negotiate with the Municipal Council for participation in administration of the Settlement; but by then troops had been ordered here and the Council felt safe in ignoring that overture. There was no election for councilors this year. It was privately arranged that only nine gentlemen could be nominated and therefore they were declared elected without balloting. The annual rate-payers' meeting for 1927 will be held this month and in the resolutions that are proposed (of which advance notice must be given) there is no mention of Chinese representation on the Council. The only concession to Chinese is a resolution to admit them to public parks in the Settlement.

With the announcement in January that a division of British troops would be sent here, new elements entered the situation. Foreign newspaper correspondents here at Shanghai felt the reactions of a powerful propaganda in England and America to make it appear that this Settlement was in extreme danger. Some correspondents received telegrams from their home offices wanting to know why they had not sent this or that. Many private telegrams were received by people here from relatives, and from their offices in America, asking if they were safe. At that time, conditions in Shanghai were approximately normal. Inquiry among American correspondents here brought denials that any was sending alarming reports. Since then American newspapers of those days have reached China and the mystery is revealed. Many of those exaggerated reports reached America via London; but many bore a Washington date line and on their face indicated that they originated with the State Department and other government sources.

A little later came Mr. Kellogg's proposal to "neutralize" the foreign settlements at Shanghai. Several times in late years there have been overturns of Chinese authority in this region, and on each of those occasions these settlements were involved because of their position near the center of the thickly populated port and its environs, with an adjacent Chinese arsenal and naval base. Troops of a defeated faction at times would be driven back on the settlements. They would be stopped at the boundaries, disarmed, and interned. At times rifle and artillery fire would fall in the settlements. Foreign volunteer forces and special police, aided by landing parties from naval vessels, would man the boundaries. It was uncomfortable. Military experts often pointed out that it was impossible to protect the settlements from that kind of disturbance by confining defensive measures to the limits of the concessions. To make their neutrality effective it would be necessary to extend the lines some distance outside of the settlements into Chinese territory, to take in outlying railways, the arsenal, and docks. Two years ago such a defensive plan was prepared and referred to the Diplomatic Body at Peking. But to put such a plan into effect required, besides diplomatic assent, a military force to man the extended lines. Local forces are insufficient. The coming of a division of British troops and extra naval forces would provide men needed for that project.

It was certain that all factions of Chinese would object to a plan embracing the whole of China's principal seaport within the authority of foreign concessions under the euphemism of "neutralization." To realize the project required backing of important governments. The British Government, under criticism at home and in China for dispatching troops to Shanghai, obviously was inhibited from advancing that proposal. Japan would not do it. Mr. Kellogg did. It was a foregone conclusion that the Chinese would receive it coldly and with suspicion.

For some time before the collapse of the Northern military defense in this region, and before the Cantonese troops were near Shanghai, it was an open secret that the approach of the Southern forces would cause immediate extension of this Settlement's defensive lines outside its boundaries. The construction of barbed-wire obstructions far outside the Settlement was commenced quietly and without official announcement by the middle of February, as soon as it was known that Sun Chuan-fong, who worked hand-in-glove with local foreign authorities, had been driven from Hangchow. On February 25 some 2,000 British regular troops moved out of the Settlement and occupied "prearranged" defense lines. Up to then the move had waited on diplomatic consent, which had not come; when a number of shells fired by a Chinese gunboat fell inside the concessions on February 22 the occasion was seized immediately. An "international" character was given to that move by the participation of some Italian marines landed from a warship. Private efforts to get American, Japanese, French, and other forces then here to join in the movement failed. So far American naval forces have confined their actions to the limits of the International Settlement. The French authorities also have refused to extend the defenses of their concession beyond its limits.

Mr. Kellogg's neutralization proposal, coupled with the subsequent troop movements of other Powers, causes one to wonder if, as far back as last January, the American Government had approved a forcible occupation of Chinese territory. Well-informed persons here believe that in a short time the "defensive lines" will be extended to take in the entire port area, including Wusung and its antiquated forts, and the Chinese towns of Chapei, Nantao, and Pootung, embracing some 250 square miles. I am not predicting that action. I am indicating only that it is a matured project of the "government" of the International Settlement and will be a logical procedure. Thus step by step a naval and military occupation of China is developing.

The foreign concessions at Shanghai now resemble an armed camp. We live under what amounts almost to martial law. We are subject to a "curfew" rule requiring everyone to be off the streets by 10 o'clock at night. The two concessions are zigzagged with barbed-wire tangles intersecting important thoroughfares at a number of points. Traffic is permitted to pass only at certain points, causing congestion and delay. Except what is created by the presence of foreign forces, business is limited to daily and emergency requirements. Already there is a feeling that these precautions are overdone and that a state of panic has been created and is being maintained intentionally to influence international policy.

Foreign residents here find the situation increasingly irksome. Nearly all able-bodied men not otherwise indispensable are mobilized for military and police duty, while their business, if any, takes care of itself. Business is stagnant with little prospect of reviving soon. Liquidation confronts many firms. Hundreds of foreigners are winding up their affairs preparatory to leaving China. A little later, if nothing is done to ease the situation, we can expect the application to all foreigners here of the "economic weapons"—strikes, boycott, withdrawal of services, almost complete "non-cooperation" of Chinese with the foreigners.

Some profit by the situation. Those interests controlling land and houses in the concessions have made fortunes through the rise of realty values here. Rents and food prices have risen about 20 per cent since the first of the year. Chinese are pouring into the settlements, and some 35,000 foreign troops and naval forces (more than the number of foreigners to be defended) provide the protection to make Chinese and other refugees feel safe. I heard an estimate that if this situation is prolonged for three years (the British military have made arrangements as if expecting to remain that long) some interests here will make one hundred million dollars. Incidentally, those interests strongly influence, if indeed they do not dominate, our municipal administrations. They own the principal foreign newspapers here, and by their interlocking business ramifications practically run the settlements. Signs appear of a revolt against using these conditions for rent and other profiteering. There has been a protest of Chinese ratepayers, the Chinese working class are clamoring about food prices, and there is talk among foreigners of demanding a rent moratorium until things are normal. One hears grumbling, also, among volunteers who find their rents and other expenses mounting while they abandon their business for military and police duty.

Everyone here feels that indefinite prolongation of this situation is intolerable and yet there is no program looking toward a solution. Here we enter the realm of international politics.

There is no obscurity on one point. The issue is drawn squarely between a policy of military intervention and a policy of negotiation and compromise. It is evident that events more and more tend to make a solution by negotiation difficult and that powerful interests are working to make it impossible. For a long time the fires of race prejudice and passion have been fanned on both the Chinese and foreign sides. Less than two years ago a composite volunteer and naval force of less than 5,000 was enough to protect these settlements. Now many people contend that 40,000 are not enough.

The decision is in the hands of three Powers—the United States, Japan, and Great Britain. Those nations would have to finance an intervention and provide most of the troops. (That assumes they can act together; if they disagree the situation will become dangerously complicated.) When analyzed, intervention would be financed principally in America. In the end, one supposes, China would pay.

As things stand Japan is averse to intervention. Joint intervention would mean a white predominance in arrangements and outcome. It would tend to revive and might make permanent a white hegemony in Asia. It would work to the advantage of Japan's great trade rivals here, Great Britain and Germany. It would very definitely draw the foremost Pacific Power, America, into direct participation in political affairs in Eastern Asia. It might bring on a war with Russia for which Japan is not ready.

An explosion in China hardly can fail to bring on similar upheavals in India and throughout the Asiatic world.

America sees its traditional China policy in the balance. A false step at this juncture may draw our nation into war in Asia. As things are now, our religious and cultural work probably cannot go on for years, our trade is handicapped, our carefully built-up moral and political influence with the Chinese is being swept away by forces not of our making and not now under our direction or control.

Russia's influence, usually regarded as malign, colors the scene. The Soviets are charged with conspiring to bring chaos in China. Perhaps they are. But to lay this trouble entirely at Russia's door is foolishness.

China remains. Her new Nationalism is a complex of foreign influences and education implanted on ancient foundations, but it is fundamentally indigenous. To drive out some Russian advisers will not suppress it. As late as two years ago the anti-foreignism of Chinese Nationalism was academically political. Today it is aggressively hostile to foreigners and rapidly is becoming indiscriminate among them. What it is to be hereafter depends on how the Powers meet the crisis.

Greece Saves Herself

By H. C. JAQUITH

PRACTICALLY every country in Europe has either a Socialist labor party on the verge of power or a dictator in the seat of authority. Greece was in this second category until recently, when she demonstrated that a dictator can be tossed off the political see-saw without forcing the other end into the mud of party strife and struggle for office. A new equilibrium has been established in the revival of constitutional government, surprising even to the Athenians themselves. Following the November elections and the reopening of Parliament, a cabinet was formed composed of the leaders of practically all of the political factions. The Constantine-Venizelos double-headed ax has been buried. The royalist has supped with the republican, and the socialist has joined with the capitalist in an effort to prevent the reexploitation of the country and the people by the army.

A year and a half ago General Pangalos came into power because at least two-thirds of the energies of the previous constitutional governments had been expended in forming and reforming coalition cabinets from a multiplicity of party groups. General Pangalos at least remedied this previous lack of action. He rode iron-rimmed over the people and ignored the usual forms of administration for over a year, until General Condylis, combining military prestige and political experience and encouraged by two regiments of dissatisfied troops commonly supposed to be Pangalos's bodyguard, seized the seat of authority in Athens left vacant by the Dictator's week-end social sojourn on the Island of Spetzia. One quiet Sunday morning in August the seemingly impossible had been accomplished—the Dictator had been overthrown and cast into prison.

Condylis soon proved himself a patriot. Logically the successor to Pangalos, he renounced the dictatorship and called an election for November, voluntarily relinquishing his political leadership over a large group of potential deputies. He refused to allow his name to be used as a candidate, although certain of winning a seat in Parliament and probably a place in the Cabinet.

The election failed to give any one party a working majority. Coalitions again seemed necessary. Recalling the previous experience with this particular form of government and realizing the danger of another attempt on the part of the military to regain control of affairs, political interests were for the moment subordinated and all the party leaders gathered about the round table to form a cabinet. It is commonly called in Athens the Oecumenical Cabinet, which has no religious significance but is emblematic of the prevailing good-will.

Zaimis, non-participant in politics since the Balkan Wars, was chosen Premier; Kafandaris, Progressive Republican, Minister of Finance; Michalacopoulos, Conservative Republican, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Tsaldaris, Popular Monarchy Party, Home Secretary; Metaxas, Royalist Nationalist, Minister of Public Works; and A. Papa-nastassiou, Socialist Democrat, Minister of Agriculture.

The Oecumenical Government, taking office in November, first deprived the military of its political power. Then it set about to reduce the expenses of both the army and the navy, canceling supply contracts, demobilizing several regiments, and decommissioning a number of naval units. Both the political power and the financial burden of the military were soon abolished.

The Cabinet further tested the strength of its own union in a way that only those who understand recent Greek history can fully appreciate. The Royalists requested a special memorial service in Athens in honor of King Constantine, for which permission had previously been withheld. The request was unanimously voted by the Cabinet. The services were held and attended by representatives of all the parties. Encouraged by this success, the rank and file of the Royalist Party wished to hold similar services in each of the larger communities throughout the country, but were restrained because the Royalist members of the Cabinet recognized that a popular political interpretation would be placed upon these services and they would be used as Royalist propaganda, thereby weakening the effectiveness of the Oecumenical Cabinet.

An important factor in the appraisal of the Greece of today is its new racial unity. Almost a million and a half refugees, most of them from Turkey, Greeks by birth, replaced the three hundred sixty thousand Moslems of Turkish origin, resident in Macedonia and the Islands, who were deported to Anatolia. The homogeneous Hellenic population was increased by over a million.

Salonika is noticeably Jewish. Traces of the earlier Slavic migrations southward are still discernible in western Macedonia. By a clause in the Lausanne Treaty the Moslem Turk in western Thrace remains in compensation for the Greeks who had been allowed to stay in Constantinople. Because of the generous attitude of the Greek Government at the time of the Smyrna disaster, over ninety thousand Armenians were admitted into the country without question or restriction. However, owing to the economic pressure inevitable in a country flooded with refugees, over half of these Armenians have sought permanent homes in France or elsewhere. For the Bulgarians still resident in Greece and Greeks still resident in Bulgaria, the two governments have provided a commission, under the neutral direction of the League of Nations, for the voluntary exchange of these people, with their possessions. These non-Greek groups, comprising about three hundred thousand persons, are relatively unimportant in the unified racial progress of the country.

The economic situation in Greece is also improving. Greece has floated but one loan since the war and this was for constructive purposes, namely, the settlement of her homeless refugees; $50,000,000 was subscribed from the financial centers of New York, London, and Athens. The guaranties of this loan were the Greek revenues. The administration was under a refugee settlement commission appointed by the League of Nations. Evidence of its value is to be seen on every hand by even the casual traveler. A hundred and forty-seven thousand families are no longer refugees, but are contented, industrious farmers in Macedonia, Thessaly, Attica, and the Peloponnesus. The still unfinished task requires a supplementary loan of at least $10,000,000.

Twice since the World War Greece has startled the economist by reversing the common practice of raising state revenue by increasing the output of the printing press. Greece has reduced the amount of currency in circulation—the first time by 50 per cent, the second by 25 per cent. This has been accomplished by the simple process of cutting off the ends of the paper drachma notes and officially declaring the remaining portion to have half or three-quarters of its previous value. The individual, in return for the cut portion, the diminutive half or quarter, is given a government bond of full face but doubtful market value. Since the value of money in countries not on a gold basis is determined largely by the amount of currency in circulation, divided by the population and its average economic needs, any radical reduction in the available amount of drachmas increases their purchasing power and strengthens the credit of the nation. On the other hand, since the total currency in circulation in Greece is restricted by an international finance commission, the Government by enforcing a reduction obtains certain rights of replacement and the privilege of new issue. By this method of internal financing, Greece has been enabled to meet her current expenses and her external obligations during a critical period without resorting to the common practice of trying to negotiate foreign loans to meet local needs. It is noticeable that during this period the value of the drachma has remained relatively high and unexpectedly consistent.

During the last three years the general economic conditions in the country have steadily improved. The Government has made an earnest effort to encourage agriculture, industry, and trade, and has regulated its tariffs accordingly. The settlement of the rural refugees on previously uncultivated land, and the division of large estates and monastic properties among the peasantry, have greatly increased the agricultural production of the country. Even with this additional activity, Greece is not self-supporting and is compelled yearly to import large quantities of foodstuffs, especially wheat.

The revival of Greek shipping, together with the forced transfer of the Greek wholesale and retail merchants from Constantinople and Smyrna, has developed Piraeus into the third-largest port on the Mediterranean. The growth of Salonika, the natural port of entry to the Balkans, is quite as remarkable. The new city has been built in the burned ruins of a war-ridden and malarial pest-hole. Provision has been made for a Serbian free port through which goods may pass in transit, without customs duties or local restrictions, direct to Belgrade and the markets to the north. The Greek Government also recognizes Salonika as the logical center of the rich agricultural and tobacco area of Macedonia, and has promoted a large agricultural and industrial fair which is to be made an annual event.

Friends of the League of Nations were greatly pleased when they heard that one of the charges on which Pangalos might possibly be tried was of having violated Greece's contract as a member of the League through his hasty action following the incident on the Bulgarian frontier. Fundamentally, however, Greece is at peace with her neighbors. The Greek press expressed little concern over the recent Italian agreement with Albania. Serbia has been tentatively appeased by the establishment of the free port at Salonika. The post-war differences with Turkey have been settled amicably. Even the troublesome Macedonian question quite disappeared from within the Greek frontiers by the advent of a unified population.

The Collapse of the Needle Trades

By BENJAMIN STOLBERG

4. Furs Which Smell to Heaven

THE New York furriers went on partial strike in 1907. They lost. The next five years were a period of much trial and some error. The rather stolid German "old timers" were displaced by young Russian Jews, fresh from the revolution of 1905-1906. They struck again in 1912. Gompers helped. The Socialist Party helped. The 1909-1910 victories in the clothing unions helped a lot. The strike was won. Dr. Judah Magnes became the arbitrator in the industry. The New York furriers became a federal union of the American Federation of Labor. In 1913 the collective-bargaining machinery was perfect. The International Fur Workers Union was established. Albert W. Miller, a conservative trade unionist, became president. Isidore Cohen, an excellent organizer and nothing more, became the manager of the New York Joint Board.

The rank and file of the new union was progressive. But it soon lost its vigilance. The fur market never has been, is not now, demoralized beyond the usual business cycle. Wages were, are now, comparatively high. The industry, though a small-shop industry, is too much of a guild trade to be a sweatshop. Union politics in a large craft is watched by the press, by liberal opinion, by the labor movement at large. Union politics in a small union, unless the rank and file is perpetually wary, becomes stealthy, then moldy, and under factionalism it tends toward sordidness. The furriers have had some fine types among their leaders—Andrew Wenneis, David Mikol. But these could not finally control the poolroom atmosphere. Both Miller and Cohen proved to be miserable negotiators. During the high-pressure seasons the worker in this industry often conspires with the boss to cheat on union rules. The almost kleptomaniac attraction of small pieces of fur is not conducive to a high morale. The business agent, who today has to watch about 1,400 shops in Greater New York, is often tempted to wink at such infractions. By 1918 petty corruption was rife.

By 1918 a strong opposition against the Cohen regime finally broke to the surface under the leadership of Morris Kaufman. Kaufman became international president and lasted until 1925. He has been the main target of the present Left Wing, which pictures him as the slimy associate of "gunmen." Actually Kaufman was an honest and efficient routine official, without imagination; an excellent negotiator with the small-shop owner. But he was too weak to throw off the petty grafters and strong-arm boys who had attached themselves to the union, exactly as Ben Gold was too weak to rid the Joint Board of the same element in 1926.

From 1918 to 1920 the industry was prosperous. But in 1920 it met a serious slump. Under Harding normalcy speculation in skins ran riot. The small manufacturer is too incompetent and poor to weather a wild speculative crisis. In April he began laying off his help. In May he tried to cut wages. A strike was called, demanding a 40-hour week and equal division of work through the year. The strike lasted thirty weeks. It was lost, but the union managed to stand its ground.

It was during this strike that the present Left Wing first began to sprout. Ben Gold, Mrs. Warschawsky, Isidore Shapiro, and other contemporary Lefts were then as yet innocent of all "scientific Leninism." They were just plain anti-administration. They opposed calling the strike. They began a vigorous attack on the Kaufman machine which, under such heavy fire, fell under the control of its own most unscrupulous element. Gold was beaten up, if not at the behest at least with the malevolent neutrality of the machine. All of which drove the Lefts further left. In 1921 and 1922 the Workers Party and the Trade Union Educational League entered the scene. Practically all the Lefts joined the Communists. In the two large needle trades the Communists had to proceed carefully, but they openly assumed control of the Furriers' Left Wing.

During the last seven years the personality of Ben Gold has played a significant part. He entered union politics, violently, as a youth of 22. He has been in the thick of it ever since. Affable, attractive, and extremely vital, he gives the impression of knowing what he wants; which is the last thing he knows. Personally honest above suspicion, he is psychologically dishonest with the recklessness of a histrionic youth. He relies on his demagogic powers and on a sort of untruthfulness which he honestly believes to be strategic acumen. It is this irresponsibility, which has nothing in the world to do with communism, which has got him into his present difficulties. Weisbord, too, is a Communist, yet, in Passaic, Weisbord did the finest piece of labor organization since the nineties. The difference is one of character.

Gold undoubtedly expressed the disaffection of the rank and file with the cumulative abuses of the Kaufman administration. In 1924 the Kaufman machine carried the convention with the steam roller. Kaufman maneuvered himself into the stupid predicament where he had to suspend Gold and his most vociferous adherents. Whereupon the Freiheit and the Daily Worker and the Forward began their usual cross-fire of recrimination, abuse, and provocation. Finally a special peace convention, simultaneous with the peace convention of the women's garment workers in Philadelphia, was called to meet in Boston in November, 1925.

In this convention the Kaufman group controlled 34 votes; the Gold group 26 votes. But in the meantime a "neutral" United Front had been formed which controlled a shifting 10 to 12 votes. The United Front "neutrality" played fast and loose—for office. Nine-tenths of the convention was taken up with the Right-Left fight. By that time the Left was under the absolute discipline of the Workers Party, whose representative William Weinstone directed Left tactics from the floor. Ruthenberg, the late secretary of the party, was in constant telegraphic communication with Weinstone. Kaufman was defeated. Shachtman, of the "United Front," a weak and colorless personality, became international president. Gold came into control of the New York Joint Board, which has jurisdiction over 80 per cent of the membership. "Peace" having thus been achieved, everybody returned to New York to face the expiration of the contract with the employers.

The union demanded a 40-hour week, with a 32-hour week in slack seasons; equal division of work through the year; a 25 per cent wage increase; an unemployment insurance fund to which the employer was to contribute 3 per cent of his wage roll. While these demands were being formulated Shachtman, for reasons unknown even to himself, attacked Gold as a liar, a swindler, and a Communist tool. The manufacturers met this splendid outburst of solidarity with a lockout. The union reciprocated with a general strike, which lasted from February 15 to June 11, 1926.

Gold became the chairman of the General Strike Committee. As in the cloakmakers' strike, the Rights were side-tracked from all influence. A lawyer named Abraham Goldman was hired, under whose legal protection fees and legal expenses ran to $78,906.50. All told, $838,203.55 was spent, a vast but not necessarily a fantastic figure. Of this sum $501,930.13 was transferred from the Joint Board to the strike committee, a rather irregular procedure; as well as $98,000 of employers' security money, a most irregular and reprehensible procedure.

Two reliable public accountants subsequently went over strike finances. They found that only $64,477.91 was supported by proper vouchers, while $130,267.18 was totally unsupported expenditures. Of the other $643,458.46 no audit of any kind was possible. Gold claimed that strike finances were analyzed with an anti-communist bias because the accountants were hired by the A. F. of L. In this connection, however, it is worth mention that the funds for relief work during the Passaic strike under Albert Wagenknecht, one of the founders of American communism, were handled not merely with meticulous entry, but with a positive genius for making a penny pay a nickel's worth. The difference between Morris Cohen, the secretary-treasurer of the Furriers' Joint Board, who finally admitted that the books on strike finances were made up after the strike, and Albert Wagenknecht, who humbly served the textile strikers of Passaic, again has nothing to do with communism.

The strike committee claims to have spent $556,174.17 on relief; according to one of the accountants, $450,000 is about the sum expended for this purpose. The picket committee spent $31,691.90. The general hall committee spent $25,630, besides rents, which is unexplainable. The meaning of $19,709.80 for "law prisoners' relief" has never been discovered; $45,117.31 went for meal tickets.

There is not the shadow of a doubt that gangsterism ran rife during the strike. There is not the shadow of a doubt that not merely scabs, but union critics of the conduct of the strike, were beaten up, some mercilessly, in union headquarters. Soon after the strike began President Shachtman left for "out-of-town" work, though there were not enough workers outside of New York City to hurt the market if every one of them had scabbed. During the third week of the strike President Green of the A. F. of L. was called into the situation. By and large, Green and Hugh Frayne, the New York organizer of the A. F. of L., handled the situation rather ineptly, though they were handicapped by the fact that Gold was carrying on independent negotiations with the employers. During the seventh week of the strike the A. F. of L. officials worked out a tentative "eight-points basis of settlement," which they tried to present to the workers in a Carnegie Hall meeting called over the heads of the strike leaders. When Frayne refused to permit Gold himself to come into the hall, the workers responded to this brilliant bit of strategy by shouting down the meeting.

Finally, Gold settled the strike with the aid of Mr. Eitingon, a very large fur importer, who enjoys an enormous concession in Russia. The Rights constantly emphasize this fact, as though it had any bearing on the situation. Employers who help to settle strikes in their industry usually have some interest at stake. Suffice it to say that Mr. Eitingon was strong enough to bend the Associated Fur Manufacturers to his will. The union won the basic 40-hour week, of five days. It had to give up the pay for three legal holidays; and to grant the 44-hour week, on single pay, during the busy season. The Rights criticize this arrangement on the ground that during slack seasons the workers never get 40 hours. But, in this case, the principle is certainly important. The minimum wage was increased 10 per cent. It was agreed that the entire garment was to be produced on the premises and that no apprentices were to be hired until February, 1928. The union withdrew its unemployment insurance demand. In spite of much difference of opinion regarding the terms, the Gold settlement was considered a victory by the rank and file, which infuriated the Rights since it tended to intrench the Left Joint Board.

Soon after the settlement the A. F. of L. decided to "investigate" the conduct of the strike, supposedly to iron out all factional differences. All sides unctuously agreed, being equally dishonest. Later on Messrs. Woll and Frayne were "horrified" by what they found, as though they had never heard of Mr. Brindell and the building trades. The A. F. of L. investigated the strike—an unusual procedure in view of its traditional policy of union self-determination —for one reason: to get rid of Communist control. And, indeed, later on, on March 2, 1927, the Left Joint Board was suspended by the international office under charges whose legality is entirely a matter of interpretation.

President Green appointed an investigating committee with Matthew Woll as chairman. The final report of the committee is undoubtedly true, both in essence and detail. Matthew Woll is far too shrewd to frame truth which is stranger than fiction. Part 5 of the report deals with alleged police graft. Isidore Shapiro, chairman of the law committee, is stenographically quoted as having said to the Woll committee, in explaining his transactions with Goodman, the strike committee's lawyer, that the following sums had to be paid for police protection: "Inspectors, $250; captains, $100 to $150; lieutenants, $50; sergeants, $20 to $25; industrial squad chief, $100; ten men in the industrial squad, $50 a week." Samuel Mensher is quoted as stating that he personally "paid the cops" in his capacity as chairman of the general picket committee. It is this "Part 5" which has been investigated by Magistrate Corrigan. The Lefts repudiate these statements. Gold characterized the report as "a brazen attempt of the blackest type of frame-up" and a "dastardly conspiracy" on the part of the A. F. of L.; which is pure bunk. The fact is that the A. F. of L. never meant this part of the report to leak out. The Central Trades and Labor Council of New York has strong Tammany connections. Besides, if any one is so evil-minded as to believe that the police ever accept graft, it is inadvisable to express such thoughts, partly because they can never be substantiated. If police take money they do not take it marked. Hence the spectacle at the Corrigan hearings, where the Lefts vehemently deny ever having made such incredible statements, while the Rights insist that they never believed the Lefts.

In the meantime an A. F. of L. committee organized a new Joint Board, which now claims the support of about 6,000 workers. The Associated Fur Manufacturers, who employ 75 per cent of the workers, has recognized this official board. The Fur Trimming Manufacturers Association has recognized the suspended Joint Board. But, in the long run, the Gold group is bound to lose. It cannot claim it is part of the A. F. of L. when the A. F. of L. says it is not.

5. Whither Tailor?

The future of the progressive needle trades is uncertain. Only vague tendencies may be discerned in the present chaos. These unions are in danger of moving to the far Right. Just now the workers in the International Ladies Garment Workers and the furriers' unions are undoubtedly forced to register with their Right-controlled internationals, whether they like it or not, for they must have a union card to work. But this does not quite describe the situation. A noticeable current of apathy, the danger signal of rank-and-file reaction, is developing. The Jewish radical, once he gets tired, gets awfully tired, with his usual extremism. The cynicism among Jewish needle workers at present is extraordinary.

Also the Jew in America is not likely to remain an industrial worker. On the continent of Western Europe, where there has been practically no immigration of proletarian East European Jewry, there is no Jewish working class. With the stoppage of immigration the same process is going on here. Only 40 per cent of the membership in the Amalgamated is Jewish. Most of the contractors and submanufacturers have been workers. The children of the Jewish tailors will not bend over the sewing-machine. What changes this process will engender no one can foretell.

The Sigman administration will have to begin building up the International Ladies Garment Workers Union slowly and painfully, under adverse economic tendencies in the industry. Until Shachtman is displaced in the Furriers Union no progress is conceivable, though the conditions of the industry are more favorable. The one real ray of hope in the progressive direction of the needle trades is the Amalgamated. Hillman wants to take the Amalgamated into the A. F. of L. Its organization work would proceed far more smoothly were it not for the petty opposition of the A. F. of L. central bodies in the small towns. In the larger cities, also, the United Garment Workers hinders the Amalgamated in every way. For many other reasons Hillman seems to think that affiliation with the A. F. of L. would be worth $50,000 a year in per capita taxation. No doubt the militancy and the industrial competence of the Amalgamated would do a great deal of good in the dominant movement. In 1920, and again in 1923, Hillman led in the abortive efforts to create a Needle Trades Alliance. He profoundly believes in the ultimate industrial unionization of the needle trades. The other progressive needle trades suspect his motives: "Hillman wants to lead." Of course. Like all great leaders Hillman harmonizes his person with his movement. He wants power for his social politics. Should the Amalgamated become affiliated with the A. F. of L., a revival of the progressive spirit in the other needle trades might be possible under its leadership. But the general situation in the needle trades is far too confused at present for prognosis. It is well to remember that, after all, these unions, with the rest of American labor, are at the mercy of social forces which are constantly strengthening the hegemony of Big Business.

The Rich Socialist

By J. A. HOBSON

THAT a man or women well endowed with this world's goods should be a Socialist is for most of us a paradox. So accustomed are we to assume that personal interests mold beliefs and aspirations. A recent controversy in the English press, stirred by the electioneering in which Mr. Moseley and his wife, Lady Cynthia, were protagonists, exhibited a curious blend of ill-temper and bad reasoning. When an isolated member of the well-to-do classes professed labor sympathies a generation ago, he was tolerated as an eccentric. But now there are so many that it has ceased to be a joke. Hence the new animus against "traitors to their class." They surely must be hypocrites or ruthless careerists! Although the makers of modern socialism in most European countries have come from the well-to-do educated minority, men unusually sensitive to the injustice, inhumanity, waste, and ugliness of our economic system, this is forgotten in the eagerness to denounce the madness and criminality of an attack on the sanctity of the established order.

It was a ragged, foolish chatter, chiefly marked by a total inability to understand what socialism, be it right or wrong, attainable or utopian, actually stands for. Its openings usually consisted in confusing socialism with communism, and in pretending to express surprise that a Socialist should have any truck with private property, or consent to live in any sort of reasonable comfort. To reply to such controversialists that Socialists were out to secure private property and comfortable living for all, instead of for the few, would simply seem an impudent perversion of the facts.

But the real interest of the performance lay in the queer imbecility of the advice tendered to the rich Socialist who might wish to save his soul. To some the solution was a very simple one. He ought to refuse to touch "the accursed thing." Rent, profits, or dividends, inherited or currently extorted gains—the wages of his own or his father's sins—let him cease handling it! If he were sincere, that is what he would do. "O sancta simplicitas!" But would the property with its recurrent income, which he refused to touch, cease to exist? He draws income from real estate. If he refuses to take his rents, he endows his tenants with money they have no more right to than he. He draws dividends from his holdings of stocks and shares. Why should he enrich his fellow-shareholders with the coupons he refuses to bank? If such income were the wages of sin, he could not transfer the burden from his conscience to that of others, without even asking their consent. Evidently this is no way out.

Others, not so simple, urged that if he were a genuine Socialist he would dispose of the money "consistently with socialist principles." He might, for instance, try Christianity, and sell all that he hath and give it unto the poor. In a recent play by Mr. Eden Phillpotts, "Yellow Sands," the "Bolshie" who comes into money is at first disposed to take this line and divide his inheritance among the unemployed. But when he realizes that it will amount to no more than two pence a head, and will go in relief of the rates paid by property owners through the poor law, his enthusiasm for dividing evaporates. One well-meaning gentleman, writing to the Times, thought he ought to invest it in a business the shares of which he should hand over to ten workers in that business. But what claim have these particular workers to have the profits of this business handed over as a bonus? They have not earned it.

Others, again, would have our rich Socialist hand over his property or income to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as a voluntary act of socialism! But, if he brings intelligent reflection to bear upon this policy, he may well hesitate. To hand it to a "capitalist government" to be expended in building more cruisers? Or in reducing the supertax upon other rich men? Or in helping to wipe out the war debt so as to facilitate the finance of the next war? Or to reduce the deficit in this year's budget, the natural penalty of bad administration? As a Socialist he cannot ease the situation for capitalism. Not he!

But, at any rate, there is the party fund. Let him endow that with his riches! Yet here again, if he has any experience in party politics, he may well pause before parting with his money to "the machine." In England just now he will be confronted with the ignoble squabble of the rival sections of the Liberal Party over the Lloyd George money, and with the notion that a party can buy a new soul with a million-pounds fund. The older parties, indeed, are hardened to such finances. But for a Labor Party to care to depend upon gifts from its rich adherents for its fighting finance would be a really deadly damage to its equalitarian spirit.

Of course a rich Socialist may do something with his money to help his cause and ease his conscience. He can at least devote the time and personal energy that are at the disposal of one who has not to earn a livelihood. If his wealth employs others, he can see that the conditions of employment are of the best. In an ill-ordered world there will be individual cases of misfortune he can help. Though charity is no substitute for justice, and organized charity is too often either a mechanical device for keeping unpleasantness out of sight, or a protection against "uncharitable" scrutinies into sources of wealth, it must always have its place in an imperfect world. As for educational and other social works that call for large expenditures, the owner of easy or ill-gotten wealth is always in this difficulty. The acquisition and ownership of wealth confer no aptitude for sound expenditure on behalf of others, rather the contrary. On the whole, the best use of money is made by those who have earned it. Great millionaire endowments, however well meant, are likely in the long run to do more harm than good, especially if, as is commonly the case, they liberate the public from the useful obligation to provide for its needs out of its own resources.

The crux of the matter is that individual conduct cannot solve a social problem. Many well-meaning people refuse to see this. A form of moral individualism is widely prevalent in our churches and our educated circles. In the last resort we are told "everything depends on personal character. Let each do his separate part aright, and the whole world will be right!" Now, as we see in the extreme case of the rich Socialist, this is not true. No such separatist solution is practicable. Precisely because "we are all members of one another," sound social policies cannot emanate from individuals. A good employer in competitive trade cannot go far in raising wages and shortening hours, Henry Ford notwithstanding. Social cooperation alone can solve social problems.

So the rich Socialist finds himself in a spiritual quandary. He cannot surrender his riches to the use of the unsound competitive society in which he finds himself. His critics charge him with inconsistency, because he is driven to compromise with principles that are only practicable in a better order than the present. Consistency will not be possible until a government of industry with equitable distribution stops the accumulation of excessive wealth. And consistency will not then be needed. Then there will be no rich Socialists.

In the Driftway

THE debt that noted men of our time, especially prominent politicians, owe to anonymous scribes for the preparation of their public addresses and state papers is well known. The particular persons to whom this debt is due are hardly known at all outside a limited circle. Their services run all the way from preparing pleasant words of greeting for delegations of clubwomen to writing 300-page books. Of one of our Governors at the present time the first question asked by the knowing in regard to any of his important statements or addresses is "Who wrote it for him?" In the Harding regime in Washington there was, shall one say a literary adviser? on the White House pay roll.

THIS state of affairs is accepted tranquilly enough in regard to the celebrities of our day, but we generally think earlier ages were free from the vice—if such it is. Probably they were not. In Tennessee, for instance, some one has lately dug up a copy of the Nashville Republican for April 27, 1837, in which a letter is printed from Judge Breckinridge, making some revealing comments in regard to the state papers of President Jackson. Of the general's goodby speeches Judge Breckinridge says:

> I know something about these farewell addresses, having written two of them for him. The first of these was on the occasion of his taking leave of his command in the army. The only part of it that was his was an uncouth memorandum containing some illiberal and ungentlemanly reflections on a brother officer who stood high in the estimation of the country [General Brown], but who had been so unfortunate as to speak with disapprobation of the practice of whipping in the army. This is all that Jackson contributed to the address. The other state paper was on his leaving Florida, where he had displayed his excessive energy for some months as civil and military governor. He said to me: "You know how to fix it." I wrote the address without a single suggestion from Jackson and he signed it without making a single alteration. The incapacity of General Jackson has become proverbial.

SELDOM has the Drifter loosed a greater flood of correspondence than when he suggested, some weeks back, that "nobody loves an automobile." He intended to close the discussions when, in a later issue, he gave up his entire column to excerpts from letters, but even at this date he cannot ignore a bit of evidence sent by Ferd Gottlieb from the office of the Kansas City Star. Mr. Gottlieb forwards a local news item from his newspaper which reads in part:

> His pride hurt by an offer of only $319 for his used motor car, George T. McDermott is building a $400 garage as a permanent home for the faithful family friend. Furthermore, he has employed two of Topeka's best architects to design it, and Senator Capper has promised to lay the cornerstone.

"Why, that old bus is only four years old," Mr. McDermott declared. "Think of their offering me only $319 for it! I told them to go to thunder, bought a new one, and kept the old one. I'll put my new car in the old garage. That old car runs like a new one." . . .

The cornerstone will contain reminders of the occasion —a few newspapers, coins, signatures, and a monkey wrench from the old bus.

"Here's a real instance of devotion for the old family motor car," comments the Drifter's correspondent. "Has any man done more for his horse?" Perhaps not; but if this Kansas City man had ever had a horse the Drifter surmises he would have done more for it.

The Ford Legend

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I was very much interested in Selwyn Schapiro's review of Charles W. Wood's book "The Myth of the Individual." What most appealed to me was the reviewer's acute analysis of the "Ford legend" which is gaining ground among radicals and ex-radicals.

Mr. Wood is an outstanding example of this tendency. The American radical never visualized a revolution; and when the overturn in Russia came, he drew back affrighted. Being still aware of the social problem and fearful of revolution, he saw a possible and safe way out in capitalism abolishing its own evils, and so he is falling into the arms of Henry Ford, the greatest of all capitalists.

New York, April 26 AN AMERICAN RADICAL

The Fight at West Chester

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There can be no more vital question in a republic than the question of the freedom of teaching. If learning be not free, no kind of freedom can long endure. To reestablish this freedom, now almost gone in America, is our objective at West Chester. The dismissal of approved teachers because of their ideas and beliefs or for their social and political activities, must become impossible in "the land of the free."

By our struggle we hope to impress the mind of America with a sense of the existing conditions, which will be seen to be intolerable. When the competent teacher is so insecure in his position that he must live in constant fear; when an American Legion post can demand his removal and boast of its "moral influence" when he is dropped; when a political board can unceremoniously expel him, without a hearing and without an explanation that is not ridiculous; when an ignorant business manager can boast that he does the hiring and firing: it is time for a nation of free citizens to be aroused. We purpose to awaken the dormant mind of America to a realization of this detestable tyranny.

Consider the effect upon the students of this enslavement of the teacher. What confidence can they have in their instructors when any vital matter of social or political science is under discussion, if they know those instructors are subject to Legion or other espionage and censorship? All honor and all influence go from the vocation of teaching. And the students cease to learn, or to be led, but only jest at the comic wobblings of the despicable hireling before them.

Following complete information of the facts, such general indignation must result that the board of trustees of the West Chester Teachers' College will be forced to resign and their successors to choose new administrative officers. It is the duty of the State Department of Public Instruction at Harrisburg to cooperate in this housecleaning at West Chester.

To win freedom for the teacher, and to safeguard him in his position, is the great task we set before us. How shall this be accomplished? There is a way, and that way is manifest. The wage-worker has taught the teacher, but the teacher has been a slow learner. It will be our task to demonstrate to the teachers of America the necessity of following the course of the workers of America and to unionize. Unionization is the teachers' only hope. The teachers of England long since discovered this, and brain and brawn in England are united in a common cause.

If we cannot accomplish this, then all respect and all influence are gone from our profession. The teacher will be an object of pity, financially and spiritually, harassed by anxiety, dominated by fear, ineffective and despised. If we succeed, education in America will enter upon a new era and our civilization will advance to a new level.

To deliver learning from a growing and abhorrent tyranny is the purpose of our controversy with the Legion and the board of trustees.

All Aboard for Russia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It may interest some of The Nation's readers to know that Louis Fischer has consented to conduct a group of students which will go to Russia this summer under the auspices of the National Student Federation of America and the Open Road. The group will spend a week in Leningrad and a week in Moscow. It will spend its remaining three weeks in the Ukraine (one of the autonomous republics of the Union), the Crimea, a famous worker's-rest area, and in White Russia, just across from the Polish border.

Congress a Preparatory School

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A certain ex-Senator, in seeking reelection, plastered his constituency with his picture, modestly adding the words: "I have kept the faith." Presumably lack of space prevented him adding the words, "of the Oil Trust"; he is now working for it.

I am preparing a little list of members of Congress who have graduated from Congress into the service of the superstate and I would be glad to have such additions as your readers may be able to supply.

Why We Can't Buy Books

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Two important features have been overlooked in your interesting discussion on The Business of Book-Making: Small apartments limit the number of books purchased because space is not available for their proper care or availability. This constitutes an effective bar to the "effective desire for accumulation" of volumes. Friendly warfare develops between an end-table and a stack of books, between a floor lamp and five-foot bookshelf.

The second omitted element is the desirability or necessity of traveling through life lightly, especially in the strata which might under other circumstances "come into the market" for volumes. To an unexpected degree impedimenta of books constitute a bar to that mobility which is necessary today.

Never, Perhaps

By HAL SAUNDERS WHITE

Not yet—never, perhaps,
Shall these eyes see
Direct and free and calm
Uncalculated truth
Sheer clear unaltered by desire
Or fear,
Unbent by kindliness.
Never, perhaps, this pen shall learn to speak
With truth's economy
In rhythms as of rivers to the sea
Of that still deep untroubledness
Standing unfearful through the measured days
Men use to mark the cycles of their pain.
Yet I shall dream of words like arrow-shafts,
Yet I shall dream by night of that clear day
When not desire shall make our world for us
Nor fevered fingers wield a striving pen;
When that unutterable ease
Which gives to gray trees leaves unfevered of desire
And lets them, searing, down a dampened wind,
Shall be direct in me,
And all of life shall mean unceasingly
What life has ever meant
In those strange scattered intervals of calm
Between heart's pride, and hope,
And lusting after life.

First Glance

SIX hundred tall wide pages of commentary on two English poems might seem to be too much, and there is a sense in which John Livingston Lowes, author of "The Road to Xanadu" (Houghton Mifflin: $6), does say too much about "The Ancient Mariner" and "Kubla Khan," or rather about the mind which gave them forth. But I shall reserve that point for another paragraph. Here let me record my joy that such a job has been done at all—that someone with Mr. Lowes's taste and enthusiasm has let himself down into the chaos of Coleridge's mind just on the eve of the poet's best efforts in the art over which, for the most part, he was a fumbler. For a few years before that famous day in 1798 when Coleridge and Wordsworth began to understand and stimulate each other, Coleridge had been reading—reading everything he could lay his hands on and hunting with particular relish for strange, gleaming facts imbedded in old travel books. It has long been known how in this period he intoxicated himself with Hakluyt and Purchas, not to mention Captain Cook, William Bartram, and hundreds of other geographers. And a German edition was available of the curiously disordered notebook he kept in order to remind himself that in such and such a folio, on page this or that, he could find some wonderful detail about sea monsters, ice fields, or tropic calms in case he needed it in his business. But the whole content of his mind at this date was not known. Mr. Lowes, so far as the thing was possible, has learned it and has made it known. Starting with the notebook, but stopping nowhere, he has tracked his hero's intelligence as it plowed through all those thousands of pages. Mr. Lowes, in a word, has read substantially everything which Coleridge read in the years that mattered. The result is something unique—a sense of intimacy with the brain of an artist as he sits down to compose masterpieces.

The risk which Mr. Lowes ran, of course, was the risk that he presume upon this intimacy and begin to suppose himself capable of knowing just how the poems got written. The perfect thing, for one possessed of Mr. Lowes's erudition, would have been simply to arrange the reading of Coleridge on one side of an imaginary line and to print the poems on the other side, pointing out traces of direct borrowing wherever possible, suggesting probable affinities here or there, and most of the time saying nothing. The concern of such a scholar, in other words, would be wholly with demonstrable facts. Mr. Lowes has generally confined himself to facts, and so has written a book of enormous value. But as he goes on he falls more and more into talk about "processes" and "ways" of the imagination. To be sure, he protests that he is not trying to "explain" the two poems, and makes much of their mystery. There is a rather awful glibness, however, in his very protestations; so that one is prepared to hear him resorting eventually to terms like "reordering," "transmutation," and "the shaping spirit," and one is not surprised to find him falling into confused imagery of a sort that permits him to speak of "raw materials" taken out of a "well" and woven on a "loom." All this part of the book was tiresome and prosaic to me. It was final proof that the more one knows about poetry the less one knows—and says.

MARK VAN DOREN

Fresh Air in American History

The Rise of American Civilization. By Charles A. Beard and Mary R. Beard. The Macmillan Company. Two volumes. $12.50.

THE work has no preface—that first aid to reviewers. I don't make a grievance of it in this case, because a book by C. A. Beard I should wish to read anyhow, sooner or later. These two substantial and finely printed volumes (with excellent woodcuts by Wilfred Jones) I have read, as they say, "with profit," which is something, and with great delight, which is more. I don't say it's a "gripping" book, nor yet a "compelling" one. What is it then? Well, it's a Beard book. That is to say, it is written with verve and swift facility, with nervous, careless prodigality of phrase and epithet, with free and pungent comment, and with an occasional irrepressible sardonic sideswipe at anything smug that turns up by the way. It is a masterly survey of American civilization in successive periods (with the narrative of events reduced to a minimum), conceived as the motive, action, thought of fallible human creatures, inspired as may be by mean or great objects, but carried along by the resistless sweep of economic forces. A Marxian interpretation in the main, but saved from the thin doctrinaire perfection of that or any other formula by exact knowledge, intellectual honesty, and a rapier-like intelligence that refuses to be duped by illusions, whether tough or tender minded.

The central thesis, if there is one (the authors do not stress it), is indicated by the division into chapters and their respective titles. The first volume carries the story down to the Civil War, or thereabouts, and is called "The Agricultural Era"; the second volume is entitled "The Industrial Era." The business of colonial settlement being quickly dispatched, there follow four admirable chapters describing provincial America and elucidating the causes and the character of the American Revolution. The account of the revolution will not commend itself to the D. A. R. The "Critical Period" is found to have been critical chiefly to business and financial interests, and the establishment of the Constitution a triumph (mainly) of creditors over debtors. The rise of national parties is not to be explained (not fully) by the "instinctive differences" between people (as Macaulay thought), or by "differences of opinion concerning the nature and function of the Union" (as Bryce thought), but by "causes more substantial than matters of temperament or juristic theory." They are to be explained essentially as the result of a conflict between the industrial and the agricultural interest; so that it was no accident that "a New York lawyer stood at the head of the party which despised the masses, and a Virginia slave-owner led the party which professed faith in the multitude." (But what about the theory that Jefferson loved humanity because his father was cross to him?) The victory of the industrial interest in 1789 was, however, only temporary—an interlude occasioned (so I suppose) by the conflict with Great Britain and the temporary suspension of the occupation of the Mississippi Valley. At all events the rise of the West and its alliance with the South assured the domination of the agricultural interest for thirty years, during which this combination elected every President except two (accidental military heroes), and ultimately shelved the industrial program—bank, tariff, debt, internal improvements, and distribution of the public lands—a program which Polk described as designed "to transfer money from the pockets of the people to the favored classes."

Yet in the end the industrial interest proved too strong for the landed interest. The Civil War was the turning-point from the agricultural era to the industrial era—an incident in an "irrepressible conflict" indeed, an irrepressible conflict not between slavery and freedom, or between States' rights and nationalism, but between land and capital. "The supreme outcome of the civil strife was the destruction of the planting aristocracy which, with the aid of Northern farmers and mechanics, had practically ruled the United States for a generation. A corollary to that result was the undisputed triumph of a new combination of power—Northern capitalists and free farmers, who emerged from the conflict richer and more numerous than ever." From the Civil War the story is therefore chiefly of the unabashed capitalistic exploitation of the incomparable resources of the country, and of the equally unabashed exploitation of political power through the Grand Old Party which had "saved the Union." Chastened but hardly checked by the Bryans and the muckrakers, the Roosevelts and the Wilsons, the irresistible force of a capitalistic and mechanical civilization carried us, and still carries us, on to a new "manifest destiny." Already we are the Romans of the modern world, sitting at the gate of customs taking toll for our loaned billions, sending our proconsuls and knights of finance into the provinces of the East, collecting the manuscripts and the paintings, gathering the spoils and the talent, the admiration and the envy, perchance the hatred, too, of the more sophisticated and fragile peoples whom we supplant in the seats of power. And through it all the ship of state, impelled onward by these deep economic currents which no captain of politics or of industry can either foresee or control, still carries at its masthead the emblazoned insignia of "American Ideals"—Liberty, Equality, Humanity.

Such is the main thesis. Not that the authors are wholly concerned with the sweep of economic forces. Far from it. Manners and customs, the intellectual activities, art, science, music, and education—all these are noted with fulness and penetration. Particularly admirable are the four chapters which deal with the "cultural" aspects of American civilization in successive periods—Provincial America; Democracy, Romantic and Realistic; The Gilded Age; The Machine Age. In these chapters you will find a little of everything which the "newer historian" clamors for—not a "synthesis of society" exactly, but something more than a hodge-podge, an entertaining and intelligible account in fact. Inevitably, in this book which is so free from bunk, in which nothing is too great or too little to be noted (from Immanuel Kant to Will Rogers, from Jacobinism to jazz), it is often difficult to recognize the ancient lady Clio, famous for her spotless flowing robes. She is off stage so much of the time! Her hair is bobbed, and you can see her bare knees if you care to look, for she rolls 'em too, and will in any company as like as not be seen tapping a cigarette or fumbling for a lip-stick. It's all right with me. What the lady loses in dignity she gains in appeal—sex maybe.

A review of a history book should properly end with a list of "errors noted." Well, here goes! It is not correct to imply that the initial suggestion for the first Continental Congress came from Massachusetts and Sam Adams. And the Dred Scott Decision—if I only knew enough law I could tell you how and why the authors have missed the real significance of the Dred Scott Decision. They must have missed it. At least I hope they have. American history would lose most of its mystery and half of its charm if any one should be so indiscreet as to discover the truth about the Dred Scott Decision. It's one of the things that aren't done.

Fresh Air in American Letters

Main Currents in American Thought. By Vernon Louis Parrington. Harcourt, Brace and Company. Two volumes. $4 each.

A FEW years ago Mr. Roscoe Pound yanked Miss Absolute Justice down from her cold marble throne in the frosty realm of abstract right, gave her a new name, Sociological Jurisprudence, handed her an apron, and put her to work in a mundane place where she could learn about lives of men and women, loving and hating, acquiring and spending, hoping and fearing. As a result, Mr. Pound gave a great impetus to a revolution in legal instruction, in speculation about rights, and in the practices of courts. Moreover, he helped to explode innumerable naive prejudices, masquerading as "immutable moral principles," and to introduce the idea of human justice into the tribunals for the disposal of cases, all to the glory of God and the improvement of social relations. Now it appears that Mr. Parrington is about to start an upheaval in American literary criticism. He has yanked Miss Beautiful Letters out of the sphere of the higher verbal hokum and fairly set her in the way that leads to contact with pulsating reality—that source and inspiration of all magnificent literature. No doubt, the magpies, busy with the accidence of Horace, the classical allusions of Thoreau, and the use of the adverb by Emerson, will make a big outcry, but plain citizens who believe that the American eagle could soar with unblinking eyes against the full-orbed noonday sun if he had half a chance will clap their hands with joy and make the hills ring with gladness.

To descend to particulars, Mr. Parrington has written two volumes, one of 400 and the other of 500 pages, on the development of American opinion. The first volume, "The Colonial Mind," covers the period from 1620 to 1800, and the second, "The Romantic Revolution in America," brings the story down to the eve of the Civil War. The grand plan is divided into six Books: Liberalism and Puritanism (the war of the theologians in New England), the Colonial Mind (the development of the American pattern and its ideological contrasts with the metropolitan defense mechanisms), Liberalism and the Constitution (the clash of agrarianism and capitalism, through the formation of the Constitution to the triumph of Jeffersonian democracy), the Mind of the South (physiocratic agrarianism, plantation psychology, and frontier equalitarianism), the Mind of the Middle East (the conflict of Whiggery and Jacksonian level-

SEVEN NEGRO SERMONS IN VERSE

by JAMES WELDON JOHNSON

THE CREATION

"One of the most remarkable and moving poems of its type ever written in America," says H. L. Mencken of Go Down Death, one of the seven poems. Mr. Johnson has turned the great inspirational sermons of the old Negro preachers into poetry which will survive by reason of its content and of its quality.

The Creation, already known to thousands as one of the great poems of our day, is included. The others are Noah Built the Ark, The Prayer, Let My People Go, The Crucifixion, The Judgment Day and The Prodigal Son. The eight illustrations by Aaron Douglas and the beauty of the binding and printing form an appropriate frame for the beauty of the verse. $2.50

BARNUM'S OWN STORY

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF P. T. BARNUM

Edited by Waldo R. Browne

"The Prince of Humbugs" lives again in this new edition of his famous autobiography which sold half a million in its day and has long been out of print. Waldo R. Browne has assembled the material contained in the various editions, and has restored delightfully candid passages which Barnum suppressed in his more respectable old age. The result is a biographical classic which belongs on the shelf beside Cellini, Rousseau and other "confessions." "As interesting a bit of reading as ever your eyes have met."—The Pittsburgh Press.

ism), and the Mind of New England (old federalism and reforming militancy).

In method of treatment Mr. Parrington has followed a systematic scheme. He prefaces each Book with a general survey of the cultural scene—its economic substance, its class arrangements, its changing forces, and its verbal modes. In this sweeping sketch-work our author shows that he had labored long with a scholar's zeal, possesses a keen eye for the realities of social situations, and commands a rare capacity for bold outlining. For example, on the first page of his opening Book he introduces his readers to "the two chief classes of New England: the yeomanry, a body of democratic freeholders who constituted the rank and file of the people, and the gentry, a group of capable merchants who dominated the commonwealth from the early days to the rise of industrialism." Then he goes on to explain that "it was the interweaving of the aims and purposes of these acquisitive yeomen and gentry—harmonious for the most part on the surface, yet driving in different directions—with the ideal of a theocracy and the inhibitions of Puritan dogma, that constitutes the pattern of life to be dealt with here." In this down-to-bedrock fashion, Mr. Parrington gives the reader an understanding of the social organism of each scene and period—the organism mirrored in culture and opinion. These provocative introductions are alone worth the price of admission.

After rubbing in a good solid background, Mr. Parrington proceeds to an analysis of theological opinions, political theories, social ideals, and imaginative literature, employing outstanding figures, such as John Winthrop, John Cotton, Roger Williams, John Eliot, the Mathers, John Wise, Jonathan Edwards, Franklin, Jonathan Boucher, John Dickinson, Samuel Adams, Francis Hopkinson, Jonathan Odell, Hamilton, John Adams, Paine, Jefferson, the Hartford Wits, Freneau, John Taylor, John Marshall, Beverley Tucker, John Pendleton Kennedy, Calhoun, W. J. Grayson, William Gilmore Simms, Andrew Jackson, Lincoln, Augustus Baldwin Longstreet, Davy Crockett, Washington Irving, Horace Greeley, Fisher Ames, Webster, Margaret Fuller, Emerson, Hawthorne, and James Russell Lowell, to illustrate the movement of American thought in relation to the continuous transformation of economic life. In each case Mr. Parrington attempts to discover the filaments that unite the personality and ideas of the typical leader with the social organism in which he moves and works. With due respect for the reader, our author clothes his text in clear, straightforward, flowing English.

Like all pioneer undertakings, Mr. Parrington's volumes are open to criticism from many angles. In anticipation he himself suggests that some of his shortcomings are due to the lack of preliminary studies and satisfactory biographies. Most family gardeners who prepare memoirs of departed great leave their readers to infer that their heroes had no economic affiliations and, for the benefit of easily frightened persons, usually exclude disturbing opinions expressed in private letters—opinions that are often more eloquent than whole reams of pleasantries deemed worthy of preservation. In other words, for practical purposes our biographies are generally worthless to anyone who wants to find out how and why things happened.

To the present reviewer Mr. Parrington's chief sin of omission is his neglect of natural science and its influence on theology, politics, and letters. Surely, Silliman's pamphlet on the effect of the new geology upon Miltonic cosmogony, published in the romantic age of Emerson, deserves as much space as the lucubrations of Cotton Mather. A stickler for niceties might well protest against Mr. Parrington's refusal to give John Woolman, America's first humanistic philosopher, a prominent niche in the pantheon of thinkers. But all such suggestions do not detract from the high merits of the work before us. Our author has traced American political, economic, and social development in bold strokes and has sought to relate letters and opinion to the forces "anterior to literary schools and movements," revealing the substance from which literary culture springs. In carrying out his project he has written a truly significant book; according to signs on every hand, a work that promises to be epoch-making, sending exhilarating gusts through the deadly miasma of academic criticism. These volumes are additional proof that America is coming of age, entering into a period of concentration, fulfilling Walter Pater's law of unification preparatory to fundamental thinking, that condition prerequisite to cultural flowering in independence.

Marco the Westerner

Marco Millions. By Eugene O'Neill. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

IN this, the latest of O'Neill's plays to be made public and the first of his long pieces to appear in print before being performed on the stage, the author turns an ironic eye upon the character of Marco Polo and sees in him not the glorious adventurer of tradition but an early example of that characteristic Occidental extraversion which reaches its ultimate development in the apotheosis of the commercial spirit. Junior member of the firm of Polo, Brothers and Son, Marco makes his way to the court of the great Khan, and there, under the amused eye of the philosophic emperor, undertakes with complacent good humor to confer upon the latter's subjects the benefits of civilization. He invents for them a debased paper currency; he appears in court in the full regalia of the Cock of Paradise, supreme ruler of a fraternal order called Mystic Knights of Confucius which he has founded; and finally, as a parting gift, he explains to them how they may use their gunpowder—hitherto frivolously wasted in fireworks—for the more serious purpose of blowing one another up in the interest of lasting peace. Innocent of reflection, impervious to irony, he moves through life with the terrible directness of a shrewd child, and he makes it simple by leaving out whatever is really important. "On the last Day one of your seed will interrupt Gabriel to sell him another trumpet," says the Pope in dismissing him for his journey, and that remark is significant of something more important than Marco's naive avarice; for it implies as well that he is equally incapable of perceiving either comedy or tragedy.

Obviously, the play has its touches of burlesque, and O'Neill has successfully employed the dangerous device involved in using certain deliberate anachronisms to point his satire; but burlesque is not the method of the piece, for in it even satire first melts into fancy and then rises to tragedy. Against the calm, schooled, and resolute indifference of the Eastern philosopher O'Neill sets not only the crass insensibility of the Venetian but a passionate and exalted romanticism, embodied in the daughter of the Khan, as well. Stricken with love for Marco, she can hope neither for any response from his prosaic soul nor for any real comfort in the tolerant but disillusioned wisdom of her own people, and in the end each of the three chief characters must meet the fate reserved for his particular nature, the Princess dying for love, the Khan struggling to accept the wisdom of his philosophers, and Marco returning triumphant to Venice in an appropriate and sublime incomprehension of his failure even to know what the others were about.

Beauty with a capital "B" has generally proved the Nemesis of those contemporary writers who have directly pursued it, and in the past O'Neill has not escaped the common fate. Condemned like the rest to know the thing chiefly by its absence, to deal in passion and in protests whose vehemence revealed the depths of his unsatisfied desires, his solitary previous effort to realize beauty in beauty's own terms resulted in "The Fountain"; and "The Fountain" was a curiously impotent effort—one which revealed that O'Neill, however much he might surpass his fellows in other respects, was nevertheless, like them, unable to do more than reduce the idea of beauty to the shadow of a sentiment. Nor would anyone who had followed the chronology of his recent plays have predicted any development in that direction, for "Desire Under the Elms" was as agonized as anything

Was the war a conspiracy or a collaboration?

Which of the great powers were guilty, which innocent? Or were all guilty together? Did Germany precipitate the struggle, or did she work strenuously to avert it? A vast amount is known today that even the most astute diplomat had no conception of in 1914-18. All this knowledge is analyzed in the standard work on the subject: the new, completely revised edition of

THE GENESIS OF THE WORLD WAR

by Harry Elmer Barnes, Ph. D.,

Author of History and Social Intelligence, Sociology and Political Theory, etc.; Professor of Historical Sociology, Smith College; Lecturer on the History of Civilization, New School for Social Research; formerly Bayard Cutting Fellow in History, Columbia University; Bibliographic Editor of Foreign Affairs (American).

Professor Barnes demolishes once for all the propagandist theories of war-guilt which were industriously disseminated by each of the great powers during and just after the war. Using a huge body of newly available documents and monographs, he brings the responsibility for the catastrophe squarely home, not to any one nation or group, but to that system of intricately organized anarchy which was pre-war Europe.

A consensus of the world's greatest historians, scholars, and publicists accepted The Genesis of the World War—even before the present exhaustive revision—as full, fair, authoritative, and uniquely readable. Glance at what a representative handful of these critics have said about the book as a feat of historical scholarship and as a document absorbing to whoever will read its opening sentences:

"No other American scholar has done so much . . . to familiarize his countrymen with the new evidence . . . and to compel them to revise their war-time judgments."—George Peabody Gooch, in the Contemporary Review.

"It is not only readable and trustworthy, I must confess that it is comprehensive."—Raymond Beazley, University of Birmingham.

"Before his powerful argument, buttressed with relevant facts, the Sunday School theory of war is utterly demolished."—Charles Austin Beard, in Current History.

Are not the publishers more than justified in maintaining that no person interested in contemporary affairs can afford to be without the knowledge which this amazing book has to impart about the greatest international problem of our age?

"He is frank and honest and sober in his statements. He has studied the evidence with care, and he has presented his case in the temper of a historian rather than of a lawyer. We must pay attention to books like this."—Herbert Adams Gibbons, in the New York Sun.

"No detective story is half as engrossing."—Ferdinand Schevill, in the Christian Century.

"This thoroughly honest, admirably generous book."—R. L. Duffus in The New York Times.

New, Completely Revised Edition

THE GENESIS OF THE WORLD WAR

by Harry Elmer Barnes

The new, completely revised edition is improved:

(1) by treatment of freshly accessible documents, especially from British sources;
(2) by the results of the author's researches and conferences in Europe during the past year; and
(3) by full, circumstantial answers to all important criticism of the earlier edition, now exhausted and superseded.

HISTORY and SOCIAL INTELLIGENCE

An attempt to define a type of history worthy of exploitation in the interest of the social intelligence. It traces the rise and spread of historical myths, and its range in time is from the Fathers of the American Revolution to the reign of Calvin the Silent.

Its analysis of the propaganda during the late war is, on its smaller scale, as brilliant a piece of writing as The Genesis of the World War.

he had written and "The Great God Brown" most coherent where it was most exclusively concerned with vehement protest. But "Marco Millions" portrays with an equally assured power the two faces of its subject, realizing the spiritual depth of its idealized Orientals no less fully than it does the shallow, bumptious complacency of Marco. Here to be sure is only tragedy for the romantic desires of the heroine and a wisdom which is rooted in despair, but withal an acquiescence which can be exalted because it is complete. In none other of O'Neill's plays is there so near an approach to peace.

Drama

What's Hecuba to Him?

TO whosoever finds himself strangely moved by some tale remote in time and remote in theme from anything which concerns his life or his experience, Hamlet's famous question will recur; and so it must have recurred to many who witnessed either of the benefit performances of Sophocles's "Electra" which Margaret Anglin gave at the Metropolitan Opera House. The "righteous deed of blood" which forms the subject of the play was done, if ever it was done at all, at a time already grown misty when first it was reenacted upon the stage; the tragic fate of Pelops' line is no concern of ours; and we are not even in any position to understand the feelings which made the desire to avenge a father's murder seem a worthy and suitable purpose to which to devote the lifetime of two people. What's Hecuba to us or we to Hecuba? Yet feelings, as Havelock Ellis once remarked, are the solidest facts of all; against all reason we are concerned, and Hecuba will get tears denied to those whose fate, it would seem, should touch us nearer.

Even to the Greeks the magic investing the legendary personages of their drama was one which chiefly depended upon what we designate by the technical term "pathos," upon, that is to say, an emotional aura which comes under certain circumstances to invest certain things with an affective power not intrinsic in them. Argolis was nearer to Athens than it is to New York; the story of Electra touched chords in its inhabitants not strung upon our hearts; but even in Athens it was chiefly upon "pathos" that it depended, and for us this pathos alone remains. When a character or a situation has passed through many inferior hands it becomes hackneyed and cheap, but when many noble minds have concerned themselves with it it is not worn but enriched. Like an heirloom it becomes more precious because of those who have possessed it, and something of them adheres to that which they have touched. We weep for Hecuba because so many have wept for her before. When we touch her we not merely touch a dim Grecian of some remote and barbarous age but touch also and at the same time all those who have felt for her, and thus we make ourselves part of a great continuous tradition of human sensibility.

As for Miss Anglin's performance, it would be absurd to attribute to it any greatness not strictly intrinsic, for we are concerned with no pathos here. It has dignity and intelligence, and it is moderately free from that tendency toward mere declamation which generally mars any modern effort to achieve the grand style; but it lacks variety of tone and it is more marked by sincerity than by genius. Yet there is probably no other American actress who could do it so well. All Western Europe is poor in native "pathetic" figures—perhaps the fact that it presents the strange anomaly of a continent which can have no heroes at once national and religious, because its religious legends are all concerned with an alien people, has something to do with this lack—and the general European poverty is merely more acute in America. To think of the figures of our past is not merely to realize how little time there has been to enrich them but to realize also that our feelings are not the same toward them as were those of our grandfathers. A body of art, theatrical or otherwise, which has nowhere represented in it the beauty of pathos is one which is singularly incomplete, and not only America but Europe as well must go back to Greece before it can find any body of legendary material which has been common property long enough to have become in the completest sense pathetic.

The exigencies of the critic's profession here require a sufficiently abrupt transition from "Electra" to "The Circus Princess" (Winter Garden) and "A Night in Spain" (Forty-fourth Street Theater), the former being an elaborate operetta and the latter an elaborate revue. Both are unusually good specimens of their kind, and though it is conventional to regard the musical comedy as less vulgar than the more completely miscellaneous revue I confess my own preference for the latter. "A Night in Spain" has a chorus of dancers who perform with a beautiful if mechanical exactitude, and it has, among a great wealth of other performers, the amiable Phil Baker and a new Spanish dancer of great virtuosity called Helba Huara.

Moving Pictures

Realism au Naturel

IT is well to be reminded that there are places on this planet where man is still a plaything of nature and his life a never-ending struggle against her blind forces. Such a place is the far-away and inaccessible Siamese jungle which Messrs. Cooper and Schoedsack exhibit in their interesting film called "Chang." There danger lurks behind every bush. Man's life and labor are continuously exposed to the attacks of giant snakes, bears, leopards, tigers, and wild elephants. The last are the most to be feared, and one of the most effective scenes in "Chang" is that showing a herd of elephants literally razing to the ground—like so many card boxes—a whole native village. Here then is human life which ever and again caps a redoubtable effort with the bitterness of defeat. No better material could be desired for a drama. And yet "Chang" is not drama—not even melodrama, which it is said to be in the official program.

In saying this I do not want to detract from the credit which is due the authors of the film for the infinite pains and exceptional risks they took in securing their material. As films go today, theirs is an achievement. But the claim put forward on their behalf is hardly justified. It is just as a dramatic narrative that "Chang" fails. We are shown a native couple engaged in the daily pursuits of primitive farming. We see their peaceful life occasionally disturbed by encounters with leopards and tigers—encounters in which man proves always victorious. Then comes their greatest calamity, the destruction of their home by an enraged mother-elephant; and a similar fate befalls a neighboring village. Miraculously, no man is killed; the villagers organize a pursuit of the elephants; they succeed in driving practically the whole herd into a trap—and thus our pioneer couple is seen again building a new homestead with a tamed elephant for their obedient servant. The story, even as it stands, should have provided sufficient opportunities for drama against the background of a relentless and awe-inspiring jungle. But in "Chang" the jungle is shown not so much in the pictures as in the subtitles (preposterously inept to boot), and man's struggle for existence is hardly ever conveyed—much less made to appear as a heroic fight against an implacable foe.

The authors are not entirely to blame for this. The natives photographed were not actors, nor could they be expected to sacrifice their lives for the sake of a certain effect. Again, the conditions under which the picture was made were not of a kind that would enable a director to build his effects according to plan. But all this only goes to show that mere realism is not enough. A film, to be truly dramatic, must organize its material as a dynamic sequence in which all scenes are emotionally related to one another. There is no such unity in "Chang."

The Fascist Labor Charter

THE Fascist Charter of Labor, made public at the recent celebration of Rome's 2,681st birthday, was printed in the Lavoro d' Italia (Rome) for April 23. The text follows.

The Corporative State and Its Organization

1. The Italian nation is an organism having aims, life, and modes of action superior to those of the separate individuals or groups which compose it. It is a moral, political, and economic unity, integrated in the Fascist state.

2. Labor in all its intellectual, technical, and manual forms is a social duty. As such, it is protected by the state.

The sphere of production is considered as a unit from the national standpoint; its aims are united and are based on the well-being of the producers and the development of the power of the nation.

3. Professional or syndical organization is permitted. But only the syndicate which is legally recognized and placed under the control of the state is entitled legally to represent the group of employers or workers for which it is formed, to protect its interests before the state or other professional associations, to draw up collective labor contracts which are obligatory for all those belonging in that group, to collect dues, or to exercise any authority over its members in matters of public interest.

4. In the collective labor contract lies the concrete expression of solidarity between the various factors of production through the conciliation of the opposing interests of employers and employees and their subordination to the superior interests of production.

5. The Labor Court is the organ through which the state intervenes to regulate labor controversies, whether they hinge on the observance of contracts and other existing agreements or on the formulation of new labor conditions.

6. Legally recognized professional associations insure judicial equality between employers and workers, uphold the discipline of production and labor, and promote the perfecting of this discipline.

Corporations constitute the unified organization of the forces of production, and represent interests as a whole. In view of this integral representation, inasmuch as in the interests of production are national interests, corporations are recognized by law as state organs.

7. The corporative state considers private initiative in the field of production the most efficient and most useful instrument of the interests of the nation.

Private organization of production being a function of national interest, the organizer of the business is responsible to the state for the method of production. Through the collaboration of productive forces comes a reciprocity of rights and duties. The worker who lends his services, whether technical, clerical, or manual, is an active collaborator in the economic undertaking, the direction of which falls on the employer who is responsible for it.

8. Professional associations of employers are obliged to promote in every way the increase and perfecting of products and the reduction of costs. The representatives of those who practice a free profession or an art and the associations of those in public service concur in the protection of the interests of art, science, and literature, in the perfecting of production, and in the attainment of the aims of the corporative state.

9. Intervention of the state in production takes place only when private initiative is lacking or insufficient, or when the political interests of the state are involved. This intervention may assume the form of control, or encouragement, or of direct management.

10. In collective labor controversies judicial action cannot be applied if the corporation has not first attempted conciliation.

In individual controversies concerning the interpretation and the application of collective labor contracts, professional associations are empowered to interpose their offices for conciliation.

The Collective Contract and Its Guaranties

Authority in such controversies is vested in the ordinary courts with the addition of justices designated by the professional associations concerned.

11. Professional associations are obliged to regulate through collective contracts the labor relations between the groups of employers and workers which they represent.

The collective labor contract is drawn up between associations of the lower rank under the guidance and control of the central organizations, except for the power of substitution on the part of the association of higher rank, in cases covered by law or statutes.

Each collective labor contract, under penalty of nullification, must contain definite regulations with regard to disciplinary regulations, the apprenticeship period, the amount and payment of wages and salaries, and the length of the working day.

12. The action of the syndicates, the conciliative function of the corporations (associations representing both employers and workers), and the verdict of the labor court guarantee the adjustment of wages to the normal demands of living, to the capacity of production, and to the fitting return of labor.

The determination of wages is not subject to any general rule, but is made subject to the agreement of the parties to the collective contracts.

13. The data obtained from the public administration, from the Central Statistical Institute, and from the legally recognized professional associations concerning the conditions of production and labor, the situation of the money market, and the variations in the standard of living of the workers, after being coordinated and properly drawn up by the Minister of Corporations, shall form the basis of judgment in adjusting the interests of the various groups and the various classes among themselves, and their interests in relation to the superior interests of production.

14. When the wage is based on piece work and calculated according to a period of two weeks or more, adequate biweekly or weekly payments must be made.

Night work, except for regular shifts, shall be paid at a higher rate than day work.

When payment is made on a piece-work basis, the scale shall be established in such a way that the diligent worker of normal working capacity shall be permitted to obtain a minimum surplus over the basic amount.

15. The worker is entitled to a weekly rest on Sundays. Collective contracts shall apply this principle, taking into consideration the provisions of existing laws and the technical requirements of the industry, and within the limits of such requirements they shall in addition attempt to provide for the observance of civil and religious holidays. The length of the working day must be scrupulously and strictly adhered to by the worker.

16. After one year of uninterrupted service the worker in an establishment which has been operating continuously is entitled to an annual period of vacation with pay.

17. In establishments which operate continuously the worker is entitled, in case of cessation of labor relations through dismissal, to compensation in proportion to the number of years of service. This compensation is due even in case of the death of the worker.

18. In establishments which operate continuously, the transfer of ownership of a business shall not dissolve the contract, and the employees connected with it conserve their rights in dealing with the new owners. Also, the illness of the worker, if it does not exceed a fixed period, shall not dissolve the labor contract. A call to arms or to service in the Fascist militia is not cause for dismissal.

19. Infractions of discipline and acts which disturb the normal procedure of business, if committed by the workers, are punished, according to the seriousness of the offense, with fine, with suspension, and, in serious cases, with immediate dismissal without compensation.

Cases in which the employer can impose a fine or suspension or immediate dismissal without compensation shall be specified.

20. A new worker is subject to a period of apprenticeship, during which there exists a reciprocal right to dissolve the contract with no other formality than remuneration for the time during which the work was effectively performed.

21. The collective labor contract extends its privileges and its discipline also to resident workers. Special regulations shall be drawn up by the state to insure the policing and hygiene of resident work.

22. The state ascertains and controls the phenomenon of employment and unemployment of workers, which is a general index of conditions of production and labor.

Employment Offices

23. The employment office is under the joint control of the corporations. The employers are obliged to employ the workers registered in these offices, and have freedom of choice within the limits of those registered on the lists, preference being given to members of the party and the Fascist unions in the order of their enrolment.

24. Professional associations of workers must exercise a selective action among the workers, with a view to increasing technical capacity and morale.

25. Corporations will insist on the enforcement, by the various members of the allied associations, of the laws dealing with the prevention of accidents and the policing of labor.

Insurance, Aid, Education, and Instruction

26. Insurance is an important example of the principle of collaboration. The employer and employees must share it proportionately. The state, through the corporations and professional associations, shall attempt to coordinate and unify, as far as possible, the system and the institutions of insurance.

27. The Fascist state proposes:

(a) Perfecting of accident insurance;

(b) Improvement and extension of maternity insurance;

(c) Insurance against professional diseases and tuberculosis as a step toward general insurance against all illness;

(d) Perfecting of insurance against involuntary unemployment;

(e) Adoption of special forms of endowment insurance for young workers.

28. The workers' associations are responsible for the protection of their representatives in the administration and judicial activities connected with accident and social insurance.

Collective labor contracts shall provide, wherever technically possible, for the establishment of mutual funds for sickness, to be contributed by employers and employees, and to be administrated by both, under the supervision of the corporations.

29. Aid to its own group, whether members or not, is a right and a duty of professional associations. These associations must exercise such functions directly through their own channels, nor can they delegate them to other associations or institutions except for purposes of a general nature, beyond the interests of each group of producers.

30. Education and instruction, especially professional instruction, of their group, whether members or not, is one of the principal duties of professional associations. They must supplement the activities of the national administration by means of night schools and other educational opportunities.

"I AM WORTH now infinitely more to die than to live," said John Brown of Harper's Ferry a few days before his execution. Standing in court to hear his death sentence, this same man said: "Now, if it is deemed necessary that I should forfeit my life for the furtherance of the ends of justice, and mingle my blood further with the blood of my children and with the blood of millions in this slave country whose rights are disregarded by wicked, cruel, and unjust enactments, I say, let it be done." Again, when someone showed him Henry Ward Beecher's statement about him: "Let Virginia make him a martyr. . . . His soul was noble, his work miserable. But a cord and a gibbet would redeem all that, and round up Brown's failure with a heroic success," John Brown took his pencil and wrote opposite to this statement the single word "good." These extraordinary utterances are recalled to us by the brave words of another man facing death at the hands of the State, Bartolomeo Vanzetti. Speaking to a reporter, he has just said:

> If it had not been for these thing, I might have live out my life, talking at street corners to scorning men. I might have die, unmarked, unknown, a failure. Now we are not a failure. This is our career and our triumph. Never in our full life can we hope to do such work for tolerance, for joostice, for man's onderstanding of man, as now we do by an accident. Our words—our lives—our pains—nothing! The taking of our lives—lives of a good shoemaker and a poor fish-peddler—all! That last moment belong to us—that agony is our triumph!

The slave power in 1859 was sure that Henry Ward Beecher was wrong and Governor Wise right when he ordained that Brown should die, but Brown's soul went marching on from 1861 to 1865 wherever there were federal troops. We would not press the parallel too far, but let those who clamor for the blood of Sacco and Vanzetti, whether they be guilty or innocent, take notice. History has a way of repeating itself.

BY A UNANIMOUS VOTE the Supreme Court of the United States has upheld the constitutionality of the California Anti-Syndicalism Law, and affirmed the convictions of Miss Charlotte Anita Whitney and William Burns. The court did not, however, pass directly upon Miss Whitney's case, Justices Holmes and Brandeis regretting that it was not so presented as to permit a ruling on whether her acts violated the State law. This most useful citizen must now go to jail unless some way can be found to present her case to the Supreme Court, as the two liberal justices obviously desire that it should be. In fairness to them it must also be pointed out that Justice Brandeis, in dissenting from the view of the majority as to syndicalism, declared, in a statement in which Justice Holmes joined him:

> Fear of serious injury cannot alone justify suppression of free speech and assembly. Even imminent danger cannot justify resort to prohibitions of these functions essential to effective democracy unless the evil apprehended is relatively serious.

He also found himself unable to concede that the formation of a political party to advocate a mass revolution at some future time "is not a right within the protection of the Fourteenth Amendment." But the existence of testimony establishing an I. W. W. conspiracy to commit serious crimes made it impossible for the two justices "to disturb the judgment of the State court." It is not for us to challenge the legal position taken, but we cannot refrain from adding our opinion that this decision marks a milestone in the deterioration of the American democracy, and opens the road to a suppression of public opinion and the further punishment of individual belief, incompatible with the republic of Jefferson and Lincoln.

MORE THAN ORDINARY INTEREST attaches to the announcement that the Russian-American Industrial Corporation will redeem the shares of its stockholders at par. The organization of this corporation was the result of a visit by Sidney Hillman to Russia during the famine days. His organization, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, then contributed $200,000 in foodstuffs and medicines to aid the famine sufferers. But Mr. Hillman became of the opinion that the Russians themselves would wish to have money invested in Russia rather than receive it in the form of charity. As a result $300,000 was raised, some thousands of which were contributed by readers of The Nation, and the Russian-American Corporation formed. This sum was largely used for the purchase of machinery and raw materials for the clothing trusts in Russia, the corporation functioning through the All Russian Clothing Syndicate. It declared one dividend of 3 and one of 5 per cent to its stockholders. The RAIC, as it is called, was also the first instrument for the transmission of funds to Russia, which business has now been made a regular and stabilized banking operation. Since it began the transfer of money, more than twenty million dollars have been sent by some four hundred thousand people through the Amalgamated Bank of New York and the Amalgamated Trust and Savings Bank in Chicago. The stockholders of the RAIC not only have the satisfaction of receiving their money back in full, but they also may take pride in having helped labor to demonstrate that it can conduct important business operations efficiently and profitably while helping a stricken people.

THE POLICY OF DECEPTION which the Department of State has practiced toward the American people throughout its present intrigue in Nicaragua continues as that adventure progresses toward its unhappy conclusion. When on May 6 an announcement was made that the leader of the Liberal forces had "undertaken to persuade his troops to lay down their arms," no mention was made of Mr. Stimson's warning that otherwise American marines would make war upon the army and forcibly disarm it. The next day came a statement that so far as the department knew there had been no threat of force to induce the Liberal troops to surrender their arms.

> And yet all this time [as the New York World comments] there lay on some desk in the State Department a copy of Mr. Stimson's letter to General Moncada saying that the President had authorized our marines in Nicaragua to accept the custody of the arms of those willing to lay them down "and to disarm forcibly those who will not do so."

When dispatches from Nicaragua revealed to this country the actual character of the negotiations the following feeble apology appeared:

> At the State Department today Secretary Kellogg explained that he had not meant to be evasive last Friday when he failed to mention to newspaper representatives that Colonel Stimson had written a letter to General Moncada of the Liberal army. . . . This letter was contained in press dispatches from Nicaragua to American newspapers, Secretary Kellogg said, and he had assumed that the arrangement for disarmament had been generally understood, and his failure to mention Colonel Stimson's letter to representatives of the press was an oversight.

This is worse than secret diplomacy. It is deceitful diplomacy—deliberately calculated to mislead the public.

POOR SECRETARY KELLOGG! The subordinates who run his department make a mess of it by occasionally blurting out something which should not be told as well as by continual efforts to conceal truth which the public is entitled to know. We have lately had an example of pied publicity in regard to France as a variation from deceitful diplomacy in connection with Nicaragua. When the French fliers Nungesser and Coli failed in their courageous attempt to reach America, Ambassador Herrick sent word to the Department of State from Paris that opinion there would resent an immediate effort on the part of American aviators to make a transatlantic flight in the opposite direction. The message was intended as confidential advice to be passed on quietly to the American fliers, but the amateur diplomats in Mr. Kellogg's office gave it to the newspapers, which spread it prominently on their first pages and made an international incident of it. After all Mr. Herrick, who is generally more touchy for the French than they are for themselves, appears to have been mistaken. When the news was cabled back from the United States the press in Paris promptly denied the existence of any such sentiment.

REPORTERS AND SPECTATORS are now barred from Delaware courtrooms during divorce proceedings under a law which has just gone into effect. It follows closely upon the English statute which forbids the printing of details of divorce cases, and it indubitably violates the old tradition that the processes of law shall be of public record. On that ground it will doubtless be protested; the fact remains, however, that judges have long exercised the right to order the courtroom cleared of everyone not directly connected with a case when public decency required it. We are not with those who believe that injury will be done by the new Delaware law. Nor are we moved by the news that the number of divorces has increased in England since its new law went into effect. This law has not created conjugal infidelity or unhappiness, and we are of the opinion that when a marriage is hopelessly wrecked it makes for morality and justice to dissolve it speedily. But we agree with the New York World that the Delaware law is a grave portent. If the daily press continues to print vulgar and disgusting details of such cases as the Hall-Mills, the Browning, and the Snyder proceedings, it will have only itself to blame if other laws besides the Delaware one come into existence. In this matter the New York World, Times, and Herald Tribune sin like the tabloids—even give more space to the verbatim testimony. Yet the World calmly admits that "things cannot in decency be allowed to go on in the present fashion much longer."

CHAGRIN, HUMILIATION, AND DISGUST are the healthy sentiments generated in some of the citizens of Little Rock, Arkansas, by the recent lynching and burning of a Negro's body there. The Little Rock Bar Association, in a series of resolutions, expressed itself in the following forthright and admirable manner:

> On last Wednesday evening, the city of Little Rock was for hours at the mercy of a mob which perpetrated the most shameful outrages; and while it had been certain all day that such an outbreak was to be apprehended, the sheriff, the mayor, and the chief of police were all absent from their posts. . . . The evidence points to such weakness and cowardice on the part of our public officials . . . as have never before been displayed in any English-speaking community.

The resolutions called for a prompt and thorough investigation of the lynching and as prompt punishment of the offenders. Judge Abner McGhee's charge to the grand jury about to sit on the case was equally unequivocal:

> This community is not going to permit mob rule. You are not going to permit it, and to the limit of . . . every power conferred by the office I hold, I am not going to permit it. . . . It is no time for platitudes about law and order. . . . I therefore direct you to proceed with all vigor and dispatch to bring into this court for trial all persons against whom a charge of violence can be sustained.

The Little Rock papers, with one exception, have been decrying the lynching, and demanding that justice be done. In sharp contrast are the apologetic and halting statements of the mayor and sheriff: "I thank God that we have been fortunate enough to prevent the loss of life in the city (except that of the lynched Negro, of course)." "I sincerely hope that no further violence will be resorted to." "We felt that the National Guard could have better success handling the disturbance than our own men." And so on. The mayor, by his own admission, went to bed before nine o'clock of that ghastly evening. He was not looking for trouble. But one can only hope that trouble has found him.

WOMEN ALL OVER THE COUNTRY owe a debt to Dean Emma Gillett, for whom a memorial service was held in Washington on May 15. Born in Wisconsin, of pioneer parents, she grew up under frontier conditions. During the Civil War she saw various professions opened to women—among them teaching, medicine, government positions, and clerical work. She had been brought up on "Women's Rights," under the influence of a mother who was courageous enough to wear the famous "bloomer dress," and from early childhood she had nursed a desire to be a lawyer. When, after ten years of teaching school in Pennsylvania, she determined to put this youthful ambition into practice, she found that no white law school would admit her as a student. Nothing daunted by this, she enrolled at the law school of Howard University, established for Negroes but open to all colors and races without distinction of sex. Here, with two other white women, she completed her law course, was admitted to the bar of the District of Columbia, and came to be recognized as an authority on the law of real property. Her services to women, however, lay mainly in her establishment of a woman's law class which eventually became the Washington College of Law, open to men and women, with women members on the faculty, and with a woman dean.

IMPLACABLY THE FATHER OF WATERS moves southward. Through the broken levees of the Bayou des Glaises the waters are rushing "like a dozen Niagaras"; the thousands who toiled to keep them from weakening have fled to the hills. And over the rich fields of southern Louisiana, the "Sugar-bowl" country where most of the sugar crop for the United States is raised, the great inland sea is surging onward irresistibly, ruinously, with a dreadful slowness. At New Orleans the waters have risen five feet in forty-eight hours in spite of the dynamited Poydras levee which was to have given relief to the city, and the crest of the flood is still more than a hundred miles away. It will be another fortnight, perhaps longer, before the Gulf is reached, and weeks before the waters have subsided to anything like their customary level. To add to the discomfort of the refugees, a heavy rain fell over the week-end and the weather was the coldest for May in the history of Louisiana. The Governor, on a tour of inspection, passed town after town where only the roofs of houses and the spires of churches were visible above the waters. The carcasses of domestic animals and game were everywhere. The human inhabitants had long since fled. The Red Cross so far has collected more than eleven millions of dollars for the relief of a situation the like of which the country has never seen. It is time for Mr. Coolidge to summon Congress; a disaster of such staggering proportions is a national matter.

TOM TAGGART, who always brings out his own Presidential candidate, has this year adopted as such Evans Woollen, the Indianapolis banker, to whose candidacy for the Indiana Senatorship in 1926 we several times referred. An exceptionally high-grade man with nothing of the politician about him, an anti-imperialist, a survivor of the Cleveland school of Gold Democrats, Mr. Woollen is eminently fitted for some positions in Washington. Any President who had Mr. Woollen in his Cabinet would be a subject for congratulation. Mr. Taggart's thought is, of course, that it is well to run up a lightning-rod in case the convention lightning should fail to strike "Al" Smith. The difficulty is that Mr. Woollen is not known to the country, that it would be no easier to dramatize him to the voters than it was in the case of ex-Governor Cox or John W. Davis—Mr. Davis was far better known because of his services as Solicitor General and Ambassador to Great Britain. Nonetheless the Democratic Party must face a difficult situation if "Al" Smith is not nominated. It will have to use someone who is not very conspicuous or not conspicuous at all.

HIRAM HOLDEN HAS BEEN ASKED to resign as principal of the district school at New City—a village hidden in the hills of Rockland County—because he has frequently been seen walking home with one of the teachers after school. No other complaint has been lodged against him; in fact his conduct and that of his companion would seem to be models for the free-and-easy youth of the day. The objection to him is that he is young—and has a girl. His fate will be settled after this issue of The Nation has gone to press. But it is not important—except to him. To us Mr. Holden's case is but another indication that the schools of this country are in the grip of an ignorant, sanctimonious, bigoted autocracy. It matters little whether the issue is freedom to criticize the administration as in Superior, Wisconsin; or to oppose war with China as in Seattle, Washington; or to walk home with your girl as in New City, New York. No matter what the impulse may be, if it conceals anything spontaneous and free, it is swiftly crushed. An article by Thomas Minehan, on page 576, describes this situation in vivid detail. The case of the New City principal is not exceptional; it is repeated all over the country; it is even provided for in teachers' contracts. It is a part of the pious hysteria that is terrorizing the producer of plays and the writer of books; that is driving evolution out of the textbooks and allowing religious instruction in school time; that is encouraging many young people from sheer exasperation and boredom to say and do things that Mr. Hiram Holden appears never even to have considered.

THE WORLD IS NOT SO BADLY OFF after all. To those persons who think things are about as bad as they can be, The Nation says: "Cheer up!" There are, for example, no tornadoes along the Mississippi, no Coolidges in China, no British Government in the tornado district, no Snyders or Grays in Arkansas, no lynchings in California, no Anti-Syndicalism Law in New York City. Out in the country in May it is hard to believe that man is as difficult a mammal as he is, or that the elements have the capacity for destruction which they undoubtedly have. To walk through an orchard in bloom, to see violets and wild-strawberry blossoms and ferns uncurling, to know that seeds thrust into the ground will sprout and bear fruit, to see the first flash of a bluebird—these are comforting. It is refreshing also to remember that with apparently very little effort the Red Cross has already gathered millions for flood sufferers—people are still generous; and in every case of oppression or injustice, voices have been raised in protest—there are still those who believe in freedom. If spring decided not to come again, if every ear were deaf to the troubles of the world, we should be lost indeed.

The Great Soviet Raid in London

WHEN, we wonder, has the mouthpiece of a great Government, a Cabinet Minister, found himself in a more humiliating position than did Sir William Joynson-Hicks, the British Home Secretary, when he rose in the House of Commons on May 16 to defend the great Soviet raid in London? Nothing more spectacular, the press dispatches reported, ever happened in the business section of London than the raiding on May 12 of the office of Arcos, Ltd., the headquarters of the Russian Trade Delegation and the Anglo-Russian Cooperative Society, Ltd. Hundreds of policemen surrounded the building in the late afternoon and held it for four days and nights, drilling their way into the great safes, searching the male employees, and overhauling the entire correspondence and records in the building. The London press teemed with inspired stories as to what was to be found and what had been found. Boxes of rifles, "knuckle-dusters," "life-preservers," and other deadly weapons, it was cabled to America, were among the first rewards of the search. Complete proof of the alliance of British Communists with their Russian brethren and the amounts paid to the labor movement was also said to have been garnered. So shocking were the discoveries, the jingo press announced, that everybody agreed that Russian and British governmental relations were at an end. Only after a day or two did it leak out that the real excuse for the raid was the allegation that an important British military document, plainly marked as the confidential property of the British Government, was thought to have found its way from the British archives into Arcos House.

What did Joynson-Hicks have to say when he stood up to explain the meaning and the purpose of this extraordinary action which may easily have far-reaching consequences for the entire British Empire? All that he could say was that the Minister of War told him that he was sure that the missing document was in Arcos House, and so after consulting with Premier Baldwin and the Foreign Secretary, Sir Austen Chamberlain, he had got a search warrant secretly from a magistrate and, like a detective in any dime novel, ordered out an army of detectives and police and had found—what? Why, nothing. The document? No, but he is sure that it had been there. Rifles? No. Bombs? No. "Knuckle-dusters"? No. What, then? Well, he was certain that among the correspondence seized were very incriminating documents about which he would be able to tell the House of Commons on the following Thursday when he had had time to read them! There was not the slightest allegation that he had discovered any pecuniary or other relationship between Arcos House and the British Communists, or any other alliance between British politicians and the Soviet. And this is called conducting a great government with intelligence, not to say common sense, and regard to the decencies of international relations.

To our minds this spectacular undertaking is part of a deliberate attack upon Russia. The plan is obviously to raid Soviet headquarters wherever possible, and to arrest Bolsheviks or hamper them in every way. The Russians are justified in suspecting that it is all part of a world-wide conspiracy to throw a cordon around the Soviet Republic. Louis Fischer called attention to this in his article A New Ring Around Russia in The Nation for March 23 last. Among other things he quoted a dispatch to the New York World from Geneva declaring that "the forging of a ring of steel around Russia is apparently the object of the determined effort made by the British at the opening of the League of Nations Council to secure amicable settlement of German-Polish and Rumanian-Hungarian differences." He added "The instigator is Britain; the reason is China." Since these words were written the building adjoining the Soviet Embassy compound in Peking was raided—on April 6. Never since the Boxer outrages have the Chinese authorities been allowed to enter the diplomatic settlement. This raid was conducted with the prior knowledge and consent of the foreign diplomatic council which rules over the Peking diplomatic compound; it was excused and permitted by them on the plea that Soviet employees affiliated with the Embassy, though not a part of it, were plotting against the Chinese Government. Thereby was established a dangerous precedent, indeed. If the Southerners should enter Peking they have ample warrant and precedent for raiding the American and British embassies on the solid ground that they had been plotting steadily against the Nationalistic Government of China. Soon after this violation of the compound in Peking guards were thrown around the Russian consulate in Shanghai and everyone was halted or arrested who sought to enter or leave the premises.

Now, we do not deny that the Russians are often provocative. There is no doubt that during the Communist troubles in Germany the Russian Embassy in Berlin was the headquarters of the movement. There has been government-inspired propaganda, and there has been the propaganda of individual zealots fired by a religious devotion to the doctrines of the Soviet. They have been thorns in the flesh in many places; they have even violated solemn pledges. But this does not excuse such acts as we have narrated. The criminal folly of the London raid is that it merely intensifies the ill-will between Russia and her opponents, and convinces the Russian people that a new war is on against the Russian Government. The arrest of Madame Borodin by the Pekingese Government on the charge of being a spy and the refusal of the American Government to allow Madame Kollontai to pass through the United States although she was a diplomatic official en route to her post in Mexico are looked upon as merely further evidence of the ring around Russia. Mr. Kerensky, who is now in this country, has been steadily warning the American public that any attempt to attack Russia by force of arms, or to take part of her territory from her, would strengthen the Soviet Government and solidify the Russian people behind it as nothing else could. The same is true of these new raids and arrests. The anti-English demonstrations in the Russian cities speak for themselves. Great Britain with her great unemployment sorely needs her trade with Russia. She has everything to lose by war with the Soviets. In Afghanistan, India, China, and elsewhere her interests would be gravely menaced by such a conflict. Under the circumstances one would think that her Ministers would walk with the greatest care. Instead, they have brought much nearer the possibility of war between the two countries, and contributed dangerously to the unrest of the world.

A City's Schools on Strike

THE whole question of freedom of teaching and the rights of the school-teacher has been raised in Superior, Wisconsin, in a manner to demand the attention of the entire American scholastic world. On March 14 Miss Lulu Dickinson, a teacher of English in the high school since 1904, was summarily dismissed by the school board, meeting in secret session. No explanation was given by either the members of the board or the superintendent of schools, P. R. Spencer, beyond the statement that "she had it coming to her." Miss Dickinson's demand for a hearing or a copy of the charges against her was ignored on the ground "that she was no longer a member of the Superior school system." Today it is only known that she is a teacher of unquestioned excellence, as to whose fitness no doubt has been voiced since the controversy began, and that she had expressed dissatisfaction with certain of the board's policies. What particularly aroused the ire of the superintendent, according to rumor, was Miss Dickinson's criticism of the waste of money involved in printing the annual school report on vellum paper with half-tone sepia portraits of Superintendent Spencer, the Reverend A. T. Ekblad, a Lutheran minister, and the Reverend William Hood, an Episcopal archdeacon, the two men who dominate the board, and of other members. However, as the superintendent himself said, it is not a question of whether the criticisms were justified, but whether a teacher was justified in making them.

On the strength of Miss Dickinson's record the Teachers' Association and the Parent-Teachers' Association each requested the school board to give her a hearing. Both were ignored. Then her pupils circulated a petition which was signed by every student in the high school and by their parents, and presented to the board—with no result. Next the students began to talk of a strike—a one-day walkout. Their leaders were peremptorily summoned by the superintendent and indefinitely suspended when they refused to sign a paper pledging themselves never to strike. At once the student body of Central High School struck. The superintendent met this by threatening suspension and failure to all strikers and legal action against parents who kept their children at home. In a few days the entire body of high-school students walked out, demanding withdrawal of the order of suspension against the students and a hearing for Miss Dickinson. Later they called for the reinstatement of Miss Dickinson and the resignations of the superintendent and Mr. Ekblad.

The strike grew until there was scarcely a pupil in any school. Interested citizens took the case into court on the ground that Messrs. Ekblad and Hood were not freeholders and therefore not entitled to their offices. In court Mr. Ekblad exhibited a deed to a one-foot strip bordering on the alley of a twenty-five-foot lot, which deed had never been filed. The archdeacon was more diplomatic. He showed title to a full lot, but his deed was not registered until the morning that he was to appear in court. Meanwhile the students held daily demonstrations, parading with banners bearing defiant slogans, while the citizens held meetings. Organized labor supported the strikers, a tag-day netted about one thousand dollars for expenses, and there arose a demand that the school board be elected instead of appointed. Enough names were obtained to compel a special election which will be held in June, on this and other questions. Finally Miss Dickinson personally appealed to the strikers to return to school, which they did when they had received a half promise to reinstate Miss Dickinson on May 9. When the school board met that day it not only failed to act in the Dickinson case but discharged C. G. Wade, principal of the Central High School, on the ground that he did not sufficiently exert himself to prevent the strike. The students walked out again, and here the matter now stands. The question whether a school board can defy the aroused public opinion of a community, and whether it can dismiss competent and faithful teachers for having opinions of their own, is yet to be solved.

The Automobile Dead List

NO, we do not mean the list of human beings killed by automobiles. These total every twenty-six months as many American lives as were sacrificed in France. As to them we have repeatedly expressed ourselves. Today we are thinking of the mortality among makes and kinds of cars ever since the business of building them began in the United States. The average citizen believes that everybody who put money into this new business grew rich out of its phenomenal development. He sees the incredibly vast fortune of Henry Ford created in a little over two decades and somehow assumes that a golden shower similarly fell into the lap of everyone associated with motor-cars. Actually, it seems to us as if the history of the rise of this industry, now admittedly the greatest in the country, were amazingly like similar developments in railroads, steel, and oil; where some have profited enormously thousands have lost heavily because of incompetence, waste, or mismanagement.

Certainly the list of the cars that have been placed on the market only to be abandoned confirms this point of view. In January, 1925, Motor printed 565 names of kinds of cars which at one time or another were being manufactured in the United States. A few more, it declared, might have been overlooked. Of those listed, Motor reported that only 86 were being produced on January 1, 1923, and but 69 a year later. Between the end of 1920 and the beginning of 1925, 43 companies producing 115,000 cars, or 6.2 per cent of the total American output, either went out of business altogether or ceased to be of any importance. In January, last, Motor published a new list showing that 23 more makes of cars had disappeared in the two years since January 1, 1925, or 31 per cent. In that time only three new makes of cars had appeared. What is even more striking is that the mortality continues. Thus, since January 1 of this year, an excellent car, the Wills Ste. Claire, has ceased production and the Rickenbacker has gone into the hands of a receiver. Five or six others are in such a dangerous condition that the industry expects to see them forced out of business during the current year. The trend is still further shown by the fact that 20 companies building 30 different cars made 98.5 per cent of all the passenger cars produced in the United States and Canada in the first nine months of 1926. Motor quotes high authorities as believing that ultimately there will be about ten big companies and possibly thirty lesser ones. To us this estimate seems altogether too high.

Of the cars deceased in 1925-1926 there were four of the oldest makes—the Apperson started in 1900, the Stanley founded in 1896, the Detroit Electric in 1907, the Stearns-Duryea in 1902, the King in 1905, and the Cole in 1910. The Maxwell was absorbed by the Chrysler, which, first brought out in 1924, carried everything before it and made one of the great successes of the industry within a year, largely because of the reputation of its designer, Walter P. Chrysler. It is to be noted that when the Stanley steamer perished the last of the steam cars—the industry began with steam cars, then more promising than gasoline ones—disappeared, and with it has gone almost the last of the electric cars once so popular in Middle Western cities. Indeed, the roll-call of the dead bears some extremely significant names. The makers of the Winton declared that it was the original American car. The Saxon, which for a time threatened the Ford's supremacy in the cheap-car field, lived only nine years, but in 1916 it turned out 26,000 cars. The Dort was for five years one of the largest producers—selling 24,000 in 1920. The Gray, also a rival of the Ford, lived only a scant four years. The seniors in the industry are now the Oldsmobile launched in 1898, the Locomobile in 1899, the Packard and the Peerless, both of which originated in 1900, while the Pierce-Arrow was first built in 1901, and the Franklin and Cadillac in 1902. The Ford did not appear until 1903.

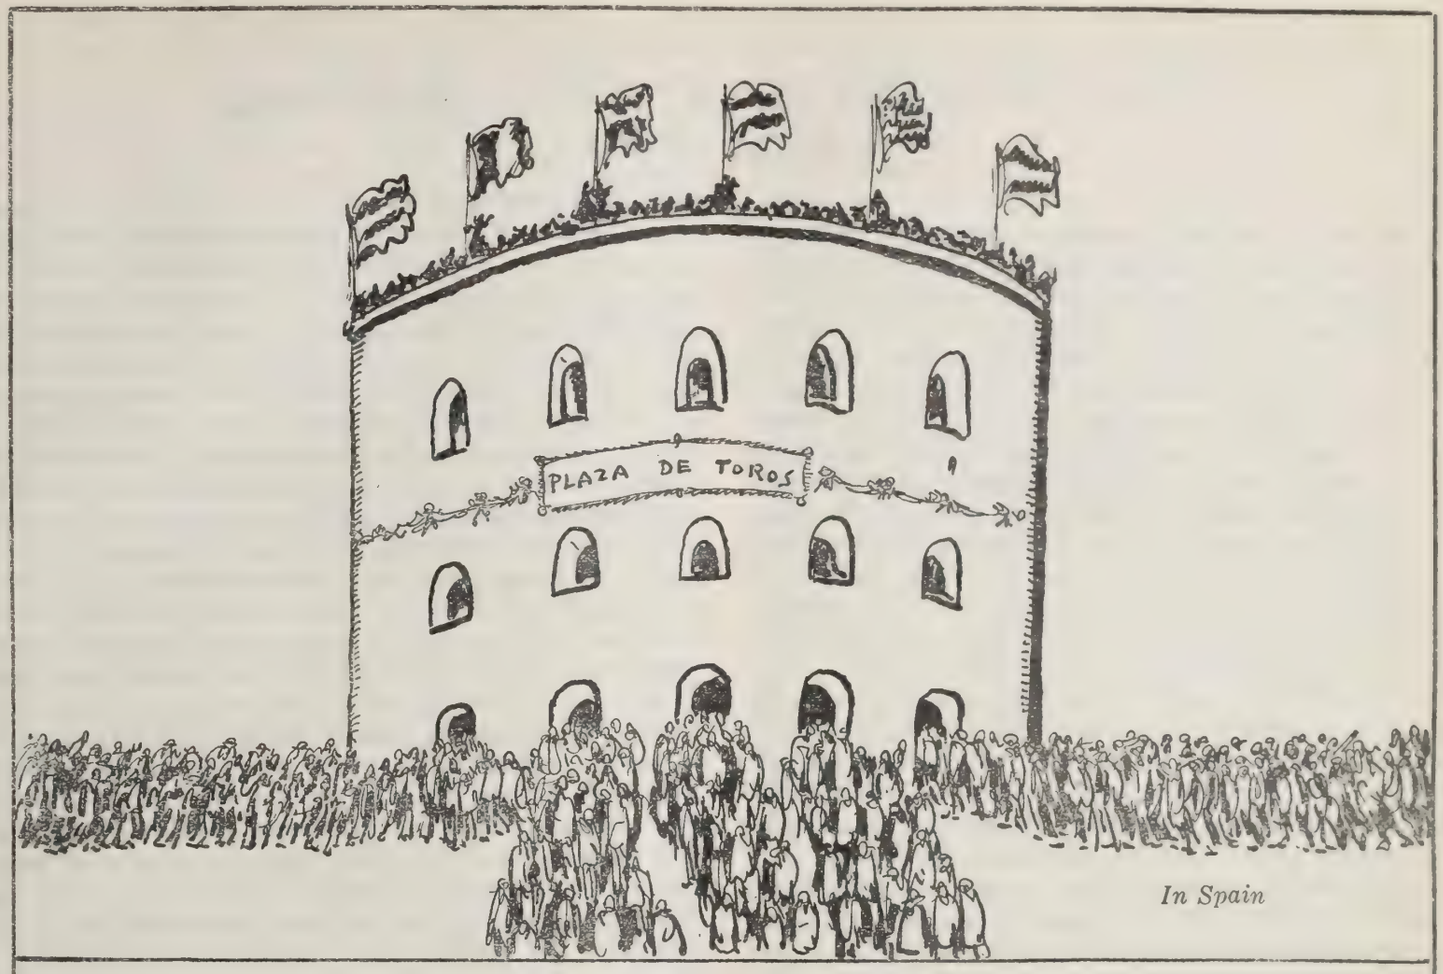
This extraordinary mortality is the more interesting because it has affected old as well as new makes and every variety of car. It has indubitably been expedited in certain cases by the extraordinary rise of General Motors with its various lines of a steadily improving quality. But in general faulty management, faulty construction, and faulty salesmanship are the triple evils which are responsible for the failures and the heavy losses involved. The question of local agents is an enormously important one, and the problem is by no means solved even now. Consolidations are going on steadily and we look for others. But it will take years for the industry to become wholly stabilized—if the inventors ever permit it to settle down.

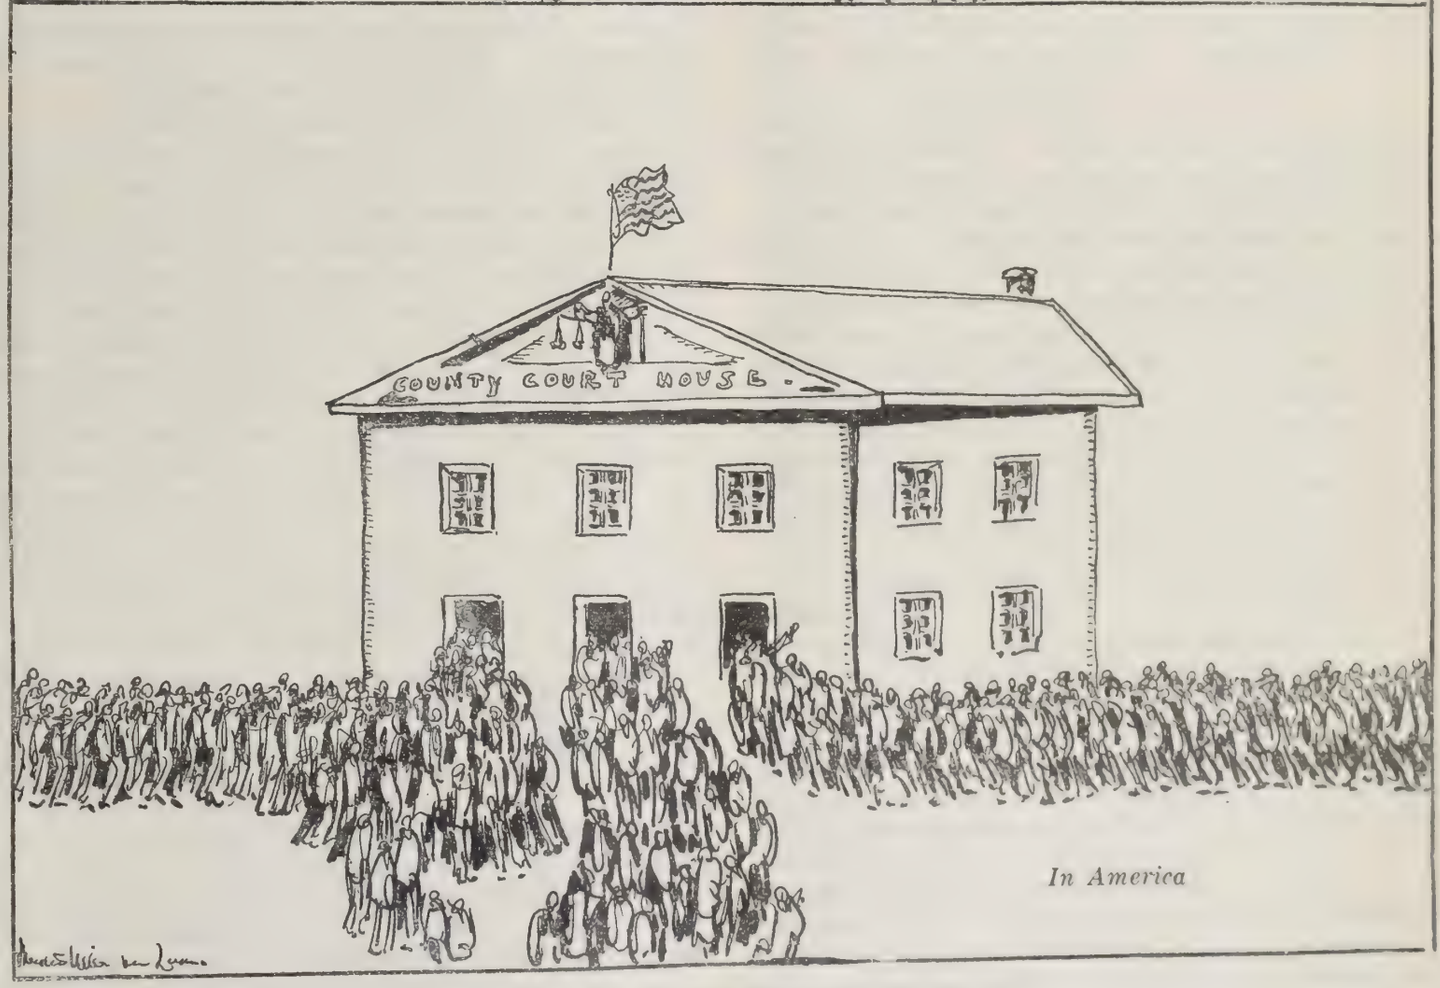
A Glut of Oil

A YEAR ago the Federal Oil Conservation Board announced to a mildly startled country that the oil in known fields in the United States would be exhausted in six years. If the prophecy had any significance, it was that we should try to eliminate waste in the exploitation and production of petroleum. Yet today, in the words of Walter C. Teagle, president of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, and W. D. Farish, former president of the American Petroleum Institute, we have an overproduction of petroleum "in a form so malignant as to seem without precedent in all past history." That, it appears, is how futile our modern business system is when it comes to doing anything except making temporary profits for itself.



But when profits are menaced it becomes at once active and acute. Hence the uproar at the moment. The true evil of overproduction of petroleum is the waste of wealth which belongs to the community, but what has set our oil companies by the ears is not that; it is that the competitive effort to sell a surplus of their product has brought five successive price cuts since last November until returns are now said to be below operating costs. This, of course, terrifies the oil companies' executives. Representatives of the big companies have been in Washington to ask Secretary Work, chairman of the Federal Oil Conservation Board, to get that body "to give its aid in bringing about reforms," as newspaper dispatches euphemistically phrase it. Less euphemistically and more concretely, they want the Administration to forget the Sherman anti-trust law to the extent of letting them limit output—which might be a good thing but which never occurred to the oil men until their profits were threatened. This is the regular technique of business. While it is making money it insists that the Government shall pursue a policy of "hands off," but the moment it gets into trouble it runs in hot haste to Washington squealing for help.

The immediate cause of overproduction of oil seems to be the new Seminole field in Oklahoma, where "wildcatting," or pioneering for new wells, has brought a flood of unneeded oil to the surface. At a recent meeting in New York City of representatives controlling about three-fourths of the oil wells of the country it was decided to appoint a "dictator" to limit and control the output of the interests in question in the Seminole field. As the Seminole field is entirely within the State of Oklahoma, it is assumed that such action may be taken without violation of the Sherman law. But they admit limitation of output will not be enough to set matters right:



> Overproduction is the direct result of too much drilling and, therefore, any constructive program must deal first with the cause of overproduction, i. e., the present drilling activities. Those present at the meeting, while owning the bulk of the production at Seminole, realized fully that the question of overproduction from the standpoint of conservation of our natural resources and the economic utilization of oil products was general rather than local, and that any comprehensive plan looking to an amelioration of overproduction would not be effective if applied only to Seminole. . . .

Behind the conference in New York City and the noise in the newspapers is a bitter war between the big companies, especially the Standard Oil group, and small independent operators. It has usually been held in the past that overproduction benefits the Standard Oil companies, as they have large storage facilities and can therefore hold their surplus to await better conditions while others have to sell their product directly no matter how low prices may be. Hence the politics behind present maneuvers is causing considerable speculation. In this connection E. W. Marland, the head of an independent company affiliated with the banking house of J. P. Morgan, writes in the Oil and Gas Journal of an attempt last winter to initiate State laws to carry out the recommendations of the Federal Oil Conservation Board to stop the waste of natural gas and thus save oil. Mr. Marland says:

> In February a bill was introduced in the Oklahoma Legislature called the Marland bill—designed to carry out the recommendations of the conservation board. The passage of this bill was opposed by large numbers of producers, led by the executives of the major purchasing companies, and it was defeated.
> The oil producers' associations, controlled by the major companies, offered no bill of their own—or even the suggestion of one. Their argument was: "Let the oil business regulate itself." . . .
> If there is anything humorous in the situation it is that the only remedial suggestion so far coming from any of the large companies is the repeal or modification of the anti-trust laws, the only laws which now impair their ability in the struggle.

The Teacher Goes Job-Hunting

By THOMAS MINEHAN

I

IT is spring in the little red schoolhouse. The children, in stiffly starched frocks and newly blackened shoes, are sitting double and visitors crowd the aisles with chairs. Up near the front, on a separate bench in a position of advantage and importance, sits the Board, looking as solemn as the High Court of Chancery about to try a case of treason. The critical moment has arrived. Little Emily has recited her piece (with, of course, appropriate gestures), about the old, old lady and the boy with the bended knee. Frankie Jones, in a stiff white collar and an uncomfortably red face, has stumbled through Lincoln's Gettysburg Address. All the children of the first four grades (with the exception of Jack McDade, who is six feet tall), dressed in white paper costumes and waving wands, have trooped more or less in step around the platform, singing "We Are the Joyous Fairy Band." The entire class has pledged allegiance to the flag and struggled through "My Country 'Tis of Thee." Now comes the climax—the speech of the teacher himself. A hush of expectancy falls on the audience; they realize that this speech, unlike the speeches of the children, is going to be given for a prize. If it is a good speech, if it meets with the approval of the Board and the audience, the teacher will be reelected to his thirty-dollar-a-month job for six months, beginning next October. If it is a poor speech the teacher will be judged as unfit to instruct the children of Moccasin Creek for another year and a new one appointed in his place.

A pale, thin youth of eighteen with nervous, white hands and deep-set eyes, the teacher is obviously tired and haggard as he comes before the jury to make his final plea for his job. He is frightened as he stands before his pupils, who no longer fear him now that they have received their uniformly favorable report cards. He is afraid of what may be back of the stolid stare of the farmers who look at him without emotion or interest, for he wants his job. He has just started a course in Mind Power and made the first payment on Ridpath's "History of the World," and he will have to drop both and go back to the farm if he loses his present position. Faced by hostile eyes, feeling that all is lost, he clears his throat timidly and begins: "My subject for today is The Progress of Civic Virtue in Rural America."

In contrast to this simple rustic scene we have a more sumptuous picture staged in the Regents' Room of one of the large State universities. The Regents are prosperous business men and fat politicians who are sacrificing valuable time to promote the general welfare and secure a few contracts for their friends on the side. They cease discussing fishing prospects and exchanging beer recipes as the door swings open and the president of the university enters, accompanied by a secretary with a fat brief-case.

The president is a dignified man, well-dressed, wearing a scholarly pair of glasses. Poised and confident, he approaches the conclave of Regents, who greet him with cordial and elaborate politeness, but in their attitude today is a feeling of constraint absent from their usual salutation, for on this day the president is to read his annual report. If it is a good report with innumerable charts and statistics and data on the important work in research done by the faculty on the Beowulf Codex or the psychical maladjustment of the earthworm due to electronic reactions in the cuticle, the Regents, not knowing what it is all about, will be suitably impressed and the president reappointed for another year. If it is not a good report, the Regents will defer their action while they send out feelers to find a satisfactory substitute.

A similar condition prevails all through the public and even the private schools of America. Everywhere the teacher is regarded as a quasi-political servant holding office for one year at the sufferance of other political powers. At the end of that time, he may be reappointed and he may not. In any case he is automatically out of a job at the end of the school year, and he has to ask to be rehired. It is true that some of the larger school systems reappoint their teachers without question after the first year or two of satisfactory work. Often the teacher is protected by civil-service provisions, but in almost all cases these provisions afford the teacher far less protection than they do policemen, firemen, or common laborers. The teacher has to serve one full year before coming under clauses that protect all other city employees after six months of service, and in many cases the teacher has to serve three years before being exempt from summary dismissal without trial. Even then the teacher is not definitely sure of his job. At the close of the school year he puts in his application for reinstatement. Not until the school officials issue a new contract is he sure that he will be taken back.

Important educators, college presidents with a good sales line, and athletic coaches capable of producing winning teams often hypnotize the school authorities into giving them long-term contracts with special bonuses, retirement features, and pensions in them. But these are the exception. The average teacher has a contract for one year—and for one year only. This, generally, is small protection. School officials may dismiss a teacher at any time and for causes that would not be considered relevant by the ordinary employer. Many a girl has been removed from a one-room school for bobbing her hair, and I remember a case where a girl was fired for singing "It Ain't Gonna Rain No Mo'" soon after a rainmaker had come to town and prayed for a wet spring.

The contract, while of small protection to the teacher, does protect the school authorities. In some States if the teacher breaks it his certificate becomes void. He cannot hold another position in the State until reinstated by the State superintendent of education. In other States his certificate will not be renewed when it expires. Few teachers leave suddenly no matter what humiliation and petty tyranny they have to endure. They wait until the end of the term.

Under such circumstances it is not strange that at the close of every school year a great army goes job-hunting. The successful teachers are those who have the best jobs, and if that means joining the Klan in Indiana, teaching a Baptist Sunday school in Mississippi, toadying to the fraternities of California or the clubs of Princeton that is what the successful teacher does. He cultivates, discreetly of course, the right kind of people even in his classroom, and it is surprising how few sons of school-board officials fail.

There is a special technique of getting and holding the best jobs that has nothing at all to do with actual pedagogical ability. In this country there are over one thousand different agencies devoted to supplying the itinerant teacher with jobs. At a fee, of course. There are State teachers' bureaus, county bureaus, city bureaus, and various college and university committees of appointment. In addition, there are the commercial teachers' agencies, and any town boasting of a college or a normal school has at least one. With the exception of the college committees all of these job-hunting agencies make money. The State and county bureaus are supposed to make only enough to support themselves, but that means providing from two to twenty political workers with good positions. They charge an enrolment fee of from three to five dollars a year but nothing extra for getting the job. The commercial agencies usually charge an enrolment fee that is less than that of the State bureaus, but they charge 5 per cent of the first year's salary.

Of the money thus collected the greatest amount by far goes to the private agencies. They range in size from agencies sharing a real-estate office in a town of 10,000 to agencies occupying expensive suites of rooms on Jackson Boulevard or Fifth Avenue. They collect fees ranging from thirty or forty dollars to more than five hundred. Many of them boast of having placed over 1,000 teachers a year for the last five or ten years, and one agency in the South claims to have placed over thirty thousand teachers and tutors during the twenty-five years it has been in business.

For a teacher to get a job, except in his home town, without the services of one of these agencies is almost impossible. Occasionally the man or woman who has a large acquaintance among educators and strong political and fraternal backing may get a job through hearsay or the help of friends. Lately, the State bureaus have begun to make inroads on the commercial agencies, but the ordinary teacher finds the agencies the best bet. Once the State bureaus have received the enrolment fee they have nothing more to gain by getting the teacher a job. The agencies have an additional 5 per cent commission to make. Often they have arrangements with school officials who give them a monopoly on all new teachers hired in a certain system, and in many cases it is more important to belong to the right agency than to have the requisite degrees or experience. There are school systems in which every teacher hired for the last five years has been obtained through a single agency. No other candidates have been even considered and a recommendation from that agency has been tantamount to election. The agencies work especially hard to place appointive officers —deans, superintendents, principals. Having placed one of these men the agency often reduces its fee or offers to split commissions on all his new appointments. Even when there is no financial inducement, the officer favors the candidates from the agency that got him the job. He himself may be looking for a new job in a year or two or the agency may know of some promotion which it can secure for him. Frequently the teacher joins not one agency but a dozen, and sees to it that he keeps in good standing with all of them.

[A second article will appear in next week's Nation, setting forth some of the qualifications as to thought and behavior demanded of applicants for teaching positions.]

Education—For What?

By SCOTT NEARING

ON my desk is a letter from a twenty-year-old college junior whom I have known since 1914. The boy has more than usual ability. Until recently he displayed vigorous enthusiasms, but now he is hesitant, uncertain, a little scornful of life. His education experience is so typical that it is well worth noting.

As a child he was curious and mechanical. Within the limits of a city apartment, he indulged this curiosity on whatever came to hand. He worked first with mechanical toys, then with electrical apparatus, and finally with a radio. He was ardent and energetic, planning original mechanical problems and solving them with unusual facility. At fifteen this boy had a grip on life. Each day counted. He was keen to go on. Then came the five intervening years of preparatory school and college. At twenty he is blasé, a bit soured, unconvinced, without driving enthusiasms. He writes that he is majoring in English. He is not intending to teach. He is not particularly eager to do anything. But English is a "general" subject, so he is taking it.

What combination of circumstances has converted a vigorous, enthusiastic, adolescent boy of fifteen into a blasé misanthrope of twenty? The answer is that this boy has never been educated for anything in particular because he has never been called upon to do anything in particular in connection with his school life. While he sat at his desk, education was brought to him on a silver tray. His schoolrooms, gymnasium, laboratories, books—the whole equipment was supplied to him without the slightest effort on his part. He was always using without making.

Schools, particularly lower schools, cannot be self-supporting. Children of eight or ten or under are too immature to produce the equivalent of their keep. They can, however, produce some part of their keep, though it be a small part. Even kindergarten children, who can take no very active share in the work of the world, can and do live their own lives, richly and fully. Elementary schools are removed from the life struggle of adults, but the best of the modern experimental schools are requiring their pupils to live as completely and as creatively as they are able to at their ages.

But all American schools are organized on a parasitic, and not on a self-supporting basis. The school gives no opportunity for children of any age to contribute to their own maintenance, nor does it encourage them to do so. On the contrary, it makes them feel that education is "free." The child, economically and socially, is a parasite as far as the school is concerned. Parasitism almost always dulls enthusiasm and deadens initiative.

Boys and girls brought up in such an educational system will pay the penalty sooner or later in the loss of a sense of reality and significance. As college juniors they are bored because they have begun to realize that the processes of life would go on quite well without them. They are not contributing, and, so far as they are concerned, life does not matter!

Side by side with the parasitism of this boy's school life is the parasitism of his home life. He lives in a busy city; his parents are both active. He himself has been sheltered and protected—denied the opportunity of becoming an integral part of the society which has surrounded him. His desire for mechanical expression was satisfied, first, by a mechanical toy which was made for him and bought for him, and with which he merely played; later, he went on playing, this time with electricity. He never wired a house; he merely played with wires. He did not even have to make his electrical apparatus. It came from the store.

Our grandfathers at fifteen, on the farms of New England, New York, and the Mid-Western States, were men of affairs. They began doing chores at six or seven. They were driving a team at eleven or twelve. At fifteen they went into the fields or woods to do a man's work. Day by day, they helped to produce the family living. This is no plea for overwork. Many of the sons of that pioneer generation worked too hard and paid dearly for their overexertion in vigor and stamina and outlook. Yet they belonged to the group in which they lived; they helped to perform its labor; and they shared in its rewards.

This college junior of twenty has never been asked to carry a single burden; he has been consistently parasitic. Consider his account with the world. He began in 1906. From 1906 to 1910 he cost in food, clothing, shelter, and attendance an average of about $300 a year, or a total of $1,500. Naturally enough, this preschool period is one in which no child can be expected to make any considerable contribution. The years in the elementary school (1911 to 1918) were somewhat more expensive. The boy ate more, wore out clothes faster, and still required a good deal of attention. These eight years cost, roughly, $4,000.

The next four years were spent in a rather expensive preparatory school, where the lad devoted himself to social life and studies. Six thousand dollars were required to bring him through this period to the gates of his university life. Up to that time his family had spent approximately $11,500, or, to put it more correctly, the boy had used up, of the products of society, $11,500. He was seventeen years old, and he had not yet begun to make any material contribution toward his own maintenance.

The three college years have not been unduly expensive, but they bring the total net outlay involved in developing this boy to something over $15,000, or an average of about $750 a year for his twenty years.

"But what has this to do with education?" asks the reader. "The whole emphasis of your article has been laid upon factors apart from the course of study." That is true. But it is these factors that are responsible for the point of view which this lad holds today. His geography, spelling, and arithmetic have left little impression on either his outlook or his fund of enthusiasm. But the fact that he has been consuming without producing, both in school and at home, during twenty years, has colored his entire attitude toward life. Society has spent $15,000 worth of goods and services on a boy to the end that he is majoring in English in a great university without any particular objective except to go on living like the similarly aimless people by whom he is surrounded.

Consider the university. Boys ordinarily enter at about eighteen. During the next four years they are, at least theoretically, preparing themselves for their life-work. Actually, they are taking part in athletics, joining fraternities, attending social affairs, directing college publications, and spending some time in laboratories, classrooms, and libraries. With the exception of those who take highly specialized courses such as architecture, dentistry, and animal husbandry, these college students are not preparing themselves for anything. They are merely enjoying a pleasant four years of parasitic aloofness from the life struggle.

The social "stunts" of college life belong in high school. A man at eighteen should be spending his energies along paths of constructive social activity. He should be considered an apprentice in a specialized field, sharing actively in the work of that field. Suppose he expects to be a mining engineer. Where does he belong? On the campus of a great university, or in Scranton, Clearfield, Butte, or some other mining center? Mechanical engineering students belong in machine shops; electrical engineering students in electrical plants; marine engineering students in shipyards or on board vessels; accounting students in departments where accounts are made up; students of English composition in newspaper offices and other places where English is composed; students of drama in theaters; students of hygiene and medicine in laboratories and hospitals.

Does this sound fantastic? Certainly not in the case of medical students. That is the way they get an essential part of their training in all modern medical schools. And surely not in the case of engineering students. Cincinnati, Lehigh, Union, and other American colleges have been experimenting with the "part-time school, part-time shop" plan for a generation. Antioch, under President Morgan's direction, is trying the same method with all the students in the college. The whole of Russia's higher education is built on the apprentice principle, with students required to devote a part of each day or month or year to the practice of the trade or profession for which they are studying.

The arts present difficulties. So do abstract sciences like mathematics and astronomy. Then there is a generous portion of the student body in any American university that has no bent and is not ready to make a vocational decision. What would happen to such students under such a plan? There are many possibilites. The higher schools might exclude any applicant who came without a purpose. Such a course would be hard on social life in the colleges, but it might do something for the student body. Those excluded could dig coal or drive teams or run elevators or shift freight. If they developed a purpose later on, it would not be too late to begin college. And if they never developed a purpose, the coal mines, the trucks, the elevators, and the freight houses would easily hold them.

The university man is an adult. He is maturing rapidly. He should be getting his faculties in hand; rounding out his knowledge; preparing to play a man-sized part in the work-a-day struggle. The university should not be a place, but a tentative participation by a group of young men and women in the life of the community. Wherever an important social activity was being carried on, there would be a university. Under the direction of and in company with those who were actually doing the work, the "student" would learn to take his place as an effective worker in his chosen calling.

Would there be "theory"? Certainly; there is "theory" in every planned process. Students would be introduced to this theory as they were introduced to other phases of the work. But each day, each week, each month, or each year they would spend at least some time in practicing the activity about which they were theorizing. The life of society is a great laboratory. It is possible to speculate about this laboratory, or to work in it. University students today merely speculate about life. They should be learning by doing their share in it.

American universities have separated their students from life. They are frequently and quite literally set off on a hill. Students must climb down that hill in order to get into the world. The life on the hill grows tiresome; the readjustment when they leave the hill is difficult and frequently tragic. University students do not belong on hills. They belong in the world of affairs.

But what about culture? demand the academicians. Well, what about it? What have your culture courses done for students? Have they enriched their lives? Have they aroused them, stimulated them, invigorated them, thrilled them with a desire for creative adventure? Culture is the mature expression of group life. It arises only from the group. Isolated, aloof institutions do not produce culture but only pedantry and empty scholasticism.

There will be ample time in the lives of these university men when they can read or travel or meditate. A four-hour day in the "shop" on the job will give them their contact with the active world. The hours of free time can be directed and should be devoted to the pursuit of those theories underlying the practical work which the students are doing, and to the development of those faculties which compose "human nature." There are the eight, nine, or ten months of the college year. The balance of the time could and should be spent in other parts of the world, and perhaps in other fields of work.

American education, particularly American higher education, fails to round out the lives of the students because it keeps them parasitically away from the world of affairs. Education is life, and it will prove effective only when this essential relation is recognized as the basic principle of the educational system.

Textbooks for Moderns

By RUTH SEINFEL

THE intellectual diet of American school-children has since the war been a constant source of anxiety to certain groups of public-minded citizens, who have revealed their trouble through the activities of the American Legion, the Sons of the American Revolution, the Hearst newspapers, and like prophets of public opinion. Even the epidemic of laws which swept the State legislatures during and immediately after the war did not reassure them, although these laws provided in no indistinct terms that the principles of the Constitution and the glorious history of the American nation be instilled into the young, by teachers whose allegiance was unquestionable, for the purpose of making proper and patriotic citizens of them.

Textbooks have been the special bogy of the fearful. Holding that "the schools of America should no more consider graduating a student who lacks faith in our Government than a school of theology should graduate a minister who lacks faith in God," the American Bar Association Committee on American Citizenship strove as earnestly to protect the youth from heretical doubts as though the punishment were eternal damnation. The Sons of the American Revolution, led by Judge Wallace McCamant—the same for whom President Coolidge failed to secure a federal judgeship—waged a long war on David Saville Muzzey because in his textbook, "An American History," he suggested that England was not wholly responsible for the revolt of the Colonies.

An excellent detailed account of this and other campaigns, contained in Bessie Louise Pierce's book, "Public Opinion and the Teaching of History in the United States," reveals curious shifts in the points of attack. During the war, when Allied solidarity was desirable, the wicked Redcoats and Tories painted in the school histories of the revolution were made to grow little wings by an ingenious theory that the Colonists had fought, not the British, but the German usurper on the English throne, George III. But soon after peace was signed a cry that America was being "Anglicized" went up from the embattled Irish-Americans, German-Americans, and Charles Grant Miller speaking for the American people in Mr. Hearst's columns. The new crusaders demolished the scarecrow of a German king on the English throne, and fired broadsides at all historians who dared to paint the British anything but black or the Continentals as less pure than snow. Such writers were "sycophantic intellectual interlopers" in the pay of Great Britain, according to the dynamic phrases of Mr. Miller. The demolition of the absurd myth about George III was certainly justified. But the attack was aimed, not only at those historians who, like Albert Bushnell Hart, were actually advocating the rewriting of histories to better Anglo-American relations, but also at such men as Van Tyne, McLaughlin, and O'Hara who were partial only to the facts.

Realizing that perfect American school histories were deplorably scarce, the American Legion in 1922 undertook to supply one. The committee in charge of the work commissioned, not a historian—perhaps, as was suggested, because historians could not be trusted—but a professor of English, Charles F. Horne of the College of the City of New York, to write it. In the course of its preparation the committee asked a number of historians to revise the text. The list of those who did is conspicuously lacking in names of importance in the field, but on the other hand the title-page is plentifully upholstered with the indorsements of patriotic organizations, beginning with the Legion and going through the American War Mothers, Boy Scouts of America, Civic League for Immigrants, Colonial Sons and Daughters, Daughters of the American Revolution, Daughters of the War of 1812, Daughters of the Confederacy, Descendants of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence, General Federation of Women's Clubs, National Child Welfare Association, National Security League, Woman's Home Mission Society, Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, Knights of Pythias, and others to the number of twenty-five or more, including the American Federation of Labor. The "united purpose" of these organizations, as candidly stated in the introduction, is to make a "nationally acceptable history" by stating the "views of the nation as a whole," principally to "express to the rising generation a faith in our country and a BELIEF in it that shall tend to create a broad patriotism and love of America."

The two-volume work was brought out more than a year ago by a new publishing firm, the U. S. History Publishing Co. The success of the venture is suggested by the fact that the editor of one of the established publishing houses specializing in school textbooks had not yet heard, two weeks ago, that the books were out.

The reformers continue to storm the doors of the scholar's library with doubtful success. Their attacks are too capricious to constitute serious pressure. Writers and publishers of texts admit their inability to guess where they will be struck, frequently even why they have been struck. When Florida condemns the use of the word "evolution" in a geology book, in so innocent a context as "the evolution of the peninsula," who can foretell where the prophet will point an accusing finger? Publishers must, to sell their books, take account of prejudices that would obstruct their sales, particularly the prejudices of school boards governing the elementary secondary schools. But publishers must also, to sell their books, publish the newest and the best that they can corral.

If hysteria is not changing the textbooks, however, something else is, and in a rather different direction. When the crusaders against "Anglicization" found that some historians explained the revolution not as a result of the tyrannical oppression of the Colonies by a heartless mother country, but as a natural sequence of the conflict of interests on two sides of the Atlantic, they had not discovered treasonable British propaganda. They were facing the new interpretation of history, which attempts to synthesize the social, economic, geographic, and a dozen other factors in a situation, rather than to present a melodrama with a horrid villain and a tattered but courageous hero. The George Washington of the newer texts is not Woodward's Washington, but neither is he the Washington of Parson Weems and the cherry tree. (Even the American Legion's model history, be it said, omits the cherry tree, but substitutes touching references to Washington's mother.) An accident of personality is of little importance to the new historians beside forces which are no accident but the result of traceable causes.

The "new history" has been glowingly described by Professors James Harvey Robinson and Harry Elmer Barnes, but a glance at the texts of those social sciences which are old enough to have had texts in the old style is illuminating even to the layman. Texts in government are turning from Aristotelian forms to actual functions. Gone is the table of contents with its "First Canon of Distinction: The Identity or Non-identity of the State with the Government," and in its place comes the study of party cleavages. The romantic conception of the "will of the people" vanishes into limbo before the realism of the "will of the pressure group"—the Anti-Saloon League, the Methodist church, et al. The economists forsake the laws and definitions of texts written twenty-five years ago to face the facts of present economic institutions, with an emphasis on production and its greater efficiency. "American Economic Life," by Tugwell, Munro, and Stryker, begins with a description of poverty, rural and urban, and continues under the caption "Raising the Levels of Living." The authors supplement their own excellent descriptive powers with passages from Theodore Dreiser and Hamlin Garland, with pictures tragic and amusing and with illuminating charts. A casebook in economics similar to that used in the law has been in use for two years at Columbia University.

Students of literature need no longer wander exclusively among the classics, but can engage in discussions of sex, politics, and religion arising from their reading in modern authors. Members of college faculties of literature, turning from the standard works which had been approved and embalmed by time, fortunately found to their hand a crop of significant contemporaries demanding attention. The texts of Carl and Mark Van Doren have made a beginning in this field, and the presence of these and other scholars in literary journalism must reassure teachers of literature who are still timid about venturing out of classical cloisters into the light of the modern day.

The colleges are setting the pace, and the lower schools follow more slowly. The realistic histories of the Beards and of Muzzey have long been in use in the secondary schools. Professor Tugwell and his colleagues are engaged in adapting their economics text for high-school students. If the lower learning lags behind in the matter of content, it is looking forward in pedagogic method, and here the experimental schools point the way. Textbooks in these schools are few; the children learn their arithmetic, for example, by keeping a store. The mathematics texts that are used are distinguished by the practical application of their problems to daily living. Their history students read of the splendors of Cathay and the perils of Columbus's voyages in the words of Marco Polo and the diary of Columbus.

To judge a text for its dulness is a new departure in schoolbook criticism. Certainly the quality of interest was not always demanded of scholarly work. But the writer recently heard two eminent university professors agree that a certain tome "would certainly not make an evening's reading." Undoubtedly many of the newer textbooks, written well and even eloquently, do make an evening's reading. The publishers moreover do their share to sweeten the draught of knowledge. The new American history of the Beards is beautifully printed and bound, and decorated with woodcuts. Even the old books are decked in new clothes. A drab gray geometry of the past is appearing in a new edition with a bright green jacket lettered in gold, with larger and more varied type, and with diagrams standing out provocatively in heavy and lighter lines, making geometry positively attractive. An algebra book has pictures: the wonder is that nobody before thought of illustrating the lever principle with a picture of an automobile being raised to replace a flat tire. A high-school sociology text is coming out with 150 illustrations, and the publisher confesses that he is having captions written to justify the pictures. Primers are printed large and spaciously, with gaily colored elves and fairies dancing over their pages, and animals are coming into their own with more lifelike portraits than they have been favored with in the past. It is, in fact, time for a new hysteria to break out, lest the nation's youth be demoralized by the pleasures of education and the realities of life, and the discipline of application to tiresome abstraction be forever lost.

These Modern Women

"The Unpardonable Sin"

ANONYMOUS

[We print herewith the fifteenth of a series of anonymous articles giving the personal backgrounds of a group of distinguished women with a modern point of view. The next article will appear in The Nation for June 8.]

I WAS born into an atmosphere of Presbyterian orthodoxy and conventionality, in a small Southern town—a biological "sport" in some ways; yet inheriting from my mother so much docility and from my father such a strain of introspection and over-conscientiousness that the best years of my life were wrecked.

That was before the days of ubiquitous psychology and child-study. Nobody had ever heard of such matters as complexes and repressions and maladjustments. The question of the psychical aspects of sex was untouched, it seems, except by a few foreign specialists. Afraid to be myself, afraid even to mention the things I longed for most if I thought those things were disapproved of by the people around me, an exaggerated fearfulness held me captive. Some of its manifestations were so marked that it is hard to see how any grown person could have missed their significance. But these danger-signals my parents strangely ignored.

The fear of lying made me say "Maybe so and maybe not," in answer to questions. The fear of disobeying made me try to pinch a red ring around my leg one day when I went wading in a creek, so that I would not step in beyond the limit set by my mother. The fear of being sinful in vague, inexplicable ways oppressed me with a sense of guilt because a little boy kissed me in a game at a party when I was eight. That kiss worried me so that I was driven to confess the deed to my mother—not in a casual childish way but with a true Presbyterian sense of sin. There were other fears, including an absurd terror (at about five) of policemen: my eyes would fill with tears from fright at seeing one suddenly in the street.

Then at eleven the words "There is no God" flashed before my mind one day while I was studying my Sunday-school lesson, and I was filled with terror over being an atheist—"infidel," I called it. I thought I was a monster of wickedness because I could not believe in a God. But I simply could not, after those words appeared to my mind's eye. I would pray night and morning: "O God, let me believe!" I would stand before mirrors and study my face to see if the guilt of being an infidel had not marked it in some sinister way. I had heard of the mark of Cain, and I think I expected to find on my own countenance some mysterious sign that I was not like other people.

I still went regularly to church and Sunday school, and of course I dared not speak of my strange sin. I suffered in silence for about two years—less keenly as time passed—and then one day at Sunday school a new, inexpressible terror was shot at me by my teacher in the form of an explanation of the "unpardonable sin." There was one sin that could never be forgiven, she said—blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. She quoted from the Bible: "If a man blaspheme against the Son it shall be forgiven him; but if he blaspheme against the Holy Ghost he shall never be forgiven, but is in danger of everlasting fire." That woman is dead now. She left as a monument of herself a compilation of Bible texts called "Sunshine on Life's Path."

It is hard to give any idea to a healthy-minded person of the effect that statement had upon my sick little soul, at thirteen—of the insane terror of committing that sin in my thoughts at any minute. There might be a God—there must be—even though I could not actually believe in Him. And the thought: "If there is a God, if there is such a sin," engulfed me. The idea of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost and my terror produced a veritable obsession of insulting words and phrases such as I had never dreamed of saying in my life. And the more I repelled these "temptations," the more they thronged upon me. Every waking hour of my life I had to undergo the strain of banishing the suggestions of "blasphemy" that kept flocking into my mind; I had to be on my guard against them; had to counteract them by contradictory words or phrases and, as time went on, by jerks and motions of my body. Strange to say, I didn't go crazy. I was even considered brilliant at school, and was passionately fond of reading.

I began, after a year or so, to feel a wistful longing to be like other girls—to know boys, as they did, and go to parties and dances. There were not many parties for children in our little town, and it never occurred to my mother to have one for me. When I was twelve a "dancing party" was given by a girl a year or two older, and I was not invited. I heard my mother explain this slight to my father by saying "She doesn't dance, you know." She said to me years later, when I reproached her for my upbringing, that she had never wanted to dance when she was a girl, and never dreamed that I would care for it. She herself deeply disapproved of "round dances."

I cared for dancing intensely, having rhythm and poetry and romance in my very marrow. And of course in a college town, as mine was, a girl who does not dance is left out of nearly everything. As I was never invited to dances, I had literally no opportunity to meet boys. I went to a private school for girls only. If I walked home from school with a group of girls, I had to listen as they talked about their beaux and dances and fraternity pins, about this college boy and that, and I felt an aching loneliness that could not have been worse if I had been actually branded and cast out from human society.

If I happened to pass one of the few town boys in the street whom I had known when we were children I dared not look at him because I thought everyone despised and scorned me. Then I would go home and cry. By the time I was fifteen I had a well-developed sense of inferiority. I could not have spoken voluntarily to my mother about my loneliness and she never questioned me about my thoughts and feelings.

When I was about eleven, I heard her talk one day with other women about certain girls of fourteen or fifteen who "had boys in their heads," who were "boy crazy." Those expressions were burned into my memory, and the contempt and blame with which those girls seemed to be regarded. I got the idea that my mother considered it shameful, or at least unspeakably silly, for a girl ever to think about boys, ever to care to have boy friends.

All this time the "unpardonable-sin" horror was wearing out my nerves. I think I could have thrown it off if I had had the friends and diversion I longed for so intensely. But nobody seemed to suspect that I was not perfectly contented to stay at home and read, or draw and paint. Not my mother, not one of my numerous aunts, not one of my mother's women friends: nobody held out a hand to draw me into the circle of happy, normal girlhood. Instead, when I was not quite sixteen I had the misfortune to visit in the home of a sister-in-law of my father's, a sensational, stupid, vulgar woman, who, by her abnormal attitude toward sex, provided one more subject for introspection and worry and created another genuine complex: a vague, subconscious impression that love, marriage, motherhood—everything remotely connected with sex—were considered vile.

I fell in love at eighteen, when I finally had a chance to meet a boy. (A new family had moved to town, and lived in our neighborhood.) I didn't call it love. Being in love meant that you wanted to marry a person, and that was disgusting. But you might adore someone, much as saints adore their God. You might have an "ideal friendship" with someone who embodied the qualities you most admired. One heavenly conversation, the first time I talked to my idol; after that, dumbness and awkwardness in his presence. An inferiority complex is not to be thrown off all at once. Even when his sister said to me: "You've made a great impression on my brother. He thinks you are one of the nicest girls in this town," I could think of nothing to say.

I had finished school—the most advanced school in town—and there was no money for college. Nothing for me but to stay at home as always. No opportunities to meet boys and acquire social ease. Nothing going on in town but college dances, and a girl cannot go to dances without being invited. It still had not occurred to my mother that I might like to be introduced to a few boys and have a chance for the social life that I was secretly dying for, and I could not even hint at such a thing. So I read poetry and George Eliot and literary criticism and smatterings of philosophy and metaphysics, and wrote introspective outpourings in a journal that I kept fitfully. I wondered sometimes whether it were wrong to adore anybody as much as I adored my hero (I worshiped him steadily for ten years) even with no thought of "being in love." I wrote in my journal at nineteen: "Was it sentimentality, was it morbidness, was it merely the romanticism of youth finding vent in one accustomed to nothing but timorous self-repression?"

At twenty I went to New York to study "art." I knew nothing about the schools in New York except that one of them—a Woman's Art School—was free. So I selected that. I expected to enter the illustration class to get the technique for a profession with which to make a living. Then I was to paint landscapes. I had great notions of interpreting the beauty and poetry of nature, which I worshiped to the point of ecstasy. The curator of the school, a severe and stolid spinster, would not hear of my going into the illustration class. Thoroughness was her fetish. It was the "elementary antique," or nothing, the first year. And I was too incapable of self-assertion then to rebel. Thus the only year in which I ever had enough money to stay and study in New York was worse than wasted. It was literally soul-deadening to me to drudge for four hours a day at those ghastly casts.

I am at least free now from the old distortions and repressions. Beginning with Stanley Hall's "Adolescence," and going on through Freud and Brill and parts of Havelock Ellis and numerous other authors of these frank days, I have read enough to cure one of any amount of Puritanism. I am still an incorrigible idealist, however. And I still expect to "get started." The words of another idealist keep cropping up in my mind: "Yet I know all the while that I have never been defeated; have never yet fought, because I have never been weaponed for the fight; shall fight some day, when my hour comes, and shall win."

A Pan-American Conference

By WARWICK KEANE

Washington, D. C., May 9

SEEN through the dispassionate eye of the newspaper reporter, Pan-Americanism is not the idealistic, fraternal relationship among American nations that, under the cloak of the Monroe Doctrine, it pretends to be. Rather, it is the domination of the United States over lesser national groups in this hemisphere.

This could not have been demonstrated more fully than during the Third Pan-American Commercial Conference just ended. It explains the announced policy of the Argentine Rural Society—"Buy from those who buy from us." Only by such reprisals will Latin-American economic groups lessen the pressure which stifles all their interests except those necessary to the development of the United States.

Four days were filled with laudatory generalizations from Latin-American delegates, while United States representatives blushingly acknowledged the justice of the praise. Mutual compliments flew hither and thither, the solitary jarring note being contributed by Luis Duhau of Argentina. He frankly expressed dissatisfaction with those policies of the United States which set up prohibitive barriers to fair international trade. His courage was applauded; but nothing was accomplished except the passage of numerous bloodless resolutions, including one introduced by Duhau himself calling for a study looking toward a gradual reduction of tariffs.

One United States delegate boasted: "This will all pass over and be forgotten." And one newspaper woman, a veteran of many such conferences, predicted the storing of the resolutions in the capacious "ice-box" at the Pan-American Union.

The teeth of several protests were drawn so subtly by United States maneuvers that little was heard about them. A Cuban protest against discrimination in freight rates favoring dealers here and operating against Cubans was tabled by the resolutions committee. The permanent chairman, now president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, kept the resolution from coming to a vote when a question was registered from the floor. He was suave although apologetic.

The Panama delegation had brought a damning memorandum concerning "underhanded selling" by United States commissaries in the Canal Zone. A meeting between the authors of the memorandum and the United States delegation resulted in an agreement to keep the subject from open discussion. The memorandum was withdrawn, in return for the sending of a letter to President Coolidge asking investigation of the charges. That letter probably slipped into a pigeon-hole at the White House; but it served the purpose of preventing a public exposé of American violations of the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty in the Canal Zone.

Closed sessions to allow frank discussion of each country's problems marked the final day. The Argentine group was composed of nine United States business men and two Argentine delegates. The morning was occupied with discussion of ways to facilitate United States trade in Argentina. The United States delegates, not knowing that matters had been settled to Argentine satisfaction, expressed fear that the market was being hurt by the frozen-meat and alfalfa questions raised by the Department of Agriculture. When an Argentine timorously suggested discussing tariff barriers, the genial chairman, a New York textile dealer, quickly stopped him with the comment: "Oh, the tariff question is really too involved to be brought up here."

The relations between Mexico and the United States were not mentioned at the conference, as though commerce were not concerned. An ironic touch was contributed by the election of a chairman for the Mexican round-table meeting. The man chosen, a former member of the diplomatic corps, now earns his bread and butter by writing editorials attacking Mexico and advocating strong-arm intervention. Nicaragua was not mentioned, despite the presence of a Diaz representative.

Practically no concrete business problems were brought into the open. Nearly every talk concerned "good-will." As one distinguished South American spectator remarked: "They should talk good business, and let friendship follow; instead of talking friendship, as though business will follow. Nations cannot be friends while conducting business that way. This was an opportunity for frank and open discussion. Instead, pretty words are being flung around meaninglessly. No one comes into the open."

The Coolidge speech said nothing. Latin-American delegates applauded and later admitted disappointment. Secretary Kellogg welcomed the visitors with a few mellow phrases. Secretary Hoover characterized tariff policies as of secondary importance, reserving the climax of his talk for an opinion concerning foreign loans. These should not be made except for productive purposes, he said; and it is reported that he later claimed to have forgotten about the Nicaraguan loan for rifles and cannon. That lapse caused Kellogg several uncomfortable moments.

The commercial conference seems to have been conducted on the assumption that the day for frankness between nations is still far away. In the meantime Pan-Americanism remains a pretense.

In the Driftway

WHAT is a six-leg pollymoozuke? Or a two-headed paluca? Or a big tombolo? These inquiries are not taken from the latest book of questions. They thrust themselves upon the Drifter in reading an advertisement in a theatrical publication of a firm in Boston which offered these creatures for sale. The Drifter was not sure that he wanted a pollymoozuke with four legs, let alone six, or that a paluca even with only one head would be a boon companion. But he did want to know what such creatures might be, and so wrote to the advertiser for further information. The latter replied with a wealth of surprising and interesting detail.

* * * * *

NOW the Drifter is thinking of going into the show business. He is planning to tour the country with a tent side-show, for he knows where he can get—at seductively low prices—all the strange creatures at which he has often gazed spellbound when exhibited by others. He has before him a communication which begins in this beguiling fashion:

Mr. Showman
Dear Sir:

Your letter at hand and with this I send price list of my big, special curiosities each one a whole show.

You of course want something strong and attractive that will get the money.

And that is what I sell big, strong main features with swell flashy banners that make a front that gets the money, and the front is the main thing Mr. that's what gets them the front don't forget that.

* * * * *

OF course the Drifter wants something "that gets the money" and he realizes, as his correspondent writes, that "the front is the main thing." But he is still undecided what attraction to choose among the numerous possibilities offered. He is considering some one or more of the following wonders:

KING-MAC-A-DULA The Two Headed Giant with 8x10 banner $55.00 cash or $60.00 C. O. D. on $20 deposit.
POLLY-MOO-ZUKE and 8x10 banner $45.00 cash or $50.00 C. O. D.
ANTONIO THE ITALIAN TWINS and 8x10 banner $45.00 cash or $50.00 C. O. D.
SIAMESE TWINS and 8x10 banner $55.00 cash or $60.00 C. O. D.
CHINESE PALUCA and 8x10 banner $45.00 cash or $50.00 C. O. D.
SEA SERPENT and 8x10 banner $50.00 cash or $55.00 C. O. D. on $20 deposit.
PREHISTORIC GIANT MAN with one head $55.00 cash.
KING JACK-A-LOO-PA and 8x10 banner $40.00 cash or $45.00 C. O. D.
MOA DEVIL BIRD and 8x10 banner $40.00 cash or $45.00 C. O. D.
SEA HORSE and 8x10 banner $40.00 cash or $45.00 C. O. D.

NOR is this all. There is "The Baby in the Bottle," which, having two heads, is "a money getter" and "a whole show." It is sent with "privilege of examination on $10 deposit, which is to pay charges if not taken." It is hard to see how anyone could be so unfeeling as to send the infant back, for "The child is as natural and life-like as we could make it. The hair on head being sewed in, giving it a very natural appearance. Supposed to be a real child in embalming fluid." But if one should send the baby back, there is the alternative of "Special swell mummified outlaw subjects, men or women, for law and outlaw shows. Can be used to represent any outlaw. Very natural looking and will look the part in any weather, hot or cold, as they will not wilt, melt, run, or shrink in hot weather." That is more than can be said of the Drifter, who feels that in the presence of an outlaw in any weather he would shrink at once and run if he got a chance.

FORTUNATELY the Drifter's "supply house" does not compel him to make up the stories for its attractions. A "lecture" is sent with every wonder. If, for instance, the Drifter tours the country with King Jack-a-loo-pa, the Three-Faced Man, he will begin as follows:

> Ladies and Gents: KING JACK-A-LOO-PA, the Three-Faced Man, was King of the African Molocas. He had, as you see, one head with three faces, three mouths, three noses, three chins, six eyes, and one neck; three arms, three hands, and three fingers; three legs, three feet, and three toes. A strange, remarkable man, different from all other human beings that inhabit this earth. In life he was a savage monster—a king who ruled with an iron hand. He had a thousand wives, and when he died many of them were buried with him. Being in the country at the time and being anxious to see a ceremony of this kind, I strolled into the Jungle, and in the distance I could hear the mournful wailing of many women, and it was in that direction I turned my steps.

* * * * *

HAVING "strolled into the Jungle," the Drifter stayed to witness the burial of King Jack, together with a generous number of his wives, and later made off with the corpse. If instead of traveling around with this lord of the African Molocas, the Drifter chooses the "big classy attraction" King Mac-a-dula, the Two-Headed Patagonian Giant, "made so legs come off at the waist so as ship in a box 5x2x1½ ft," he will first explain that his friend is not embalmed but "a natural-dried body" who got that way in the atmosphere of his native land. In that arid region there is sometimes not a shower for years. After considerable further palaver the Drifter will move on majestically to the following peroration:

> The body was found fourteeen years ago and taken to England and placed on exhibition at the Crystal Palace. It is owned by a historical society of London, and no amount of money can buy it. We simply rent it. The atmosphere in this country being so damp it begins to soften in places and we have to use artificial means to keep it preserved, touching it up occasionally with arsenic, pitch, corrosive sublimate, etc., and in this way it will last for years. Truly a wonderful curiosity, worth many times the price you have paid to see it, and I ask you as a favor to the management to please tell your friends about it. Thanking you for your kind attention I will ask you to look it over carefully and stay as long as you like.

* * * * *

BUT on the whole the Drifter thinks he would prefer to go about the country showing the Centipedian Wonder, the Six-Legged Pollymoozuke. For he feels that he could declaim from the heart the line in the "lecture" which asserts: "What strange things live in this world besides ourselves, and how little we know of them!"

The Yellow Man's Burden

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You will be interested in the following news item from the Peking Daily Bunk disclosing a situation of international interest:

> POWERS SEND STRONG NOTE TO AMERICAN GOVERNMENT DEMANDING APOLOGIES AND REPARATIONS FOR MURDERS OF CHINESE CITIZENS
> Unarmed Woman and Two Men Brutally Murdered by American Bandits
> NEW YORK, June 2 (via Asiatic Press).—Affairs in the United States approached a crisis today, with the reported murder of Wun Lung, well-known laundry operator of Baltimore, at the hands of American bandits. Reports from war-torn Chicago announced the brutal slaying of Woo Sing and his daughter. Woo Sing represented Chinese silk interests in Chicago, and was said to be a staunch friend of America.
> As a result of these murders and killings previously reported, Turkey, China, Russia, and the associated Powers have dispatched identic notes to the Washington Government, demanding immediate apologies and reparations. At the same time additional troops have been landed from Chinese and Japanese cruisers in New York harbor, and are being quartered in the Woolworth Tower and adjoining buildings. At present there are 155,000 foreign troops stationed in and about New York City, while an additional 100,000 is available on twenty-four hours' notice. There are now 115 fighting vessels in the harbor for the protection of nationals of the various Powers. The Washington Government has received strong protests demanding the protection of foreign lives and property.
> A special dispatch from Charleston reports a clash between Nicaraguan and Mexican marines on the one hand and an American mob on the other. The mob was driven off after two of its members were killed. There were no casualties among the Nicaraguan and Mexican troops.
> A cable from Mexico City quotes the report of Admiral Alvarez, commanding officer of the landing party at New Orleans: "All quiet here following our bombardment of the city and the arrest of ninety-seven American agitators, who are believed to be in the pay of the reactionary British Government and the International Chamber of Commerce. We hope that further arrests will not be necessary."

Montgomery, Alabama, May 2 E. C. STEWART

Conservative or Revolutionary?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I was naturally much interested in Benjamin Stolberg's review of my book "Business and the Church," although except for the label I should hardly have recognized it. Mr. Stolberg maintains that it defends the "company union" in the name of Christ and is a "silly book." Actually, it is a case record giving the heart of the philosophy of twenty-two different labor-union and business executives. I accepted chapters from John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Henry Ford, the president of the Westinghouse Electric Company, and other captains of industry in order to present their outlook. It is my contention that many business men will be more liberalized and encouraged to support labor unions by this volume than by others which include only one side.

The side of union labor is not neglected. Mr. Stolberg admits that five articles are valuable, namely, the two from the Columbia Conserve Company, that from the Hart Schaffner and Marx plant, that from the Dennison Manufacturing Company, and the one from the A. Nash Clothing Company. No mention is made of other articles, totaling in all nearly half the book, which support union labor. One of these writers, Benjamin M. Squires, impartial chairman in Chicago, was asked at the suggestion of Sidney Hillman, and the chapter is entitled Cooperative Management with the Labor Union; another is written by Albert F. Coyle, the able editor of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers' Journal. His article, to be sure, refers to Christ in a way apparently objectionable to Mr. Stolberg, but note the words used:

> Twelve million people in this country live in a state of chronic poverty. The labor union, not the church, is fighting for them in the front rank, with the church nowhere in sight. But if the church really takes its Christ seriously, why shouldn't this multitude of impoverished humanity call upon the church to help the unions? . . . Dare the church line up with labor in opposing the whole profit-taking industrial system?

The reviewer does not quote the article by L. K. Comstock in which he says: "I look upon the labor movement in the large as a revolt against a social order growing more and more archaic." Nor does he refer to my own concluding chapter in which I champion labor organization and maintain that the minister must actively get into the fight for unionism.

The best proof that the book is not reactionary is that it is being severely criticized by certain business leaders. All that can be fairly asked is that everyone who is interested in creating industrial good-will read it for himself and discover at first hand whether it is a conservative devil in disguise or "revolutionary propaganda," as is charged by the other side.

Teachers Must Organize

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "Teachers from three different parts of the country—Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, Minnesota—sent us articles last week. Each was an arraignment of the school system"; but each ended with "You must not print my name. I would lose my job if it were printed." So says an editorial in The Nation for May 11.

Well, why do not these teachers join the American Federation of Teachers and help build an organization so powerful that teachers will be able to compel respect? In this organized world, power alone counts, and the unorganized are powerless.

Make the American Federation of Teachers a power and then, and only then, will teachers be able to look school boards and trustees square in the face and tell them where to head in at.

Vivid but Rotten

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "Revolt in the Desert"—vivid, magnificent, the outstanding book of the century. Very well, but it seems to me your reviewer has neglected to mention one of the most salient aspects of this Oriental adventure: the fact that Lawrence, in winning the confidence of Feisal and the Bedouin chieftains and encouraging them to rebel against Turkish sovereignty, was nothing more than a hireling of British imperialism. British troops and British stool-pigeons were in Syria and Arabia for very interested motives. Was the English Government ever really concerned about the freedom of those countries?

I can see nothing admirable in Lawrence's activities as related in this volume. To the contrary, he was by his own admission an agent provocateur of the British Intelligence Service, and, later, a free-lance brigand acting in concert with the British Army of Occupation.

Many of the pages of Lawrence's book are merely disgusting in their utter disregard for human life. What about that tale of the blowing up of the desert train with its hundreds of sick Turkish soldiers—many typhus victims—and then the mad orgy of murder and plunder?

Vivid? Perhaps, but despicable, inhuman, rotten.

Return to me now,
For I am a thousand arms
Spread out to you like an open fan;
A thousand gargoyles whose stone mouths
Will twist into shadowy smiles
When you return.
Walk in my night,
Far among the taut strings
Of my veins, that will tremble with sound.
And in my brain, panel'd with broad mirrors,
Be blood-red sparks by thousands
That walk and walk.

The Career of Passion

Tristram. By Edwin Arlington Robinson. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

IT may be said not only that "Tristram" is the finest of Mr. Robinson's narrative poems, but that it is among the very few fine modern narrative poems in English. In the total development of Mr. Robinson's art it occupies a special position. For in "Tristram" certain capacities hitherto only intimated are completely fulfilled; to many of Mr. Robinson's admirers who have not perceived the intimations in his previous work, this fulfilment may even seem surprising. To me it seems an inevitable development, and for me the poem takes its place as the most complete and most characteristic expression of his genius.

Hitherto Mr. Robinson has chosen to study passion rather in its consequences than in its career. He has been chiefly concerned with the ultimate effect of life upon the soul, and only infrequently has he been preoccupied by the ebb and flow of immediate experience. Many of his shorter poems suggest a story without telling it, or interpret a situation without reproducing it; "Eros Turannos," which is perhaps the most notable of his poems about love, is actually a poem about the effect of having loved. In "Merlin" and again in "Lancelot," however, Mr. Robinson indicated his capacity for the direct expression of immediate experience; in them a careful reader might have found the prophecy of a great poem having as its subject the career of passion in human destiny. It is this poem that Mr. Robinson has given us in "Tristram."

Like all legends which fix some of the eternal attitudes of the human spirit, that of Tristram and the two Isolts is susceptible of various interpretations. Were the two lovers guilty, or did the guilt lie with King Mark? Whose was the responsibility for their tragedy, and whose for the tragedy of Isolt of the White Hands? Every age has answered these questions in terms of its special preferences in ethics; the versions of the legend change, but the legend itself is immortal. It is of this fact that Mr. Robinson's superb treatment of the legend reminds us, for his poem, as I read it, is singularly free of ethical implications. This, he seems to say, is what happened; the events and not their interpretation form the subject. Life itself is the source of the tragedy in his version; but art is the celebration, not the indictment, of life.

[illegible] dramatic structure "Tristram" has a classical austerity, for all of Mr. Robinson's aptitude for re- could declaim [illegible] poem, directed upon the elements of form and asserts: "What [illegible]es the poem notable, what makes it specifi- ourselves, and how [illegible] the roll of his works, is the intensity of [illegible]eeps through it with a vigor and beauty that are new, in this full resonance, to Mr. Robinson's art. The old familiar intellectual magic that he has exercised is there, but it is subdued by the glamor of this new spell. For in "Tristram" Mr. Robinson has recreated, in its noblest guise, the ecstasy of passion.

LLOYD MORRIS

A Cross-Section of English Fiction

The Longest Shadow. By Jeffrey E. Jeffrey. Little, Brown and Company. $2.
Daphne Adiane. By Maurice Baring. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.
The Happy Tree. By Rosalind Murray. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.
The Miniature. By Eden Phillpotts. The Macmillan Company. $2.
Lud-in-the-Mist. By Hope Mirrlees. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.
Skin-Deep. By Naomi Royde-Smith. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.
Jennifer. By John Palmer. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

THUS the old-style society novel and its present practitioner, Maurice Baring:

> And at that moment she felt the whole fabric of her life and of her future which the architects, builders, and workmen of Hope and Illusion and Youth had been so busily and so gaily building, singing as they worked under her orders and personal supervision, and which had arisen and shone, shot with all the colors of the morning, like Tristram's fairy castle, or some ethereal Parthenon on the top of a fabulous Acropolis, now in one second come crashing down about her. The pillars were laid low; the marbles had crumbled; the colors had faded and vanished; the altar was a smoking ruin. Henceforth the temple could be only a home for bats, lizards, reptiles, and rats, and weeds and mold and dust. It was ruined, done with forever.

The moderns are more practical and more honest. Miss Murray, who was born about the time that Mr. Baring published his first book, makes her heroine conclude the story with the words:

> And this is all that has happened. It does not seem very much. It does not seem worth writing about. I was happy when I was a child, and I married the wrong person, and some one I loved dearly was killed in the war . . . that is all. And all those things must be true of thousands of people.

One infers from this representative group of novels that it is true of thousands of people. Life for the upper classes in twentieth-century England is pitifully dull and damnably pointless. Too sophisticated to enjoy the crapulous pleasures that satisfied their simple grandfathers, too sedentary for the palestric amusements that completely occupied the leisure class of the eighteenth century, the present-day gentry roam languidly through city and country seeking employment for their indolent minds and occupation for their hankering souls, taking what comfort they can, en passant, from such tame diversion as English affairs of the heart.

Small wonder, then, that the authors who seek to depict this listless and bored society suffer from lack of interesting personalities and vital motives. An old hand at fashionable fiction, like Mr. Baring, naturally tries to solve the problem by adding to the coincidences and emotional tricks which, in printer's phrase, justify a popular plot. Skilfully but none the less obviously he weaves in mysterious spectral elements to prop our flagging interest until he is on the verge of a ghost story. But his mundane and spectral triangles still intersect in the same plane of stock situations and stilted sentiments which is the society novel. Nor can Miss Royde-Smith escape this plane despite the air of mock-seriousness and ironical cuteness by which she impresses her reader that she is above the tittle-tattle of aristocratic automatons. And Mr. Palmer, who would mitigate the dulness by combining the tawdry winsomeness of Barrie with the superficial psychic investigation of Pirandello, is equally trite and inconsequential. There is no such escape from reality, neither by subterfuge nor by the wholesale and heavy-handed fantasy with which Miss Mirrlees preaches a too-apparent moral.

Miss Murray frankly accepts the conditions of her environment and presents them as inoffensively as possible by pitching her story in a minor key. So presented, they point no moral; neither do they adorn the tale. They are not even necessary to an understanding of the heroine, who is less affected by the life around her than by an ordinary sentimental adventure with an unhappy ending. Nevertheless, the author's strong, simple style and her sharp, sure portraiture make one hope that she will soon discover the conflict between active, Faustian personality and a quiescent, because a comatose, society which can furnish a theme "worth writing about."

This conflict is recognized by Mr. Jeffrey, whose groping hero, well born and well bred, finds himself the protagonist of the impulsive life. Like Galsworthy, Mr. Jeffrey sets down calmly and even humorously what he feels intensely; unlike Galsworthy, he is less concerned with the destiny of class or nation than with the fate of an individual. The result is not merely the best book of this group but also one of the most interesting novels written in post-war England. "The Longest Shadow" earns this praise both as an important social document and as a moving story. Treating the same theme as the much-lauded Ford Madox Ford, Mr. Jeffrey avoids all of the other's hysterical and vulgar caterwauling about the degeneracy of English aristocracy; dealing with the same class as Mr. Baring, he manages to invest the stock figures of English gentry with the breath of life. What is more important, he realizes and communicates the individuality of half a dozen characters and creates completely Philip Queste, the hero of his story.

"Your own mind's workings are your only reality," is Philip's device in his battle with the realities of conventional life. Miss Mirrlees takes the converse of this theme and attempts to show that our conventions and our laws create a world as fictitious as any dream of fairyland. Considering the difficulty of her task she has done very well indeed, but the theme demands either a lighter touch or a deeper trench. In the case of "The Miniature," too, more humor is necessary than Mr. Phillpotts brings to his story. To present the gods of Olympus as a collection of stolid Britons may not have been his intention, but the dull discussion of man's evolution and religious beliefs leaves no doubt as to the results he has achieved.

JOHAN SMERTENKO

The Private Life of Richard Wagner

The Prodigious Lover. By Louis Barthou. Traslated by Henry Irving Brock. Duffield and Company. $2.50.

ISN'T it about time for good critics to stop being shocked by the private life of Richard Wagner? They used to complain about his works and scold him for not writing operas sounding like the bogus grandeur of Meyerbeer's horrendous tinfare or the sweet purity of Mozart's exquisite patterns. At last they had to swallow his operas like so many gnats trying to engulf the leviathan; and now they find new reasons for being annoyed because his private life went more like Odin's than like a highly respectable gondolier's. Ever since Ruskin had his say about goodness and virtue they have worked on the theory that purity in art rises from a life managed according to the moral dictations of a village curate; and in their pious zeal they seem to have overlooked the disturbing fact that almost all great artists require the splendor and passion of love, and often guilty love, for the source which shall take form in works hewn from a marble purity. They indulge in vague gestures about Leonardo's impeccable and disinterested life, which is really a special case and has been investigated by Freud; and anyhow Leonardo's work has a cold formalism which is the very result of that kind of life. Even the impeccable Brahms lost his whole heart to Clara Schumann; and there a frustrated passion gave birth to music steeped in an aching sadness. One wishes these estimable persons would look into Beethoven's later life, to say nothing of Michelangelo's and a few more of that splendid sort. If we knew more about Shakespeare we should write less scholarly tarradiddle about his being a spectator of life. Needless to say, spectators of life have the habit of writing lines of such terrible passion and despair and giving them to characters in plays who utter their haunting music in dramatic situations wholly inappropriate to their themes.

Not long ago, in his "Wagner as Man and Artist," Ernest Newman went burrowing like a mole into the immense and conflicting evidence about Wagner's life and then spent half the book trying to show Wagner up as a most unpleasant and detestable egotist; and then in the second half of the book proved the case for Wagner's overpowering genius in music and his absolute capacity for entering into the very souls of all his characters. Minna Wagner came in for all kinds of sympathy; and Mathilde Wesendonck turned out to be a frigid nobody, taking Wagner's adoration just to glut her vanity. No one ever tried to argue Wagner's being a law-abiding grocer; and the egotism which results in great art is a commonplace of history. It is a bit difficult to share Ernest Newman's fervor about Wagner's unforgivable selfishness and greed and unkindness. There is too much evidence of his indisputable charm and the real kindness of his heart, and the simple fact that for twenty-two long years he stayed as Minna's husband. She wanted him to write popular music like Meyerbeer's and never had the least idea of what he was trying to do. As a good bourgeois, she found him spendthrift in money and emotion and ambition; and despite a long course of domestic scenes Wagner kept her for his wife because he understood her nature and his own difficult nature and had a genuine kindness for the aging and scolding woman he had married in the thoughtless passion of his youth. If she found him as impossible as Mr. Newman asks us to believe, why didn't she get up and go? She knew he had genius and she was the slave of that genius; and like most wives she preferred a bad husband and a genius to a God-fearing citizen who never cast eyes at any other woman.

What has all this to do with M. Barthou's book? It has everything to do with M. Barthou's being one of the few critics to understand and explain the Minna and the Mathilde and the Cosima and even the light loves of Wagner's life as conditioned not by lust and selfishness but by the terrible ardor and passion of Wagner's soul, which had to make its own laws and not obey the conventions laid down by men who never create art because their souls run to the set grooves of ordinary conduct. The title of the book is wholly misleading, nor is M. Barthou so foolish as to isolate Wagner's so-called "love life" from his work. For Wagner love was never a dissociated performance done for its own sake; and never at any time was he a "prodigious lover" for the simple reason that for him love and music could not in his life be separated. No doubt Casanova was a prodigious lover; and a tom-cat is a prodigious lover. They never do much else; but except for Mathilde we might never have had "Tristan" and except for the second Mathilde we might not have had "Die Meistersinger" and if Cosima had not been the perfect wife—both a haven of refuge and a general of affairs—we might never have had the "Ring." Suppose Wagner did borrow money from Wesendonck and then make love to his wife? In his own mind Wagner knew he couldn't write "Tristan" without Mathilde; and after all he was in a position to know. He didn't visit Wesendonck just to seduce his host's wife. He was never a Don Juan; and if women prefer unhappiness and splendor with a genius in preference to security and dulness with a good husband they make their own choice; and for that they have our blessing. In any case, Wagner went through agonies of remorse and indecision about his first wife. He felt bound by duty and their long life together and his sympathy for her helplessness.

If people feel so badly about Wagner's conduct why don't they stay away from "Tristan" and thereby show their moral disapproval? They are quite willing to have rapture and wonder and delight from the works of artists they delight in calling bad names. The truth of Wagner's private life has its own interest and importance; but compared to his art it has no importance. At this distance of years, it simply doesn't matter; and how can a distinguished critic like Ernest Newman spend so much time in giving a worm's-eye view of a soaring eagle? Wagner did all sorts of things the rest of us could not do. Likewise he wrote music which no other composer can match for a flaming and terrible beauty. At the very least, we ought to be decently grateful and, like M. Barthou, do our best to understand just why he led so tempestuous a life. An egotist and spendthrift and seducer cannot write works like "Götterdämmerung"; and the stupendous grandeur of that opera is answer enough to all our private hesitations about the private life of Richard Wagner. If he made people suffer that is just what gods do; and the women seemed willing enough to suffer. They were caught in the god's meshes, as we are caught in the golden net of his music. We may cry our agony and our hurt, but we cannot and would not escape.

DONALD DOUGLAS

The Unbelieving World

From Myth to Reason. By Woodbridge Riley. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

AND now it is an Outline of the History of Natural Science and Speculative Thought, or as Professor Riley's subtitle has it, The Story of the March of Mind in the Interpretation of Nature. The book might equally well have been called "This Unbelieving World," for it complements "This Believing World." Lewis Browne's book, it may be recalled, traced the origin of religion back to fear—to primitive man's fear of the forces of nature. To primitive man the phenomena of nature seemed to be the work of spirits—highly whimsical spirits. Hence the need to control or cajole these spirits; hence magic. And out of magic arose myth and primitive religion.

Thales for Mr. Riley is the first of a long line of great unbelievers who form a sort of apostolic succession of science—men whose discoveries and speculations have completely transformed man's ways of life and his concepts of nature. It is the story of this transformation that Mr. Riley tells. He divides his story, as it naturally divides itself, into five great epochs. The Age of Myth, the Age of Magic, the Age of Discovery, the Age of Mechanics, the Age of Evolution.

> There is first the Age of Myth, when men believed that nature was ruled by rival gods with the world as their playground. The end of this act tries to reduce these gods to the forces of nature, but the same motive carries over into the second act, the Age of Magic. Here men looked on the powers of nature with fear and trembling. They had a positive terror of its forces, and they filled the world with fabulous monsters. Such a state of mind obtained during the Dark Ages and lasted until the end of the Middle Ages, when the explorers discovered that the ocean was not filled with grotesque beasts and that strange and terrible men did not inhabit the remote parts of the earth. In the third act we have the rebirth of knowledge. Then the scientific discoveries made by the ancient Greeks were revived, and in this crucial middle act characters like Copernicus and Galileo reduced the workings of the universe to natural forces. This leads to the fourth act, where the world is looked upon as a machine, something that can be studied as easily as a working model, a contrivance which man can take apart and understand. But this belief was found unsatisfactory as it left out the great vital element. In the last great act, then, the world is discovered to be alive. It has as it were, a soul of its own; it is a living machine. In short the present Age of Evolution completes the drama so far as we are concerned.

Mr. Riley's aim is not merely to tell us how science has evolved, interesting as that part of the story is, but rather to show how the evolution of science has revolutionized man's outlook. If religion was evolved as antidote to fear, science has performed its greatest service in uprooting ignorance, the root of fear. Fear, of course, is far from being annihilated. Religion, for most men, is still an inescapable necessity; but its gods grow more and more tolerant and its devils less and less potent. Even in the least literate sections of the country, thanks to science, life and death and destiny have been robbed of most of their primitive terrors. Nordic blondes in Mississippi, for instance, are no longer afraid of black cats, ghosts, and goblins. Tennessee Baptists do not burn old women on charges of witchcraft. Georgia dervishes do not smudge the sick to drive away devils. Even the yokels of Arkansas are not frightened by an eclipse of the sun.

Mr. Riley writes with clearness and with sound scholarship. True, as an outliner he will never set the world on fire. He lacks the dramatic gift of Lewis Browne, the Stracheyan artistry of Will Durant, the whimsical humor of van Loon, the magnificent journalism of Wells. Nevertheless, "From Myth to Reason" is a readable book, well organized, full of curious and interesting information, and altogether worth while.

CHARLES LEE SNIDER

Warm Satire

Mr. Fortune's Maggot. By Sylvia Townsend Warner. The Viking Press. $2.

MISS WARNER'S first book, "Lolly Willowes," filled one with a complicated mixture of admiration and foreboding. So much keen satire of the humdrum, so much reverence for the delicacies of verbs and adjectives, and so much ingenuity in the construction of an outré story—and all this tragically married to that sweet nausea of whimsicality which Mr. Morley's magical molasses has induced in 200,000 (largely feminine) readers. The question naturally arose as to whether Miss Warner's next production would cultivate the Peter Pannerisms which secured her initial large audience or whether she would realize her most vital temper and commit herself, mind and style, to that special and delightful acerbity which constitutes her essential value.

With triumphant decision, "Mr. Fortune's Maggot" arrives to answer the question. This is the simple and exquisitely written tale of a serious, warm-hearted missionary who made one male and beautiful convert on an amazing island in the South Seas, who tried hard to replace the sweet wine of a tropical nature with the best bottled brand of Anglicanism, who won love but lost his God, who in the losing saved his soul and so watched, in a sad bewilderment, a great human equation canceling out.

There are discoverable occasional concessions to the ghost of Mr. Barrie—the disastrous geometry lesson, the by now famous mathematical definition of the umbrella—but on the whole there is very little milk and water offered up to the God of the Whimsical. The primary quality of the book resides in its satire. This satire is the most serious kind of satire, because it is humorous. The humor is well-bred, but it is none the less devastating. In this connection it is pertinent to note that Miss Warner is, in a manner, dealing with the same problem posed in "Elmer Gantry"—the essential ridiculousness of modern organized religion. But there are at least two points of contrast, even if we neglect to mention the fact that Miss Warner's English is as pure and invigorating as spring water. Mr. Fortune's not-quite-converts are South Sea Islanders and so exhibit a slightly higher grade of mental complexity and a purer quality of morals than do Gantry's awed congregations. But there is a profounder distinction. Miss Warner quietly bubbles over with her joyous lack of faith; Mr. Lewis froths at the mouth when he discovers that Methodists are morons, a conclusion he might have heard long, long ago from the lips of any Jesuit in America. Miss Warner's sensitive irony reveals the insufficiency of the Christian ethic when it is juxtaposed with the simple hedonic creed that needs no revelation and is the basic animal faith of Christendom as well as of Tahiti; and this insufficiency exposes itself through the tragico-ridiculous disillusionment of the Reverend Timothy Fortune, the most warm-hearted and least hypocritical of men. But Mr. Lewis cannot rise to humorous satire; a hustling career in America has robbed him of the capacity for calmness; and so he must perforce set up a lout, a sneak, and an evangelist in order to convince us that there is something rotten in the state of grace.

He proves his point well enough—but all we are left with is the rather unsatisfying feeling that he has won the argument. The beautiful close of Miss Warner's exquisite tale, on the other hand, leaves us rapt and wondering at the spectacle of man's multifarious simplicities. Her satire, so humorous, so warm, so finely feminine, has the depth and reach that a brutally naturalistic rendition of a life-surface can never attain; and the fairy-like locale of her story, her impossible islanders, and her slightly mad, quixotic hero admit the entrance of beauty and wit—two qualities which American satire (and I am keeping Mr. Cabell well in mind) does not too largely possess.

"Mr. Fortune's Maggot" will delight all the tender souls who enjoyed "Lolly Willowes." But it should furnish a harder joy to those who are seeking among the writers of our day for a satiric hypodermic which is really subcutaneous.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

Books in Brief

At the Sign of Sagittarius. By Richard B. Ince. The John Day Company. $2.

A thoroughly charming series of mockeries, recalling Voltaire and Anatole France—and the "Gesta Romanorum," too, for this little book has its own peculiar sweet-smelling piety. The author, an Englishman hitherto unknown on this side of the Atlantic, writes with the appealing baldness and simplicity of a medieval conte. A few sentences from Caesarius of Heisterbach or some other moldy chronicler have been sufficient to set grinning the gargoyles of Mr. Ince's mind. His dry account of Orphitus, the bibulous Roman lion-tamer who managed to become a Christian saint, and his suave satire on spiritualism called The Thanatists give an engaging hint of Mr. Ince's anti-theological bias. But the reader will remember longest the four pleasant and gentle anecdotes that tell of the good deeds of Dean Ensfrid, who, forbidden by his bishop to give away his cloak, evaded the commands of God's vicar by the simple stratagem of presenting the beggar with his only pair of breeches. This little book of short tales is likely to be overlooked in the furious search for "significant literature"; but the few leisurely souls who will read it are in for a long series of appreciative chuckles. Incidentally, the volume is a perfect example of tactful printing and binding.

Gullah. By Reed Smith. Columbia, S. C.: Bureau of Publications, University of South Carolina.

This pamphlet is a short, untechnical, yet fairly adequate account of the language spoken by the Gullah Negroes of the Georgia-Carolina coast and sea-islands. In its drastically simplified grammar and vocabulary Gullah is not unlike Pidgin-English, Beach-la-Mar, and Chinook, but possesses charms of its own. To an outsider it is almost completely unintelligible. A number of attempts have been made to reduce Gullah to writing, the most successful being that of the late Ambrose E. Gonzales, who published four volumes of Gullah stories and compiled an extensive vocabulary. Mr. Smith's pamphlet is dedicated to Gonzales's memory. A scientific study of Gullah, on the lines of Sir James Wilson's grammars of the Lowland Scotch dialects, is much to be desired.

Enough Rope. Poems by Dorothy Parker. Boni and Liveright. $2.

Dorothy Parker's rope appears to be twisted from a thread of traditional light verse, a wire of Edna Millay's, a hair of Elinor Wylie's (the dedicatee), and a thick enough strand of her own. In her weaker lyrics the author writes variations on a theme which Miss Millay and, in another key, Sara Teasdale, have already explored. In her best work the rope is caked with a salty humor, rough with splinters of disillusion, and tarred with a bright black authenticity.

The Evolution of Modern Capitalism: A Study in Machine Production. By John A. Hobson. New and Revised Edition. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

First published in 1894, this work has passed through several revisions. In its present form it brings the marvelous story of the evolution of our industrial order down to date. In a long supplementary chapter the distinctive movements in trade and industry in the pre-war and post-war epochs are described and analyzed with a wealth of factual and statistical information, and a number of the significant resulting problems are discussed. "Big business," particularly in the form of loose combinations, cartels, and trusts, has continued to grow by leaps and bounds. There has been a definite shifting in the distribution of occupations in Great Britain and the United States. Women have come to play an increasingly important role in industry, commerce, and the professions. The growth of economic internationalism as a consequence of the increase of the export of capital is a marked feature of our times. The United States has passed from the status of a debtor to that of a creditor nation. Industry has been more and more transformed as a result of the development and wider application of the new technology. The war has revealed the tremendous reserve capacity for production unutilized in peace time. The significance of key industries is coming to be more appreciated. The socialization of basic industries appears to be a possibility of the not distant future. Attention is being given, as never before, to the vast waste in the productive and distributive process. The problems of a satisfactory adjustment of the relations of capital and labor and of affording the worker protection against unemployment have become ominously urgent. With the insight and penetration which characterizes all his work, the author illuminates the record of industrial evolution during these recent eventful years.

Music

Criticism by Radio

IN Music and Common Sense[1] I discussed the inability of a purely verbal explanation or definition of musical facts to make them intelligible to one who has had no direct contact with them. The reason, as I gave it, is that the simplest of such facts (those to which all others may be reduced) consist of the relations and meanings of musical tones, relations and meanings sui generis, which only the musical tones themselves can convey and words can only allude to, and the allusion to which can be understood correctly only by one who has already apprehended them directly. In other words, a purely verbal explanation assumes knowledge of what it sets out to explain.

It may appear, then, and indeed is, a step in the right direction to illustrate each name with an example of what it names (I am now, obviously, referring to a spoken explanation). However, the real object is not to define terms; it is to make appreciable the things the terms stand for. There are obvious uses in knowing names of things; but one need not know names like "sequence" and "thematic development" if only one's ear follows actual sequences and modifications of themes when these occur. In fact, as I pointed out in the preceding article, there is no learning the meanings of the names once for all: thematic development is a new thing with each new theme, the sonata is a new form with each combination of new material and the new treatment this material demands.

[1] The Nation, December 8, 1926, and January 19, 1927.

The implication is quite clear: to the degree to which music can speak for itself it should be allowed to do so. What sort of music the educator starts with depends on what sort of person he is educating (the education is, then, one of individuals), but he will allow a piece of music to present an example of material and its use, of which he will make the listener aware; and if he gives names it will be only to what the listener has already apprehended as musical facts. Each additional musical composition will offer new examples of the facts; and in so doing it will add to the connotations of the names, which is, however, of less importance. For at any point, it is true, the listener will be in possession of a body of knowledge, abstracted from experience, which must by itself make further experience easier. But only slightly easier, since in each musical composition the material and processes are, or should be, unique; and so the real function of each newly elucidated composition will be to present for apprehension its own unique materials and processes. And as I conceive of it, the job of the educator is as long as the list of music.

As it happens, we occasionally find performances of music prefaced by the quotation of themes, which, though valuable, is only part of what should be done. Thus, the regular program of the Boston Symphony is considered too much for the musical sophistication of the larger radio audience, and Professor John P. Marshall undertakes to make things easier. And in New York those who want to listen to the concerts of chamber music donated by Mr. Lewisohn must consent to receive the brand of enlightenment provided by Professor Henry T. Fleck. Of the two, Professor Marshall is clearly the more adequate lecturer; but both are alike in one respect, in which indeed they represent the whole tribe of music-explainers: they do not know when to assume knowledge and when to assume ignorance, and so they offer help where it is not needed and withhold it where it would be of use.

Thus, in the ten minutes at his disposal Professor Marshall has to deal with Sibelius's Seventh Symphony and "Finlandia." The symphony has been performed in America exactly once before, "Finlandia" innumerable times. The symphony is of the class of compositions characterized by a complex structure which is built up by the modification and interplay of themes, a structure which depends, for its appreciation, on the identity and modifications of these themes being recognized; "Finlandia" is of the class of compositions which are no more than a few melodies that speak for themselves. One therefore expects Professor Marshall to skip "Finlandia" and spend all his time on the symphony; and, in this, to waste no time on talky-talk but to play each theme, first in its original form, and then in whatever modified forms occur later. Consider now what he actually does. He gives details of Sibelius's life and career; he describes the bleak, dour country Sibelius lives in, which, he says, has affected the folk-songs of the Finns and, through these, the music of Sibelius; and to illustrate this effect he plays, not the themes of the symphony but three of the folk-songs. None of the things he has said and done is of the slightest use for the particular problem, as I have described it, of apprehending Sibelius's unfamiliar symphony; he has accomplished no more than if he had said only: "Sibelius's music is melancholy and stern"; and even that is unnecessary, for the general connotation of music is obvious. And having provided help that was not needed, he now withholds help where it would be of use; for coming to the symphony he says: "You will hear first an ascending scale-like theme (he does not play it) which will occur several times during the work; you will hear other themes (he does not even describe these); the work will rise to a climax (of what goes to make up this climax, not a sound)." And having said this the good man proceeds to play every one of the familiar melodies of the ubiquitous "Finlandia." Perhaps he is reluctant to work through a new orchestral score; it is easier to read from Mr. Hale's program notes.

But Professor Fleck has to deal with two works that are from twenty to thirty years old, quartets by Dvořák and Debussy. Of these, the second is the less obvious; yet, while he quotes repeatedly every one of the rather obvious melodies of the Dvořák, he elucidates the Debussy as follows: "And now we come to a composition that is very different. The melody is different, the harmony is different, everything is different . . . as you will hear for yourselves."

Sierra and His Theater

Of all the countries of Europe, Spain must be the one which modern ideas have touched the least, for if I may judge from the books and plays which get translated here (and I hastily disclaim any other basis for my judgment), she has never actually absorbed even those influences to which she fancies she has subjected herself. It is true that she went, though a little tardily perhaps, to the same schoolmasters as the rest. Her playwrights read Ibsen, her novelists imitated the Russians, and her philosophers studied Nietzsche, yet they remained essentially alien to the spirit which transformed the others. Unamuno, her one thinker with a European reputation, is a Christian mystic; Benavente and Sierra, the only two of her playwrights known here, are unabashedly romantic; and Pio Baroja, the only novelist to win even a mild reputation in America since the collapse of Ibáñez, disintegrated as the result of a complete inability to digest the ideas which he had absorbed. Realism, rationalism, and disillusion remained to Spain fundamentally incomprehensible. The bleakness of mere intelligence is not for her temperament, and in spite of all efforts in a contrary direction she cannot help seeing life in terms of melodrama, romance, and sentiment. A Spaniard would rise from a careful perusal of the complete works of all the intellectualists from Schopenhauer to Shaw with the unshaken conviction that after all "love is best," and when the population of all the rest of the world has been transformed into he- and she-ancients he will still be concerning himself chiefly with moonlight.

Certainly the brief visit of Sierra's Spanish Art Theater to the Forrest did nothing to modify this opinion. The institution is superficially under the influence of other "modern" theaters. The very name is evidence of that, and so, too, are certain mannerisms. The sets which it uses are somewhat impressionistic, the second drop-curtain is painted with a sort of batik design, and Shaw's "Pygmalion" is included in the repertory. But once the curtain has risen upon "The Road to Happiness," which Sierra wrote in conjunction with one of his compatriots, or upon one of his own plays, all doubt is dispelled. Though the acting is doubtless restrained and naturalistic by Spanish standards, the leading lady acknowledges applause upon her entrance by a full bow in front of the footlights; the melodious sentences are declaimed in well-rounded periods; and in the lines romantic sentiment holds sway. In one play the fickle Rosina bewilders her suitors with her coquetry; in another a beautiful orphan girl wanders friendless over the world and after various misadventures, including one among a band of gipsies, finds happiness in an unselfish love; in a third the nuns send out into the great world the foundling they have reared. Hardly since the Victorian Age has any English or American author written anything which seems so naively romantic. Leaving aside all questions of absolute merit, one is struck most of all by the fact that the author of these plays is living in a world never really touched by the movement which, in other countries, completely transformed the modes of feeling.

The company is composed of acceptable actors, and it has in its leading lady, one Catalina Barcena, a young woman of considerable skill as well as very unusual vivacity and charm, but the Spanish Art Theater is not likely to scatter any ideas capable of affecting the American stage. We have a good deal to learn from the Germans and the Russians, but not much from it. That we are capable of feeling a certain charm in Sierra's work the unexpectedly great success of his "The Cradle Song" at the Civic Repertory Theater is enough to prove, but that charm is of something quaintly exotic, it has nothing to do with the moods or the aspirations which are potent for us, and it leaves nothing except a faintly pleasant memory.

"Oh, Ernest" (Royale Theater) is a musical comedy not very skilfully made out of "The Importance of Being Earnest," by such simple expedients as giving the butler Lane an eccentric dancer for a wife and hiding a chorus of gay ladies in Algernon's apartment. The other plays of the week—"Julie" at the Lyceum, "Katy Did" at Daly's, and "He Loved the Ladies" at the Frolic—are all merely the usual end-of-the-season odds and ends sponsored by hopeful enthusiasts who take advantage of the low rentals of the spring. None has any particular excuse for existence.

The Kuomintang Party

By TI-TSUN LI

THE Kuomintang or the Nationalist Party was first organized, under a different name, in 1894 as a secret revolutionary society by the late Dr. Sun Yat-sen, Father of the Chinese Republic. This party was largely responsible for the success of the revolution of 1911. In the earlier days of the republic it was the most powerful political party in the country, controlling a majority of the seats in the first National Assembly. Because its political views were distasteful to President Yuan Shih-kai it was dissolved by a presidential mandate on November 4, 1913.

In the summer of 1917 a large number of former Kuomintang M.P.'s rallied to the call of Dr. Sun to form a new government in Canton. By taking this step the Kuomintang Party has definitely identified itself with the Southern or Cantonese Government. Hence the party is also referred to as the Cantonese Party—a very misleading name.

The new government went through many trials and experiences—experiences which served to convince Dr. Sun and his associates that the revolution of 1911 had not done its work as thoroughly as it should have; that foreign oppression was stronger than ever; that the reactionary elements were still dominating national politics, and that consequently the Kuomintang Party should renew its former revolutionary activities. In pursuance of this new conviction Dr. Sun reorganized his party on a revolutionary basis in the First National Party Convention of the party convened on January 21, 1924. The reorganized party has pledged itself to champion the cause of the people, that is to say, to liberate the country internally from control by the militarists and externally from the grip of the foreign Powers. Using Canton as a base the party began its military operations early in 1926. The campaign has been one of rapid and uninterrupted success; and at the time of writing the Nationalist Government is in control of Southern and Central China from Tibet to the Yellow Sea. It is only a question of time until the Nationalists will take Peking and thus unite China.

We are now in a position to examine briefly the platform of the Kuomintang Party. Foremost among its foreign policies is the abrogation of the unequal treaties and the conclusion of new treaties on the principles of equality and reciprocity. Any nation which voluntarily relinquishes its special privileges in China will be treated as in actual fact a "most favored nation." As to foreign loans made to China none will be repudiated excepting the few that are detrimental to the political and economic life of China or that were contracted by an irresponsible government for illegitimate purposes. All these measures are designed to free China from foreign domination.

In the domestic policies of the Kuomintang Party we find a picture of China in the making. Politically the new China will take the form of a decentralized unitary state —a middle course between centralism and federalism. Each province will have the right to frame its own constitution and to elect its own officers. Whenever the national and the provincial constitutions are in conflict, the former will prevail. The principle of legislation by representation will be recognized, but it will be supplemented by popular initiative, referendum, and recall. There will be equality of the sexes in all matters. The traditional threefold separation of powers is considered unsatisfactory. Therefore the powers of the new government will be divided into five branches, namely, legislative, executive, judicial, censorial, and public examination. The duty of the Censorate—an institution peculiar to China—is to watch over the conduct of the higher officials and to denounce them for malfeasance. It performs, in other words, the combined functions of an administrative court and a senate sitting as an impeachment body. The Ministry of Public Examination prescribes and conducts examinations for persons who wish to enter civil service or who seek to be candidates for elective offices. No one will be permitted to run for any elective office unless he has previously passed such a prescribed examination. Thus demagogues will find no place in the new China.

This is an ultra-democratic program. Even the most optimistic Nationalists admit that the mass of the Chinese people are not ready for it. Accordingly they worked out a schedule for the gradual application of the new policies. Three political periods, one following the other, are contemplated: (1) The period of military government; (2) the period of tutelage, and (3) the period of constitutional government. During the first two periods the Kuomintang Party will assume the rule of the country. It is only when coming into the third period—the period of constitutional government—that we shall find the new scheme of government in full operation.

The economic system of the new China is roughly a form of state socialism. One of its cardinal features is the readjustment of land ownership by regulating land rent, by imposing a progressive tax on unused land, and by the socialization of unearned increment. Another feature is the regulation of capital. All industrial enterprises which are of a monopolistic nature or beyond the financial resources of private individuals are to be undertaken by the national government. Census taking, agrarian reform, labor legislation, and other democratic measures are also promised. The left wing of the party advocates a communistic scheme, but so far it has not found favor with the majority of the party.

The Kuomintang Party, through its founder, Dr. Sun Yat-sen, has also defined the future relations of China to the world. The keynote of the new world-policy is the nationalization of the whole world. It is only in such a nationalized world, a world of independent nations, that the Christian ideal of "peace on earth and good-will among men" is possible. Indeed, does not the word "internationalism" itself presuppose the coexistence of the different national groups as independent nations?

Starting from such a premise the Kuomintang Party laid down in its program that in future relations with the world China shall always be guided by the principle of justice and equality. She shall refrain from any policy of aggressive nationalism. She shall help to nationalize the world by giving assistance to the weaker national groups in their attempts to establish independent governments of their own. Lastly, when the whole world is ready she shall cooperate with the others to form a federation of nations, a federation in which all states are equal in practice as well as in theory.

The Permanent Mandates Commission

THE Netherlands representative to the League of Nations Council made the following report, at the recent Council session in Geneva, on the question of the hearing in special cases of petitioners by the Permanent Mandates Commission.

The report of the Permanent Mandates Commission on the work of its ninth session contained the following paragraph concerning the question of the hearing of petitioners by the commission in certain cases:

> The commission has again carefully considered the procedure in force with regard to petitions. Experience having shown that sometimes the commission has been unable to form a definite opinion as to whether certain petitions are well founded or not, the commission is of the opinion that in these cases it might appear indispensable to allow the petitioners to be heard by it. The commission would not, however, desire to formulate a definite recommendation on this subject before being informed of the views of the Council.

As will be seen from the minutes of its ninth session, the Permanent Mandates Commission was fully alive to the difficulties which might arise in connection with the hearing of petitioners, even in exceptional cases.

Its reason for desiring, nevertheless, to learn the opinion of the Council on this question was that, having been instructed to receive petitions and, when necessary, to report on them to the Council, it felt that in certain cases it could not fully discharge this duty without granting the petitioners a hearing.

The Council has, therefore, to express its opinion on this point.

The question was considered by the Council at its meetings on September 3 and 4, 1926. Objections were raised to the adoption of a procedure such as that mentioned by the commission, and the Council finally decided to invite observations from the mandatory Powers before adopting any decision on the subject. The question was also discussed by the Sixth Committee of the Assembly at its meeting on September 21, 1926, and by the Assembly at its plenary meeting on September 25, 1926.

As the views of some of the mandatory Powers were not received until just before the beginning of the Council's session in December last, it was decided to postpone the matter until the present meeting.

In their replies to the Council the mandatory Powers all oppose the hearing of petitioners. They point out that with such a procedure—which would involve the hearing, at the same time, of a representative of the mandatory Power—the parties would, in fact, be engaged in a controversy before the commission; and they urge that any procedure which would seem to transform the commission into a court of law would be inconsistent with the very nature of the mandatory system; that it would weaken the authority which the mandatory should possess in order to carry out its duties successfully, and that it might lend itself to intrigues on the part of those who are more desirous of promoting disorder than of remedying defects.

The replies further point out that the right of petition is governed by regulations in various countries, and that, even in those which are endowed with the most liberal constitutions, petitioners are not, as a rule, entitled to a hearing by the competent authorities.

I think that my colleagues will recognize the justice of many of the objections which the mandatory Powers have urged in their replies. The procedure for handling petitions was instituted by the Council in order that the commission might thereby have further means of securing information on conditions in the mandated territories, and might so be enabled even more satisfactorily to perform the duty intrusted to it under the provisions of the Covenant of advising the Council on all matters relating to the observance of mandates. It is important that the commission should have at its disposal all proper means for obtaining such information. It would not, however, be desirable to seek to attain this object by means which might alter the very character of the commission. This commission, as has been very justly observed, does not and must not possess the character of a court of justice when dealing with disputes between private petitioners and the mandatory Powers. Should the commission desire further information on any particular points in connection with a petition, it could always apply to the mandatory Power, which would certainly not fail to accede to its request. If in any particular case the circumstances should show that it was impossible for all the necessary information to be secured in this way, the Council could, as the Belgian Government has indicated in its reply, decide on such exceptional procedure as might seem appropriate and necessary in the particular circumstances. The close and successful cooperation which has fortunately existed up to the present moment between the commission and the mandatory Powers is the best guaranty that such cases would be entirely exceptional, and there appears to be no occasion to insert any general rules to govern such cases in regulations concerning petitions.

I have, therefore, the honor to propose the following resolution:

> The Council,
> Having taken note of the replies of the mandatory Powers in regard to the hearing of petitioners by the Permanent Mandates Commission in certain cases, is of the opinion that there is no occasion to modify the procedure which has hitherto been followed by the commission in regard to this question.
> The Secretary General is directed to transmit copies of the present resolution, of the report of the Netherlands representative, and of the replies of the mandatory Powers to the Permanent Mandates Commission.

AS WE GO TO PRESS the news comes that the Die-Hards in the British Cabinet have pushed the Prime Minister into a complete break with Russia. It is another proof how easily Mr. Baldwin can be molded by the stronger personalities near him. The decision now taken is momentous, fraught with danger for the whole world. So far as checking the Soviets is concerned we are entirely of Ramsay MacDonald's opinion that it will "strengthen the revolutionary elements in the world and leave the field free for their agents to go on with their work untrammeled." We do not agree with him when he says that it will make the world laugh at England. For us the move is too tragic. England, with her huge unemployment, torn by the clash of internal policies, so in need of all the foreign trade that she can get, now to turn over her Russian business to America or to Germany! We cannot believe that this action will commend itself to sound business opinion in Great Britain. Indeed, outside of the Die-Hard group, even the conservative press is half-hearted. We do not deny that there has been provocation, nor would we defend the folly and the stupidity of the Soviets, who ought beyond all else to be winning the good-will of the world instead of working against other governments. But the time had not come for a break.

CHINA SEEMS TO BE ENGAGED in proving that she is not yet ripe for civilian government, and the Powers in proving that they do not want her to be. Out of the mysterious fog which always surrounds civil war in China emerge two clear facts: that the Hankow Government, misnamed "Bolshevik," is not able to control its generals and armies; and that the Powers would rather subsidize any bandit chieftain than a group of civilians who show capacity to get along without any alien aid. The forty-odd warships assembled at Hankow with their guns trained upon the headquarters of Eugene Chen's Government have not helped it to organize order out of chaos. Meanwhile, with the disintegration of the Nationalist movement, China is lapsing into the kind of free-for-all which has marked her recent history. A score of ambitious generals are all striving to reap the rewards of chaos; but it is not clear that any of them has the ability or the principle to do much more than maintain himself in local power. Underneath the apparent disintegration, however, the same forces are at work which created the Nationalist movement. All the militarists now proclaim its principles, and the splendid spirit which the Chinese people have shown throughout her troubles will yet triumph over the mess created by her militarists.

NEXT DECEMBER flood waters will again be rising in the Mississippi. By that time, presumably, the present devastating flood will have receded and something resembling normal conditions will prevail in the ruined area. There will still be many thousands bankrupt, many crops ungathered, and new homes built with government or private funds will still have to be paid for. Yet opposition to the calling at once by President Coolidge of a special session of Congress is strong even in Louisiana. Let the matter be taken up in due course—that is, November—is the cry; and the floods begin to come down a month later! It seems obvious that the time to act is now. Now funds are needed—urgently, immediately; the months between today and the approach of the inevitable next flood are barely long enough to consider the matter from a scientific and non-political point of view. Congress, if it were in session today, could without delay appropriate funds for relief and take the business of rehabilitation out of private hands. It could, in addition, pass the bill introduced last winter by Representative O'Connor of Louisiana calling for the appointment of a commission to investigate flood conditions and advise as to procedure. A body of engineers appointed now, with power to coordinate the government departments dealing with flood control which are hopelessly at variance, would have six months to study the situation and make a report. There need be no "playing politics."

THE MEASURE OF CALVIN COOLIDGE may again be taken by his latest action with regard to his conferences with newspapermen. He has now ruled not only that newspapermen may not state what questions have been submitted to him, but that they may not state what questions he has refused to answer. By this petty but arbitrary act he is seeking to prevent its becoming known that he has been asked and refused to answer whether he signed a statement in 1912 protesting against a third term for Theodore Roosevelt. That he has for weeks dodged the question sent to him by the editor of the Forum as to whether he will or will not be a candidate for a third term is well known. He cannot punish the editor of the Forum, but he can hold over the Washington correspondents the threat of their exclusion from the White House. As that might mean in some cases the loss of their jobs, the result is quite obvious. We do not recall any previous President who laid down the doctrine that the press must not criticize his policies in foreign affairs on pain of being called unpatriotic and then undertook to regulate what the press men should say in his august presence and should write after leaving it.

WE ARE REMINDED by Senator Walsh of Montana of the importance of being Andrew W. Mellon and of the priceless advantage it is to the Aluminum Company of America to have its controlling stockholder at the head of the Treasury Department, just across a little strip of grass from the White House. In the issue of the New South for May Senator Walsh recalls that as far back as 1912 Mr. Mellon's company, which has a monopoly in the production of crude aluminum in America, was adjudged to have violated the anti-trust laws by the United States District Court of western Pennsylvania. A decree was entered directing it to cease various practices in restraint of trade. But when in October, 1924, the Federal Trade Commission, after two years of inquiry, reported on the high price of house-furnishing goods nearly half of the report had to be devoted to detailing violations of the court decree of 1912 on the part of the Aluminum Company of America. The Department of Justice was advised of the findings and Attorney General Stone replied, acknowledging that there was evidence either that the company was indifferent to the decree or was intentionally violating it. But the letter was sent only after a delay of several months.

THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, says Senator Walsh, assigned to the inquiry a man who was neither a lawyer nor an economist. He took some notes from the evidence of the Federal Trade Commission, went into "the field" for further facts, and after an inquiry pursued with "amazing leisureliness" reported that he had discovered no substantial complaint of the methods of Mr. Mellon's company. No further information came from the department in regard to the case until September, 1925, when a group of newspaper correspondents asked Mr. Stone's successor about it. "He told them he had never heard of the affair!" In January, 1926, the Senate directed its Judiciary Committee to inquire whether due expedition had been shown in the investigation; the report was in the negative. Meanwhile a Detroit manufacturer had appealed to the Federal Trade Commission. It assigned a lawyer to investigate and, contrary to the findings of the man from the Department of Justice, he reported that complaint was "very general." The Senate was asked to make an investigation of its own, but declined to do so by a close vote, 36 to 33. The proceeding still drags on in the Department of Justice, delayed by ingenious counsel and growing ever more pointless because of the statute of limitations. In the circumstances one might expect that Mr. Mellon would demand immediate action and that the President would take the case outside of his official family for inquiry and, if necessary, prosecution. But as Senator Walsh says the "purpose is to shield Mr. Mellon."

LAST FALL THE NEW YORK CITY Board of Education refused to allow the American Civil Liberties Union to hold a meeting in one of the public schools on the subject of Old-Fashioned Free Speech. Officially, at least, neither the subject nor the announced speakers—John Haynes Holmes, James Weldon Johnson, Nevin Sayre, Norman Thomas—was the cause of the ruling. Objection was made to the Civil Liberties Union itself; it was branded by the board as "un-American, untruthful, and immoral." On an appeal to Albany, the action of the board was sustained by Commissioner of Education Graves—but on different grounds. The Civil Liberties Union was not objected to by the commissioner, but the subject was; no controversial subjects could be discussed in public-school buildings, he held. Both rulings are in process of being tested by the indomitable Civil Liberties Union. Already, on a new application, it has received permission from the Board of Education for a meeting in a school to discuss the Growth of New York City since 1900—a subject apparently considered free from dynamite, especially since it is to be handled by such worthy citizens as Charles C. Burlingham, the distinguished lawyer and former president of the board; Nelson S. Spencer, former president of the City Club; Congressman La Guardia, Professor John Dewey, and Dean Lathrop, assistant to Bishop Manning. By granting this application, the board appears to have reversed itself on the question of the Civil Liberties Union's morals and Americanism. The fact is, an organization is dangerous only so long as it is represented by persons whom the authorities dislike. In this business no principles can be applied, no lines can be drawn. We congratulate the Civil Liberties Union on its success in showing up the hypocrisy of censors.

WE HAVE PUBLISHED or commented on the various decrees by which Mussolini has muzzled the press. These, however, can give no idea of the methods actually in operation, because orders from Mussolini are given to the editors by the prefects over the telephone, with strict instructions that no notes whatever shall be made of them. But some of these orders reached the European socialist press and were reprinted in the Milwaukee Leader. We quote a few:

> August 5, 1926. It is forbidden to refer in any way to the interview which the Indian poet Tagore gave to a reporter of the Vienna Neue Freie Presse, in which he denies the Fascist report that he is an admirer of Mussolini.
> August 25, 1926. It is ordered not to say anything about a manifesto of London intellectuals which demands the abolition of forced enlistments.
> August 30, 1926. Suppress all mention of the purchase of war materials in Italy by foreign governments.
> September 23, 1926. Don't publish the final plea of the attorney general in the process dealing with the murder of the Fascist Luporini and the Anti-Fascist Nenniolini in Florence. Cut every word referring to the economic, financial, and political penetration of Albania by Italy. (It was emphasized that these orders came direct from Mussolini.)
> October 13, 1926. Nothing must be said about the thefts committed by Italian soldiers in the hotels of Meran, South Tyrol.
> February 25, 1927. The prefect forbids any mention of the departure of Under Secretary of State Grandi to San Remo for the purpose of meeting the German Foreign Minister Stresemann.

A BEAUTIFUL "VOLUNTARY COOPERATION" between capital and labor having been announced in the recent Italian Labor Contract, published in The Nation of May 18, the all-powerful Italian state has proceeded to get down to business by demanding that workers in all branches of production accept a 10 per cent cut in wages. This is for the sake of "improved national economy," and is to be accompanied by a corresponding reduction by employers in the cost of production. It is curious, in these happy arrangements between employer and employed, that the worker's contribution to the needs of the state is always sharply defined—10 per cent or 15 per cent—while employers are left to their own discretion in the amount of loss they will take. It leaves one wondering just where, for the workers, the "voluntary" aspect of the situation comes in. Perhaps Signor Mussolini visualizes each Italian workman saying, soberly but with a sort of noble joy, to his devoted wife: "Of course we shall suffer hardship; of course we did not get quite enough to eat before, and now we shall get less. But it is for the state. Let that be our reward." This may be a true picture. If it is not, Mussolini has driven another nail into the receptacle for his political corpse. The lira is going up; wages are going down. Perhaps prices will go down also, but the Government admits they are not keeping up with wages. Italy must some time stop borrowing from Peter to pay Paul.

SAM BERNARD, known to several generations of theatergoers, died suddenly at sea on the evening of May 17. Seen in a play here during the present season, he had been on the stage for fifty years, and like many great comedians he had risen gradually from the humblest ranks of his calling to a position of real eminence. Born in England, he made his debut as an entertainer in a Coney Island beergarden and then, after becoming one of the chief comedians at the old Weber and Fields Music Hall, he passed on to the legitimate stage, where he became famous for his interpretations, touched with wistfulness, of German and Jewish characters. It is said that he was exclusively an interpreter and that he was responsible for none of the lines which he spoke, but for most of those who saw him it was hard to believe that the humor did not proceed from his own soul, for he stamped whatever he did with the impress of his personality. He will be remembered not for any particular role which he played, but because he was recognizable as his own amusing self behind whatever mask he happened to be, for the moment, wearing.

FEELING RAN HIGH in the University of Madrid when the philosophical faculty proposed on May 17 to confer an honorary degree on King Alfonso in celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of his reign. The nomination was declared to be unwarranted and inopportune, and after a lively debate a memorial was signed by fourteen of the leading professors. It was charged that the king had failed conscientiously to perform his constitutional duties. His complicity in the persecution of men like Miguel Unamuno and Francisco Ferrer, the famous teacher, was bitterly denounced. The execution of Ferrer in 1909 aroused world-wide indignation, and the retirement of Unamuno from his post as professor of Greek at the University of Salamanca because of his criticism of the Dictator, De Rivera, has now borne its fruit. The opposition to the King's degree was that of courageous intellectuals free from party prejudice. Most of them had no strong political leanings, and those who did ranged from Julian Bestiero, professor of logic, representative of the Spanish Socialist Party in the Socialist International, to Professor Bullon, a noted Conservative. Of one hundred professors privileged to vote on granting the degree, sixteen voted No, and sixty refrained from voting.

GOOD EDITORS OF OLD BOOKS, it would seem, are as scarce as good authors of new ones. Professor Ernest Bernbaum in a recent issue of Modern Language Notes has administered a rebuke to slovenly editorial workers in the field of old fiction, which field, according to Professor Bernbaum, has in the past two years yielded 88 reprints of prose narratives dating from the beginnings to 1800. That there have been so many volumes of the sort argues a commendable enterprise on the part of the publishers, and Professor Bernbaum admits as much. His quarrel is with editors who do not know all that a scholar can know about the books they are sponsoring, who sometimes fake their learning, and who read proof badly or not at all. Positive error or deliberate dishonesty is certainly not to be condoned in editors of any kind. But we find Professor Bernbaum unnecessarily nervous concerning the scholarship of "literati" like Van Wyck Brooks, Richard Aldington, and John Macy who write introductions for volumes in The Broadway Translations, The Blue Jade Library, The Rogue's Bookshelf, and similar series. The sensible question is whether scholarship of Professor Bernbaum's sort is needed in essays commending famous works of early fiction. Since a popular audience is aimed at now as then, why should not the editors for this audience be interesting and imaginative men? We think they should be, and suspect that many Ph.D.'s would be otherwise.

A DESERVED TRIBUTE has been paid to President Neilson of Smith College by the establishment in that institution of the William A. Neilson Chair of Research. It is intended both as a tribute to President Neilson's interests in scholarship and as a personal appreciation of a man, beloved by all who know him, on the occasion of his tenth anniversary as president of this college. Mr. Neilson has long since taken front rank among the university presidents of the East, and is one of the two or three outstanding university figures whose work is being carefully watched by the entire college world. To the new chair there has been appointed, for a five-year period, Professor Kurt Koffka of the University of Giessen; he will establish next fall, with the aid of a group of assistants, a research laboratory in experimental and educational psychology. This is the first research chair to be established in a woman's college, but it is safe to say that the results of the experiment will be of great value to all colleges. Indeed, it is in line with the plan outlined by Charles R. Mann, director of the American Council of Education, at a recent meeting of the Association of American Colleges, for the establishment of a committee to stimulate research in colleges, which have too often left this to the universities. Teaching without scholarship and research is usually barren; the worth-while teacher must always advance in his field of knowledge. The difficulty has, of course, been lack of means in the colleges as contrasted with the universities, so that research has too often been a luxury. The William A. Neilson professorship shows what can be done when faculty, alumnae, and the friends of the institution determine to find the way.

The Tariff Specter Will Not Be Denied

EVERY day the tariff specter, a veritable Banquo's ghost, arises to haunt the protectionists. Outwardly they insist that nothing is wrong with the system, that only a few cranks are opposed to it, that it has come to stay, and that America cannot do without it. But secretly they are quarreling among themselves and are as little content with their partnership with the Government as are some of those who oppose their receiving special privileges denied to others. Abroad, at every turn the tariff pops up. Is it a question of the international debt settlements? The American tariff comes up at once. Does one discuss the rising tide of ill-will against us all over the world? Then the tariff cannot be hidden. It is the skeleton in the closet. When tariff increases are proposed, as recently in France and Germany, the explanation is that it is to oppose the American tariff. The official spies of the United States are in Europe, 365 days of the year, peering into the costs of production of every industrial country—a procedure no American manufacturer would tolerate for a moment in the United States, much less the American Government. At every point at which the tariff touches the life of other countries it fosters bitterness and hatred toward us.

To be concrete, let us refer to the two economic conferences which have just been attracting world-wide attention. The Third Pan-American Conference, which adjourned in Washington on May 5, unanimously resolved that a committee of business men should be formed at once to bring about the gradual reduction of high customs duties wherever found. The resolution was general, but it originated with the Argentine delegation, with whose country the United States has been having a trade dispute as to frozen meat which resulted in something of an economic boycott. Secretary Hoover told the delegates that tariff policies were of secondary importance, but that did not keep the question from coming up during the conference in one form or another. It was only Luis Duhan of Argentina, however, who dared to express explicitly his opposition to the barriers erected by the United States to prevent the free exchange of goods with the countries which Uncle Sam insists upon treating as minors, orphans, and his special proteges.

As for the Economic Conference at Geneva under the auspices of the League of Nations, the New York Times reported on May 6 that "the formation of an economic United States of Europe to be directed against Anglo-American commercial domination became more clearly the definite object of the International Economic Conference today." Such a move has long been forecast; it is the inevitable result of our tariff barriers, quite aside from any question of "commercial domination." This is the first time, however, that its approach has been so clearly recognized. It is needless to say that the American tariff bobbed up repeatedly. All the delegates, the reports run, "are agreed that the present tariff walls have produced an abnormal situation which is dangerous to European prosperity." One of the British delegates, Walter Layton, asked early in the proceedings the unanswerable question: "Just what attitude does the United States intend to preserve toward European industry and commerce during the next decade?"—unanswerable now because the answer will be given sometime hence by the American manufacturers who subsidize the Republican Party and tell it what schedules to write into the law of the land.

Our governmental tariff-spying system came up for discussion. At first it seemed as if the American delegates themselves would refuse to support this indefensible practice—as every man of principle ought to. Then evidently they changed their minds and decided to defend their Government. Switzerland and Sweden, two countries which refused to permit the American spies to examine the books of their respective manufacturers, led the way for an explicit condemnation of this practice. There was no difficulty in rousing feeling against the United States; it is a simple fact that its agents have gone to the European manufacturers and obtained access to their books on the pretense that if they were allowed to study them there might be a change of the tariff in favor of the particular manufacturers approached. The revealing of their trade secrets was then rewarded by further discrimination against them.

The truth is that if this Economic Conference is to be of any value whatever it must sooner or later grapple with the tariff problem. As long as tariff barriers exist between members of the League of Nations that League becomes more or less of a joke. That has been clearly pointed out in the admirable memorandum addressed to the Conference in Geneva by the International Union for Land-Value Taxation and Free Trade. "The very existence of a tariff or other artificial obstacles to trade is an implicit betrayal," the Union correctly asserts, "of the spirit of the League of Nations." Well, our protectionists will reply, what of it? We are not members of the League. To this the answer is precisely that foreshadowed in the Times dispatch we have quoted above. There must be a league against the United States for offense and defense if we persist in our attitude. There is no other way out for Europe. Indeed, at the very moment that this Economic Conference was going on the French Minister of Commerce, Bokanowski, insisted that next month the Chamber of Deputies must vote the new and higher French protective tariff which he is demanding largely in order to protect France against the United States. He insists that the tariff must be raised for bargaining purposes as well as for protection, and he added significantly enough on May 13: "The day when the Powers decide for free trade France will answer present to the roll call. . . ."

Meanwhile, here at home we hear that the Tariff Commission will be actively at work on July 1, when it will again be in funds. It is reported both that it is being overwhelmed with complaints that the tariff is not high enough in many cases, and that the Coolidge Administration has been sounding out certain industries with a view to seeing whether they could not be induced to accept decreases. Meanwhile, the Democrats are beginning to stir, and, Republican though he is, Senator Howell of Nebraska has joined them in suggesting a gradual reduction of rates. So the tariff family is not and never can be happy. This is proved by a statement given out by that high priest of protection, Wilbur F. Wakeman, the genius of the American Protective Tariff League, which reads as follows: "I am an admirer of President Coolidge but do not like the timidity and procrastination which prevails in the administration of our custom tariff laws"!

Britain's Blow at Labor

IT is officially called the Trade Unions and Trade Disputes Bill. In the Labor Party it has been dubbed the Blacklegs' Charter. It is not so much a piece of legislation as a punishment—the "sanction" levied upon organized labor in Great Britain for its defeat in the general strike of a year ago. The purpose of Premier Baldwin and his Conservative majority in forcing it through Parliament is to weaken organized labor industrially and, if possible, to wreck it politically. They are deliberately playing politics with it under pretense of safeguarding the realm. Moreover, it must be read in connection with the raid upon Arcos House, the office of the Russian Cooperative Societies in London. A year from next fall the life of this Parliament expires. Is there another Conservative victory in the Soviet issue and the "Blacklegs' Charter"?

But even within Mr. Baldwin's party there is some doubt that the bill will accomplish its objects and a good deal of uneasiness exists among employers lest the bad feeling created have a disastrous effect upon the country's already depressed industry. Comment in recent numbers of the English weeklies shows that second thought on the bill suggests many unpleasant possibilities in it. Although the Government is so committed to the legislation that it will probably pay little attention to the maturer judgment even of its own sympathizers, it is none the less significant that a journal like the Spectator questions "whether more will not be lost in the public interest than can be gained by the bill." While agreeing with the intention of the legislation the Spectator doubts if it will, as intended, clarify the law in regard to the rights of trade unions. It thinks, on the contrary, that the language is vague and likely to keep the courts busy interpreting it. Moreover, "A bitter and prolonged dispute seems to lie ahead, and this is much to be regretted at a time when there was a reasonable prospect of industrial peace. Nothing can compare in importance with peace in industry just when our feet are set on the road back to prosperity." The Spectator says further:

> We have frequently expressed the wish that if there was to be fresh trade-union legislation it should be carried out as far as possible by agreement with the trade unions. Those who suffer most from defective or tyrannical trade-union laws are certainly the trade unionists themselves, who have not the ability or the nerve to throw off their fetters. Of course, Labor might have flatly refused an invitation to discuss the matter. In that case the Government would have been in a very much stronger position than now.

We discussed editorially in our issue of March 16 various bulwarks of British labor which the forthcoming legislation purposes to destroy and in the number of May 4 printed the bill in full. It is necessary here, therefore, only to remind our readers that the bill seeks to make unlawful any general strike or any compulsion upon the government; it aims to cripple the treasury of the Labor Party by making the political contributions of a trade-union member an individual affirmative act in place of the present system whereby such contributions are automatic unless the individual specifies to the contrary; it limits greatly the activities of civil servants; and it restricts drastically the present rights in regard to picketing and peaceful persuasion. Picketing and persuasion are to be unlawful if they lead to "an apprehension of boycott, or loss of any kind, or of exposure to hatred, ridicule, or contempt." This language is so broad as to lead the London Nation to paraphrase the Shakespearean dialogue:

> Blackleg: Do you bite your thumb at us, sir?
> 1st Picket (aside to 2nd Picket): Is the law on our side, if I say aye?
> 2nd Picket: No. [It would cause apprehension of exposure to contempt or ridicule.]
> 1st Picket: No, sir, I do not bite my thumb at you, sir; but I bite my thumb, sir.

Whole-hearted support for the Government's bill seems to come mostly from the die-hard Conservatives who want to cripple trade unionism at any cost and from the left-wing labor forces which believe the legislation will hasten what they regard as the inevitable class struggle. Such weekly journals of progressive opinion as the New Statesman and the London Nation naturally oppose the legislation although they foresee different results from it. The New Statesman regrets the bill as an inequitable gesture, but thinks it will be unenforceable and unenforced, with "no appreciable effect upon the actual position and activities and powers of the trade unions."

> Sane Labor opinion on the bill hardly knows whether to scold or to laugh. So much of it can obviously never be enforced. How, for example, are the provisions against picketing to be enforced in a mining village? Is the whole village to be sent to prison? The legalization of picketing was a very valuable right when it was first granted to the trade unions, but nowadays non-union blacklegs are in most industries so few that it really would not matter very much to the unions if picketing were abolished altogether. It would not, that is to say, appreciably affect the success or failure of any ordinary strike.

The London Nation, on the other hand, takes "the gravest view of the probable consequences of this bill," calling it "the most wanton contribution to social discord that any Government has made in modern times." To this opinion we strongly incline.

The Movies and Their Czar

THE power which Will Hays exercises over the movies is extensive and arbitrary. The chief producing companies submit themselves to this control, and those who would like to know in what interest it is wielded would do well to consider the case of the melodrama "Spread Eagle." Not even the most prudish could possibly consider the play objectionable to decency. Sex, except in the form of a sentimental and wholly subsidiary love story, does not enter into it, and its language is pure. Yet "Spread Eagle," so its producers say, has been banned from the movies and banned for no reason except that its tone is not conventionally patriotic.

Its fable is concerned with a war with Mexico, and by implication it charges exactly what has been charged in countless magazine articles, namely, that oil and other interests operate to bring about American intervention. But Mr. Hays, it seems, does not approve of such ideas. Perhaps they may tend to cast some reflection upon the Harding Administration, of which he was a part; perhaps he merely sympathizes with those veterans' organizations which have successfully protested against the plan to broadcast excerpts from the play over the radio. But whatever his reasons may be, Mr. Hays's word goes. "Spread Eagle" will not appear in the movies and the country will be protected from "dangerous" ideas.

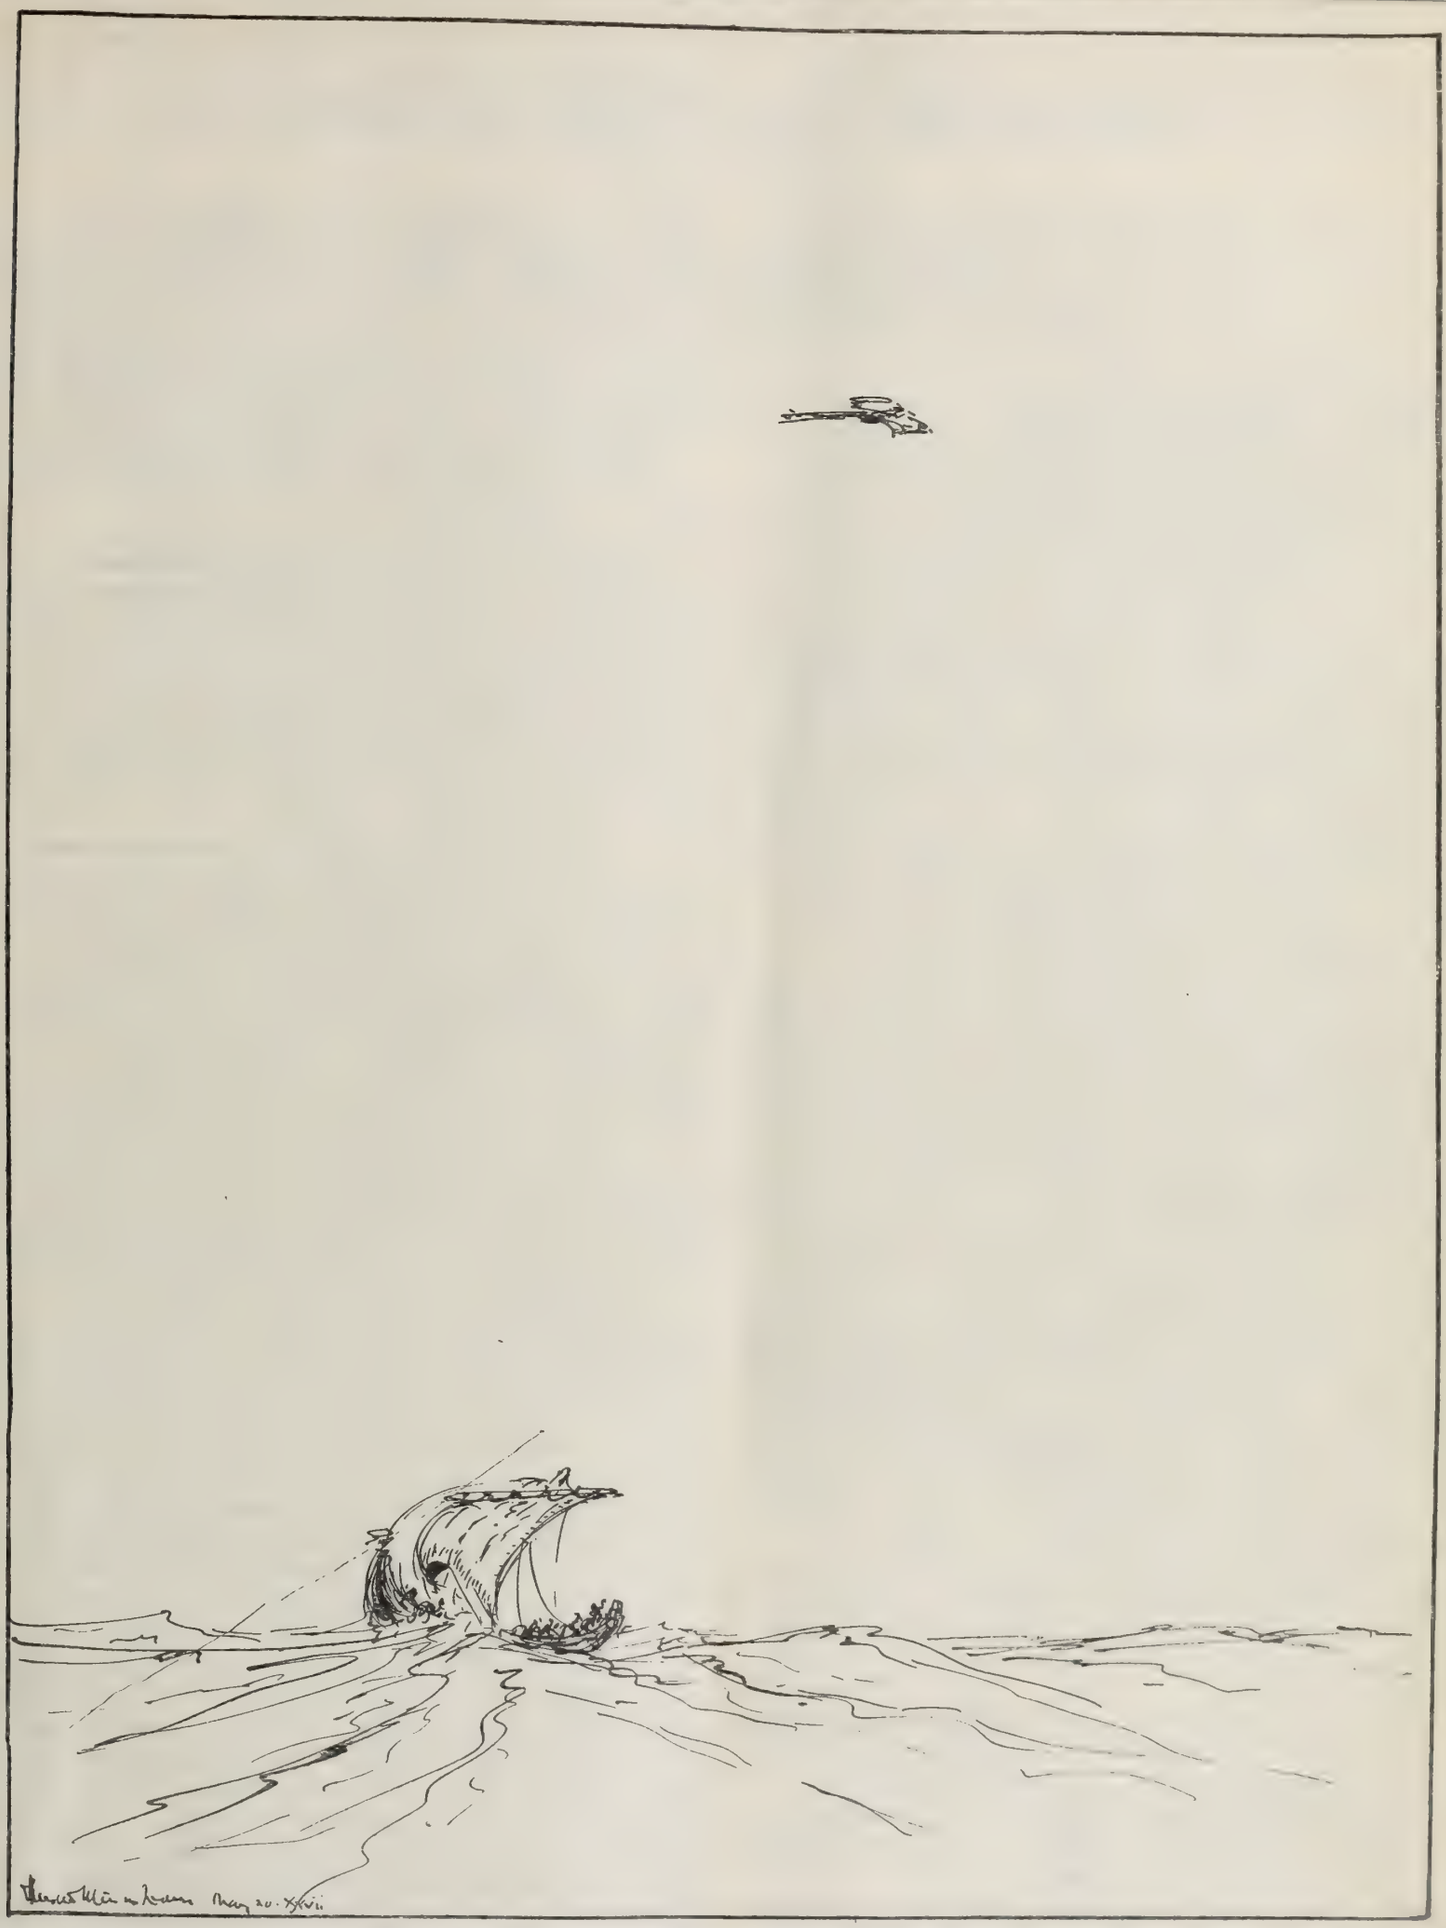
This is the serious charge which the producers of "Spread Eagle" make. That Mr. Hays's office, established and defended on the ground that it afforded a necessary safeguard against indecency, should be used to reduce the movies to a state of spineless orthodoxy is indefensible. More than that, it is positively dangerous. The movies are, so we are constantly informed, one of the most powerful instruments of popular education; as such, no democracy can afford to allow them to be controlled in the interest of any particular propaganda. Yet serious as the charge is, Mr. Hays's office will not deign to answer it. Not only is the power of that office arbitrary but its acts are secret as well. No one knows officially whether or not "Spread Eagle" was banned, and no one ever will know. That Mr. Hays is called a "czar" is not the result merely of the picturesqueness of common speech, for he is a czar in fact and he wields his power czaristically.

In this particular case we have made every effort, both by letter and by word of mouth, to secure information from Mr. Hays's office, but that information has been categorically denied us. We have, in its place, been given an abundance of generalities. The office, we hear, considers plays and stories submitted to it purely from the standpoint of their "availability as movie material," and it has been admitted that the activity thus innocently described includes an examination to make sure that there is nothing in any story which would prove offensive to the prejudices of any considerable group of persons anywhere in Europe or America. We have even been told that writers engaged in creating works which they hope to have used in the movies are in the habit of calling the office on the telephone in order to learn whether or not some particular situation or idea is "available"; but concerning no specific case will any information be given us. If "Spread Eagle" was submitted and if it was banned, then it was banned because "it was not available as motion-picture material."

Such arbitrary and secret dealing cannot be defended on the ground that Mr. Hays's office is concerned merely with the private business affairs of a group of private corporations. The movies, like the press, are a proper subject for public concern. Indeed, no one doubts that Mr. Hays was appointed to his position for the very reason that, having been a public man, he would give to the office over which he presides the air of representing the people; under these circumstances, it is imperative that those whom he represents should know what action he takes. Writing recently in the Review of Reviews, Mr. Hays himself said: "Had the motion picture been known when the Constitution was written, there is not the slightest doubt that it, too, would have been accorded those inalienable rights which Americans jealously safeguard, for motion pictures are but visualized speech and thought." He spoke, also, of that fact that "to release the product of one's brain only after it has been strained through the sieve of a censor and has received his imprimatur is a discouragement and an affront to conscious men." These are well-sounding words, but what of the spirit behind them? If Mr. Hays banned "Spread Eagle" merely because its authors believe it not impossible that a capitalist might succeed in provoking war with Mexico then Mr. Hays has been guilty of an outrageous abuse of power. If he did not, he owes the public a denial.

Skoal! Charles Lindbergh, Skoal!

"Speak! speak! thou fearless boy!
Who, to our breathless joy,
Hast with thy wingéd toy
Tamed the Atlantic!
Wrapt not in eagle-down,
But with your harness on,
You flew where none had flown,
And we are frantic."



Then from those Northern eyes
Laughter began to rise,
Thinking of sleety skies
Passed now forever,
And of the water's flow
Under the ice and snow,
As he resolved to go Back to land never.

"I am no Viking old!
My deeds are young and bold;
We came through all that cold—
I and my engine.
Before you have toasted me,
Hailing my victory,
Let those nine pistons be Honored with mention.

"Over Long Island Sound,
By the Grand Bank around,
We left the solid ground
Darkened behind us.
Then fell the evening—
Frozen and evil thing—
With only the compass ring
There to remind us.

"Sleep there was none now;
I and my swift prow
Sped as we wondered how
Broad was the ocean.
Rising ten thousand feet—
Still came the angry sleet!
Ah! then the early, sweet
Morning in motion.

"All day I felt the pull
Of the steel miracle. . . .
Ireland was beautiful,
Then France was near us."
Now from the flowing bowl
Spoke forth a nation's soul:
"Skoal! Charles Lindbergh, skoal!
New York to Paris!"

The Return Visit

1000–1927

Deception According to Law

By MORRIS L. ERNST

[The challenging issue raised by Mr. Ernst in the following article was submitted for comment to a list of distinguished lawyers, including Emory R. Buckner, Samuel Untermyer, George Gordon Battle, Julius Henry Cohen, Max D. Steuer, James N. Rosenberg, and others. Their opinions will appear next week.]

IN the storm of protest and counter-protest that has centered about the Sacco-Vanzetti case a startling obiter dictum of the Massachusetts Supreme Court has gone almost unnoticed. The attorney who prosecuted Sacco and Vanzetti suppressed information and evidence in his possession tending to affirm the innocence of the defendants. It may or may not have been conclusive; I do not wish to cloud the problem of legal ethics by analyzing the kind or amount of such evidence in this case. The fact stands unchallenged that the prosecutor had evidence in favor of the defendants and suppressed it. The jury never heard of it, and when the defendants' attorneys objected to this suppression the highest court of Massachusetts declared: "A prosecuting officer is violating no canon of legal ethics in presenting evidence which tends to show guilt while failing to call witnesses in whom he has no confidence, or whose testimony contradicts what he is trying to prove."

This seems to me a shocking admission.

Obviously, the prosecutor cannot be required to call every possible person who has testimony to offer. He should, for instance, have the right to refuse to call an inmate of an insane asylum who has been excited by the tabloids and wants to testify as to imaginary happenings. Yet one might well ask in passing for a definition of the word "confidence." Did the court refer to a "confidence" that the witness would help get a conviction, or "confidence" in his veracity and reliability?

More important, however, is the question: What ethical principle justifies a prosecutor in failing to call a witness whose testimony might defeat the plea for conviction?

There can be no doubt that such is the rule of the game called "law." The decisions so hold. Yet this reasoning seems to me clearly unethical, in violation of canons of legal ethics and even of the oath administered to lawyers in many States. The American Bar Association, at its thirty-fifth annual meeting in 1908, adopted a canon of Professional Ethics. Rule 5 reads in part as follows:

> The primary duty of a lawyer engaged in public prosecution is not to convict but to see that justice is done.
> The suppression of facts or the secreting of witnesses capable of establishing the innocence of the accused is highly reprehensible.

A common form for the oath of admission to practice reads in part: "I will never seek to mislead the judge or jury by any artifice or false statement of fact or law."

How can a prosecutor maintain that he is not seeking to mislead if, knowing of evidence of innocence, he does not bring it before the judge and jury?

Let us take one or two examples. The district attorney in a murder case interviews four witnesses, all of whom appear honest and reputable. He has "confidence" in them; they are the kind of men whose testimony might be contradicted but not impeached. The testimony of three tends to prove innocence, of the fourth to prove guilt. Under Canon 5 the prosecutor should seek justice rather than conviction. Instead, he puts the fourth man on the witness-stand, and tells the other three to leave the State for the time or to keep out of sight. The defense fails to locate the three friendly witnesses, the defendant is convicted, the judge pronounces sentence, and the defendant is hanged.

Should not the district attorney be disbarred for secreting three witnesses who would have testified to the innocence of the defendant?

Suppose, however, that the district attorney instead of secreting the witnesses merely fails to call them. Suppose the prosecutor talks with four equally reputable witnesses, all pistol experts, three of whom would testify that the defendant's pistol could not have fired the death bullet, while the fourth disagrees. Is the prosecutor who calls only the fourth seeing that "justice is done"? Has he lived up to his oath never to "seek to mislead judge or jury by any artifice or false statement of fact or law"?

Where is the ethical distinction between hanging a human being by secreting a witness and by failing to call one? To the man who is hanged the distinction is of little value.

We are still at the caveat emptor stage of justice. The merchants have gone far beyond this primitive stage of ethics of letting the "buyer beware." Once the seller was under no duty to reveal the nature of his wares. "Here, buy this gold ring," he said; "if it turns out to be brass, that's your look-out." Business has passed into the second stage. "Here's a gold ring." The buyer can sue if there is no gold in it—if the representations made are literally false. But business is now entering a third stage, in which the seller must tell the precise karat fineness of the gold in his ring. His statements must be more than merely honest in so far as they go—they must tell the whole truth.

The legal profession lags behind, in the second stage. Statutes against perjury took it out of the first stage. Prohibition of secreting witnesses and hiding testimony brought it into the second. Why not consider the possibility of requiring complete disclosure of all facts, at least in capital cases, in the hope that prosecutors will aim at justice instead of at convictions? As the game of matching wits is now played in court, the prosecutor feels no duty either to put his so-called unfriendly witnesses on the stand or to call the attention of the defense to their possible testimony.

To me it seems as if some violent biological force was driving this problem of legal ethics into the consciousness of the nation. The bar is on the defensive. Naturally, lawyers hesitate to face the issue. They are human beings, and dislike to admit that codes of ethics long adhered to need to be changed. Such an admission carries with it a kind of confession of unethical practices in the past. Change seems to imply confession of error, and confession of error is too often construed as a defeat instead of the spiritual victory it may more truly be. Truth at best is difficult to find. Most matter is controversial, and the lives of human beings often depend upon the sifting for truth. All material facts should be poured into the sieve.

Will not the bar associations fearlessly appoint committees to consider whether the court decisions are in accord with the canons of ethics, and if not which shall prevail? Possibly the committees will recommend that the bar restate its rules of ethical practice. The problem raised by the Massachusetts Supreme Court can be completely isolated from the accusations of judicial bias and unjudicial atmosphere commonly made in the Sacco-Vanzetti case. It is a challenge to the profession. Does the bar admit that convictions rather than justice should be the prosecutor's aim?

In the Blackball Mine

By ALFRED W. PAGE

[This article was submitted in The Nation's 1926 Student Worker Contest. Since its author lives in New Zealand, the article was ineligible for a prize, but is printed on account of its excellence and general interest.]

THE Blackball in which I found myself, after a day's tedious railway journey, is a township of wretched, unpainted dwellings, of ragged children, of a multitude of hotels, of smoke and of grime and of rain. To a young student, fresh from the assured security and irresponsibility of college life, even though he be fortified with money sufficient for immediate needs, looking for work is an experience as illuminating as it is uncomfortable. The absence of the mine manager caused my first two days to be days of fretting idleness. Unemployment, hitherto regarded with the philosophic complacency of one not directly affected, was glimpsed in something of its grim reality. Then with the manager's return came the joy of a job secured, of the thought of primitive, sweat-producing toil next morning.

That morning will always remain a vividly colored picture: the crowded bath-house, oozing steam and sweat and profanity; the yawning pit mouth; the lines of trucks; the whirring of machinery; the tired, patient horses; the oddly assorted throng of miners, all openly curious of the shrinking new chum painfully conscious of the betraying cleanness of his boots and dungarees, and panic-stricken in the discovery that there are certain essentials beyond old clothes with which one is expected to provide oneself. But nothing can exceed the rough good-heartedness of miners. Within a few minutes I found myself in possession of cap, lamp, tin for carbide, water-bottle. Then down into the blackness of the mine, blackness which the acetylene lamp bobbing uncomfortably on my head proved completely ineffective in piercing; bewildered, stumbling, no particle of dignity or importance left, grateful for my comrades' gruff advice:

"Better hold your lamp in your hand, sonny."

"Keep clear of that rope."

"Watch your head now, mate." The problem is to watch one's head and one's feet at the same time, a problem which seems to present no difficulties to the old-timers, but which I never succeeded in solving. As disaster followed immediately and invariably if I removed my eyes one instant from the mine floor, and only sometimes if I removed them from the roof, I finally adopted the plan of abandoning my head to its fate and concentrating all my energies on safely guiding my feet. The way was strewn with pitfalls more thickly than Christian's in his Progress; and, unfortunately, the goal it led to could scarcely be called a Celestial City. The beginner's job is trucking. He has to push the empty trucks from the main tunnel up a branch line to the men hewing the coal, and run down with the loaded ones. Afterwards, I learned how to make the job a comparatively easy one; but that first day it was as hard work as ever I wish to experience. Panting, sweating; in semi-darkness; in a hot, poisonous atmosphere; bruised and aching, as I strained to keep up with the flood of empties that the rope-road poured forth, or hung on like grim death to the loaded trucks as they rushed downwards, frantically endeavoring to prevent their crashing too heavily into the stationary ones in front. Failure meant a derailed truck, and a shamefaced appeal to my grumbling mates for help in lifting it back.

Unfortunately, much of the well-meant advice that was tendered me proved of little value owing to my inability to understand half the words used. "Why don't you sprag her, mate?" "Are you ready to jig, there?" "See you chock your skip, sonny." Not having the remotest idea what was being referred to, I was at a disadvantage in answering; but not for worlds would I have admitted my ignorance. Further to increase my troubles, almost 50 per cent of the miners at Blackball are English or Scotch immigrants whose dialects were often wholly unintelligible to me.

The stream of trucks seemed interminable, leaving me no time to marvel at the strength and endurance of the men who were filling them. Then, O the joy of it! a lull. The rope had stopped, thanks to a fall of coal somewhere on the main rope-road. Later I discovered that stoppages of the rope are by no means uncommon, that on the average probably an hour or more a day is lost through this cause; and I found that idleness, if enforced in a dark, oppressive pit, may be as wearisome as work. You condemn the incapacity of the management and the stupidity of the system under which such waste is possible; but that first hour of unexpected rest you accept with pious thankfulness as a special gift of Providence. The other truckers share, in a less degree, your satisfaction. They are paid day wages. But the feelings of the men on the coal, who work on the contract system, are very different, and are expressed in highly colored language. In regard to that language, one is struck not so much by its profanity as by its lack of originality.

The end of even the first shift in a coal mine arrives at last; the adventurous journey to the surface is accomplished; fresh air and daylight are experienced once again; and—crowning blessing of all—a steaming bath-house is waiting. Some years ago, as the result of determined and persistent agitation, the provision of baths at every mine was enforced. The reform is perhaps the greatest and the most appreciated of all the New Zealand miners have won.

Baths are certainly needed. At first, even with them, I despaired of ever getting clean. My companion was unsympathetic. "That's always the way with new chums," he explained. "When you're not used to baths, your skin's rough and holds the dirt." My pride had suffered many jolts that day; but this was the worst of all. "The great unwashed," indeed!

The novelty and adventure of the first few days do not last long. When the novice's muscles have become hardened, when he has been "put wise" to dodges for lightening work, he sinks into a state of mental torpor which accepts the lot of shoving trucks as part of a divinely ordered plan. Conditions in the Blackball mine are comparatively good. There is no fire-damp, so that naked lights are used and smoking is permitted; the seams are high, and the temperature seldom rises much above 70° F. It is not the hardness of the work, not even the wet or the heat or the bad air that makes the tragedy of a miner's life. It is the deadly monotony. For six and a half hours you labor up and down the same fifty yards of track, or shovel coal into a ceaseless succession of trucks, all in pitch darkness, save for the faint gleams shed by the lamp.

At first there are occasional moments of excitement. An ominous, rapidly approaching rumble, a frantic shout "Look out, down there!" and a runaway truck crashes down upon you out of the blackness. Soon, however, a remarkable alacrity in leaping out of the danger zone becomes a matter of instinct, and even runaways lose their power to thrill.

A trucker receives between 16 and 17 shillings a day. With deductions for medical and accident funds, union dues, and stores (carbide, etc.) this gives him less than £4 for a five-day week, even if employment is regular. But employment seldom is regular. Through various causes—strikes, lockouts, falls, glutted markets—the mines are idle for several months in the year. The hewer is a little better off, being paid an average of just over 3 shillings per ton of coal hewn; but he suffers even more than the trucker from irregularity of work. It is difficult to obtain exact figures; but probably the average earnings of the New Zealand miner are not above £150 a year—an existing wage, perhaps; certainly not a living one. And that for as hard and dangerous labor as any which society demands.

There are two outstanding lessons which work in the Blackball coal mine cannot fail to drive home. First, the colossal stupidity, and above all, the colossal waste of our present competitive system: waste of material, waste of effort, waste of capacity, waste of life. The one thing thought of is to make a profit. The production of coal for the people's needs is a secondary consideration. Consequently, the coal is got out, not in the most economical and efficient way, but by whatever method seems to produce profits most rapidly. The amount of coal lost at Blackball is appalling. It is generally conceded that not more than 30 per cent of the possible total is mined. The rest will probably never be recovered. The waste of effort is almost as striking. Primitive and makeshift methods and gear are employed just so long as they serve to produce coal with the required margin of profit. Increased comfort for the men, and even increased efficiency from improved methods, apparently carry no weight. To cite one example: The loaded trucks are hauled up to the mine mouth along the main tunnel and the empties brought down by means of an endless rope. In one particular section of the mine the working face was 200 yards from the rope-road, to which the trucks were hauled by horses. Owing to the wetness of this section, the track was soon in a terrible state, the men and the horses often sinking up to their knees in mud. Not only did this make the work very unpleasant for the men, but the horses became covered with sores. For eighteen months nothing was done. Then the condition of the horses was so bad that the drivers refused to work them longer, and "came out." That occurred at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Next morning, in time for the new shift, the management had extended the rope-road right up to the working face. Not only were conditions of work very much more agreeable, but immediately the output of coal was more than doubled without the employment of any extra men.

The second lesson is the reality of the conflict between employers and employed. To one who has been fed the comfortable university philosophy that the unrest among workers is caused by a few troublesome agitators and Bolsheviks, actual experience of the bitterness and inevitability of the class struggle comes as a startling revelation. Your sympathies are wholly with the men; yet you realize that, after all, it is not the individual on either side who is to blame; it is the system—a grasp-who-can system, grown out of the savage instinct, inherited from times when there was no possibility of enough being produced to go round, to fight tooth and nail for oneself.

The Blackball mine is obviously in a bad state of disrepair: the timbering is rotten, the rails are worn and badly laid, the ropes are constantly breaking and the roads being blocked by falls. For the sake of both safety and efficiency a thorough overhaul is essential. Yet a short time ago, when floods prevented the coal being got away, the mine was closed down and the men turned adrift. Had even a portion of them been kept on to effect repairs a large source of friction as well as of waste would have been removed; but because such a policy would have involved expenditure that did not promise a direct and immediate return in the way of profits, the criminal risk to men's lives and the little less criminal wastage of time and energy and materials continued.

There were both strikes and lockouts during my two months at Blackball, and always the causes seemed incredibly trivial.

On one occasi two men were accused by the underground manager of having left work three minutes before time, and were told that they would have to lose a day. Their comrades threatened action unless the penalty was withdrawn. A little tact on both sides was all that was required to effect a peaceful settlement; but miners are often hotheaded and far from tactful. Consequently a one-day strike resulted. The men lost £300 or £400 in wages; the owners 800 or 900 tons of coal; and nobody one whit the better off.

There was a "show" in the town, an event sufficiently rare never to fail to arouse excitement. Everyone talked of it, everyone wanted to go. The men on "back shift," who normally got away from the mine at 10 p. m., wished to leave two hours early, losing, of course, their pay for that time. The manager refused the desired permission. His attitude was logical enough. If he allowed men to stop work whenever the whim took them order would be impossible. Equally understandable was the position of the miners. When the mine was stopped for any reason—a broken rope, or full bins, or a flooded river—they were turned off as a matter of course. If they were prepared to sacrifice two hours' pay for the sake of seeing a "show," why shouldn't they be allowed to do so? Both sides were adamant. The men attended the performance, and the management locked them out the following day.

"Wet time" is a constant source of friction. Under the New Zealand Coal Mines Agreement, men in wet places shall work six, instead of eight hours bank to bank. Unfortunately the views of managers and men as to what constitutes a "wet place" tend to differ. As an instance of an extreme case, two men were sent to clean out a blocked pump. As this necessitated their working up to their necks in water they decided to strip, and work "bare buffed." Considering they were entitled to "wet time," they left when that had expired, though the job was not completed. The manager met them. "Wet time, indeed!" he stormed. "Back and finish that job, or I'll sack you."

It is inevitable that the workers should be on the lookout for opportunities to "do" their bosses, much as boys at school take pride in outwitting an unpopular master. A piece of sacking soaked in water and secreted in the timber of the roof will often serve to make a dry place appear genuinely wet to the manager's eye; a fouled bell-wire means stoppage of work until the foul is discovered; an unfastened coupling or a weakened chain may cause a glorious "smash up" which, with luck, will block the road for hours. That it will also endanger many lives is not remembered unless serious results occur.

Every day in the mine made me more firmly convinced of two things. First, no material increase of human happiness is possible until our present social system is replaced by one founded on cooperation and the incentive of service. Second, the road to such an improved ordering of society is blocked by the gulf that separates employers and employed. If the present relations between them continue, violent revolutions or attempted revolutions are inevitable; and violence has never yet proved a lasting solution of any problem.

The Teacher Goes Job-Hunting

By THOMAS MINEHAN

II

[This is the second section of Mr. Minehan's article on teachers as job-hunters. The first appeared in last week's Nation.]

DEVIOUS as are the means through which a teacher gets a job, the method of application is more devious still. To anybody who has ever sought employment in the ordinary channels of business, the amount of correspondence carried on over even a sixty-dollar-a-month job is amazing.

In order to register in any agency a teacher has to furnish a complete record of his education and experience, a recent photograph, and from three to five references to verify all of his statements. The agency will then send him notice of some vacancy. The teacher writes a letter of application, giving full information in regard to his qualifications—education, experience, degrees, certificates held, and references. In addition, he incloses a photograph of himself and copies of three or four testimonials. At the same time the agency sends the school authorities a complete record of the candidate together with copies of the references which it has received. If the school authorities are going to consider the applicant they will answer his letter by sending a blank calling for information in regard to education, experience, degrees, certificates held, and references. The teacher has already supplied all this information, the agency has answered similar inquiries, and it has supported all these statements with copies of confidential references which it has received, yet the teacher, if he wants to be considered, must supply all the information once more. This is a good time, if the teacher has two or three more testimonials, to send them, and the experienced job-hunter invariably does. Meanwhile, the school authorities write to the teacher's references. In order to play safe the teacher will, if he is wise, have some friends in the educational and business world write letters to the school authorities urging his appointment. After a few days, the school board receives answers from the references. These together with the testimonials and letters of recommendation are examined. All are satisfactory, but there is unfortunately some vital information lacking. The teacher has not presented prima facie evidence that he is a believer—a true Christian, and an active Sunday-school worker. Nor has he presented a medical certificate. More correspondence, and a letter from a minister and a doctor is forwarded to the school authorities. At last all of the facts are in. After receiving similar information from fifteen or twenty candidates, the school board meets one night and on the basis of race, political, or religious prejudice appoints the applicant whom they or the agency had decided on in the first place.

Why then did they bother about applications, references, and testimonials from a dozen individuals? Simply to convince the man who is footing the bill that he is getting his money's worth. The more work the school board can make, the more generous the secretarial and office allowance the taxpayers can be induced to provide, the more plums there will be to distribute among followers. I know of a superintendent who was able to get an assistant and a stenographer simply by showing the county board an enormous stack of letters and references on his desk, which he assured them had to be answered. Next year the assistant looked after all routine work, the stenographer answered all mail, and the superintendent spent most of his time tabulating the results of a questionnaire which he had the stenographer copy into a doctor's thesis for him, and as a result of this work he got a raise in salary and a new job.

The correspondence carried on between the applying teacher and the school board is often curious. The school authorities in almost all cases want to know about the applicant's most personal habits. Does he smoke cigarettes? Is she fond of dancing? Will she teach Sunday school and take part in B. Y. P. U. work? Will he make a good basso in the local choir? Will she fall in love with any of the town swains? Will he cast immodest glances at the knees of his flapper pupils? Will the teacher be able to put on a weekly program that will permit every pupil to appear at advantage before the fond mammas? These and a hundred other questions must be answered before the school authorities will appoint the teacher. The strongest recommendation a teacher can have for most jobs in Dixie is to be a Baptist. The strongest recommendation a teacher can have for most jobs in Minnesota is to be a Scandinavian. Many teachers are selected because they happen to be of the same nationality or religious faith as the superintendent. I have known brilliant young teachers who found it absolutely impossible to get jobs simply because they were Jews. I have known of Catholics who have been removed in order to have teachers of other religious faiths appointed. Any teacher suspected of being a radical is never retained longer than it takes the board to meet, and in some States backwoods communities do not care to consider a graduate from any of the liberal universities.

Sometimes the school authorities require other qualifications than those of a religious, moral, or academic nature. I recall a letter I received from a principal in Alabama advising me of my appointment as an instructor in his school. The letter closed with this paragraph:

> But let me tell you right now that you would not be a success at this school if you are not a fighter. If you would hesitate to toss an unruly boy out of the window or cowhide him into submission this is no place for you. That was the trouble with the last man I had. He could not fight and was always calling on me to do his fighting for him. I want a man who can do his own fighting and is ready to fight at the drop of the hat.

After drawing some unpleasant comparisons between one hundred and fifty dollars a month and the earnings of a "fighter," I declined his generous offer and I suggested that in the future when he had need of teachers he communicate with Tex Rickard.

A school in Missouri wanted me to sign a resignation with a contract. The resignation was to be effective together with the forfeiture of all salary that might be due me if I should smoke a cigarette, pipe, or cigar at any time, in any place during the period my contract was to run. I did not sign. A girl of my acquaintance went out to Montana a few years ago after signing a similar contract except that the prohibition was against dancing on school nights. After the first of the year there was no money in the county treasury. She was paid in driblets until the end of May. When she applied for the remainder of her wages, she was presented with evidence showing that she had been seen at a dance one night in March and consequently no further money was owed her.

The end is not yet. A woman received a contract from a small village along the seacoast of North Carolina. It contained the usual stipulations in regard to certification, boarding at the dormitory, sacrificing pay while unable to work, and in addition the following clauses:

> I promise to take a vital interest in all phases of Sunday-school work, donating of my time, service, and money without stint for the uplift and benefit of the community.
> I promise to abstain from all dancing, immodest dressing, and any other conduct unbecoming a teacher and a lady.
> I promise not to go out with any young men except in so far as it may be necessary to stimulate Sunday-school work.
> I promise not to fall in love, to become engaged or secretly married.
>
> I promise to remain in the dormitory or on the school grounds when not actively engaged in school or church work elsewhere.
> I promise not to encourage or tolerate the least familiarity on the part of any of my boy pupils.
>
> I promise to sleep at least eight hours a night, to eat carefully, and to take every precaution to keep in the best of health and spirits in order that I may be better able to render efficient service to my pupils.
> I promise to remember that I owe a duty to the townspeople who are paying me my wages, that I owe respect to the school board and the superintendent that hired me, and that I shall consider myself at all times the willing servant of the school board and the townspeople and that I shall cooperate with them to the limit of my ability in any movement aimed at the betterment of the town, the pupils, or the schools.

This, remember, for a job paying eighty-five dollars a month for seven and a half months in a little town of three or four hundred persons, located in the mosquito and fever district of North Carolina, where half the inhabitants cannot read or write.

This is the most restrictive contract I have ever seen, but anyone who is familiar with the conditions of restraint under which the average teacher works and with the attitude of the community toward the teacher cannot help admiring its frankness. There are hundreds of places where every provision mentioned in that contract is enforced. A teacher may not be required in writing to teach Sunday school, but the teacher who fails to do so will not be reelected. A teacher may not have to promise not to fall in love but if she does she had better marry as soon as possible, for in nine cases out of ten she will find herself out of a job the next year. A teacher may not have to sign a pledge to sleep at least eight hours a night, but the teacher who wants his job will not keep a light going long after curfew.

Everywhere it is the same. The mails, the fire department, the police department, almost any other division of public service is relatively immune from prying supervision. Not so the schools. There is no reform too ridiculous to find favor and support in the schools. Twenty years ago the prohibitionists began to make it impossible for any man who did not abhor the word rum to get or hold a job in our public-school system. Today the anti-tobacco leagues are making it increasingly difficult for any man who smokes to get work outside the large cities. In fully half the school districts of the country the churchmen completely dominate the teachers. Some States will not grant a teacher a certificate, no matter what his academic qualifications, unless he presents an affidavit from some minister showing that he is a good church member.

There are, of course, other reasons besides moral ones for the continual shifting of teachers. Teachers become tired of towns and want to change. Towns become tired of teachers and want new blood. There is more bossing and bickering among school-teachers than among any other class of workers. The principal and supervisor are always interfering with the teacher, the superintendent and school board interfering with the principal and supervisor, and the parent-teachers' associations with all of them. The boarding-houses take advantage of the teacher because, in most cases, the teacher has no other place to go. The administrative officers are much more tyrannical than in any other occupation. They know that the teacher will not quit in the middle of the term; to do so means not merely quitting a job but quitting the profession entirely. The teacher who does not work to get a good recommendation from his present employer has small chance of a new job in the fall. The teacher keeps his grievances to himself, knowing that in a few months' time he can leave town and need never come back. He eats the humble pie that is placed before him, smiles, and placates the powers that be. Next spring he will go job-hunting and next fall, if his references are first-class, he will have a new job.

England's Middle Class—Dead or Alive?

By HAROLD BUTCHER

"THE middle class is damned," said an English business man the other day. He spoke gloomily but without bitterness. "We are crushed between the 'upper ten' and the organized workers. I can see no future for us."

When Bernard Shaw began tilting at middle-class morality the older middle class of today was young. The middle-class heart was beating sound and true; the middle-class brain was doing good business; the middle-class home was unthreatened by movies and jazz; and the good middle-class Liberal Party was a power in the land.

Today what has happened? The older middle-class homes have brought forth sons and daughters who spurn the religion, morality, politics, and manners of the fathers and mothers who ushered them, correctly and carefully, into the middle-class world. The earnest members—the "sheep"—of this new generation are the life of the Nonconformist churches—the middle-class religious stronghold—but they no longer worship a middle-class God. They call themselves Christian Socialists; they do not bother about theological abstractions but are fiercely sincere about Christ's social gospel. And in politics they vote Labor. The few youngsters who stray into the meetings of the Liberal Party look quite pathetic in their loneliness.

The "goats" of this younger middle-class generation are in a sorry pickle. They have rejected middle-class morality but few of them cut loose from the solid maxims of their sheltered youth without suffering more from conscience than the adventure is worth. They no longer go to "chapel," of course, but they find no attraction in a "life of sin." Despite the chances for unmarried sexual experience in a country where there are practically two million more women than men, one can count on most of the younger middle class to avoid free love and its consequences. They become mildly cynical concerning the religion, morality, politics, and the conventional life of their parents, but they content themselves with shoulder-shrugging indifference. And they, too, though they may be skeptical of results, vote Labor.

Economically, the damnation of the middle class began with the coming of the chain stores—the "company" shops, vast organizations with "no body to be kicked, no soul to be damned." From the point of view of the independent merchant the chain stores seduced his women customers by reducing prices and by giving all sorts of presents with the purchase of a package of tea or a pound of butter. The competition was killing. Some business men became bankrupts; others sold their businesses to the "accursed" companies and, bowing their independent necks, forgetting their sturdy initiative, became employees of the very companies that had ruined them—as managers, traveling salesmen, and the like. It was a bitter pill to swallow. Some people would call this progress; but, as a matter of fact, it meant the blotting out of solid men who, despite their narrow middle-class morality—or perhaps, because of it—were worth far more to a local community than a score of employees in a company shop ruled by an unseen board of directors, alien to the town and in no way interested in its welfare.

The war completed the economic break-up of the middle class. True, some traders became war profiteers and, with their quickly grasped fortunes, joined the ranks of the new rich. But most of the men and women of the middle class became the "new poor." Some joined the Middle Class Union to protect their interests; but with their essentially anti-union mentality it is not surprising that their meetings always appeared tragically humorous rather than serious. The cause of their predicament was the post-war trade depression through which they fought desperately to retain the incomes and social position that had been theirs. And, as though this were not bad enough, they found themselves saddled with crippling taxation to pay for a war that never had the slightest prospect of doing them any good. Talk to a middle-class man in England today, and he will tell you he is taxed out of all the little luxuries that made life worth living; he may ostensibly rejoice that he—brave man—had the courage to make a debt settlement with America, at a time when other European nations were still defaulters, but he fails to find America an entertaining topic for discussion.

Politically, the middle class has practically disappeared. While the younger generation has joined with Labor, many of the older men, embittered by the competition that has shattered them and by the internal dissensions and factional rivalries of the Liberal Party, seek in the Tory Party a bulwark against the disruptive forces of socialism and trade unionism.

But at this point enters irony. Just as the older middle class is dying a new one is appearing in the heart of the citadel where "class" is anathema. Today in the Labor Party are thousands who, as professional men and women and as former Liberals, are essentially middle class however energetically they may speak on Labor platforms, however consistently and honestly they may vote Labor at the polls. In their well-groomed and unostentatious appearance, in the homes they rent and buy, in their recreations, in their whole make-up they are bourgeois rather than proletarian.

Not long since the Liberal Party, energetic and alive, seemed a permanent and powerful political institution. Today it is dead, never to rise from the cold ashes of its spent fires, no matter what party chests may be accumulated and spent. Similarly, the Labor Party of today, united by a common program, hot with the thrill of a winning battle, appears to be safe from any conceivable disruption. But history will repeat itself. As long as the British Parliament lasts it is probable there will be three parties—a Conservative or Tory Party; a Labor or Socialist or Communist Party; and a Conservative-Liberal Party or Liberal-Labor Party, which will represent the forces that are gently but definitely passing from revolution to reaction. It is safe to predict that, ten or fifteen years from now, many thousand present Labor Party members will be, socially and politically, essentially where the Liberals were in the heyday of their power.

The middle class is dead! Long live the middle class!

Democracy in the Making at Manumit School

By NELLIE M. SEEDS

A BRISK wintry morning at Manumit. The snow on the hillsides and in the valley sparkles in the January sunrise. Such weather begets keen appetites, and Manumit children are abnormally healthy in this respect. But a bitter disappointment awaited the earliest comers on this Wednesday morning of January, and the news was soon communicated to the later arrivals.

"No breakfast."

"Why?"

"Annetta refuses to cook it. She says the supper squad would not wash dishes last night."

"But somebody washed them. They're all clean."

"Yes, Marjory and Sally did them. But they were not supposed to. Stan went on strike because he says he's been on supper dishes too long. He gave notice four days ago that he was going to quit today, but Annetta didn't pay any attention to him. So he struck last night. Then Joe and the rest said they wouldn't wash up if he didn't, and the whole squad quit."

But last night was ancient history. Morning had come, and, strike or no strike, breakfast had to be secured somehow. What could be done about it?

"Let's call a community meeting!"

It was obviously the only thing to be done. Five of the children presented an immediate petition, and the meeting was called to order. Sally moved that Stan be asked to present his point of view, and give his reasons for going on strike. But the motion was lost. The pressing immediate demand was breakfast. John demanded to know why breakfast was not ready. The dishes had been washed. The food was cooked. The last time there had been difficulty with supper dishes there was no delay in breakfast. Why all this fuss?

Annetta was called upon to explain herself. Her declaration was simple. It was her interpretation of the community ruling that dishes must be washed by the squad assigned. Otherwise they were not officially done.

Loud and pronounced objections! There was evidently considerable difference of opinion on the matter. Bill moved that the community rules on the subject be read. But the secretary was unable to produce any record of legislation on the question. Some one had apparently mislaid a goodly portion of the minutes. The point was stressed that unless the chairman in charge of inside work herself secured the volunteers when people balked, community responsibility did not amount to much.

The community was becoming hungrier and hungrier. Principles might be principles. But an empty stomach is a stark reality. Sally requested that any one be permitted to do the work. Florence offered an amendment that any one asked by the chairman of the Inside Works Committee be allowed to do it.

In vain did the constitutionalists urge that the only effective method of discipline was to make the whole community suffer when one individual failed in his work. The community was in no mood to listen to broad general principles. Their average age is not over thirteen, and adolescence is always hungry. They were following constitutional procedure. But they did want breakfast. Florence made a substitute motion that meals be served whenever and however the dishes were done. Hope was looming for the hungry ones. A general discussion, and the motion was adopted, with the declaration that the holding up of breakfast was out of order.

Cheers from the hungriest. Protests from the constitutionalists. Arguments and explanations echoing from children and faculty alike. The babel of voices continued until Douglas, the youngest and probably the most immature member of the community, quietly rose to his feet.

"Since we've done the business we called this meeting for, I move we adjourn and have breakfast."

The motion was unanimously carried.

Democracy? Yes, in the making. Illogical, perhaps. Shortsighted, undoubtedly. They dodged the main issue of reconciling their practice with their principles. But they did follow parliamentary procedure. They discussed the question in orderly fashion for over an hour. They did wait for breakfast until a majority vote declared it legal. Could much more be expected from children?

Sometimes, when the exigency is not so pressing, their devotion to the principle of pure reason is more pronounced. But the above is a pretty fair sample of the way in which Manumit administers its every-day life, and solves its community problems.

Thirty-eight children from nine to seventeen years of age, six group teachers, the arts-and-crafts teacher and the music teacher, the farm superintendent with his two assistants, the domestic science teacher with her assistant, a superintendent of buildings, and a trained nurse constitute the community group. The rule of procedure is simple. One person, one vote. Jurisdiction over all community questions, save those involving health, safety, and educational procedure. Freedom of discussion irrespective of age or position. Absolute equality of every member of the group.

Manumit does not claim to produce a finished product. Mistakes are many and sometimes involve serious consequences. But experience is the best of teachers. Our children display qualities of initiative, resourcefulness, and ability to handle themselves that are quite astonishing. They are making progress in learning to merge their individual desires and wishes into the needs and emergencies of the community. The most venial sin at Manumit is failure to cooperate.

Thus education at Manumit School is something quite different from the humdrum lessons of the ordinary school. It is life, full, free, and rich with the possibilities offered by a 177-acre farm, well-stocked with cattle, a tumbling mountain trout stream offering opportunities for swimming and boating, hillsides for climbing, coasting, and skiing, dams to be built, ice to be cut, cows to be milked, fields to be plowed—in short, an endless variety of occupations.

The unique opportunities of Manumit, however, are not provided for the usual hand-picked private-school group who can afford to pay a high tuition fee, but for the children of organized labor. At a minimum fee of $1 per day, trade unionists can secure for their own children all that Manumit has to offer. Over thirty local trade unions, central bodies, and State federations have indorsed Manumit officially. Over a dozen trade-union officials of national importance have commended it.

But Manumit hopes to do more than educate its forty or fifty children. It hopes to serve as a laboratory or demonstration school of the labor movement, where creative activity can be tried out in an environment that furnishes fundamental life processes rather than artificially devised schemes as project material, and where it can be applied to a typical group of public-school children. The leaven which Manumit plants in these children has an immeasurable potential power. By arousing public opinion through its own demonstration school, organized labor can exercise an influence of incalculable importance in modifying and revivifying the public-school system.

In the Driftway

SCENE: The platform of the Times Square station of the Interborough subway, New York City. Time: 11 p. m. recently. Dramatis personae: A lady, five policemen, three hospital employees, two Interborough men, a fairly Good Samaritan, the Drifter, and several bystanders. Out of the corner of his eye the Drifter saw the lady fall to the platform and turned to help her up. The fairly Good Samaritan assisted. As they raised the lady—no featherweight—to her feet they sensed her trouble. The lady was —Yes, gentle reader, you've guessed it; that's what the lady was, improbable as it may seem in the reign of Andrew Volstead. She didn't look as if she was accustomed to getting that way. She was some fifty years of age, neatly though simply dressed, with a good face and iron-gray hair. She wore a wedding ring.

* * * * *

"THAT'S prohibition for you," sneered the Drifter, knowing that in the Great City no other remark so quickly makes all men kin. "Yes," responded the fairly Good Samaritan, brightening, "she's been to a party and got some poisoned hooch. You can't trust any of the stuff nowadays. She's pickled." After considerable effort the Drifter ascertained that the lady wanted to go to Brooklyn —to the last station on the Flatbush Avenue line. "Fine," said the Drifter. "That's a long way. We'll put her on a train and most likely she'll be all right when she reaches her station. Anyhow she can't be carried past it." But the lady didn't want to be put on a train. She resisted all persuasion. Finally the Drifter and the fairly Good Samaritan hauled the lady into a car and dropped her upon a seat. But, to their disappointment, she didn't pirk up. Instead she lolled her head on the Drifter's shoulder and fell asleep. "You're some ladykiller," remarked the fairly Good Samaritan, concealing his jealousy with admirable restraint. The other passengers grinned appreciatively.

* * * * *

WHEN the train drew into the Borough Hall station in Brooklyn the Drifter resolved upon stern measures. "She can never get home like this," the Drifter said. "Let's get her out here, and if she doesn't wake up and act better we'll have to call a cop." Out on the platform the Drifter guided the lady to a bench, upon which she slumped heavily. But when the Drifter looked up the fairly Good Samaritan was not to be seen. He had adroitly stepped back aboard the train. The Drifter went to the street for a policeman. He told his story to one who after hearing it pointed over his shoulder to another officer and advised: "Talk to that guy there." The Drifter did so and "that guy there" followed him into the subway. The Interborough station agent came too. A happy ending seemed to impend. An incident like this, reflected the Drifter, was common in the Great City; there must be regular machinery to take care of it; the policeman would know what to do. Although it was after midnight, the Drifter decided to stay and see the machinery of the Great City at work. The policeman talked with the station agent and the Drifter for a while, then disappeared. In his place, presently, came another policeman. This officer talked with the station agent, the Drifter, and a platform man of the Interborough who had arrived to swell the crowd. Incidentally, this policeman got—approximately —the lady's name and address. Then he, too, disappeared—to call an ambulance, he said. Two other policemen arrived. We all talked. Then down the platform came a white-clad, bare-headed ambulance surgeon and an orderly with a cap marked "Long Island College Hospital." The lady had now enlisted the attention of five policemen, two hospital employees, two Interborough men, one fairly Good Samaritan, one Drifter, and several bystanders. Surely something was going to happen. Something did—we talked some more. The ambulance surgeon said his hospital didn't receive cases of intoxication. "The only place in Brooklyn that does is the Kings County Hospital, and I don't want to take her that far." The policemen didn't want to take her to the station because they would have to make a charge against the lady, and she didn't seem to be guilty of anything but drowsiness. "Why not take her home?" the Drifter suggested to the ambulance surgeon. The doctor shook his head. "That's further than the Kings County Hospital."

* * * * *

"WE can't wait here all night," said one of the policemen finally, and seizing the lady the two officers half dragged, half carried her to the street. The ambulance came clanging toward them. We talked some more. The lady was put inside and the door closed. Then we talked again. "You'd rather she went to the station, would you, Doc?" asked one of the police. "That's what I've been telling you all along," said Doc. So, because it was nearest, the lady went there. The Drifter went home. He had seen the machinery of the Great City at work.

On Second Terms

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Whether you believe that a third term tends dangerously toward monarchy depends on your presuppositions. There is another argument, based on actual experience, which has been published but not attended to; it ought to be published over and over till it becomes part of the familiar view of the case.

No President since Andrew Jackson has gone through two full terms and done as well in his second as he did in his first. The reason is obvious: the United States has grown so big that the job of presiding over it is overwork, and a man who has been through four years of that and two campaigns for election is too fatigued to be competent to do his best at four years more of it.

When a President runs for a second term we ought to count on it as a certainty that his second administration will have more of faults and less of merits than his first had. We cannot assume that expert care of his health and strength will carry him through. Roosevelt and Wilson cared for themselves as competently as any President can, and neither of them handled his office as well in the second term as in the first.

If the Coolidge of 1927 is having more fault found with him than the Coolidge of 1925, is it not partly because Coolidge, despite the refreshment of the electric horse, has been growing wearied and brings to his work in 1927 less ability than he brought in 1925?

Nin-Che-Go-Fan-Liao-Ma?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Not "Gesegnete Mahlzeit!" but just "Mahlzeit!" ("gesegnete" understood) is the greeting here in Germany. And "Velkommen til bords" and "Tak for maten" of the Scandinavians is not an equivalent any more than is the French "Bon appetit" or the Spanish "Buen provecho" or the Russian "Na zdorovya" or the Polish "Niech pan bog segnasz" or the Eskimo "Ko-wa-chuk-unga." These expressions are, like our variations of Burns's ". . . but we hae meat, and we can eat, and sae the Lord be thankit," all normally used only at the table; whereas the German Mahlzeit! may be heard in the office, on the street, anywhere. Nearest to this Begrüssungswort is indeed the Chinese "Nin-che-go-fan-liao-ma?", which is appropriate in the middle of the day. But that inquiry, "Have you eaten rice?" is more like our similarly inquisitive "How do you do?" It is not the equivalent of this cheery mealtime greeting—Mahlzeit!

Hamburg, Germany, April 30 E. J. WARD

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Apropos of Mr. Ward's letter in your issue of March 16, the following may interest your readers: A newly arrived American in Germany sat in a restaurant opposite a German. At the end of the dinner the German got up, clicked his heels, bowed at a right angle, and said to the American: "Mahlzeit!" The latter quickly replied, "And my name is Johnson."

Vienna, Austria, May 5 JULES POLLINGER

That Foreman

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You caused me great grief by explaining that last prize poem of yours. For the first time I thought I had been able to find a meaning in one of The Nation's prize poems. I was quite thrilled by the achievement. I was sure that the author was identifying a steel building with the ancient oaks of Britain, and that the "foreman" was one of the Druid priests. But now it seems the poet meant something else, and what he meant has no meaning to me. Your prize poems are a good joke, but when are you going to "own up"?

Pasadena, May 4 UPTON SINCLAIR

The Really Oppressed

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I find it impossible to comprehend why you and your people concentrate all your attention on the laborer (with occasional sugar pills for the Negro) while the "white-collar" man, i.e., the one who writes your articles and reads them, is out of luck. The average daily paper expects us to be interested in murders and coming-out parties, while you expect us to worry about the English miner's problem! Do you blame me if I admit that in both instances I feel like Hamlet: "What's Hecuba to me?" If the other papers indulge in unimportant and mostly filthy gossip, must you go back on us and devote your time and every bit of space to the workers? Far be it from me to underrate their importance, but could you not make it a fifty-fifty proposition at least? The laboring class is protected by unions and organizations, while the brain worker is like an outlaw, with no one to turn to. The brain worker who, through his inventions, discoveries, technical ability, gives work to the laborer and gold to Wall Street, gets nothing in return. He is used as a convenient "buffer" by both. The laborer and his family have a hard life—miserable lodgings, bad air, poor food. Yet, compared to the brain worker, he plays the part of the man born blind, while the other one represents the man who lost his eyesight in later years. Whose fate is more pitiful?

New York, April 5 CLARA HORVATH

The Case of Charles Cline

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On September 13, 1913, the door of a Texas State prison closed upon Charles Cline, a member of the I. W. W. He was convicted of participating in the murder of one of the Sheriff's posse of Dimmit County, while en route to Mexico to help in a revolutionary movement against the Diaz Government. Despite the continuous efforts of persons and organizations convinced of the innocence of Charles Cline, the prison door remained closed until, on August 19, 1926, Miriam Ferguson, Governor of Texas, signed an unconditional pardon for him.

Charles Cline is a radical. As a radical he is still concerned about the things that workers are struggling for the world over and is still capable of doing his part in the struggle.

The League for Mutual Aid is anxious to help Charles Cline over the period during which he will have to make his readjustment with the world he has been out of for thirteen years. To that end we are asking you to contribute to a fund for him. Please send all you can spare, in care of the League for Mutual Aid, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Influencing American Policy

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Recent reports from London indicate that the British Government has joined Washington in its refusal to participate in further action relative to the "Nanking outrages" of March 24.

I congratulate you. For it was The Nation that succeeded in bringing about, by courageous criticism directed at a policy which was destined to undo all the good work done by former American governments, a revision of our Government's policy in China. The United States, to the regret of every true American, united with the British in the bombardment of Nanking, but the storm of criticism that resulted forced the Administration to alter its procedure. The strict adherence of the United States to its new course, together with the lukewarm attitude of Japan, has brought Great Britain into line. Thus you have, indirectly, averted a clash between the East and West.

Protecting American Lives in Chicago

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Can anyone tell me why warships and regiments are rushed to China, where one American was killed; and yet, in our own country, where Americans are killed by tens of thousands and wounded by the half million, every year, by speeding automobiles, our Government does nothing effective to protect us from mutilation and death? I have a right to make this inquiry, because I myself was knocked down three times by automobiles on the streets of Chicago in less than a year.

Escape into the Night

By EDWARD SAPIR

"Let every star that falls
Down the night of Time
Be candle for my sight,
Be christened for my name."

So they who, when the sun
Wheels up and burns away,
Lose themselves upon
The highroad of the day,

But in the safer dark
Of stars that overhang
Dry every tear that wells
And quiet every pang.

Shelley in Action

Shelley, His Life and Work. By W. E. Peck. Small, Maynard and Company. Two volumes. $40.

THIS kind of biography has been badly needed. Previous writers have tried to entrap the elusive Shelley in some theory or other—from which he always escapes—or to follow up some single trackway of his life. Mr. Peck has simply stalked the creature, stalked him in all his haunts with immense labor and unfailing sympathy, and gives us now a moving picture of him. In general the story is animated as well as accurate; and for the most part it is interesting. The author's style is vivacious, rather slapdash, and occasionally jumbled. It is therefore truer to the Shelleyan spirit than the careful professorial periods of Dowden and others. One feels this particularly in the opening chapters, where just the right touch is applied to Shelley's childhood, with its healthy waywardness and its abnormal sentimentality: "A predisposition to the lachrymose," says the author, "was part and parcel of Shelley's spiritual nature." The book is episodic and packed with quotations. But these seem to me well chosen and woven together. Familiar material is excerpted so briefly and is so well blended with the fresh matter which Mr. Peck has drawn from the Pforzeimer collection in New York, the Huntington Library in California, Mary Shelley's novels, and so on, that we have a constant sense of forward movement in the picture. In general he shows us Shelley in action.

This is the way the biography of Shelley is bound to go. In Dowden's book Shelley was an English gentleman of genius whose conduct, from the standpoint of domestic morality, must now and then be regarded as exceedingly ill-advised. In the present work Shelley is revered as a wonderful poet but frankly displayed as very much of a "will-o'-the-wisp" (Mr. Peck's own word) among men. Herein resides a certain paradox that is characteristic of our age. In the future, when human and artistic standards shall have approached each other again, and when Shelley's life will be interesting mainly in illustration of his best verse, it is likely that Shelley the man and Shelley the poet will undergo a single plain judgment: extraordinarily fascinating, extraordinarily shallow. His shallowness of personality was the complement of his magical nature-poetry: like those forest pools that so delighted him for their reflection of all the tracery and movement of the upper air.

His thinking was shallow, eager, and imitative—like that of the college youth of today who swallows Nietzsche whole and has a sense of large originality in his neighborhood. Mr. Peck's numerous citations of the sources of Shelley's ideas confirm Professor Gingerich's finding, in his recent book on the romantic poets, that Shelley never got his head above the doctrines of eighteenth-century thinkers, from Locke to Godwin. In his poetry the materialistic metaphysic persisting from the previous century was raised and beautified by lyric art without changing its essential quality; as the dust of the earth, lifted and diffused by the wind, provides the colors of our most superb sunsets. His mind was not philosophic, as he fancied, but oratorical. Mr. Peck dwells upon his gift of speech and his early efforts as an orator. One may agree with Trelawny that "however great Shelley was as a poet, he was greater as an orator." All his life he orated, drawing materials from his incessant reading. He would read and talk himself tired, and then suddenly fall asleep, and presently awake to talk and read again. Shelley did not weigh and consider. He was abnormally devoid of meditation. And, as Mr. Peck points out, he could never have endured the seclusion which he often yearned for.

Constitutionally he needed people. I think it was this need, even more than his devotion to "the principles of benevolence and reason," that made him the center of such a curious network of dependencies. Mr. Peck recounts in convincing detail the tragi-comic story of his expenditures of time and money and effort and sympathy upon his acquaintances. If these flies, and particularly that fat fly William Godwin, loved to be caught in the shimmering web of his benevolence, we must remember that the kindly spider himself drew from the game a certain vital sustenance. His nature craved continual but not profound relationships with persons. He was not Cor Cordium, and Mr. Peck gently omits that legendary view of him. He was a friendly will-o'-the-wisp, dependent on human companionship but devoid of any real passion for human personality. His love for women was an electric friendliness that would never have seemed very passionate if it had not been abnormally uncontrolled. It was a sort of erotic congeniality, diluted with priggish theorizing.

The whole subject of his transition from Harriet to Mary Godwin is dealt with very effectually by Mr. Peck. After dismantling the flimsy charges against the former, he remarks: "If Harriet was at any time unfaithful to her marriage bond, is anything else established than that a simple, honest girl, who by all accounts was as good as she was fair, eloped with, married, and bore children to a man who corrupted her morals with Godwinian poison and, afterwards deserting her, set her adrift in an evil world to follow his own teachings and his own example? Certainly there can be no exoneration for him in any act of hers." Mr. Peck confesses himself nonplussed by the coldness of Shelley's references to Harriet after her death. But surely the definitive exposal of his shallow-heartedness is his attitude toward Mary during the last years of his life. He was now mature; she was his avowed mate in mind and spirit; and she had suffered very much for him and with him. But he became more and more unfaithful to her, as this book demonstrates. He yearned away from her, and expressed to others his sense of her cold limitations—just as he had done in the case of Harriet. The emotions as well as the thoughts of this man revolved and repeated themselves without finding any human goal; like the circulations of wind, stream, and cloud in his poetry.

But he had a vague yearning to break through the shallow round of his nature—like a naiad who doesn't understand what a human person is but moans because she isn't one. This yearning is the most human and poignant thing in Shelley's life and poetry. A confused self-despair loomed up more and more behind his priggishness, his humble vanity, his dissatisfaction with others. Mr. Peck cites Browning's opinion that if Shelley had lived he would have become a Christian. One may reject this possibility without denying that Browning's remark was a keen intuition into a kindred poet. Half of Shelley, at the least, was a born institutionalist—like his father, Timothy, or, if you will, like Nature herself. He was convinced of the vast importance, for good or ill, of wholesale systems. Even in the midst of composing "Prometheus Unbound" he could say: "I consider poetry very subordinate to moral and political science, and if I were well, certainly I would aspire to the latter; for I can conceive a great work, embodying the discoveries of all ages, and harmonizing the contending creeds by which mankind have been ruled." As a poet, however, he needed a systematic creed that would give him some image of the inmost meaning of human personality, its mingled dust and deity. In the thirteenth century he would have been a distinguished monk—predominantly celibate, keenly interested in contemporary fine arts, enthusiastic about the most recent theories in theological cosmography, and intensely devoted to the cult of the Blessed Virgin. As it was, he was tragically unfortunate. He was dismissed from Oxford in his second year; of which event Dowden saw the significance more fully than Mr. Peck. Thereupon he was lured into a stultifying confusion of his sensuous and his ideal impulses. In his early wanderings he missed contact with two men who could have guided him, Wordsworth and Coleridge. He needed a gifted and penetrating friend—and he got Byron. He needed a god and he got Godwin.

Mr. Churchill Sees It Through

The World Crisis, 1916-1918. By Winston S. Churchill. Charles Scribner's Sons. Two volumes. $10.

NO account of the conduct of the World War, as distinct from its origins, has been so provocative as the series of chronicles which Winston Churchill completes in this last instalment. As we read in the English press the protests of distinguished generals and admirals against his version of one incident or another, we are reminded of the Schley-Sampson controversy that flamed up intermittently in the American papers early in the century. It may be that from the debates of the experts there will ultimately emerge some generally accepted account of what really happened which will differ, here and there, from Mr. Churchill's. But his critics will have to find a second Churchill on their own side before they will be able to dislodge from the layman's mind the impression left by this book—some writer who is his equal in those rare gifts that make his narrative one of the most vivid and fascinating contributions to the English literature of our own time.

Mr. Churchill is one of the few living authors who can deal with great events in the grand manner, and who can do so without making us feel that he is straining after effect. He strikes a sort of epical keynote in his very preface, where he tells us that he has "tried to find and follow the stepping-stones of Fate." Even though we know the denouement beforehand, we read with almost breathless interest his story of the Jutland battle and of some of the principal struggles of the land warfare. The compiler of an anthology of eloquent passages—passages whose telling simplicity is marred by no turgid rhetoric—might profitably convey from these volumes his brief comment on the death of Kitchener or his description of a bombardment of which he was himself a spectator and auditor. He is a master of graphic metaphor and simile. In his account of this bombardment, for instance, he writes: "And then, exactly as a pianist runs his hands across the keyboard from treble to bass, there rose in less than one minute the most tremendous cannonade I shall ever hear." He brings home to us the tenacity of the commander against whom this barrage was directed by remarking: "The impression I had of Tudor was of an iron peg hammered into the frozen ground, immovable." The book is inspired from first to last by an abounding vitality. One feels that Mr. Churchill, while writing every page, was living the past event over again. He recaptures, and communicates to the reader, the authentic thrill of the dramatic moment.

But the outstanding value of the book consists in the store of material it provides for the preacher of pacifism. Ten dollars is a prohibitive price for a tract; otherwise one might urge the peace societies to give these volumes a nation-wide circulation. (If there were only a Carnegie Endowment for the Prevention of War!) Mere extracts would not serve. It is the cumulative effect of this narrative, written as it is by a man whose heart leaps up when he hears the clash of arms, that makes a dint upon the reason and the imagination. No sensible reader of this book will henceforth believe a word that is told him by either political or military authorities while a war is on. How our leaders will lie to us to keep our martial spirits up is revealed here by the disclosures now made of the appalling casualties suffered by the French early in the war, of the concealment by the censorship of the full extent of a catastrophe which involved "the greatest loss and slaughter sustained in a single day in the whole history of the British army," of the wholesale mutinies in the French army after Nivelle's failure, and of the depredations of the U-boats, so successful that, during one month, of every four merchant ships leaving the British Isles one never returned. We are reminded of another phase of mendacious propaganda when Mr. Churchill declares point blank that the Crown Prince was harshly judged—that he was neither fop nor tyrant, that no group of German armies was more consistently successful than his, and that his personal influence was often thrown into the right side of the scales.

Most striking of all is Mr. Churchill's exposure of the stupidity of the "brass hats" on both sides. It justifies up to the hilt H. G. Wells's contempt for the military mind. That damning line from Tennyson's Charge of the Light Brigade—"Someone had blundered"—might have been used as an appropriate quotation to head chapter after chapter. Nothing could be more scathing than the quiet irony with which Mr. Churchill sometimes impeaches an incompetence that doomed thousands of men to death or torture; as when, after quoting Haig's description of the elaborate German defenses at the Somme, which, in that general's own words, "formed one composite system of enormous depth and strength," he dryly comments: "All these conditions clearly indicated to the Staffs a suitable field for our offensive." If the history of the war, on its political side, illustrates anew with how little wisdom the world is governed, Mr. Churchill's accounts of the operations in the field make it clear that credulity reaches its highest mark when the nations place their fortunes and the lives of their sons at the disposal of their military leaders.

The Escape of a Family

The Allinghams. By May Sinclair. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

MAY SINCLAIR'S predilection for taking her characters from the cradle to maturity, if not the grave, and her fondness for watching them approach the bright edge of madness alike find scope in this new novel.

There were six Allingham children, born with beauty and brains in a home of comfort and loving tyranny. Miss Sinclair sketches them with a few revealing strokes, as they sat about the tea-table with Father and Mother and Aunt Martha one bright afternoon of the midsummer holidays of 1893. Margaret, the eldest, was fifteen then, and Angela, the baby, was five. Between them, at two-year intervals, came Wilfred, Stephen, Mollie, and Robin.

Then in the brief lucid chapters which follow she flashes the picture as each child in turn begins to try his wings to escape the nest and embark on a life of his own. Before the story is ended they are all gone and the scene is beginning to shift to the third generation. The three boys married; Wilfred and Robin are farmers, Stephen a poet. Mollie, balked in her desire to become a musician, still found happiness in marriage. Little Angy could not find love and marriage together and took love. Only Margie was somehow not able to manage the perilous crossing from infancy to adulthood. Turned in on herself, she could see only the perverse circle of her own wishes and fears until these gradually engulfed her; when love did offer itself, the effort of transition was beyond her powers, and they had to take her away, bound and shrieking, in a maniacal frenzy.

It is this tragic failure of the parents and Margie which most deeply engages Miss Sinclair's attention, as the similar problem concerned her in "Mary Olivier" and "Harriet Frean." The other children are differentiated; they are credible, but somehow they seem conceived less as individuals than as patterns, or, scientifically speaking, "controls," to cast the story of Margie into sharper relief. "The Allinghams" belongs in the group of serious novels in which Miss Sinclair studies the emotional tragedies of individuals rather than in the witty stories of Wyck, but the compression which was needed to bring the course of a whole family into one short book robs it of the riches and the force of either of the two earlier novels of similar theme.

The Westernization of Turkey

Turkey. By Arnold J. Toynbee and Kenneth P. Kirkwood. The Modern World Series. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

IT is doubtless a mistake for a young man to write a surpassingly good book. In "The Western Question in Greece and Turkey" Mr. Toynbee five years ago set a standard which makes it difficult to judge fairly the result of his odd-time collaboration with a less-gifted observer and writer. Without suggesting a closer analogy to the famous collaboration of Liddell and Scott (in which "that which is good is Scott and that which is Liddell is not"), we may note that the best part of the book on Turkey is that which elaborates the view advanced in the earlier book that "everything in contemporary Turkey which has life in itself . . . can be traced back to some Western stimulus and will be found to be a reaction against Western influence when not an emanation from it."

Another part of the new book in which the hand is doubtless Jacob's though the voice may sometimes be Esau's is the outline of the history of reform in the Ottoman Empire. Such reform, it is pointed out, has always been from the top, and the top has always been military. The social and political reforms attempted by the Young Turks in 1908, like those attempted by Mahmoud and Midhat in the nineteenth century, were doomed to failure partly by the character of the few leaders upon which they depended and partly by the non-homogeneous character of the empire. The non-Turkish portions of the empire, with the exception of Kurdistan, having been lost, and knowledge of Western institutions having been acquired by many civilians within the last two decades, the authors believe that there is better than an even chance that the drastic Westernizing reforms imposed by the enlightened despotism of President Mustapha Kemal will be permanent. In this connection the chapter entitled The Ideas of 1789 is valuable for the light it throws on a limited number of the personalities which, at this stage in Turkish history, are probably more important than what appear to be economic, political, or intellectual tendencies.

The last half of the book, which is devoted to The New Turkey, presents various aspects of contemporary Turkish life in cross-section. The chapters on Population, Agriculture, and Railways, Commerce, Industry, and Finance, and Social and Cultural Questions exhibit unfortunate affinities to the style of the year-book. The discussion of the change in the relations of Turkey and Islam, "the best single measure of that mental revolution which it is the main purpose of this book to record," is interesting in its characterization of the Turkish Nationalists' hostility to the Islamic connection, which the Nationalists consider "reactionary, unfashionable, and anti-national." There is an illuminating discussion of the Mosul question, the crux of which is said to be the contrast between the Turkish and British policy in regard to the Kurds.

The somewhat extensive account given of the international situation of Turkey is deficient in two important respects: It does not bring out the fact that under the settlement of Lausanne Allied nationals in Turkey still enjoy certain remnants of the former capitulatory privileges; and it does not indicate awareness of the guaranty of the League of Nations, under the same settlement, of certain fundamental rights in favor of the non-Turkish minorities remaining in Turkey.

On the whole the book succeeds in being, as required by the scheme of the Modern World Series, a balanced survey of the tendencies and forces which are shaping the new Turkey. Of these tendencies and forces it gives a more satisfactory account than is to be found anywhere else.

EDGAR TURLINGTON

The Magic Whole

Holism and Evolution. By J. C. Smuts. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

THE title of this book arouses suspicion. A new ism is hardly what intelligent readers seek, and a coined word to mean the tendency to form wholes rather fails to entice the inquiring mind. But a book which offers us "the last word in the relations of mind and body," a book that applies a principle of explanation to the whole range of evolutionary forms from mechanical structures to human personality and Values with a capital V, a book which not only defines this holistic conception but also describes genuine holistic creation, holistic freedom, holism as the agent of structural changes, as an existent factor in, and as the general nature of, the whole universe—such a book demands attention, especially when its author is a famous man.

But the reading of it can hardly be said to bring the promised reward. Holism turns out to be only a magic word which General Smuts substitutes for the mysteries he finds unfathomable by the ordinary concepts of mechanism, vitalism, naturalism, and the rest. If an animal "acts as a whole, with a unity and effectiveness of action which is no mere mechanical composition of its movements," the holistic concept is the only explanation; "the whole is the only category that will explain" it. "Coordination and coadaptation in organic structure cannot be explained on any ground but holism." And so all the way up to personality, "a whole which in its unique synthetic processes continuously performs that greatest of all miracles, the creative transmutation of the lower into the higher in the holistic series."

When we look for something more specific than the statement that unity is explained by wholeness, either we are told that others are to carry out the theory to its full and illuminating possibilities or else we find holism betraying itself as a less careful and not quite modern version of familiar concepts such as the "emergence" of Alexander and Lloyd Morgan, the systematic wholes or partial wholes of Bosanquet, mechanism itself in its clear and familiar features, or teleology in its equally familiar if vague ones. Not that our author is a plagiarist or forgets his obligations; rather that in the naive sincerity of his good-will toward men, his complete faith in upward progress and his serene security of eventual victory in a "more stable holistic human society," he has been so eager to impart this precious idea—an idea that has fortified his own spirit, no doubt, but a contribution that is no more useful to science or philosophy, and certainly no more original, than any of a hundred other optimistic faiths.

Lest this seem scant courtesy to a distinguished writer, let me cite one or two passages. How in the name of behaviorism can it be said that psychology deals with the individual "only from the purely mental point of view"? What is the basis for saying that philosophers have neglected the distinguishing feature of personality as such? What of Bosanquet and his principle of individuality and value? What of the personalists, who have gone so much further than General Smuts with this idea? Or take the long, repetitious accounts of wholes as not quantitatively added entities, yet as a more in each case, a new existent factor, absolutely and genuinely creators or creations. Surely Lloyd Morgan, or almost any of the "evolutionary naturalists" of our day, has avoided such obvious contradictions of statement. They have at least seen the difficulties and dealt with them, not answered with a supposedly new concept which for all its pretended concreteness and synthetic reality turns out to be the merest abstract word.

To expound a holistic universe, holistic structure, holistic functions and values, holistic self-realization, holistic personality leaves us with the same old problems of life and mind, structure and function, personality and the universe on our hands—plus the new adjective. Thus, it only adds to our weariness in whatever theoretical well-doing we may be engaged upon, for we must interrupt ourselves long enough to direct our puny blow toward dislodging this latest idol of the theater—or is it merely of the market-place?

D. W. PRALL

The Free Child

The Problem Child. By A. S. Neill. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.

FRANKLY heretical, the author believes "that if Christ could come to earth He would lead the Sunday scholars to the nearest cinema." For the author's creed is merely to seek happiness, his attitude generous and tolerant, his book a delight because its essential wisdom is cloaked in the humility of one who has traveled long enough on the path of knowledge to realize that the goal is never completely known.

Mr. Neill holds that it is impossible to educate the conscious mind of a child, and that only the unconscious can be permanently taught. What to teach is the problem, for standards of good and bad are relative, and human motives, whether our own or other people's, are difficult to explain. He conceives the child as a dynamic urge impelled by a life force. Moral instruction is dangerous, since it merely strengthens unfulfilled wishes of an unsocial nature in the unconscious. He sees unimpaired egotism as the greatest force in social relations, since group approbation is essential to it. He has faith in the doctrine of original virtue and in the deep urge for honesty with oneself, and finds that stealing and lying are often manifestations of the desire to get at truth. The desire for perfection is real, too, and where we fail to attain it ourselves we are apt to try to foist it on others.

The whole idea of Mr. Neill's school is release, the living out of the absorbing interest. Convinced that freedom destroys conflicts and makes men good, he puts as the chief necessity that the child's unconscious life become conscious, that children be helped to know themselves and approve of their actions, rather than hide away and repress them. "The teacher's task is simple, to find out where a child's interest lies and to help him live it out." Punishment has no place here, for it terrifies the conscious and leaves the unconscious untouched. Obedience is a courtesy and can be gained by teaching children the natural consequences of their acts.

Mr. Neill divides his allegiance between Adler and Freud. He is certain that happy homes, with properly mated parents, tend to create happy children, and in a free school love is an important element, and the sex wish a predominant factor. Side by side with the sex wish stalks the enemy, the power wish, in whose wake breed hatred, jealousy, and inferiority. The book carries conviction. I should like to have visited his German school when the Schulgemeinde carried a motion that he be "put out because he was useless"; when he had remained away three days the children voted to reinstate him.

Books in Brief

An Introduction to the Study of Education. By Ellwood P. Cubberley. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

A common-sense, comprehensive statement of what schools are today and why they are not something radically different. The title of the book is, perhaps, its chief defect, since it may prove forbidding to the average layman. True, the volume will serve as a text for the orientation of student teachers, but it will serve fully as well in giving the layman who does not intend to go into the schools, but insists upon his right to criticize and direct those who do, an authoritative bird's-eye view of the largest governmental undertaking of the American people—the maintenance of public schools.

How to Study in College. By Leal A. Headley. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

If during his preparatory schooling the student has not learned how to study, then the question is whether the college should become a sort of kindergarten and teach him the elementary process, or merely bounce him out into the cold, cruel world—a rejected freshman. This question is raised, but not answered, by Mr. Headley's pretentious book. If the student has not acquired most of the knowledge here outlined years before he enters college, then the college is to be censured for admitting him. How to keep fit physically and mentally; how to concentrate, understand, learn, and remember—these are proper subjects for the elementary school and the first year of high school. Such portions of the book as might legitimately be taught for the first time in college would make a pamphlet instead of a 417-page textbook. Much of this material does not belong in a college course any more than would instruction in washing the ears, brushing the teeth, and blowing the nose.

The Franciscans in England, 1224-1538. By Edward Hutton. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

A judicial survey of the record of the friars on English ground, their adventurous coming and settlement, their uncloistered piety and poverty, their rapid expansion in numbers and influence, their gradual corruption and decay, is preluded with a fervent offering of the author's labor, on the seventh centennial of St. Francis's death, "for the repose of the soul of Henry VIII," and finds its close in a vehement exposure of that monarch's offenses against Mother Church and her children. Yet here as often quiet recital of facts moves us more than emotional dedication and denunciation. The story of the friars is of the very essence of tragedy, not because a royal villain is the final agent of their overthrow but because theirs is an abysmal descent from that heavenly energy of love which men called St. Francis of Assisi. Here is the detailed and documented story of the shattered ideals of an order which won worldly fatness and with it leanness of soul.

Dramatic Publication in England, 1580-1640. By Evelyn May Albright. Oxford University Press.

An extended and thoroughly documented study of the subject. "Publication" is taken to include public performance upon the stage and the inquiry concerns itself with all the circumstances—including the government regulation of the stage and the censorship of stage and press—which affected play production from the outside. The author's questioning of the current assumption that the printing of plays before the Civil War was generally without the consent of author or owner except when the piece had exhausted its appeal upon the stage is of particular interest to scholars. The volume is the second of the new series made possible through a fund managed by the Modern Language Association of America.

A Monarch of the Sky. By Archibald Rutledge. The Purdy Press. $2.

A nice little book. To criticize it harshly would be as ungracious and as useless as taking a sledge-hammer to smash a butterfly. It bears about the same relation to literature that a well-raised shy little girl, tinkling a boarding-school piano, bears to Mary Garden. Since it is written by a Southerner—a South Carolinian—one may guess before opening it that it contains mildly sentimental stories of good old Negroes and their quaint ways, and of duck-shooting. It does—except that the duck is an eagle called The Monarch of the Sky. We are rather tired of Southern stories on this theme. Is it not about time for some Southerner to write a great book on the Negro question? Not a thin little essay filled with sentimental ecstasies, but a powerful book of research and psychology and history and opinion and foresight. Such a book would—or ought to—deal with lynchings, with miscegenation, with the Negro's personal and political status, openly and boldly; it ought to represent the spirit of the South, and it ought to come from the South like the blow of a fist. Then, with that before us, we might get somewhere in considering the Negro question. Instead we are given little pleasant cakes spiced with honey which we swallow at a gulp without realizing that we have eaten anything.

Is It God's Word? By Joseph Wheless. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

The author of this volume, an able New York lawyer and linguist, was perhaps the smartest Sunday-school scholar ever seen in Tennessee. His adolescent head literally bulged with texts from Holy Writ. Unfortunately for his orthodoxy, however, he read the Scriptures too much, becoming aware of multitudinous blemishes, discrepancies, and contradictions of which the average fundamentalist never dreams. So he determined to write a book which should refute the dogma of Biblical infallibility for all time. To this task he has brought erudition, wit, industry, and extraordinary skill in exposition. Not an inconsistency or an incredibility seems to have escaped him. Yet his book is free from indignation and bad manners, and is downright interesting. Rightly used, it should prove a powerful counter-offensive in the Holy War below the Potomac. For down there the troops of the late General Bryan go marching on, and unless they meet stouter resistance we may yet see biologists banished to Alaska and witches burned in Mississippi. Hitherto our scientists when belabored have been very polite—in fact, have remained almost timorously on the defensive. They may have to borrow a few leaves from Mr. Wheless.

Letters from Russian Prisons. With an Introduction by Roger N. Baldwin. A. and C. Boni. $1.50.

This book is a collection of authentic documents dealing with the methods of Soviet Russia in repressing counter-revolution and threats against the new system of society and government. It consists chiefly of the Soviet laws, official statements of policy and activities by Soviet authorities, and letters and affidavits of prisoners punished by the Soviet Government. These documents furnish convincing evidence that the Soviet authorities have not adopted the policy of turning the other cheek; but before any American enemy of the Russian experiment hastens to exploit this material he should read the letter of Upton Sinclair on pp. 14-15 calling attention to the conditions with respect to the conviction and treatment of political prisoners which prevail in the sun-kist State of California.

Crashing Thunder, the Autobiography of a Winnebago Indian. Edited by Paul Radin. D. Appleton and Sons. $2.50.

Most of our accounts of primitive cultures are gargantuan log books, concerned with external fact and oblivious of the human being buried somewhere under the pyramid of detail. This autobiography of Crashing Thunder, a Winnebago Indian from the country south of Lake Superior, is the most satisfactory introduction yet available to the complex, alien world of an Amerind. It was collected and annotated by the leading ethnological authority on this tribe, and the picture is not romanticized. Crashing Thunder, by turns knave, skeptic, and wise man, speaks objectively and without afterthought. He emerges a very human and credible figure in the midst of these exotic vision quests and medicine bundles and resurrection-initiations, and through his eyes the strange culture takes on perspective and convincing coloring. Nothing perhaps is more intimately revealing than the formal instruction of the young by their elders; in set talks the boy and girl are told what is expected of them, and given specifications for meeting the contingencies of life. Whether our interest is in primitive education, or ethics, or the role of the sexes, these speeches are more illuminating than much ponderous theorizing. Altogether it would be difficult to find a better introduction to the world of any of our American aborigines.

Drama

Solis Occidere

THE original "Grand Street Follies" was born, as all such entertainments should be, out of an irresistible exuberance of spirits. At the end of the season a hard-working company found itself still left with energy demanding an outlet, and the impudent jollification which resulted created a sensation among the members of a public grown weary of elaborate but soulless revues. No one, however, supposed that the thing could be repeated. The very sense of obligation which the maintenance of an institution involves must lie like a weight upon the spirits, it is hard to be made responsible for a periodic outburst of irresponsibility, and last year in particular there were, indeed, signs that the pumps were working in wells that had been wont to gush. But no such charge could be made against the fifth (and, alas, the last) edition; for whether it be because the company rose to its last opportunity or whether it be for some other reason, the new "Follies" manages to capture the spontaneity and abandon which marked the first. Whatever may be the fate of the organization and the players, both are at least unrepentant. Their satire is as irreverently salty and their spirit is as impudent as ever it was.

The thing which distinguishes these performances is the presence of the amateur spirit in the best sense of that term. Obviously they are larks for the performers as well as for the audience, and they have the spontaneous air of impromptu clowning. Certain features, notably the extraordinary mimicry of Albert Carroll, have always exhibited a great virtuosity as well, but it is the holiday air which has made them most delightful. From the moment the curtain of the present entertainment rises upon a delicious burlesque which represents Mae West of "Sex" fame and Helen Menken of "The Captive" serving terms in jail until it descends upon a parade of characters from the best-known Neighborhood productions, the spectacle is witty, irreverent, and sometimes unashamedly scabrous. Miss Menken, scrub pail in one hand and a bunch of violets in the other, declares herself not "blue" but "mauve"; Miss West voices the understandable complaint

> They got by with Lulu Belle,
> But they shut me in a cell;

and in another sketch Mrs. Fiske (delightfully hit off by Carroll) explains to the admiring Mr. Wolcott her remarkable comic interpretation of Mrs. Alving on the ground that she had always considered "Ghosts" a Fiord joke. It must be admitted that not all of the skits come off, and it is hardly necessary to say again that the aim of the production is spontaneity rather than finish, but it is certain that one cannot find anywhere in New York more clever ideas, more fresh satire, or more verve than are to be found in this entertainment.

As everyone interested in the theater knows before now, the present production is the last which the Neighborhood Playhouse will make. Accordingly, a group, even more representative than usual, of those for whom the theater is a business or a passion turned out to applaud the players on this their last first night, and many came not without a touch of sentimental melancholy provoked by the thought that they would come no more to a theater in which they had seen several of the most beautiful productions of the last decade. But save at the end, when Albert Carroll read a witty last testament ordering, among other things, that a certain critic who has been conspicuously unbeguiled by the charms of the Neighborhood be "sold to the lowest bidder" and that the very modest lobby be presented to the Paramount Theater, there was no reference to the "finis" which this production is writing to a notable career. "Let not my hearse be vexed with mourning friends," cried Catullus, wishing for "sweet pastimes to grace his happy tomb," and Catullus was wise. As for me, I am not without hope that the spirit of the Playhouse is setting, like the sun the poet sang of, only to rise again; but if we of the first-night audience were in at a real death then these are very jolly obsequies indeed.

The Opium Trade at Geneva

By ELLEN N. LA MOTTE

THE ninth meeting of the Opium Committee of the League of Nations was held in Geneva from January 17 to February 1. On this occasion the committee threw overboard all pretensions to the contrary and came out boldly as the upholders of the opium trade; also the drug trade. For this time the fight centered on drugs rather than opium. Drugs, it would seem, pay even better than opium, and it is evident that the drug interests are able to exert powerful pressure on their various governments, and upon the delegates sent by these governments to this Opium Committee of the League. But, bad as it was, a mighty fighter has been raised up in opposition to these sinister interests. Italy has come into the arena, and Italy—and Mussolini—are in earnest. Their spokesman was Signor Cavazzoni, and never once was the Italian delegate daunted in his fight against the Opium Bloc. Never once did he fail to address himself directly and earnestly straight to the British delegate, recognizing in him the leader of the opposite camp. Cavazzoni was never fooled for a second. Over and over again he called their bluff and exposed their tricks, and at the end of the prolonged session he left his opponents in an untenable position. For the first time since the death of Sir John Jordan, the Opium Bloc finds itself faced with a courageous opponent.

The first shot was fired by the Opium Bloc. Fired, it would seem, during the Assembly last September, when a resolution was passed by the Assembly recommending to all League committees the advisability of cutting down their proceedings to the smallest possible space—for economy. In fact, the resolution suggested that they issue no printed minutes at all, but just boil down their business into a report which could be published at the minimum expense. So the first thing the Opium Committee did was to consider this resolution and act upon it. With one accord they all said that publicity was the greatest weapon with which to fight opium, no doubt of it. And that the previous reports and documents, heretofore issued, had been invaluable. No doubt of it. But—here was this awkward resolution passed by the Assembly and they must comply with it against their wishes. They were just torn in two—yearning for publicity on the one hand, yet faced with this necessity for economy. They were forced to compromise. They would publish their reports and proceedings, but in the name of economy they would omit all that was "unessential" and "not indispensable," the committee being sole judge of what might be dispensed with. Before this the minutes of the Opium Committee have been somewhat doctored, but now such treatment is sanctioned by an Assembly mandate. For the sake of economy, it will now be possible to leave out so much! No verbatim records were taken during the whole session—only an abstract of each delegate's remarks, abstracts submitted next day to stern revision.

A few days later Cavazzoni threw his bomb, which was expected but unwelcome. Italy, he said, was a country that neither grows opium nor makes drugs, yet it was being flooded with drugs in common with the rest of the world. But Italy did not like it and wanted to protect itself. He reminded the committee, therefore, that the countries they represented were all tied to the Hague Convention, and that Article 9 of that convention called upon the contracting Powers to limit drug manufacture to the medicinal needs of the world. He said not one of them had done that; that they were all manufacturing vastly in excess of those needs, and that an international obligation like the Hague Convention should be binding upon its signatories. The committee's records and documents showed contraband seized in all parts of the world, which seizures represent but a tenth or a twentieth of the contraband in transit. All absolute proof of excessive over-manufacture and a violation of Article 9 of the Hague agreement. He also said that international agreements should be carried out and not made into scraps of paper. His remedy was to live up to Article 9, that is, to curb manufacture by rationing the factories in their supplies of raw material, and so limiting the output of morphine, heroin, and cocaine. His concluding remarks were significant. In Italy, he said, there was great skepticism as to the sincerity of this Opium Committee, which skepticism he did not share. Therefore he would like to return to his countrymen and say that their fears were unfounded. (This last sentence is deleted from Cavazzoni's speech, as apparently "not indispensable.")

Profound silence, lasting several minutes. Then Sir John Campbell, the chairman, pulled himself together. These remarks from the Honorable delegate from Italy were irrelevant to the subject under discussion. The Dutch delegate said he did not wish to discuss them at all! The British delegate said they might be discussed in an appropriate place on the agenda, though even then any delegate might refrain from taking part in the discussion. But there did not seem any real place on the agenda for them at all—the committee should have been warned—anything so extraordinary should have been provided for by proper notice. However, when they got on with the agenda a bit, there might possibly be an opportunity.

A few days passed, during which superficial matters were discussed. But always a shadow lurked in the background. Had Cavazzoni been properly snubbed, or was he going to bring a spirit of discord into what had heretofore been such a united committee imbued with but one idea, the protection of the opium trade?

Mr. Cavazzoni remained silent a few more days, and then broke forth again. He did not wait for an appropriate place on the agenda (which he doubtless suspected would never occur), and one morning he burst in with a resolution:

> The Advisory Committee, taking note of the fact that the manufacture of drugs is unquestionably carried on on a scale vastly in excess of the world's medical requirements, and that in consequence the contraband traffic continues to increase, as is proved by the quantity of drugs seized:
> Considers it advisable that full application should be given to the principles contained in the Hague Convention, Article 9, and confirmed in the Second Geneva Convention, Article 5, by which the contracting parties undertake to reduce the production of manufactured drugs to the quantities needed for medical and scientific purposes. . . . It is of opinion that it would be advisable to make a study of the measures which should be taken in order that the manufacture of drugs be reduced to agreed quantities. . . . In order to attain these objects . . . the Advisory Committee proposes to the Council that it should hold an extraordinary session at a date to be fixed by the Council.

It was a bad moment for the drug interests and the gentlemen representing them. Here was a member of the committee itself actually proposing to ruin the trade. Here was a delegate who looked on drugs as meaning ruin to millions of people, instead of millions of dollars to a few. He had put the question squarely up to the committee and asked them what they proposed to do? Were they in earnest or were they not? Were they going to live up to international agreements or break them? Cavazzoni waited.

A painful silence followed. Sir John Campbell (British India) said they could not possibly consider this suggestion until it was put before them in writing, both in French and English. This would take half an hour, during which time any delegate might speak if he wished, but if so, he must remember that he was speaking as an individual, not a government representative. There was a further pause—even as individuals, no one liked to risk it. Finally the Japanese broke the stillness; he said this was a drastic measure and would be a serious thing for Japan where the drug industry was only nine years old; it would mean stopping its expansion and development. Furthermore, he continued, as the Italian delegate had evidently been moved by humanitarian motives and was considering the welfare of people as a whole, why had he said nothing about opium smoking in European colonies or the eating of opium in India? Did not the Orient need protection as well as the West? The Serbian delegate was flatfooted in opposition. To ration the factories, he said, would shut off the market for Serbian opium. Sir John Campbell (speaking as an individual for British India) said he could not subscribe to anything which reduced the drug output. The one country that supported Cavazzoni was Portugal.

It was a relief when the half hour was up and the typewritten document placed before them. They could now act, not as individuals, but as delegates representing huge interests. And act they did, casting their votes to the accompaniment of pious utterances. The British delegate said he was heartily in favor of the thing in principle but it did not seem practical at the moment. He felt constrained to vote No. The complete vote was as follows:

Great Britain	No
British India	No
Holland	No
France	No
Switzerland	No
Serbia	No
Japan	No
Italy	Yes
Siam	Yes
Germany	Abstained
China	Absent (ill with influenza)
Portugal	Absent (from the room)

Simple as this seems, it was a momentous decision. It shows the drug interests at the height of their influence, defiant and determined. Cavazzoni forced their hand and made them reveal their true attitude. He gave them an opportunity to take a decisive step toward stopping the drug traffic and to keep an international agreement, and they refused. The committee protested their noble intentions but they voted No.

The Real Arabian Nights

IF YOU had sat at the Sultan's feet, on the satin cushions of the haremlik, as Scheharazade wove the pattern of these wondrous tales into a many-hued oriental tapestry of words, you would have enjoyed "The Arabian Nights" no more than you will this sumptuous, illustrated, limited edition.

For years the translation of Richard Burton has been the last word. But it is no longer. Dr. J. C. Mardrus translated the exotic Eastern tales into French, treating the unblushing, original Arabian text with the deft and delicate touch of a great French artist. From this complete, unexpurgated version, E. Powys Mathers has given us "The Arabian Nights" in English, more complete, more beautiful, more scintillant than it has ever been before.

Privately Printed for Subscribers

Publication of this most complete and authentic edition of the epic of the East brought the highest praise from the British press.

"In the 'THOUSAND AND ONE NIGHTS' the tale after all is the thing, and the tale is better told by Mardrus than by Burton. But let not those who are jealous of every word suppose he has attained this result by the method of a sub-editor. For artistic presentment the abhorred shears are not necessary. All the superfluities have also a value. Burton cut out a great deal. The Mardrus version is very much fuller in detail."—The London Times.

tions asked by Mr. Dunham, representing Colonel Woods, the American assessor. With ingenuousness he asked:

> 1. What action has been taken by your government to carry out those provisions of the Hague Convention which relate to the limitation of the manufacture of drugs, Articles 9 and 10?
> 2. What is your opinion of the obligations imposed by the provisions of the Geneva Convention referring to the limitation of the manufacture of drugs, Articles 4 and 5?
> 3. Does your national legislation already give full effect to the provisions of the Geneva Convention which refer to the limitation of the manufacture of drugs to an amount not in excess of medical and scientific needs? If not, what specific laws and regulations have you recommended to your government for the purpose of carrying out the Geneva Convention?

Except by one country, no answer was given to these questions. The one country that replied was Japan. Baron Sato made a statement showing the new legislation recently adopted to inaugurate a new policy, i.e., to limit importation of raw material so that drug manufacture shall not exceed the medical needs of Japan. He said that for nine years Japan had been a huge manufacturing country, but was now turning over a new leaf, and would prove its sincerity of purpose. He added that the reason he had voted against Cavazzoni's proposal was because his country, following the lead of America, was reducing manufacture on its own initiative. This is of great significance. Japan is breaking away from the Opium Bloc, and aligning herself with America and Italy in this world fight against drugs.

The session concluded with an effort made by the British to whitewash the ugly situation, to pretend that after all the committee was in earnest. After a long dissertation upon the iniquity of smuggling and the leakages into illicit traffic, Sir Malcolm Delavigne said that

> It should be possible, by making detailed examinations into the transactions of the manufacturers and wholesalers and of the persons or firms to whom they sell, to trace leakages. . . . Governments have the power to require particulars to be supplied to them . . . to examine the books of the firms, and so on. In this way they could follow up the drugs through each stage, from the entrance of the raw material into the factory, checking production and sales, and in time would come to a point at which leakages occur.

Cavazzoni shot to pieces this grand proposal which is only dodging the issue and another excuse to gain time. He said that this sort of investigation would take years and that the statistics, if furnished (which was doubtful), would be incomplete and inaccurate. If such supervision was in connection with a vastly reduced output, well and good. But with output maintained at a high level and scattered to the four corners of the earth it was useless.

In outlining his plan, the British delegate made a significant admission: Once drugs are shipped out of a country, the onus is shifted to the receiving country. All leakages take place abroad. This is where the British rest their case. They are careful that no leaks occur in their own country, and that exports go out on genuine certificates. What happens afterwards is no concern of theirs.

Needless to say, the British plan was adopted, and there was considerable comment on it in the British press, from which it was made to appear as a great stride forward. Not one comment was made on Italy's stirring appeal to the nations to live up to their international obligation.

Second Large Printing

"CAN only be described as an epic. . . . Almost every page smacks of the pungent irony, the sardonic humor, the discernment that are characteristic of Charles A. Beard."

—Evans Clark, New York Times.

"A REMARKABLE synthesis. The high-water mark of modern historic presentation in America. Not since the generation of Parkman, Motley and Prescott have scholarly competence and literary skill been united on a single work of such great sweep."

—Lewis Mumford, New Republic.

COL. HENRY L. STIMSON has returned from Nicaragua much pleased with the success of his efforts to obtain peace there by the device of threatening the use of the American army and navy if arms were not grounded by both sides—a device the more interesting because it was only a few weeks ago that our Government announced that it had sold $217,718 worth of rifles and munitions to the puppet President of Nicaragua. Incidentally the United States is now paying ten dollars a weapon for all the guns that the Liberals are turning in. Col. Stimson dwelt with horror upon the fiendish character of the warfare, declaring that women and children were not spared, that most of the wounded died from neglect, and that often no prisoners were taken at all. Well, that sounds familiar to us, but apparently he has forgotten the dispatches of ten years ago. Did not women and children perish wherever men fought in Europe? Is it not known that prisoners were murdered without number on both sides? Does he remember that Lt. Gen. Robert L. Bullard, one of our chief commanders, wrote in his memoirs: "The French authorities decline to see or speak of it, but the Moroccan division were in the habit of giving no quarter in battle; did not trouble themselves with prisoners," and then added that at Soissons the Americans "loaned" these Moroccans "some German prisoners"? War is the devil's work everywhere.

WORD TRICKLES OUT of Washington that another reduction in taxes is planned at the next session of Congress, and like that of two years ago it will be for the well-to-do only. Senator Reed of Pennsylvania, who is a handy man for the Administration on Capitol Hill, recently emerged from the Presidential presence with the news that the expected surplus of revenue for 1928 would justify lopping off $300,000,000 in taxes. As outlined by Senator Reed the program of revision is as follows:

> Reduction of the corporation tax from 13½ per cent to 12½ per cent.
> Reduction of surtaxes on incomes between $30,000 and $75,000.
> Reduction of maximum surtaxes to 10 per cent.
>
> Repeal of some of the "nuisance taxes," including club dues and admission taxes.
> Repeal of the inheritance taxes.

All of these reductions will benefit chiefly, if not exclusively, the well-to-do. The so-called "nuisance taxes" are in fact not such at all. The admission and club taxes are among the soundest we have and fall on persons well able to bear them. The phrase "nuisance tax," like the word "jaywalker," is a skilful bit of propaganda used to discredit something intrinsically justifiable. "In my opinion there ought to be no reduction of the rates on small incomes," said Senator Reed. "The exemptions are high enough and there seems no necessity for further reductions in the rates or increase in the exceptions." Unwisely frank, we call that. Secretary Mellon can do better. We look for him to explain that while the proposed reductions apparently favor the well-to-do, they will in practice be chiefly beneficial to the person of small income.

STRAW VOTES may or may not show how the political wind blows, but at least they supply entertaining material for speculation between elections. The Publishers' Autocaster Service, which furnishes news matter to country newspapers, is already at work on the Presidential campaign of 1928 and reports the result of a recent poll as showing Calvin Coolidge to be the favorite candidate among Republicans and Governor Smith of New York the leading contender among Democrats. The poll covered twenty-nine States and brought out a total of 362,210 votes. More interesting, though, than the sentiment in favor of "Cal" and "Al"—which has long been apparent—is the closeness to President Coolidge of ex-Governor Lowden of Illinois. Mr. Coolidge received 87,176 votes, with 8,390 persons voting for him as second choice. Mr. Lowden received 80,066 votes as first choice and 12,546 as a second pick. Probably his strong showing was due—partly at least—to the fact that the poll was largely in agricultural communities. Next in popularity among Republican voters were Senator Borah,

Vice-President Dawes, and Secretary Hoover, with 14,525, 9,938, and 8,445 votes respectively. Among Democrats Governor Smith received 53,751 first-choice votes and 10,890 seconds, while Senator Reed of Missouri was next in line, 41,185 persons putting him first and a still larger number, 42,160, indicating him as a second preference. W. G. McAdoo received 37,245 votes, Governor Ritchie of Maryland 26,113, and Governor Donahey of Ohio 3,766.

IN OUR ISSUE OF MAY 18 we printed, for the use of our readers, a petition to the Governor of Massachusetts urging a commission to revise the evidence submitted at the original trial of Sacco and Vanzetti. There were left blanks for eight signatures and we asked that signed petitions be mailed back to us. It is surely an evidence of the widespread popular interest in this case that we have received to date no fewer than 1,552 signatures from all over the country. They continue to come in by every mail. Among the petitions returned to us were some from the Naval Academy, from Harvard, Smith, Brown, Cornell, Clark, Michigan, the University of Iowa, and the University of Minnesota. One came from employees of a branch post office in New York City, another was signed by five physicians resident in Cleveland, while a third came from a former naval officer and four members of his family. From Westminster College in Pennsylvania came one return with a letter stating that of the five hundred students enrolled there is not one who would not gladly sign this petition.

BENNIE SMITH is an organizer for the Brotherhood of Pullman Porters. Until recently he was making his headquarters at Jacksonville, Florida. Life went smoothly for Smith until he was recognized by a Pullman official named Webb connected, appropriately enough, with the company's welfare work in behalf of safety. Then things began to happen. Various porters were cross-examined about this organizer. One porter brought him a warning from the company's district superintendent—so he said—to leave town. Mr. Smith stuck. On May 18 two detectives ordered him to appear the next day in court charged with the crime of selling the Messenger, a Negro magazine, now the organ of the Brotherhood, which they said the white folks didn't like. The detectives served no warrant and on legal advice the organizer did not appear. Instead he sought to get an interview with the police judge to explain his errand and get protection. The judge said he had no sympathy with him. Other porters brought more urgent warnings. His very life, they said, was in peril. Still Mr. Smith stuck. On May 26 he was arrested on a blanket charge. Newspaper dispatches said that District Superintendent Cooper would appear against him. Again he was offered a chance to leave town. This time on orders from his national organization he left. The Brotherhood chiefs explained that they wanted to take no chance on another Jacksonville lynching. Thus Florida does her bit to save from the impious hands of a Negro labor organization those sacred institutions, white supremacy and Pullman profits.

AN ARMY OF 5,000,000 is Mussolini's latest goal. It may be that he will have little trouble in attaining his desideratum, for much that this prince of dictators wants comes into being with the waving of his wand of power. "Today, May 26," he announced in a speech in the Italian Chamber, "we bury solemnly all the lies of universal democratic suffrage." At the end of the year, the Chamber of Deputies will be transformed into an organ of the corporative state. Members will be elected by the national corporations created under the Charter of Labor, instead of by direct vote of the people. Thus Mussolini has not only destroyed all political opposition to himself and his party but he is about to make it impossible for such opposition ever to arise. Of course "ever" is a long time, even for a prince of dictators. When he says "My successor is not born yet," when he announces that he had thought his task of creating a united state would be finished in five years but that now he knows it will take at least fifteen, he deals in words only, and he knows it. But his pronunciamento about a huge army is concrete and dangerous. Italy playing with the toys of despotism, thriving or not thriving under the most rigid suppression a nation has known in modern times, is less an international matter than Italy armed and ready for war. An army cannot be maintained for long without an excuse for its existence; it is far too expensive. Is Europe going to be an "armed camp" again, only a decade after the close of the war to end war?

PRESIDENT MACHADO OF CUBA recently visited this country and was received with the greatest honors in Washington and elsewhere, although the most startling charges in regard to his treatment of labor have been published against him, as well as assertions that there has been a deliberate campaign of persecution and murder against the labor-union leaders in his country. Chester M. Wright, English-Language Secretary of the Pan-American Federation of Labor, charges that 124 trade unions in Cuba in existence a year ago have either been destroyed or reduced to complete impotence and that he personally "established approximately one hundred cases of assassination and disappearance, nearly all of them officers or leaders of trade unions." While he was here, President Machado made public statements that Cuba had been rendered safe for American capital, that American investors were welcome, and that they would be treated like Cubans. He did not deny that he had been accused of being a ruthless dictator, but declared that the measures he had taken were necessary to the welfare of his republic, adding that there would never be another revolution in Cuba. Apparently his subservience to the Government and the capitalists of the United States was complete; yet curiously enough it has leaked out in the press that when in Washington he told the Government that there must be some modification of the Platt Amendment and he has repeated this statement since his return to Cuba. So strong is the anti-American feeling in Latin America that even this dictator is compelled to demand the breaking of some of the political ties that bind Cuba to the United States.

A NOTABLE ACT OF LEGISLATION is now definitely upon our statute-books by reason of a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in upholding the validity of the Virginia sterilization law. The court's decision was written by the most beloved of the justices, Oliver Wendell Holmes, who declares that States are not only within their rights in passing such legislation but that they are wise in making it possible to prevent imbeciles or degenerates bringing offspring into the world. The power is an extremely dangerous one and so Justice Holmes dwells upon the provisions of the Virginia law intended to prevent a misuse of this power. In a number of the States laws like this have already been passed, and it cannot be denied that they have been in response to a growing demand for something of this kind. But, if the proceeding is not profoundly safeguarded, terrible wrongs to individuals may ensue. It is reported that in California alone 635 insane people have been sterilized. But who can ever be certain that sanity may not be restored? Remarkable cures do take place and persons recover their wits long after their cases seemed hopeless. Obviously every possible protection must be thrown about this procedure lest it become not an advance, but a weapon of mischief, cruelty, and perhaps even revenge.

DURING THIS PERIOD when the public is so justly critical of the legal profession and court procedure, it will do no harm to add one trifling bit of evidence. At a meeting of the American Bar Association, held in Milwaukee in 1912, the following resolution was adopted:

> Resolved, That as it has never been contemplated that members of the colored race should become members of this association, the several local councils are directed that, if at any time any of them should recommend a person of the colored race for membership, they shall accompany the recommendation with a statement of the fact that he is of such race.

The American Bar Association is a lawyers' guild or trade union. It has no social aspects. The personal contacts of its members consist solely of meetings called for consideration of professional problems. Of course, the constitution of the association does not bar Negroes. In fact, a few colored men were admitted about the time this resolution was passed. Many white lawyers decline election to the association as long as this restriction is on the books. Why not apologize for its enactment, expunge it from the records, and abolish a discrimination ordinarily condemned by the leaders of the bar when practiced by labor unions, as well as other groups, against colored citizens?

THE STATE OF CRIMINAL JURISPRUDENCE and communal enlightenment in Amherst, seat of the Alma Mater of John W. Burgess, Frank M. Goodnow, Munroe Smith, Harlan F. Stone, Dwight W. Morrow, Calvin Coolidge, and other eminent barristers and jurists, has just been revealed by two news notes in the Amherst Record for May 18, 1927, which read as follows:

> Judge Webster Thayer of Worcester recently called on his daughter, Mrs. Warren S. Gault, in Amherst. As a representative of the dignity and integrity of the judicial system of Massachusetts Judge Thayer commands respect and admiration in Amherst.

> The Smith College soviet, alias the Hampshire County Progressive Club, held a meeting in John M. Greene Hall in Northampton Thursday evening. The hall was crowded. The speaker was Clarence S. Darrow, who has devoted the greater part of his life to saving assassins from paying the penalty of their crimes. He is best known as the man who saved the lives of Leopold and Loeb, Chicago youths, who committed one of the most fiendish crimes ever known. Their parents were very wealthy. At Northampton Mr. Darrow's theme was education as a preventive of crime. His audience, though not on trial for their lives, was aroused to a frenzy of enthusiasm. When Jesse Pomeroy is freed he may be able to accept lecture engagements. Then the Smith College soviet could listen to the other side.

"I Am Charles Lindbergh"

THE happiest feature of the country's acclaim of Captain Lindbergh is that for once, everybody, of every shade of opinion, can agree. There is no room for dissent. A marvelous achievement was accomplished in a faultless manner by a young American who embodies within himself the finest American characteristics. The only discordant note comes from certain militarists in Washington, who dolefully warn us that America's isolation is at an end, that the sea is no longer a rampart of defense. Everybody else has rejoiced, not merely because it was an American who achieved the impossible, but also because there was an international aspect to the feat. Ambassador Herrick may exaggerate when he declares that Captain Lindbergh has wiped out all the ill-will which has existed in France against us, but there can be no question that he has rendered an enormous service to both nations. The fears that a success would hurt French feelings have been proved baseless. No welcome could have been freer from envy or hurt pride, none could have been more cordial, more spontaneous, or more overwhelming than that given by the French Government and people to the young man who stepped out of his airplane and said simply: "I am Charles Lindbergh."

Equally gratifying has been the bearing of the hero. A skilled diplomat could not have done better. His turning over to the orphans and widows of French aviators the 150,000 francs given for a gold cup; his call on Mme Nungesser; his toast to France as the land of the greatest number of great aviators; his acclaim of the veteran Louis Blériot as his master; his tactful speech to the Chamber of Deputies—all these reveal an old head upon young shoulders over a warm and sympathetic heart. Moreover, his refusal to consider the offers made to him for public appearances, which would make him a millionaire overnight, is in the best tradition. When he declared that he had never thought of money in connection with his exploit, he taught the youth of his country a finer lesson than he did by the courage and fortitude of his flight toward the sun. In an hour when public emphasis is so largely upon things purely material, it is glorious to find a youth who can remain a modest gentleman seeking no undue reward and can keep his head in the face of the greatest applause and fame ever given to a single individual.

That he will remain unspoiled is our devout wish—one has only to recall how the "hero of Santiago," Captain Hobson, lost his head in 1898, to realize what might have happened. The Government and the rest of us should help him to maintain his balance and his modesty by not overdoing the honors everyone wishes to bestow upon him. We are sure he had rather come home by steamer than be convoyed by a flotilla of destroyers. The ordeal of official receptions can hold no charms for him who stole away in Paris to put on overalls and overhaul his plane himself. Let us not ask the impossible of Charles Lindbergh, and let us, as we are sure he would wish, remember that he was not the first to cross the Atlantic. We must not forget the extraordinary skill and gallantry of John Alcock and Arthur W. Brown, two British gentlemen and soldiers, who first crossed from Newfoundland to Ireland by air, in 1919. America can best show her pride and gratitude by refusing to spoil one who, we sincerely hope, will always remain one of her finest assets.

Governments, Spying, and Propaganda

WITH governments as too often with individuals the deadly sin lies in being found out. That is what caused such excitement in Washington some weeks ago when it appeared that important and revealing documents of our embassy and its military attaché had found their way into the hands of the Mexican Government. So, in London, a Cabinet which was looking for an excuse to break off relations with the Soviets has made skilful use of the familiar fact that the Russians, in violation of their trade agreement, were engaged in propaganda in Great Britain. Mr. Baldwin charges that they bought stolen documents, which is probable—all governments do it—but the sensational raid on Arcos House did not produce any stolen documents, and the information about revolutionary activities was a pathetic fizzle. One Russian had a two-year-old list of addresses of Communist offices in Canada and the United States—which might have been obtained from a telephone book—and of well-known Communist sympathizers; another Russian official who was not supposed to engage in propaganda asked Moscow for more data on British atrocities in China. Another seized document established the falsity of Russian statements—which nobody ever believed—that Borodin was not a Soviet agent.

All this proves that the Soviet Government is no pure, white-winged angel. Like other governments, its agents lie, suborn theft, and violate solemn agreements. As propagandists for a new and theoretically better world order their actions have stood in their own way. Their business was to make a success of Communism at home—if they could—and leave others to their way of life. Instead the Russians have aided revolution where they could, notably in Germany. The result is that they are looked upon with suspicion everywhere and have now lost their trade and political arrangements with England. Whatever else this is, it is not statesmanship.

When all is said and done, however, all governments spy upon each other and steal each other's documents, as Lloyd George frankly stated in the debate in the Commons on May 25. They do not, of course, often seek to overthrow another government, as Mr. Wilson set out to overthrow Huerta and as he tore down the governments of Haiti and Santo Domingo. The fact is that while the United States Government swears friendship to Great Britain, its army and navy staffs are forever working on plans for war with our former ally, and we maintain in London, Paris, and every other capital military and naval attachés who are nothing but recognized spies, sent there for the purpose of discovering, by fair means or foul, everything they can about the military and naval secrets of the country to which they are assigned. The stolen British War Office document is not an isolated incident. On May 24 it was announced in Vienna that two employees of the Austrian Foreign Office had sold important documents to Russia and other countries. It appears that a systematic traffic in the secret papers of the Foreign Office had been going on for a long time; exact copies being offered to every legation in Vienna. The Soviet attaché when arrested possessed the complete correspondence of Austria with England, France, and Italy concerning their joint defense against Bolshevik propaganda. It is also stated that the purchase by French officials of certain Austrian documents was revealed by Premier Poincaré himself. On the same day a Lithuanian general, Kleszinski, was arrested in the act of selling a secret military document to a Russian.

Few Americans will, we suppose, remember that an officer of the United States army, Captain Henry D. Borup, was hastily recalled from Paris in 1892 because in his capacity as American military attaché he was publicly charged not only with buying French military secrets but reselling them to the German and Italian governments "for a consideration." The latter charge was apparently not sustained; for the other, Captain Borup's defense was that all he had done was "absolutely within my legitimate duties as a military attaché of the United States Legation toward a friendly Power." In this he was defended by the London Times, which is now so outraged by the Soviets' doing the same thing. It wrote: "Captain Borup was entitled, even bound, to obtain documents for the benefit of his own country and government. . . . A case similar to that of Captain Borup is spoken of as having occurred at St. Petersburg. In that case the attaché was recalled by his government, but he was afterward appointed to a higher post." Captain Borup remained on the army rolls until he died. Why not? A dispatch to the New York Times defending him declared in these words that this was a universal American practice, officially sanctioned:

> The United States officers who are sent out under what is now known as the Division of Military Information are allowed something like $50 a month to buy documents and plans which may be offered for sale. This sum will not go very far toward securing valuable material anywhere, at home or abroad. . . . He had at his disposal on his personal account some funds which, it is thought, he must have used.

Plainly Captain Borup's only offense was that he got caught. So did the English official who, Premier Baldwin declares, was found to be selling secrets to Russians and so apparently did the British lieutenant commander who now languishes in prison awaiting trial for selling submarine plans and secrets to an as yet unnamed foreign Power. It is a nasty, despicable business, unworthy and reprehensible, but every government indulges in it, and it will continue as long as the war system, with its lying, deceit, and chicanery, is retained.

As for the Russian propaganda, we should like once more to state our position about it. It is physically impossible for any country to exclude such things as the Communist matter originating in Russia. It is impossible to build walls against ideas. Ideas can be fought only with ideas and false assumptions or theories combated with correct ones. The United States, in which the Communist movement is negligible, has nothing to fear from revolutionary doctrines as long as the government is honest, devoted to the people, and just. If the bulk of our people believe the United States is living up to its ideals, nothing on earth can endanger its institutions. The dangerous enemies are within. They are those who pervert American liberties, who would enthrone special privilege and class government in favor of the rich and powerful, who sneer at democracy and openly cry for a dictator.

For Recreation Read the Best

THE four months from May 15 to September 15 are commonly dismissed as dead months so far as the business of books is concerned. Authors groan when their publishers tell them that the biography or the novel which was scheduled for April has been put off until June. The reviewers will be out of town, they say; readers of all classes will be on vacation from the routine of literature as well as from the routine of life; hence their handiwork will be still-born. And in large measure their fears are justified. The publishing world has thus far devised no way of preventing that summer slump which is the curse of so many trades. Or at any rate it has accepted the notion that the slump is necessary, and ceases late in the spring to put forth energetic efforts at supplying the public with important new titles. By the beginning of June, the assumption is, the best of the current offerings will have been selected by critics and readers; and the hope is, no doubt, that a portion of the public will resolve to get that selection read before fall if time and weather favor. Then will come the autumn flood.

The whole question is one that might be gone into with something like the thoroughness of the examination now being made in the London Nation and Athenaeum by John M. Keynes, Michael Sadleir, Stanley Unwin, Basil Blackwell and others, of the British situation with respect to books. Something is wrong, they all more or less agree, with the British public which buys books; it does not buy enough of them, or it buys the wrong ones, or it depends too much on circulating libraries, or it is too seldom made the subject of diligent study by those having to do with the circulation of literature—publishers, agents, booksellers, critics, and perhaps authors themselves. The storm of argument aroused here in the United States by the Literary Guild and the Book-of-the-Month Club is evidence that we have our problems too. And it is plain that we are very far from having saturated our public with good reading matter. The sales of occasional volumes are amazingly large, and there must be those who feel that we have decidedly too many books as it is; but the fact is that the majority of Americans never hear of the best books at all save through accident, and indeed are not prompted, from one year's end to another, to remember that literature is a thing which constantly is in a process of being created.

What, then, to do about the summer? The first thing is to realize that summer is an excellent season for reading, and to recognize that a great many persons do avail themselves of it. We should like to see figures on the numbers and kinds of books consumed in the United States between May and September. We think they would be surprisingly large; and we suspect that they would show an overwhelming preference not for new books at all, or at any rate for light ones, but for classics to which the busy winter has given no decent opportunity, or to long and serious books of the passing year which need leisure for perusal. We suggest to publishers that summer is the season for reprints of famous books, however old—books that citizens are ashamed of never having read. And we recommend that they by no means cease in June to push important titles. Here even is a slogan: "For recreation read the best. You can't forget yourself with a poor book. Forget yourself with one that is worth the price."

Looking Toward Peace

WHEN Aristide Briand, the French Foreign Minister, said last spring that France would be glad to agree with the United States to settle mutual disputes by arbitration and to renounce recourse to war, surprisingly little attention was paid to the suggestion at first, but it has recently crystallized in two definite proposals. The American Foundation, established by Edward W. Bok, has given to the press the draft of a general treaty for the settlement of all international disputes through conciliation, through arbitration by the Permanent Court of Arbitration at the Hague, or otherwise, or through judicial settlement by the Permanent Court of International Justice (World Court). Almost simultaneously, James T. Shotwell of the Carnegie Endowment has made public the draft of an arbitration treaty that could be entered into between the United States and France or any other nation. Mr. Shotwell was assisted in drafting this treaty by Professor J. P. Chamberlain of Columbia University. The proposal has the indorsement of Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University.

While drawn in response to Premier Briand's suggestion, the Shotwell treaty is not limited to France. It is hoped that it may serve also for agreements with Great Britain, Japan, Germany, Italy, and other countries. Its appearance at this hour is especially timely because the Bryan arbitration treaties—with France, Great Britain, and Japan—all expire next year and new agreements are desirable if the movement toward international peace is to continue. The draft treaty of Messrs. Shotwell and Chamberlain is for the most part a combination of the principles and machinery of the Bryan treaties and of those negotiated at Locarno in 1925 between representatives of France, Germany, Belgium, Great Britain, Italy, Poland, and Czecho-Slovakia.

The first article of the proposed treaty renounces war as a means of settling disputes although with some qualifications. The stipulation shall not apply, says Article 2, in the case of "the exercise of the right of legitimate defense, that is to say, resistance to a violation of the undertaking contained in the previous article, provided that the attacked party shall at once offer to submit the dispute to peaceful settlement or to comply with an arbitral or judicial decision." The Monroe Doctrine is also preserved by excepting from the operation of Article 1 "action by the United States of America in pursuance of its traditional policy with reference to the American continents, provided that the United States will use its best endeavors to secure the submission to arbitration or conciliation of a dispute between an American and a non-American Power."

The proposal of the American Foundation is the more comprehensive, as it is a general treaty and includes international disputes of all sorts, even those which are supposed to involve "national honor." It is suggested that the House and Senate, by joint resolution, request the President to call an international conference for adopting the treaty. But the very comprehensiveness of the plan probably militates against its early success. Moreover, the advocates of the plan feel that the entrance of the United States to the World Court is a prerequisite to its adoption. The Shotwell treaty is less ambitious but more immediately realizable. It could be used as the basis of an agreement between the United States and any one other country without reference to our membership in the World Court.

Shall Prosecutors Conceal Facts?

IN an article, Deception According to Law, published in last week's issue of The Nation, Morris Ernst takes exception to a declaration of the Massachusetts Supreme Court in its decision in the Sacco-Vanzetti case. The court held that "A prosecuting officer is violating no canon of legal ethics in presenting evidence which tends to show guilt while failing to call witnesses in whom he has no confidence, or whose testimony contradicts what he is trying to prove." Mr. Ernst challenges this statement, especially the phrase in italics. "What ethical principle," he asks, "justifies a prosecutor in failing to call a witness whose testimony might defeat the plea for conviction?" and he quotes the Canons of Professional Ethics adopted by the American Bar Association and the various oaths of admission to practice in support of his belief that the duty of a public prosecutor is to obtain justice rather than merely to obtain convictions.

In response to a request from The Nation a number of eminent lawyers have replied to the article. William D. Guthrie wrote that he had referred the question raised by Mr. Ernst to the standing committee on professional ethics of the Bar Association of New York City, of which he was then president. The comments of the other lawyers who responded, printed herewith, present an impressive clash of legal opinion on an issue of peculiar public interest and timely importance:

EMORY R. BUCKNER,

Until recently United States District Attorney for the Southern District of New York

In my opinion a prosecuting officer should bring out from any witness whom he puts upon the stand all of the relevant testimony which that witness is prepared to give, whether for or against the prosecutor, and should not leave the adverse part of such witness's testimony to be developed on cross-examination.

A prosecuting officer has no duty to place upon the stand a witness whose testimony he does not believe. I do not think a prosecutor is doing his duty when he places testimony in the record which he does not believe, whether for or against his case. I have myself, in prosecuting cases, often told juries that I believed part of my witness's testimony but not the remainder. In one case, many years ago, I told the jury that I did not believe the testimony of any of the seven witnesses testifying for the prosecution. I did not feel justified in throwing out the case when there were so many witnesses supporting it. The jury promptly acquitted.

I think it is a prosecutor's duty to place witnesses upon the stand whose testimony is adverse to his case if he believes that such witnesses are telling the truth. His job is to develop the truth, not merely to win his case.

If a prosecutor consults expert witnesses, some of whom give their opinion in support of the prosecutor's case and some of whom give their opinion against it, I do not believe it is the duty of the prosecutor to call all of the experts consulted, providing he believes the opinion of those testifying favorably for him to be correct and does not trust the opinion of the adverse experts. After all, expert testimony is only opinion testimony and experts nearly always differ.

When I became United States Attorney a little over two years ago I started a little weekly paper called Scraps for distribution inside the office only. In the edition of this paper for November 7, 1925, I wrote:

> No Assistant United States Attorney is called upon to try either a civil or criminal case or to argue an appeal where he thinks he is wrong. In such cases he should consult with the head of the department in this office and have the case assigned to some one who has the opposite view. If the head of the department shares his view, the case should be dismissed. It does not make any difference what department of the government is interested. We simply will not try a case in this office where we think the government ought not to win. If it is a so-called test case and Washington wishes the case taken to the Supreme Court and we do not believe in it, we should so advise our clients in Washington, and the most we will do under such circumstances is to submit the construction of the statute to the court without argument, frankly stating our reasons for so doing. It may be possible in such cases to bring on the lawyer who is giving us our orders and let him argue the case if he wishes to do so.

ALLEN WARDWELL

I have taken occasion to examine the entire opinion of the Massachusetts court to which Mr. Ernst refers in his article. It seems to me that a reading of the whole decision does not justify the criticism which Mr. Ernst makes. The paragraph preceding that in which the sentence occurs to which Mr. Ernst refers and the paragraph in which that sentence appears seem to indicate that the Massachusetts court in no way differed from the ethical principles expressed in the Canon of the American Bar Association. In fact, the whole context leads me to think that the word "or" in the sentence referred to should be interpreted as "and," so that the sentence which Mr. Ernst refers to would read, "A prosecuting officer is violating no canon of legal ethics in presenting evidence which tends to show guilt, while failing to call witnesses in whom he has no confidence and whose testimony contradicts what he is trying to prove." Be this as it may, it is clear that the court considered whatever evidence there was in the possession of the prosecuting attorney and determined that it was not of a character which required him to present it to the court. Just what evidence would be substantial so as to move the prosecuting attorney to take such a step must, it seems to me, in the first instance be left to his sense of propriety, as obviously he cannot be called upon to bring forward every bit of information, reliable or unreliable, which might cast doubt upon the case which he is attempting to prove. The determination of this question may in some instances be difficult, but no more so than the ethical problems which are presented to any lawyer in almost every phase of the practice of his profession. It seems to me that the Massachusetts court should recognize, as it seems to have done, and as every court should recognize, that if the prosecuting attorney had suppressed or concealed obviously important evidence tending to establish the innocence of the accused, the judgment might be reversed; certainly that the prosecuting attorney is subject to censure.

In view of my ignorance of criminal proceedings I am not in a position to state the practice, but I should suppose there was no doubt that if the prosecuting attorney had substantial evidence tending to prove the innocence of the accused, he ought either to call the attention of the accused's counsel to the evidence or himself present it to the court.

SAMUEL UNTERMYER

I have no hestitation in saying that the declaration of the Massachusetts court that "A prosecuting officer is violating no canon of legal ethics in presenting evidence which tends to show guilt while failing to call witnesses . . . whose testimony contradicts what he is trying to prove" is not in accordance with the ethics of our profession unless the prosecutor is satisfied that the contradictory testimony is false. Even if he believes the witness whose testimony would contradict that of other witnesses is honestly mistaken, it is his duty to place him on the witness stand and let him tell his story.

I incline to the view that the court in laying down this extraordinary rule failed to appreciate the fundamental difference between a public prosecutor and a lawyer at the bar who is representing private interests whether in a civil or a criminal case. And yet the distinction is well defined.

In private controversies the duty of counsel for each party is limited to the presentation of the facts bearing upon the contentions of his client. It is assumed that the lawyer representing the other side of the controversy will do likewise, and that thus the court will be fully informed as to the claims of both parties. It is not the duty of the lawyer for one side to present the facts in favor of the other.

The duty of a public prosecutor is entirely different. It is quite as important a function of the state in the investigation, prosecution, and punishment of crime to shield the innocent as to punish the guilty. That duty extends to the prosecutor as the representative of the state. He is as false to his oath if he suppresses or fails to present evidence that he believes to be credible in favor of the accused as if he were to submit perjured testimony against him.

With all due respect to the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, it is preposterous to suggest that it is consistent with the duty of a prosecutor or with the prevailing Canon of Ethics in our profession for a public officer, ostensibly engaged in the administration of justice, to fail to call a witness whose testimony would contradict a fact that he is trying to establish, unless he is satisfied that that testimony is unworthy of belief. I doubt whether in the length and breadth of the land any man with reputation in the legal profession could be found who would justify such action.

In my judgment there is no necessity for bar associations appointing committees to establish any such fundamental rule of conduct. Rule 5 of the Canons of Professional Ethics of the American Bar Association plainly points out the duty of a lawyer in such a case, and any member of the bar intrusted with the sacred responsibility of administering justice for the state in criminal cases who fails to observe that fundamental rule of common decency is unfit to belong to our noble profession. The prosecutor is as much a minister of justice as the man who sits on the bench.

JULIUS HENRY COHEN

Mr. Ernst calls attention to number five of the Canons of Professional Ethics. This canon and the oath of admission to practice which Mr. Ernst quotes are to be interpreted in the light of the established practice. It was not intended to reverse the usual practice in the trial of criminal cases. It has long been the accepted fact that in presenting cases to the grand jury for purposes of indictment, the district attorney should lay all the facts before the grand jury, leaving to them to determine whether an indictment is justified. In the trial, however, it is his duty to submit evidence to support the indictment. If he has evidence which should acquit the defendant, he should move to dismiss the indictment. Neither side may falsify evidence. Neither side may secrete witnesses. The word "secreting," used in the canons of ethics, means hiding witnesses or documentary evidence, or removing them from the jurisdiction. The words "suppression of facts" mean the affirmative destruction of evidence or prevention of access by the other side. They do not mean withholding the evidence.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the statement by the highest court of Massachusetts concerning the conduct of prosecuting officers is entirely within the established practice and consistent with the canons of ethics and the oath taken by a lawyer.

In my judgment, our present philosophy errs too much on the side of safeguarding the defendant in his rights. Convictions fail because of the right of the defendant to refuse to take the stand and because of the necessity of securing a unanimous verdict from the jury. The challenge to the legal profession demands an answer not alone to the question whether "convictions, rather than justice, should be the prosecutor's aim" but also to the question "Should acquittal, rather than justice, be the aim of counsel for the defendant?" If justice is to be the aim both of prosecutor and defendant's counsel, then each is under duty to lay all the evidence in his possession before the court and the jury. If we are to consider a newer ethical conception for the trial of criminal causes, we must consider the technique both of the prosecution and the defense.

The present method is not in accord with our finer sense of social needs. I find more disappointment, however, in the escape of the guilty, of which we have had too many conspicuous and flagrant examples within the last few years, than in the comparatively rare conviction of defendants in cases where evidence in the possession of the prosecuting officer, if revealed, might have changed the result.

GEORGE GORDON BATTLE

The enlightened opinion of mankind has come to recognize that a criminal trial should be a just and fair investigation to determine whether or not the accused is guilty of the charge. It should not be an assault by the prosecutor upon the defendant with the purpose of convicting him by fair or foul means. It should be in all cases the primary desire of the prosecutor to elicit the truth, and not to convict at all hazards. It may be said that counsel for the defendant is necessarily partisan in his conduct of the defense; that he is under no obligation to bring forward evidence which may be favorable to the prosecution, and that it is against public policy to impose upon the prosecutor obligations and responsibilities which make him less effective than the opposing counsel. The answer to this suggestion is that public opinion is more and more frowning upon the efforts of unscrupulous lawyers to defeat justice. No lawyer would now advance the famous proposition of Lord Brougham to the effect that it was the duty of counsel for the defense to endeavor by any and all means to secure the acquittal of his client even though his efforts might bring about ruin to his country.

Furthermore, there is a difference between the function of the public prosecutor and the private counsel. It is the bounden duty of the public prosecutor, representing the people, to bring out all the facts to the end that justice may be done. This is recognized by the Canon of Professional Ethics adopted by the American Bar Association and quoted by Mr. Ernst. The principle, however, must be interpreted by the district attorney. He is under no obligation to call to the stand witnesses who he has reasonable grounds to believe are mistaken or perjured in their testimony. He is not bound to call witnesses whose testimony would merely obscure the issue and confuse the jury. But it is undoubtedly his duty to call all reliable witnesses who can give legal evidence material to the issue of the guilt or innocence of the defendant. I do not believe that the Supreme Court of Massachusetts intended to lay down any rule that a prosecuting officer is not justified in calling witnesses whose testimony may contradict what he is trying to prove, provided that testimony is reliable, honest, and material. The expression contained in the extract from the opinion of the court is perhaps susceptible of a broader construction than was intended.

Crime must be vigorously prosecuted. Law and order must be maintained. But that result can be better reached by free and fair investigation, in which a zealous and able prosecutor, unhampered by outworn technicalities, can call all witnesses who have knowledge on the subject and thus so far as is possible to human beings bring to light the absolute truth.

A PROFESSOR OF LAW
whose name must be withheld

Mr. Ernst's position is the result of his harboring a very common preconception. He thinks of the governing group existing in a particular geographical area as consisting of all or most of the people in the area. He thinks that the interests of the governing group are the interests of the inhabitants, and that the ethics of both should be the same. If he abandoned his preconception and were more realistic he would see the Government as only one among a number of groups, such as the United States Steel Corporation, the American Federation of Labor, and the Rockefeller Foundation. Further, he would note that the governing group is much smaller in number than he supposes. He would not expect the interests and ethics of the governing group to be the same as those of the other inhabitants, but would rather expect them to be class interests and class ethics. Consequently he would not be surprised in a case like the Sacco-Vanzetti case to find many members of the governing group, including the courts, sharing the feelings of the prosecutor, one of their fellow-members. Nor would he urge, by argument, the governing group to restrict its power by changing its rules.

MAX D. STEUER

> A prosecuting officer is violating no canon of legal ethics in presenting evidence which tends to show guilt while failing to call witnesses in whom he has no confidence, or whose testimony contradicts what he is trying to prove.

As far as the statement of the Massachusetts Supreme Court goes I agree with it absolutely. The side that calls a witness vouches for the credibility of that witness. Necessarily, therefore, the district attorney vouches for the credibility and reliability of a witness called on behalf of the State or the Commonwealth. How could he, therefore, consistently call a witness in whose credibility he does not believe and in whom he has no confidence? The inquiry answers itself.

The particular challenge, however, is directed to the words: "or whose testimony contradicts what he is trying to prove." In other words, should the district attorney be required to call witnesses to contradict his own statement of what the believable facts are? Analyzed, it comes to this: The district attorney first calls witness A, who gives a version of a transaction tending to show guilt on the part of the defendant. Shall he then be required to call witness B to contradict witness A and give a version tending to exculpate the defendant, and then continue until the end of the chapter in the same way? Is there any method by which confusion could be made more confounded? Convictions would be rendered impossible in any case, however clear, if the district attorney was compelled to discredit his own case by calling contradictory witnesses.

The defendant has his own counsel, who knows how to present his side of the case and to whom should be intrusted that duty. This does not, however, mean that the district attorney may suppress evidence. Nor, in my opinion, has the defendant's attorney any greater right in that regard than the district attorney. It is the duty of each to see that all of the evidence in favor of and against the defendant is adduced. If the prosecuting attorney becomes apprised of a witness who could give testimony favorable to the defendant it is his duty to notify the defendant's counsel of that fact—furnishing to the defendant's counsel the name of the witness and his whereabouts—and to afford him every opportunity of access to the witness.

On the other hand it is, in my opinion, just as much the duty of the defendant's counsel to make the same disclosure to the district attorney with respect to any witness of whom he knows who could give evidence in favor of the prosecution.

These Modern Women
In Search of Adventure

ANONYMOUS

[We print herewith the sixteenth of a series of anonymous articles giving the personal backgrounds of a group of distinguished women with a modern point of view. The next article will appear in The Nation for June 22.]

AN attempt to recreate the emotions or the facts of childhood is never easy; for almost everyone it must involve a certain amount of what comes perilously near to being sheer invention.

In my own case the child that was is dim to the woman that is. I can see, as through an inverted telescope, a series of microscopic pictures; a tiny tow-headed figure (two of them in fact, my sister and myself, one almost as detached as the other) moving about a background that shifts between New York, Washington, England, Newport, Long Island, France, and so on. The one that was me always in violent motion, full of spirits and eagerness, with a full measure of the adventures and rebellions, the joys and despairs that make up a thoroughly normal childhood.

Ironically enough, in view of my present interests, I was born at Newport in the early eighties. The earliest of my childish memories concerns a room, a strange, immense, unexpected room, with walls that did not behave as walls should, and a ceiling that was somehow "funny." It is curious how vivid it all remains—especially a hard, bright light and a smell which I have later identified as that of oil paints. A huge portrait still exists of my sister and myself, all fat legs and blue bows, painted by the leading Academician of the day. So probably the memory is of the studio in Rome where the horror was perpetrated, when I was somewhat under two years old.

Another picture, this time a steamer: a low quiet light; the sea still and glassy; myself on deck peering between the rails over which I was too small to see; rows of comfortable ladies on deck chairs consuming tea and taffy, that sweet, sticky stuff provided, thanks be to Heaven, only on Cunarders; everywhere peace and serenity. Suddenly a grinding shock, a shiver through the ship, a grating, wrenching, jerking forward for several seconds, and finally a bump that brought us all to our feet. Then somehow in everybody's mouth the mysterious words, "We're aground." I knew exactly what to expect—a raft, desert island, monkeys, a house in a palm tree, all in the best Crusoe tradition. This in spite of the fact that the shores of Staten Island were still faintly visible in the haze. For the first time I tasted to the full the bitterness of disillusion. I can remember as if it were yesterday the first dreadful doubts that sprang to my mind as I realized that my mother, who had never failed me before, was sitting calmly in her chair, that no joyful activities were on foot, no lashing together of masts to make rafts, no gathering up of water-kegs and axes and all the other delightful paraphernalia of adventure, as I had so confidently anticipated. Something very close to despair filled my soul as it was finally borne in upon me that my island was but a mirage, that dull ships would go on forever sailing to duller destinations. The taste of taffy brings it all back to me, even to the sudden disintegrating nausea of the piece tucked in my cheek throughout the excitement—the piece I spat fiercely into the sea with a feeling that somehow the doors of life had clanged shut upon romance.

This anticlimax was all the more devastating as I had been frankly "scared." It was not until many years later that I realized what a joyful, soul-satisfying sensation the word implies. Always the same rhythm—first an overpowering oppression, a tight clutch at one's throat almost like a physical bond, then the revulsion: a sudden, soaring, wide-flung feeling of delight, of tremendous possibilities just ahead, an intoxicating illusion of sudden power. A sensation to be prized above all others and to be courted in all manner of ways. It is much the same today—whether the occasion be the stalling of an airplane engine low over London, picketing surrounded by a crowd of angry scabs, swimming among sharks, the schooling of a green hunter. Even careening down a steep hill with a drunken taxi-driver, his machine out of control, has its points.

Intense physical pain has a similar effect. After the first oppression, the first grinding annihilation, comes the same revulsion, the same fierce release of the spirit, the same sense of swinging incredibly free above the limitations of an everyday world. Ever since my first child was born, I have known that one day the world's supreme work of art would be created by a woman in childbirth.

But to return to my commonplace and uneventful childhood. Another memory: a calm windless afternoon, a golden sunset—and my pet rabbit, its leg crushed by my clumsiness. The agony of that moment will have power to torture me till the end of my life. After all these years I still waken in a cold sweat, the feel of the soft little body under my foot, its screams ringing through the room.

The scene shifts to a London hotel—my mother, in a dress of flame, coming in to tell us goodnight. I remember my feeling of stunned consternation as I realized she was dining out in England! Actually about to break bread with the British enemy! It seemed an act of unutterable treachery impossible to understand. Obviously the propaganda then fed to the young under the guise of patriotism had borne its fruits.

One more story and I am done. Since I had read "Ben Hur" at the age of six, a small white birthmark on my breast assumed a new interest and was immediately identified as the mark of incipient leprosy. With a feeling part disgust, part triumph, part excitement, I rode into the park on my little old tricycle, debating seriously with myself whether I must not shout "Unclean!" "Unclean!" to the children that rushed up to greet me, and then steal quietly away into the mountains of Palestine. But of course never a sign of all this to parents, governesses, nurses, or indeed to anyone. I would have died before letting a word of it pass my lips.

Commonplace as are these incidents of my childhood, the next phase is even more undramatic. The stage was set for a conventional coming-out, and the normal sequellae to be expected from the daughter of my sort of parents—none of which happened. My father and mother, much to their surprise, were forced to adjust themselves to a "dud" in the family circle. I don't know how seriously they took it, but I do know that life was made uncomfortable for me through an atmosphere of failure, of having somehow not come up to expectations, so much so that I went around with a sense of guilt and rather bitter revolt.

I flatly refused to "come out," but I had not the faintest idea what I did want. I only knew that I was "agin" everything the family wanted—all its traditions, all its theories, all its works. This sense of revolt—my hand against every man, especially against the rich and the established—may have come from something more deep-rooted than the ordinary rebellion of the young against their parents; I don't know, but at any rate, it is even now a fundamental part of my make-up. Some years ago my husband and I were forced to endure several months of intensive police protection. Over and beyond the inevitable nuisance of having a secret-service man at one's elbow morning, noon, and night, was a feeling of resentment, of being in a humiliating position. I had always the sense that the police were the natural enemy, that they and I belonged to different camps. No amount of reasoning could overcome the sensation. I experienced much the same discomfort on my first visit to a steel mill, where even "tapping a heat" for the first time—one of the real thrills of life—could not make me unconscious of the obsequious manager who trailed us from shop to shop, giving me the same humiliating sense of sailing under false colors. What had I to do with the Steel Trust or any of its works?

However, in spite of revolts and rebellions, I managed to have an extremely good time. For several of those years I went in heavily for sports—one in particular with a reputation for danger (in which women rarely competed) affording a most gratifying opportunity to score against hard-boiled masculine competition.

The inevitable young men turned up at times in considerable numbers. I was sent the other day an old letter of my mother's that complained of three diamond solitaires found in a discarded bureau about which, according to her, I professed to have no interest—but flippantly suggested that she attempt to return them to the young men in question, and see whether she might be more successful than I. Her disgust with my behavior, her reluctance to give the offending articles houseroom in her safe, combined with her inability to leave them where she found them, serves to illustrate the difference between the two generations. Incidentally, I have not the slightest recollection of the occurrence.

Then one fine day I made up my mind to shed my present and my past—decided to go out and see the world from a new angle. With a portentous feeling as of one signing a declaration of independence I discarded both my pearls and my maid and, having provided myself with letters of introduction to all the great, the near-great, and the not great at all from Maine to California, I started out with a wise friend. For the first time in my life I was foot-loose—with no family to consider or demonstrate against. We would arrive in a town, having sent our letters ahead, to find a welcome arranged for us by the leading citizens perhaps, or by a puzzled mayor—both quite uncertain whether they were to deal with lady adventuresses, uplifters, or a new brand of drummer. One of my most cherished possessions is a card from a bell-hop in a Los Angeles hotel to his friend in San Francisco, tenderly inscribed: "Be good to these girls." As a pendant to this story was a perfectly impersonal, almost public proposal of marriage, after a few hours' acquaintance, by a tory statesman, very rich and pompous, evidently because he felt it was expected of him. We had all manner of joyful adventures and collected I. W. W.'s, big-game hunters, reactionary Senators, Socialists, stodgy captains of industries, single taxers, a whole-hog Tolstoian, college professors, and editors galore—even a Hindu agitator. It was a good trip and things began to move from then on.

I cannot remember just when or how I first became interested in the suffrage movement—but I do know that it came more through my active interest in liberal politics than through the usual resentment against women's political discrimination per se. Many of my family had held elective offices of one kind and another. I remember more than once dining with an ex-President who took me into the smoking-room to talk politics with the men after the women had left the table, and it never struck me that this was in any way unusual. I had not learned to think of myself in terms of a downtrodden and disfranchised female.

I walked in the first suffrage parade and in some later ones as a matter of course and without feeling that I was doing anything significant. My family were opposed, equally as a matter of course, but I cannot remember that that particular bone of contention was ever seriously worried between us. As time went on, I joined actively in the suffrage fight and gave considerable time to it, but I must admit that quite aside from the essential justice of the proposition, I saw women largely as a new group of voters. I worked to help enfranchise them with even more interest in their responsibilities than in their rights.

Since then, in the language of the booster, more adventures and better adventures have come into my life—some successes, some reverses—but no more negations, no further futilities. Some years ago I marked down, pursued, and captured one of the few really big men I have ever known—"one who never turned his back but marched breast forward"—and lived happily and gloriously ever after.

My interests have continued to be specialized along actively political lines. My feminism has broadened and become more human, more understanding, especially in my belated recognition of the vital importance of economic independence for women, and the need of constructive action to make that possible for the average wife and mother.

On one point, however, I take direct issue with orthodox feminists, many of whom assume that the bearing of children is a burden and a handicap, and that men's exemption therefrom constitutes an asset. I disagree. In the first place many women tend to over-emphasize the question of physical pain; and in the second, even if one admits that the adventure of child-bearing "gums the game" for a certain period, there is no reason for assuming that this in itself constitutes a cost too high to be borne with eager, glorying equanimity; nor that because he is free from it man has essentially the better part. Personally I would not change, abate, or sacrifice any part of my own job.

My feminism tells me that woman can bear children, charm her lovers, boss a business, swim the Channel, stand at Armageddon and battle for the Lord—all in the day's work!

The Reign of the Masonry Dome

By ELBERT PEETS

IF you wish to measure the revolution that steel, the elevator, and desk-worship have caused among architectural values, nothing will help you so much as to know what the full meaning of the dome was to Michelangelo and his time. For the dome reigned over architecture during the generations that built St. Peter's—became, indeed, the center of a school of architectural effort striving to realize an ideal that was more clearly seen, one must think, than any other that has given energy to art. That ideal was the perfect dome-centered building.

We now can quite easily reproduce the shapes of domes by bending a few steel beams or by cementing together a few layers of hard thin tiles. But we have lost the desire to know the dome as a perilous heroic adventure in building. Engineering has so far outdistanced daily experience that it has become a sort of magic that will protect us and serve us, though we cannot understand it. We enter the Woolworth building without any sense of fear. But in the living days of stone-arch building, a kind of fear was part of the beauty of architecture. Burke was right, joining awe and sublimity. The people of Rome who walked under the dome of St. Peter's in 1590 did not lightly accept the ceiling above them as a pretty surface held up there by some clever mechanical trick. They and their fathers and great-grandfathers had seen the ox-teams pulling creaking cartloads of great stones up through the Borgo, and they repeated stories of the oak forests cut for scaffolding. The oriental proverb that arch and dome never sleep was more to them than a pretty saying. The cultivated among them, at least, felt that enormous mass of stone as a membered whole alive with symmetrical thrusts, frictions, compressions, and coherences.

And it was this sublime monster, the masonry dome, that Bramante, Leonardo, Michelangelo, and Vignola dreamed of raising to a kingship over architecture more absolute than it had ever had in Rome or in Byzantium. Their ideal was a building whereof every stone should serve the dome that crowned it. They wanted to embody in a building—in a whole city if you would let them—the complete unfolding of the mechanical and formal significance of the dome principle. They saw in the old long-naved basilicas and Gothic churches merely a practical housing for congregations; each bay of them was a unit, but there was no inevitable structural law that fixed the number of bays. Identical bays, too, performed different functions, and identical functions were performed by dissimilar members—these being the very errors most hated by architectural logic. Brunelleschi's fine dome at Florence has for supports three compact apses and an arch of the wide high nave. Clearly, the mass of the dome bears down equally on all four sides: would it not then, if freed from arbitrary human interference, create for itself exactly equal supports, identical in form because equal in strength? The supporting members, to be sure, might be grouped and modeled so that they could do their work better or in order to honor the dome, both inside and out, with a series of contrapuntal echoes interpreting or completing its form. But every section taken through the vertical axis of the dome must be symmetrical.

Gothic architecture is constantly spoken of as spiritual and the taste of the Renaissance is called sensual. That is in part because the barbaric splendor of the Gothic has worn or been torn away and in further part because modern eyes see the color of Renaissance interiors but not their structural and formal unity. The Gothic is rich in the vertical lines which by a crude symbolism we call spiritual. But the popes and architects of the Renaissance, masters of geometry and formal logic, made for their spirituality a symbol in harmony with their intelligence, planning churches that would draw the whole earth up to a single point, huge complexes mastered by a single law. They must have smiled at the Gothic builders who laid their churches upon a line drawn from the cross in the market square to the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem and, it is said, sometimes bent their main axis to symbolize the bent body of the crucified Christ. Bramante and Michelangelo built St. Peter's on a line running from the center of the earth to the zenith of the heavens. They sought to symbolize, by incarnating it, the absolute truth of the syllogism that was the core of their art: "If the functions are the same, then the forms are the same."

The unity that I am ascribing to the dome-centered building was not a requirement of clerical mysticism—its great enemy and final victor, in fact, was the Latin cross and the traditional processions of the Cult. The architects of the sixteenth century strove for the perfect solution of the dome composition because that was the great professional problem that history and the thought of the time assigned to them, just as the most vital work of our architects is being put into the solution of the tower office-building. It was the good fortune of the sixteenth century that artist and engineer were still one man and that, further, the technical and aesthetic command over the sole material, stone, was so complete that only ultimate problems remained for solution. Such a problem was St. Peter's—the attainment of structural-formal perfection in a domed building so large that human beings, even in great crowds, could not sense the actual size of a larger one.

Michelangelo was the most skilful worker in stone of his time. So he built St. Peter's. He built it as a demonstration of absolute logic and unfettered skill in stone building. When he walked, in imagination, through his design, as an architect loves to, he felt the separate existence of every member, felt the relation of each member to all the rest, the economy and sufficiency of its form, its part in the work, what forces bore upon it, how they were met. He read the whole building, solid and surface and void, as we read a lyric, with, instead of the approximate likeness of rhyme and meter, the abounding floods of symmetry in his church, and instead of the poem's charming play of ideas, some thousands of tons of stone hanging, in an intricate equilibrium, over his head. But how can you set down precisely the meaning to the human mind and body of participation in the phenomenon of an ideally organized mass supported equally by four ideally suitable and ideally placed supports? That might be the formula for a saw-horse—to Michelangelo it meant a universe in which accident had no part, a tangible rendering of man's greatest aesthetic creation, the concept law. For law in the abstract he substituted the laws his hand and eye could know: gravitation, the coherence of stone, geometry. Set in play, these laws produced a vast masonry dome crowning a building devoted wholly to the dome's physical support and formal amplification. And so was fulfilled the desire of the Renaissance for absolute law in the disposition of space-inclosing stone—for absolute dignity, mastery, amplitude, elegance, and reason in the shaping of stone-surfaced space.

These skyscrapers we see springing up around us are sometimes lovely and in groups they often have a rugged alpine picturesqueness. But they know as little of Michelangelo as a vaudeville theater knows of Sophocles. His titanic logic is forgotten, the materials and forms he struggled with have become ridiculous toys. Well, our task is to form ideals for steel and to realize them. Perhaps it is in self-defense that we prefer not to think of other labors. But whoever wishes to know the heights of the human mind must try to know Michelangelo's vision, a huge dome-centered building, as simple and as clearly formed by law as a sunflower or a snow-flake.

The Camera Learns to Lie

By SAMUEL TENENBAUM

OPPONENTS of tabloid journalism are becoming vocal. They are accusing it of vulgarity and bad taste. They are even making more serious charges, namely, that it is helping to spread sexual morbidity and immorality and criminality. Nowhere, however, have I seen an attack on its outstanding characteristic—the pictures it uses so abundantly. Defenders of tabloid journalism—and there are many such—have listed this characteristic prominently among the tabloid's virtues. Of the theories advanced to explain its phenomenal and overnight success, the most plausible is the "see and believe" theory.

The camera cannot lie. This belief in pictures is almost pathetic. To some extent the fact that errors, exaggerations, and, what is worse, deliberate lies creep into the news columns is known, but this new medium—pictures—the public accepts at its face value.

Even a cursory examination of tabloids shows that the type of pictures desired are of a surface, emotional nature. These pictures must have "news" value, just like "worded" news. Hence, the good cameraman, like the good reporter, is the one who can give this "news value" to his pictures. Ordinary pictures can be got by the score—anywhere. But the tabloid does not want ordinary pictures. It wants news pictures, and the photographer has learned to play tricks with his camera to get them.

A little more than a year ago a child was missed from the lower East Side, the Ghetto district of New York City. At first it was believed that the child had been kidnapped. Later his body was found in the East River, in which, it was established, he had accidentally fallen. This was a splendid opportunity for tabloids and Hearst newspapers to weep buckets of tears. I was then working on one of the city newspapers, and was assigned to the story. A cameraman came along with me, of course. He gathered a group of children in the neighborhood and told them to take out their handkerchiefs and make believe they were crying. The caption, when the picture was published, ran something like this: "'When will Sammy come back?' his playmates ask."

One of the reporters hoisted himself to a fire-escape and waved in the air a stick with a loud bell attached to the end. Many tabloid cameramen carry such contraptions around with them as part of their paraphernalia. Naturally, a crowd was attracted by his antics. They probably thought the reporter had gone mad. Meanwhile a photographer on the opposite side of the street snapped a picture of the crowd. When printed, the explanation stated that all day throngs had gathered around the stricken house, "aroused by the sinister crime." There were pictures—almost two pages of them—of mothers hiding babies in all sorts of strange places to prevent possible kidnapping; there were pictures showing the child's brother, three months old, and the parents weeping over the misfortune; there was a picture of the detective questioning the parents for clues; there were pictures of cellars in the neighborhood.

These pictures were obtained as the first two were. They were first conceived in the brain of the photographer; he then found persons to make the original conception a reality. Rarely does one come across a picture that can be taken as it is, that does not need fixing up.

There comes to my mind a story boastfully told to the rest of the staff by one of our star reporters. He was sent to interview the father of the demented Noel boy, who killed a child, a year or two ago, in New Jersey. The man refused to see reporters. Our star saw himself coming back to the office without a story, an indignity he refused to accept. The reporter and the photographer put their heads together. The next morning our paper carried a photograph of a notice written in a scrawling hand to this effect: "For God's sake stay out, or there will be another crime committed." The notice was apparently signed by the boy's father and was attached to the door. A caption underneath the picture stated that a noted alienist had examined the son's and the father's handwriting and found a remarkable resemblance between the two. The story was a fabrication from start to finish. The reporter and the cameraman had written the notice and then found a door on which to attach it.

Many of the pictures that come into the office are supplied by syndicates and associations. It frequently happens that the information about them is meager. Even the staff cameramen often bring into the office good pictures with very little information. The copyreader puts his imagination to work, and interesting, if not accurate, reading matter is produced.

Besides this conscious twisting of truth, there are the conniving publicity agents who are growing so rapidly in number and importance that they threaten to make it impossible for even the honest reporter to get at the facts of a story. The publicity man contrives to make his pictures appear unusual. It is for this reason we see so many freak poses—an actress lying on a cake of ice to keep cool, another hugging a young lion, a third getting out of a milk bath, a fourth undergoing a peculiar operation, a fifth distributing handbills for something or other. For the most part these pictures are the products of the publicity agent's fertile imagination.

The camera is still in its infancy. What new tricks may be developed with its aid it is difficult to foretell. The newspaper camera may yet compete with the movie camera in inventing and perfecting new tricks to fool the eye.

In the Driftway

THE new United States Attorney in New York City, Charles H. Tuttle, is disturbed over what he calls the decreased sanctity of the oath in the modern courtroom. Presumably he means that witnesses, having sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, lie more than they used to. As to this the Drifter has no information, but the administration of the oath and the assumption that a witness should thereby do less lying in court than otherwise strikes the Drifter as one of the many absurd survivals of medievalism in our judicial system. A presumption of truthfulness as well as a presumption of innocence should exist until the contrary has been proved. Our present attitude is virtually the negation of this; it is a presumption that a witness's word cannot be relied upon unless he first raises his right hand and murmurs assent to an incantation mumbled by the clerk of the court which ends "So help me God." This attitude, the Drifter submits, is an insult to anybody of normal honesty and no deterrent to one who has any temptation toward lying.

* * * * *

TO what extent one is justified in lying is one of the oldest of questions. It makes a good deal of difference, of course, on the definition. A lawyer once described a lie as a misleading statement made to one who has the right to know the truth, not to one who hasn't a right to know it. This is a pretty good definition. It rightly includes as lies statements which are literally correct if they mislead somebody who ought not to be deceived. On the other hand, the definition does not include as lies even untrue statements if made to persons who haven't any business to know the truth or to those who for various reasons would be more injured through knowledge than through ignorance. It excludes what we call social lies and untruths told to people presumably for their good.

* * * * *

THIS definition of a lie, excellent as it seems to be, is broader and more exclusive than that implied by the oath administered in our courts. But what of results? Do people tell any more truth in court than out of it? Is there any reason why they should? When King Edward VII was the Prince of Wales he declared that in a case involving a lady's honor he would, if necessary, perjure himself "like a gentleman." Probably most persons go further. Most persons would justify lying on the witness stand—at least a little—to protect a friend provided nobody else was injured thereby. If the Drifter is ever summoned to court as a witness he hopes to be able to tell the truth, but he will try to use his intelligence, and he is sure that the administration of the oath will not make the slightest difference unless it is to annoy him a little.

* * * * *

TRUTHFULNESS is a civilized virtue; it is on the increase. If Mr. Tuttle finds less of it in the courts than formerly, the trouble is with the courts rather than the witnesses. We shall never increase the so-called sanctity of the oath; it is a bit of outworn liturgy that were better abolished. As to raising the average of truthfulness among witnesses, that will come only when the courts gain greater respect—through more expedition, more probity, and more justice.

The Labors of Harriet Beecher Stowe

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Carl Sandburg in his life of Lincoln says that my mother, Harriet Beecher Stowe, "worked hard and for thirteen years had done most of the washing and sewing for the family." From the first of her married life till she wrote "Uncle Tom's Cabin" she had a most efficient housekeeper and two hired maids. "She cut and sewed her husband's coats," he says. If my father had ever ventured abroad in any garment my mother could have made he would have been locked up for a tramp or an escaped bedlamite. "And, besides, was a cobbler cutting leather soles and nailing leather heels onto uppers she had cut and sewed so as to lace the shoes up behind." If my mother had ever made my father a pair of shoes to lace up behind, like Job's wife he would have cursed God and died.

Mussolinied Prosperity

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: A letter to me, dated Turin, Italy, April 22, says among other things:

> All the really necessary and essential things have increased enormously in price. Everybody is of the opinion that, in order to satisfy the lower classes, Mussolini is allowing the prices to go up as high as possible before stabilizing the lira. France and Italy are the only countries where the currency still fluctuates, and, consequently, affairs are . . . what they are, that is deplorable for the middle classes, or people with only a regular income. I will quote a few prices: In October oil was 10.50 the kilo; now 15. Potatoes, 90; now 1.30. Bread, 1.80; now 3.25. It is the same with polenta, rice, butter, coffee, pasta. Green vegetables, at least most of them, are prohibitory. Dollars have never been so low as now. Last August $100 were worth 2,800 lire; now 1,900.

New Orleans Makes a Correction

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: New Orleans owes The Nation thanks for its excellent work in promoting flood control and appreciates the great value of the publicity given the Valley's necessities. But we feel constrained to request the correction of a damaging error in your editorial of May 25. "At New Orleans the waters have risen five feet in forty-eight hours," you say, "in spite of the dynamited Poydras levee, which was to have given relief to the city."

The facts are that the greatest rise ever known here was six-tenths of a foot during twenty-four hours of May 10-11, 1912, and the greatest rise this year was five-tenths of a foot in twenty-four hours April 14-16. The rise of 1912 was assisted by a storm. It is a physical impossibility for the Mississippi River to rise five feet in two days. The greatest rise since the dynamiting of the Poydras Crevasse was four-tenths of a foot during May 12-14. The Poydras Crevasse is a complete success and is now about 3,200 feet wide. New Orleans is doing all it can for the flood sufferers on the western side of the Mississippi in Louisiana and in other States through the Red Cross and other means, and for herself and them asks continued support of plans for flood control.

Railroad Valuation

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your comment on the recent decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission which held that railroad valuations must be based on 1914 prices seems to me misleading. The valuation theory adopted by the commission is not the theory championed by the late Senator La Follette. In fact, the basis of valuation used by the commission was bitterly attacked by La Follette in his later years.

The Progressives in general and La Follette in particular long urged the use of "prudent investment" as the proper rate base. The basis approved by the commission in the St. Louis and O'Fallon Railway case was cost of reproduction as of 1914 for property constructed prior to 1914; cost of reproduction at the prevailing prices for property constructed between June 30, 1914, and June 30, 1919; and actual cost for property constructed subsequently. Depreciation was, of course, deducted. Land was taken at current prices, not at 1914 prices. The resulting valuation is not "prudent investment"; it is considerably higher. Prices of labor and materials were rising from 1896 to 1914, and of course continued to rise until 1921. It is probable that values based on 1914 prices are in excess of original cost. Furthermore, the practice of valuing land at current prices instead of at 1914 prices gives the full benefit of the unearned increment to the railroads, again resulting in valuations in excess of "prudent investment" or of actual sacrifice on the part of investors. Since more than one-half the total investment in land of some railroads is in valuable terminal properties, where land values are rapidly and constantly rising, the increasing burden put upon commerce by this method of valuation is considerable.

Great Britain—Seven or One

By ALBIN E. JOHNSON

Geneva, May 1

WHEN the League of Nations was founded and its opponents in the United States were frantically seeking arguments against Washington's adherence, one of the most effective charges against it was that by virtue of its six self-governing Dominions and India the British Empire would have seven votes to one—provided equality of membership was granted to all.

Today, eight years after the Geneva organization started functioning, British statesmen are working overtime to hold the Commonwealth together—or else their maneuvering around the League of Nations halls is a brilliant bit of camouflage. The last gesture of Downing Street indicates that where fearful Americans lost sleep over "seven votes against one" for England, the Foreign Office is really more concerned in establishing "one vote for seven" for the empire. And by a technical establishment of this theory, Sir Austen Chamberlain has again loosed the tempest, and brought about an open revolt which probably will be heard from when the Assembly convenes in September—if not before.

It happens that the Irish Free State, in the person of its permanent envoy, Mr. Michael MacWhite, ex-Foreign Legionnaire, Sinn Feiner, and soldier of fortune, and the Canadian Government, in the person of Dr. W. A. Riddell, maintain official watchdogs at Geneva to safeguard the interests of their respective countries. Likewise they send influential delegations to the Assembly and participate independently in international conferences held under the auspices of the League and International Labor Office.

In the Council, however, like forty-two other members of the League, they are not represented although at the last Assembly both Sir George Foster, head of the Canadian Delegation, and Desmond Fitzgerald, Foreign Minister of the Free State, declared categorically that they maintained their right to become candidates for the Council and claimed absolute equality in their membership in the League with Great Britain and other nations.

The Irish even went so far as to establish a precedent by becoming a candidate for a Council seat, and polled a respectable number of votes. Canada, by virtue of a tacit understanding among the Dominions, was slated to be a joint candidate next fall and was sure of election as "representative" of the Dominions, under the theory of "group interests."

But something has gone awry. Great Britain, through Sir Austen, sought to act as spokesman in the last Assembly, when the Foreign Minister stated that none of the Dominions was a candidate for a seat on the Council. The assumption brought about the situation mentioned above, with even Australia and South Africa voting for Ireland and the Chief Indian Delegate personally expressing his regrets to Mr. Fitzgerald that he had not been permitted to dictate the way the Indian vote was to be cast.

The Imperial Conference came along. The Commonwealth representatives agreed on a new form of international treaty, wherein each government was to sign its own international engagements, independent of the government of Great Britain. Sir Austen Chamberlain was "authorized" to make a statement to this effect before the Council of the League. He did. Attending the session were Mr. MacWhite, Dr. Riddell, Sir Joseph Cook of Australia, and other representatives of the Dominions, as "observers."

In his verbal statement to the Council Sir Austen said in part: "I should add that I make this statement at the express desire of all the governments represented at the Imperial Conference."

But in the confidential minutes of the session (C/ 44th session/P. V. 4 [1]) is found the following insertion, evidently put into the record by the British Spokesman when he revised the proof for the Official Record: "I sit here as the representative of Great Britain and the Dominions." And then follows: "But the Dominions sit in the Assembly in their own names."

Ignorant of the revised statement that a fortnight later appeared in the Official Minutes (which are distributed to all governments) the Dominion representatives who attended the Council for the express purpose of "assisting" in the enunciation of a new principle in the formulation of international treaties reported to their governments that all was well. Then after the fait accompli the attention of the envoy of the Irish Free State was called to the official altered version.

As the matter stands, the Dominions are "equal" members so far as the Assembly of the League is concerned; they can also participate independently in international conferences and accept or reject treaties; but in the Council of the League, which is the real governing power of the organization, they are "represented" by the Foreign Minister of Great Britain. That is, if the pronunciamento of Sir Austen Chamberlain remains unchallenged.

League circles are puzzled. The question of equality, made amply clear at the last Assembly by Ireland's and Canada's strong stand, is again in the fire. The skeleton is rattling in the closet. In the Seanad Eireann a suspicious Senator, Mr. O'Farrell, asked Minister Fitzgerald point blank: "What about it?" He wanted to know if the Irish Free State had been duped at the Imperial Conference, or if Sir Austen had overshot his mark. Fitzgerald replied:

"The statement: 'I sit here as representative of the British Dominions' was not a justifiable statement and is not in accordance with facts." The challenge is passed directly back to Sir Austen by the Irish Free State at least. In the last Assembly Sir George Foster said: "I think it is right at this stage to say to this Assembly and to the League that we consider we have equal rights of representation on the Council and otherwise with everyone of the fifty-six members of the League and we do not propose to waive this right." What Ottawa intends to do, when it is informed of the situation, remains to be seen. Without any doubt the government of South Africa and also the administration in Australia will be heard from—unless, at the Imperial Conference, the Dominions surrendered something they had fought long and hard to secure.

"Equality" is an illusion at Geneva; none insist that Abyssinia and Panama are equal with France and Japan and Great Britain and Germany. But for the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations the word has another meaning. The status they gained through blood and money sacrifices in the World War will not be easily surrendered, either in theory or in fact.

Spring Novels and "The Magic Mountain"

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IN its Spring Book Number The Nation included the names of ninety-five works of fiction in a list of "notable new books." Since that time most of them (as well, of course, as innumerable others) have appeared and some have doubtless already been forgotten. Yet there was, at least, no lack of variety here. Ranging in time from "The Tale of Genji," which Lady Murasaki wrote in the eleventh century, on through a new twelve-volume edition of the novels of Benjamin Disraeli, to the present; ranging in mood from the flippant assurance of Michael Arlen's "Young Men in Love" to the high seriousness of Thomas Mann's "The Magic Mountain"; and ranging in manner from the sledge-hammer denunciations of Sinclair Lewis's "Elmer Gantry" to the gentle ironies of Sylvia Townsend Warner's "Mr. Fortune's Maggot," these novels dealt with every conceivable subject, exemplified every conceivable technique, and reflected every conceivable state of mind. Hungry presses accepted the most diverse sorts of material and hungry readers eagerly devoured what these presses gave out.

Nor did the numerousness of the works printed and read predispose readers to demand brevity. Miss Townsend's tale was brief but most of the other important works published during the spring made considerable demands upon the peruser's time. "Elmer Gantry" was a substantial book, Francis Brett Young required two volumes for his "Love is Enough"; both the "Tale of Genji" and Romain Rolland's "The Soul Enchanted" have already reached a third volume without yet being complete; and "The Magic Mountain," though published all at once, extends to the prodigious length of four hundred thousand words. In spite of all that may be said of the hurry of the present age, there are obviously many who have time both to read and to write.

But if one turns from such statistics and seeks to discover the meaning of this flood of words one will find it equally difficult to deduce either the Spirit of the Age or any aesthetic creed. While Mr. Lewis reveals both his social passion and his faith in the semi-didactic naturalistic novel, Miss Warner abandons herself to fancy and adopts the tradition which came down from Voltaire to Anatole France; while Donn Byrne writes "Brother Saul" in the facile style of old-fashioned romance, Edwin Muir tells the story of "The Marionette" in the subtle sentences which are the result of his effort to achieve a scrupulous exactitude; and while Anne Douglas Sedgwick upholds the genteel tradition in "The Old Countess," Hanns Ewers pursues the pathological frisson through the pages of his grisly "Sorcerer's Apprentice." On the basis of these spring novels it would be possible to seem to prove anything, and hence really possible to prove nothing at all. Every variety of fiction had both its practitioners and its admirers.

Undoubtedly, however, the one work upon the list which stands out above all the others is Thomas Mann's "The Magic Mountain." It is a massive work which represents several years of labor on the part of a novelist whose fame was already great, and it is worthy of him—but this is not all that can be said of it. Other established writers have recently issued books which sustain their reputations, but none have this year published anything so new and so vital. The extraordinary, almost morbid sensitivity which Mann has before exhibited is here again revealed, and so, too, is the mastery of detail which marked "Buddenbrooks," his other massive novel; but here also it is made evident that his style, beautiful and individual though it was, had not before and probably has not even now completed its evolution. For not since Marcel Proust published the first volume of "A la Récherche du Temps Perdu" has anything appeared in which a new form was so completely mastered.

Mann has come nearer than any other contemporary writer to solving a problem of which innumerable students of contemporary fiction have been acutely aware. Obviously "ideas" cannot be neglected in the writing of modern fiction; they are, as H. G. Wells has argued, quite as much a part of the life of a modern hero as deeds; and yet most people now feel that Mr. Wells and his followers succeeded in introducing "ideas" only by destroying fiction, which became in their hands little more than a sugar-coated treatise supplied with an exordium. Mann, on the other hand, though his novel is concerned with intellectual movements more, perhaps, than it is concerned with anything else, has succeeded in remembering always that his business is with the imagination. In his novel "ideas" appear not so much for themselves as for the moods which they generate, and what one gets is not argument but a diffused sense of the effect which the intellectual atmosphere of their times has upon the characters. "Ideas" are there in plenty, but they are always seen though a temperament and used as the materials of art.

Vast as is its scale one does not get from it the impression of anything unwieldy or sprawling. So perfectly is it proportioned and so completely are all its details held in hand by the author that when one has finished it one seems to have read not one of the longest modern novels but a perfectly rounded conte, since the thing which is left in the mind is an absolutely unified impression. And yet this perfection of execution is achieved in the case of a work planned in a radically new way and intended to accomplish something never accomplished before. Readers of the story called Tristram in the collection entitled "Death in Venice" will find the mood of the book there foreshadowed, but they will get from it alone no conception of the magnitude of the new book nor of the astonishing art which has enabled its author to tell the whole story of the modern mind without violating the unity of the single impression which he creates.

"The Magic Mountain" does not lend itself easily to imitation. It is a creation, not a formula, and very likely it will not, for that very reason, serve as the beginning of a new school. One cannot easily imagine another work of fiction "like it"; but so great is its achievement in an essentially new direction that it will, I fancy, be the most influential as well as the greatest of the season's novels.

Moral Criticism

By HAVELOCK ELLIS

THE criticism of critics is today an occupation actively pursued. The reason is that there are now so many critics. And there are so many critics because criticism has become the business not only of the few who regard it as a lifelong vocation but of the many who find it the best preparation for their life's vocation, all the ardent young spirits who, in order to find their own place in the world, feel the need to scrutinize searchingly the significant figures imposed on them as leaders.

The volume of "Études," in which Jacques Rivière appeared before the world at the age of twenty-six, is a typical example of this sort. Rivière was not primarily interested in literature; he had set himself to explore the world in general and his own soul in particular (his lately published intimate correspondence with Alain-Fournier, to whom he dedicated the "Études," reveals his aims), but he realized at the outset that to situate himself in the world he must grapple with those figures of his time in literature and painting and music which he instinctively felt to be significant, and his instinct proved right, for all now recognize that significance, even though Rivière himself, when twelve years later, shortly before his early death two years ago, he republished the book, was keenly conscious of its critical inadequacy.

I mention Rivière because it is from him that Mr. Ramon Fernandez claims to proceed.* This does not mean that in any narrow sense he is a disciple. In an introductory In Memoriam (omitted in the translation and rightly, for it comes in rather awkwardly) the author of "Messages" makes clear that the special value of Rivière for those who knew him was as a medium in which each could freely develop his own personality. It would therefore be idle to discuss the relation to Rivière of Mr. Fernandez. He has his own strongly marked personality.

It may not be unreasonable to find to some extent the clue to that personality in heredity and upbringing. Mr. Fernandez was born in Mexico and belongs to a distinguished family, his father having been at one time Mexican Minister to France; his mother is southern French and he was himself taken as a child to France, where he has ever since chiefly lived. We may thus understand his large international outlook and in part—not entirely, for it is mainly temperamental—the influence exerted on him by writers of English origin. Of the ten figures dealt with in this volume five have written in English (Meredith, Newman, Pater, Conrad, and T. S. Eliot); of the others one is German (Freud) and another (Maritain) possesses, as probably Mr. Fernandez would admit, little significance outside France; there remain Stendhal, Balzac, and Proust.

As "Etudes" was Rivière's first book, so "Messages" is the first book of Mr. Fernandez, produced at a less youthful age, and the work of a more mature thinker, indeed one who from the outset, we may be sure, bore the impress of more decisive individuality than the supple and sensitive Rivière, wave-like and diverse; we should expect to find in the man of Spanish race a "convinced individualist," as Mr. Fernandez describes himself, while the Spanish flavor we so often detect in Rivière's native Gascony is but a faint infusion. The title of this book must be read in the favorite English sense; the men here discussed have come to the author with a "message."

That may suggest, and I think rightly, that Mr. Fernandez is fundamentally a moralist, a moralist who appears before us wearing the mask—certainly an excellent mask—of the critic. Naturally, that is not the way he would himself put it. In the admirable introductory essay of the volume, no doubt the most recently written as well as the most notable, Mr. Fernandez sets forth his own conception of his task as being that of a philosophic critic, that is, as he understands it, a critic who is not content to discuss a work of art for its own sake, technical or historical, but to seek out its "spiritual dynamism" and to ascertain what place it is entitled to occupy in the human universe. There is much of subtle and suggestive value throughout the volume, of a "philosophic," or, one might say, philosophically psychological character, especially concerning the relation of an author's work to his "personality," which it is not possible to deal with in a summary review.

But the author's ultimate interests are always less with thought than with activity in the world, and the "spiritual dynamist" is what in common English we call a "moralist." He frequently, we note, uses the word "spiritual," a word which some English critics consider meaningless, but he is careful to explain that he means by it "the internal unification of concrete experience." We may compare Mr. Fernandez with the leading English critic of the Victorian age of fifty years ago, with Matthew Arnold and his "Essays in Criticism." There was a vital difference, for Arnold was a master of prose, which Mr. Fernandez at present can scarcely claim to be, but Arnold also set forth "messages," which to him came chiefly from France, as those of Mr. Fernandez chiefly from England, and equally with the Frenchman Arnold would have repelled the idea of being a moralist, though that "joyful sense of creative activity" which for him was the essence of criticism is not far from the "spiritual dynamism" of Mr. Fernandez.

A radical impulse to seek out the motive forces of living is apt to make a searching and ruthless critic, and such Mr. Fernandez often proves himself to be. His essay on the method of Balzac is in this respect characteristic, though it is not of his best. It is partly based on the youthful aprioristic method of starting with arbitrary definitions and classifying in accordance with those definitions. Here there is much fine-spun distinction between the "novel" and the "narrative." It is a method of criticism I can sympathize with, for I recall how in youth I used to maintain precisely the same thesis and even to cite the same work, "Madame Bovary," as the type of the "novel." Such academic exercise is good in youth, but now seems to me supremely indifferent. As one grows older one realizes that to appreciate a work of art the critic must put himself in the situation out of which that work sprang, reproducing to himself the artist's vision of it (that is what the academic critic shrinks from to fall back into mechanical classification), so that when we have grasped the world the artist has created we may judge how far he has succeeded and how far his success has for ourselves any human value. We cast aside rigid artificial categories, which is why, as Croce has truly observed, criticism is so much more difficult than is commonly supposed. Here Mr. Fernandez so cruelly analyzes the method of Balzac that we begin to ask ourselves how he accounts to himself for Balzac's fame in the world, until at the last moment he reveals the fine critic he is and concisely sums up what remains significant in the genius of Balzac.

Even more characteristic, and not less searching, is the attitude of Mr. Fernandez toward Proust. There is on the surface an apparent contradiction in his feelings about Proust: on the one hand an immense admiration; on the other a severe critic, eager to deny that he is a "Proustian." But the ambiguity scarcely exists for anyone who has entered into the spirit of Mr. Fernandez. We are here brought to the core of his problem, the problem, as he himself expresses it, of "the spiritual experience of the nineteenth century" and the question of what it furnishes "to assure to human life a better return." The human organism has, even anatomically, a sensory aspect and a motor aspect. On the sensory it reflects the images of the external world, and Proust (I am not here following Mr. Fernandez) stands out as the revealer, in an exquisite degree never before attained, of such sensory images. So keen an attentiveness, so absolute a passivity, could not exist without compensatory defect on the motor side; that is the price to be paid. We do not need to read about Proust's life, or to listen to what Parisian literary scandal (truthfully or not) adds, to accept the necessity of that price. Mr. Fernandez, too, accepts it; but he accepts it with a struggle. His own tendency is so emphatically to the motor side, he is so instinctively a champion of "spiritual dynamism," that Proust at the same moment casts on him a fascinating spell and arouses a fierce revolt. The whole of his essay on Proust is the criticism, acute and just, of Proust's "insufficiency," but we would like to see it more clearly emphasized that that defect was the foundation of Proust's fine quality. Mr. Fernandez relegates to a footnote the suggestion that there was in Proust "a premature fixation of sensibility, an arrest of development." There he is on the right track, and he might more precisely have implicated the invasion of that nervous affliction of asthma at the age of nine which hampered Proust's normal development and furnished the stimulus to his superb abnormal development. But this essay, significant as it is, must not be taken as our author's last word on Proust. In the introduction "Proust's title of glory" is fully recognized, and since the present volume was published, Mr. Fernandez has become editor of the Cahiers Marcel Proust, which are to bring together with reverent care even the most minute Proustiana and bear witness to their editor's devotion.

But we may best understand Mr. Fernandez's attitude to Proust when we turn to the essay he entitles The Message of Meredith, whom he reasonably regards as the exact opposite of Proust. It was, I believe, his first published essay, and it lays bare his essential sympathy with those who express the motor side of life and "its spiritual dynamism." Among English readers just at present Meredith is scarcely a prophet; he is either too far or too near, and so proves irritating, while a tendency to romantic rodomontade (I speak for myself and the memory of an attempt made, at the suggestion of a fine critic, to read "Harry Richmond" some thirty years ago) is apt to alienate, for if it is true, as Mr. Fernandez asserts, that "Meredith decapitated romanticism" he left to it a considerable body. Still, it is good for the English reader to have Meredith so clearly and freshly set forth, even with excess of enthusiasm, and to realize that in his constant endeavor to harmonize living activity with intellectual activity, to establish the creative interaction of life and thought, he still has a "message" for the world.

It may seem piquant to the English reader to find Newman placed side by side with Meredith. Whether Meredith would have been amused or indignant at the juxtaposition is uncertain; Newman would doubtless have been painfully hurt. But Mr. Fernandez gives good grounds for his faith. His admiration is here clearly limited; he does not share the beliefs of "this almost medieval priest," but he finds in him something "even uniquely modern." Here are more subtle points to bring out than when Meredith was discussed, but equally germane to the author's conception. Newman appears as an individualist, opposing a narrow and myopic rationalism by a deeper conception of complex elements of personality demanding harmonious persuasion; here is invoked that "Illative Sense" which Newman set forth in the "Grammar of Assent" and regarded as something corresponding to taste in the fine arts, "a personal gift or acquisition" rather than a logical process, a sense which to follow is, as Mr. Fernandez admits, "a perilous path"; but all that he has to say about it remains suggestive.

Regarded as a book, "Messages" seems to have been put together by simply collecting the author's literary essays, long and short, which thus often remain out of proportion alike in length and substance. The short essays come at the end and the last is devoted to Mr. T. S. Eliot, whom, it is pleasant to note, Mr. Fernandez recognizes as "one of the most profound of contemporary critics." He neglects to add that Mr. Eliot is a critic who knows how to write; clear expression means clear thought, though not necessarily deep thought, and there are moments when Mr. Fernandez may possibly be deep but is certainly not clear. But at least he is always vigorous and sincere, a subtle thinker, and robust, if not always delicate, in aesthetic appreciation. Among the literary movements of today he is well fitted to be a leader and guide.

He has found an admirable translator in Mr. Belgion, to whose insight and prompt action we owe this English version so soon after the publication last year of the original. The translation scrupulously follows the original, save where it rather betters it, silently amending slight oversights. Useful footnotes have also been added to explain references that English readers might find obscure. I would myself demur to a few small statements in these notes: Thibaudet is possibly the best of French academic critics but would be flattered to hear that he is "an essayist in the manner of Montaigne"; the paradoxical Maurras is not adequately described as "an avowed atheist" if it is not added that he is also a champion of the Catholic church; Brémond's name is connected with a futile discussion of "pure poetry" but nothing said of his main life-work, the "History of the Religious Sentiment in France." These are trifles. The main point is that we here see adequately presented to the English reader a book which concerns all those who experience the impulse of essential criticism, "a disinterested endeavor," again to revert to an old formula of Matthew Arnold's, "to learn and propagate the best that is known and thought in the world."

How Beethoven Worked

By DANIEL GREGORY MASON

WHAT a magnificent subject Beethoven would be for a thoroughgoing psychoanalysis, and how many sentimental idealizations of him, repeated ad nauseam in all the books, such an analysis would explode! Even so able a writer as Mr. Ernest Newman hardly more than scratches the surface.* When the English version of Thayer's biography appeared five years ago, the present writer, reviewing it in an article called The Paradox of Beethoven, pointed out that Beethoven, constantly balked in his relations with the actual world through his lack of any discipline such as could have fitted him to deal with it successfully, was thrown back upon the world of music, wherein discipline had given him mastery and the sense of power. It is interesting to find that this is also Mr. Newman's view. "The only real world for him," he says, "was that of music; it puzzled and fretted him that the world that other men called real did not proceed upon the same lofty and simple principles as that other." And later: "Even the bitterness died out of his hypochondria as he retired more and more within himself, giving up as hopeless the attempt to reconcile the world within him and the world without." Mr. Newman believes that in his last years, giving up as insoluble the riddle of the outer world, Beethoven attained a "spiritual transfiguration," and that "when life ceased to draw its puzzling zigzags across his simple spirit, something of the inner light shone through the rugged, fissured rock that was the outer man." Everyone must agree that this happened who has listened understandingly to the later quartets and sonatas, to the Adagio of the Ninth Symphony, to the Benedictus of the Mass in D. But how it happened still remains a mystery.

As one would expect from a writer so well informed, so realistic, and so courageous as Mr. Newman, he gives short shrift to some of the time-honored superstitions about Beethoven. Refreshing is his refusal to accept "Fidelio" with the undiscriminating admiration of those whose musical judgment is affected by their moral edification over the libretto, or to be hypnotized by the humanitarian uplift of the Ode to Joy into ignoring the inferiority of the last movement of the Ninth Symphony to the other three. Enlightening are his reinterpretations of familiar facts of the composer's life in the light of recent psychology. He shows, for instance, that Beethoven's well-known hatred of loose women, far from being the rational and edifying evidence of moral principle it has been considered by superficial sentimentalists, was irrational, hysterical, almost mad—was, in short, a phobia, due to his unconscious association of sexual irregularities with the venereal disease which in his case they had led to, and with the terrible affliction of deafness which that had brought in its train. Such analyzings-out of the automatisms in Beethoven's mind make us sensible of the human struggle of his life, and reduce him from a heroic statue, larger than life size, to a real man, making him more lovable and truly admirable in the process.

The second part of the book, dealing with The Composer, is at once the most valuable and the most unsatisfactory: valuable because it discusses provocatively many curious features of Beethoven's actual creative process; unsatisfactory because it brings these considerations to no definite focus, and even uses its fundamental conceptions inconsistently—taking "unconscious," for instance, sometimes in the bad sense of mechanical or automatic and sometimes in the good sense of broad, free, and profound. One gets no definite ideas from this half of the book, and doubts if the author himself has any; yet it raises no end of fascinating problems, and is one of the most suggestive treatments of the mental processes of a composer.

The first half of it is taken up in showing, by a singularly thorough examination of the slow movements of Beethoven's Sonatas and other works, that he is subject to an "obsession," a figure of three notes rising in the diatonic scale, which flood up from his unconscious whenever he is in earnest mood. The documentation is impressive, but doubts arise. Are not the diatonic scale and the arpeggio the two fundamental melodic paths for all composers, at least through the eighteenth century, and is not rising movement instinctive with all melodists in moods of will, energy, earnestness, just as descending movement is instinctive in moods of melancholy and depression? On the whole, however, the point may be conceded as proved. Mr. Newman's conclusion from it seems to be that Beethoven is greater, more individual, in his fast movements than in his slow ones, that in these, being less alive, he sinks into automatisms, formulae, such as these three-note figures and the like. He is thus using the "unconscious" in its aesthetically bad sense here.

Briefly the argument is that Beethoven began a great movement like the opening Allegro of the Eroica with a general scheme of the whole vaguely in his mind (rather than with definite melodies or themes, as we are told Mozart began) and then proceeded arduously to incarnate this scheme in appropriate themes. What we see in the sketch-books is the condensation into themes, sub-themes, transitions, developments, and so on of the dramatic or architectonic plan which was vaguely in his mind when he began. Here the author is considering the unconscious superior to the conscious. Now there is much to be said for this theory, but also much to be said against it.

The sketches often strikingly justify Mr. Newman's observation that Beethoven "was at first intent, now and then, not so much on hammering out his theme as on fixing proportions, modulation, and so on to his satisfaction; rather than hold up this part of his task in order to settle on the precise notes of a theme he would be content with a rough blocking out of this." Most composers will know by experience the necessity of such subordination of details to general design in a large work, and will sympathize with the comparison to the painter, who will "draw the rough outline of a head in its proper place, and splash in a suggestion of its value in the color scheme, leaving the filling-in of the features to a later time."

All this is not only exciting but highly needed by a generation inclined to neglect structure; yet one wonders whether the independence of structure upon idea cannot be exaggerated. In the nature of things we cannot know from Beethoven's sketch-books just the order in which scheme and theme appeared or alternated in his mind. But one suspects that theme determined scheme nearly or quite as much as scheme theme. "The thought of an end," shrewdly points out John Dewey, "is strictly correlative to perception of means and methods. Only when and as the latter becomes clear during the serial process of execution does the project and guiding aim and plan become evident and articulated. In the full sense of the word, a person becomes aware of what he wants to do and what he is about only when the work is actually complete." Possibly this is overstatement in the opposite direction; but one cannot fancy Beethoven's getting very far with the Eroica, for instance, without the hammer strokes of that E flat major theme to pound his mind to incandescence. Mr. Newman, by the way, who is an incorrigible programmatist, says that the famous conflict of dominant harmony in the violins with tonic harmony in the horn at a highly imaginative moment is unquestionably programmatic, that it has a "symbolic significance." Does not this illustrate the dangers of estimating poetic and literary schemes generally at more than their due importance? Beethoven might have thought of an imaginary conflict, in the abstract, till all was blue, without producing anything worth discussing. But once he had a theme like that, with its insistence on the tonic harmony of E flat, all he had to do, and all he tried to do (as Mr. Newman himself shows from the sketches), was to put it into conflict with dominant harmony to get one of the greatest effects to be anywhere found in music. In short, the conflict was a musical, not a poetic one, and could not arise in his mind until the theme afforded the ground of it.

So even if scheme was more important to Beethoven, so dramatically minded, than it was to the lyrical Mozart (since structure is essential to drama) it is possible that scheme and theme are more reciprocally related than Mr. Newman leads us to suppose. It is possible that they grow up alternatively, or even simultaneously, in the composer's mind, and that neither one of them is entitled to creative priority.

The Wind Beyond Time

By JAMES RORTY

White chips sailing, falling,
White chips flung by happy gamblers, flying, soaring;
I think the laugh of the first gambler was the first sound heard when the world woke in star-bloom from the whirling sleep of chaos and night;
The first Cause and the final Answer—I think the gamblers will be laughing beyond the gates of the last hell and last heaven, casting their chips and laughing.
Troy and Nineveh and Babylon—the cautious walls of cautious men—they made a small death of Time and the Time-fear took them silently.
The grass came and a wind beyond time scattered its seeds—"Too small, too small," cried the grass that grew on Troy, on Nineveh, on Babylon.
Fling your chips, O gamblers, a wind beyond time will carry you through.
Gamblers who won and gamblers who lost, the wind beyond Time is loud with the laughter of gamblers, the wind beyond Time laughs and blows forever.
Fling your chips, O gamblers, laugh when you breed, O mothers, in the wind beyond Time your seed is sown.
Soldiers and sailors, sod-breakers, builders of bridges and dikes and cities, gamblers who win and gamblers who lose,
Fling your chips, O gamblers, a wind beyond Time will carry you through.

Love Is Enough. By Francis Brett Young. Alfred A. Knopf. Two volumes. $5.

MR. YOUNG'S two-volume elaboration of the simple declarative sentence in his title reflects great credit on the business acuteness of his publisher. The modernistic sympathies which many years ago courageously introduced to the American public the image-breaking figures of Wyndham Lewis, T. S. Eliot, Dorothy Richardson, and Stephen Hudson have now mellowed sufficiently to induce Mr. Knopf to publish in 1927 a novel considerably more Victorian than Thackeray's "Pendennis." There are a hundred indications serving to suggest that the reading public wishes to enjoy a mental rest from the nervous experimentation of the literary left wing. This, let us hope, temporary reaction is inevitable, even physiologically necessary.

To begin with, the author employs the form of "David Copperfield"—the straightforward horizontal structure of the old-fashioned biographical novel which depends for its formal outline on a series of events projected through the medium of a temporal rather than a psychological current. We follow the career of Clare Lydiatt from her early childhood to middle age. So many chapters are devoted to her youth, so many to her first romantic love, so many to her first marriage, so many to her second, and so many to her concluding amorous affair. There is a discreet, possibly enforced halt at the menopause. The ordinary reader's interest is engaged by this simple life-profile because it resembles the superficial aspect of his own and so he is able to make a biographic identification of an elementary sort. It is as if Clare were saying to him, in Browning's phrase: "Grow old along with me."

Corresponding to the Victorian formal simplicity of "Love Is Enough" is a Victorian intellectual simplicity and a Victorian ethical simplicity. There is not a character in the book from the sweet sensitive heroine (a slightly humanized Agnes Wickfield) to her noble and reticent third husband, who has not been met before in some comforable three-decker. The reader does not so much follow the mental reactions of these characters as know them in advance; and in the satisfaction of having his anticipatory judgments confirmed by the omniscient author lies the whole charm and fascination of books of this type. It is James's emotion of recognition all over again. Consequently Mr. Young must avoid any employment of the newer psychology—that is to say, any psychology; for, as Mr. Knopf tells us, this is a book for normal people. Furthermore, the essential idea or prejudice expressed by the title is subjected to no analysis. It seems fairly clear that Clare's misfortunes, her mistakes and conjugal sufferings are all due to her maniacal series of love attachments—first to the church, then to her young animal-husband, Ralph, then to her young animal-son, then to Major Hart. Had she not excluded from her life everything but her fatal susceptibility to romance and idealistic love she would have developed the hardness necessary to round out her life and meet the onsets of tragedy. If there is anything proved by "Love Is Enough," it is that it is not enough at all—that any woman who abandons herself completely to a set of amorous fixations is doomed to the double tragedy of emotional disappointment and intellectual starvation.

Finally the novel reproduces the astounding ethical and emotional simplicity which seemed to have died with Meredith. This story, ostensibly dealing with the life of a woman the mainspring of whose character was an unquestioned (and unquestioning) genius for love, never once, in all its slow length, grapples with the problems posed by the existence of desire. The discreet references to the fact that Clare possesses other organs besides a heart will not discompose a Watch-and-Warder. It is wonderful to see how, in this day and hour, Mr. Young manages to convey a specious impression that he is portraying a woman's life without in the least emphasizing the fact that she is a woman. This is a book for normal people.

It is regrettable that Mr. Young should have yielded so completely to a sterile aesthetic conservatism when he is capable of producing such excellent Conradian romances as "Sea Horses" and "The Black Diamond." Possibly, now that the Victorian virus has attenuated itself in 180,000 nicely chosen words, he will return to the moving and colorful narratives which remain his finest achievement.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

The Measurable World

Exploring the Universe. By Henshaw Ward. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.50.

MR. WARD, as the perspicacious remember, is the author of "Thobbing," that sound and ironical treatise on the thobs which pass for thought in the average brain pan. He now presents us with a view of the universe which modern science has disclosed—from the infinitely small to the inconceivably great; from the electron to the nebula of Andromeda, a million light-years away. Of all the outlines and digests of science, this is far and away the best that I have seen. For two reasons. It is certainly the most readable. And it contains a chapter on the nature of science which is violently exciting. It thus registers at once on the imagination and on the intellect. What is that strange and rare quality which makes a book—or a discussion—intellectually exciting? The most learned and hifalutin doctors and savants, Spengler, Dewey, Whitehead, for all their profound erudition, contain not a trace of it. One plods on, enormously edified, but unmoved save by a sense of duty done. Meanwhile smaller fry from God knows where light mines and rockets in one's mind.

Writing not as a scientist but as a layman, Mr. Ward has an initial advantage over any similar work by a technician. He can approach his data from the point of view of the reader, who is also presumably a layman. The contact is thus close and constant. The bulk of the gentry who use this method, however—we might term them the Sunday Supplement Boys—always abuse it. Their imaginations are fluent but they have no humility before the relentless nature of the facts. The result is usually on a par with one of Mr. Goldberg's machines—without the saving humor. Our author yields to none in imagination—go with him, decreased fifty billion times in size, into a drop of water and inspect an atom—but he has found the elusive line which divides science from moonshine. His fancy always works within the rigorous limits of the provable. Some of his expeditions, it must be confessed, are more happily conceived than others—I was rather seasick climbing about the cells in a twig of a tree—but in all his stories rings the humility of verihood.

The real intellectual excitement comes in Chapter XI, which contains no expeditions into the physical world, but is merely a modest attempt to find out what science is. It is a safe wager that not one out of a million laymen, or one out of ten scientists, has any clear conception. "But nothing in all the realm of modern thought is so novel or so important. . . . Ask yourself which words in the following list are names of science:

Psychology	Philosophy	Astronomy
History	Mathematics	Economics
Theology	Sociology	Ethics

There are just two, astronomy and mathematics. Why? Because the findings of one competent observer can be checked by another competent observer. No conclusion or "law" can be laid down without this preliminary and relentless agreement. A few simple facts in psychology are subject to such verification perhaps, but the bulk of the subject matter is a mighty hair-pulling contest between the behaviorists, the psychoanalysts, the introspectionists, and God knows who. There is no bench mark of common agreement worth the name, and so psychology is still a pseudo-science, a matter of opinion, not of quantitative proof. Mr. Watson is pounding on the door, but only time will tell if he has got more than his boot inside. There is little common agreement among the historians, less among the economists and the sociologists, and none at all among the theologians, the philosophers, and the doctors of ethics. But at the splendid body of the provable and measurable knowledge of the astronomers, none, save an idiot, can cast a stone.

In like class with astronomy are physics, chemistry, geology, and, less completely, biology. All the genuine sciences are continuously gaudy with skyrockets of speculation and opinion, but they are frankly known as such; they are hypotheses only, until independent observers have verified the findings, and so incorporated them into the main guard.

A genuine science works without reference to human desires or human passions; its materials are seen uniformly by all workers; it cannot be "overthrown" or "radically revised" every few years; it deals with data susceptible to quantitative measurement. In brief, it does not tell us what we ought to do, or concern itself in any way with duty or with progress.

> Now you see before you the straight and narrow way within which the science of the future has confined itself. Science is now, and must increasingly become, a limited field of endeavor. Its materials are only those forces which can be measured and predicted with precision by all experimenters alike. If there exists in man a free will, a conscience, a power of self-sacrifice, a social mind, these forces are beyond the pale of science. If one of them is ever brought within its pale, it will at that moment be proved mechanical, and the mind will be proved to be more nearly an automaton.

If this quotation does not give you at once enlightenment and pause, you had better go back to Aristotle. From it flashes the terrible two-edged sword of the modern world; that unyielding, tramping body of science which is at once our flaming hope and our black despair. STUART CHASE

Upton Sinclair at His Best

Oil. By Upton Sinclair. Charles and Albert Boni. $2.50.

IT is the misfortune of Upton Sinclair that he became famous during the muck-raking era when Everybody's and the American Magazine exploited in the form of sensational journalism the brazen inhumanity and the organized iniquities of our industrial civilization. Ever since, the public has associated his name and the character of his work with the ephemeral style of a passing period; whereas both actually belong within the permanent tradition of English literature. What Fielding was to the eighteenth century and Dickens to the nineteenth, Sinclair is to our own; nor is the author of "Oil," "The Jungle," and "The Journal of Arthur Stirling" hopelessly outclassed by these predecessors. While he lacks the irony and imaginative appreciation of the one, and the humor and kindly understanding of the other, he is superior to both in zealous intensity and factual information. This overwhelming knowledge and passionate expression of specific wrongs are more stirring, more interesting, and also more taxing than the cynical censure of Fielding and the sentimental lamentations of Dickens. Where Mr. Sinclair does not deliberately intrude his woe-conscious philosophy and his political propaganda into the action of his story, he achieves narrative that by the standards of both art and life is as great as any work of his masters.

It is, therefore, not too much to say that Mr. Sinclair has no right as an artist to take such liberties with his medium, especially when the action helps neither his thesis nor his story. To say, after 445 pages of skilful exposition: "When they got to Montreal, there was a palatial steamer waiting, with several hundred wage-slaves of various sorts prepared to serve them in return for a few hundred barrels of the stolen oil," is belaboring a point to tediousness; to inject a paragraph of moralizing into the piquant incident of Mrs. Thelma Norman's attempt to be seduced in Bunny's cabin is absurdly priggish; and it is an equally foolish pedantry that inserts the parenthetic and didactic "you see" and "you may remember" which are constantly jerking the reader out of engrossing scenes to observe Mr. Sinclair, ruler in hand, pointing out the roots and exponents of our economic equation.

This may justly be considered carping criticism. For the fact is that in this novel Mr. Sinclair has gone farthest in the direction of unadulterated fiction. As sheer story "Oil" is a tremendous piece of work, even greater in significance as a study of diverse personalities than as a social document; it is a modern "Dombey and Son," but more vigorous, more poignant, and more honest. The author has at last realized the truth of Fielding's observation that "we can censure the action without conceiving any absolute detestation of the person," and hence his captains of industry are no longer the fiendish villains of melodrama but the palpably real figures of contemporary life. They are not merely astutely observed and cleverly portrayed; they are presented with that compassionate understanding, which raises an artist above his creations, and yet with that realistic touch which keeps him on the level of his subject matter.

Unlike "The Jungle" this story is not confined to one industry or to one locality; neither is it limited to any special groups of people. The World War and local politics, national corruption and the movies, a real-estate deal and a religious revival, strikes and spiritualist seances, the "flapper" morality and the Russian Revolution—in short, all of the vulgar hurly-burly of modern life is reflected in these pages. But in the foreground stand Bunny and J. Arnold Ross, his father. In drawing the affectionate yet antagonistic filiation between these two Mr. Sinclair is at his best. He is again concerned with the purely individual relationships that make a masterpiece of "The Journal of Arthur Stirling"; he can again think of the human rather than of the social significance of Bunny's adventures, thus raising the incidents born of his ideals on a par with the experiences which concern his mistresses and vitalizing the whole. Finally these heroes—for the oil-speculator is Mr. Sinclair's hero, too—inspire him to a narrative greater than his thesis instead of the usual tract disguised in fiction form.

JOHAN SMERTENKO

The Art of Disproportion

A History of Caricature. By Bohun Lynch. Little, Brown and Company. $6.50.

MR. LYNCH, with a disconcerting chuckle which is clearly audible, concludes his new book on caricature with the following touching epilogue:

> "Will you not," asks a child of about five as described in certain works of a hundred years ago, "will you not relate to us, dear papa, some history or account of one of the arts which will improve our minds and elevate our thoughts?"
> "Indeed, my dear children (for such it is my privilege to call you), I deem it both a pleasure and a duty which I owe to you, to endeavor from time to time to mingle instruction with what I may term entertainment, for your benefit. . . ."

Mr. Lynch's intention in his history is also to mingle instruction with entertainment, although I am quite sure that the sapient papa quoted in the above colloquy would raise his complacent eyebrows in horror at the suggestion that caricature might be a branch of art. He would never stoop to condone the grossness of Rowlandson or Gilray, and as for the caricatures of Max Beerbohm—he would wonder what they were all about!

Innumerable books have been written on comic art and caricature, but, as Mr. Lynch has pointed out in his preface, the term "caricature" has been used almost invariably as a convenient word to cover all comic art. Mr. Lynch endeavors to limit the term to the artist's personal graphic interpretation of individuals. Generally speaking, this eliminates from consideration comic strips, illustrated jokes, and political, polemical, or social "cartoons." Of course there are plenty of instances of true caricature exploited in graphic satires on political or social themes; but Mr. Lynch is not a precisian here, and, indeed, even allows himself a certain personal latitude in regarding as caricature various typifications by Callot and Daumier—although he very justly spurns Du Maurier. He is at some pains then to define caricature and in a most illuminating first chapter brings together a variety of descriptions. The highest art of the caricaturist, he thinks, is suggested by Bergson in "Laughter":

> He [the caricaturist] realizes disproportions and deformations which must have existed in nature as mere inclinations, but which have not succeeded in coming to a head, being held in check by a higher force. This art, which has a touch of the diabolical, raises up the demon who has been overthrown by the angel. Certainly it is an art that exaggerates, and yet the definition would be very far from complete were exaggeration alone alleged to be its aim and object, for there exist caricatures that are more lifelike than portraits, caricatures in which the exaggeration is hardly noticeable, while, inversely, it is quite possible to exaggerate to excess without obtaining real caricature.

Following the opening discussion of The Nature of Caricature is a chapter entitled From the Antique to the Middle Ages, which is succeeded by chapters on Early Secular Caricature, The Caricature of Bigotry, The Eighteenth Century in England, Continental Caricature, The Recent Past, Max Beerbohm, and England and America Today. The early chapters especially are grounded in thorough and painstaking research. The attempt is not to be exhaustive or encyclopedic, but rather through suggestive citations to portray essential tendencies and outstanding figures. There is no mere heaping up and classifying of dry bones; the facts are alive. They are seen by Mr. Lynch in perspective and are colored by the lens of his own very intelligent and at times quizzical scrutiny. The book is illustrated by thirty-three beautiful plates, most of them in collotype. These include—to name a few—the famous "Devils Bagpipes" caricature of Martin Luther, two drawings from "Les Songes Drolatiques de Pantagruel," a series attributed to Rabelais, and amusing caricatures by Leonardo da Vinci, Rowlandson, Gilray, Daumier, Ape, Robert Dighton, Ospovat, Dulac, Kapp, Quiz, Max Beerbohm, André Rouveyre, Covarrubias, and Ralph Barton. In addition to the plates is an excellent bibliography. The volume is dedicated to Max Beerbohm and handsomely bound in gray and lavender—just the dress to delight the quintessential dandyism of Max.

Students of caricature will probably be most interested in the last three or four chapters of the book because of the up-to-date material not to be found in other books, and because of the special relish which Mr. Lynch imparts to his survey of his contemporaries. He devotes an entire chapter to Max Beerbohm, tracing the evolution of his work, analyzing his methods and the manner of his approach to caricature; it is impossible to read this chapter without acquiring a keener appreciation of those qualities in Max's art which make him supreme among the caricaturists of our time. It is gratifying to find in Mr. Lynch's book a sympathetic appraisal of the work of Henry Ospovat, whose work deserves to be better known. His Caruso and Harry Lauder are masterpieces of comic overstatement. Sem, the French caricaturist, is agreeably mentioned, but unfortunately not a single drawing by him is included in the book. His caricatures are remarkable. I recall a sheaf of sketches he made some fifteen years ago in L'Illustration representing Count Robert de Montesquiou. Sem had taken at least twenty shots at his victim and each one was a smack in the diaphragm. They moved me to ecstatic and obscene cachinnations. If Mr. Lynch could have reproduced only one tiny drawing by Sem his book would be perfect. However, he does not neglect two men well known in this country—Covarrubias and

Ralph Barton. There is a reproduction of the young Mexican's admirable caricatures of Mencken and Somerset Maugham, and Mr. Barton's highly diverting sketch of himself being interviewed by a Celebrity-at-large. This book of Mr. Lynch's is an eminently civilized book written by an Englishman for the people of England and America with the modest hope, I am sure, that it will serve as a civilizing influence in both countries. All Medieval Life

The Legacy of the Middle Ages. Edited by C. G. Crump and E. F. Jacob. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

English Life in the Middle Ages. By L. F. Salzman. Oxford University Press. $3.

IN the ample atmosphere of such volumes as these that specter of the myriad-minded pamphleteer, over-specialization, seems but the figment of superheated air waves. The specialists themselves have laid the ghost, the phantom of a hundred disordered dreams, by throwing open the windows of the haunted chamber, and the doors, too, to adjoining rooms, flooding all with streams of light and life. Time was, indeed, not so very long ago, when the seeker after truth was forced to grope so darkly in dusky corners that he himself appeared to the unknowing but a faint simulacrum, shadow rather than man. Among the many, too, who taxed the scholar with blinking owlishly in his rare glimpses of broad sunshine, the contrast between his professed love of the gleam and his twilight existence aroused scornful laughter that echoes still in the face of all fact. He has stultified his critics by virtue of that very quality in which he was deemed deficient, clearness of vision, which has enabled him to detect all the relations and connections and dependencies of his subject, and hence to portray it in its proper perspective. He has advanced unfalteringly from microscopic observation of minute particles to large and legitimate conclusions, and yet farther to the linking of his generalizations with those of scholars in other fields, until his range has become encyclopedic. In the books before us, epitomes of many investigations, all medieval life solicits us.

To tell the varied story of "The Legacy of the Middle Ages" the editors have summoned nearly a score of experts, admirably qualified by lifelong labors for the necessary selection and summary. Stern restraint is needed to bring together infinite riches in a little room; and intense concentration and compression sometimes make too severe demands on the reader's attention. The divisions of the subject are most judicious: first, the things of the mind and spirit, the Christian life, art, literature, philosophy, and education; secondly, that "most fundamental and characteristic of medieval bequests," law; and finally, the fabric of society and government. Everywhere the voice of authority is dominant, whether it speaks of sculpture through Paul Vitry, director of the Louvre; of literature through Claude Jenkins, Lambeth librarian, and Cesare Foligno, professor in Oxford; or of canon law through Gabriel Le Bras of the University of Strasbourg. We trace the development of handwriting, majuscule, minuscule, Gothic script, under the guidance of so good a paleographer as E. A. Lowe of Oxford or contrast the conditions of social life past and present as that vivid scholar, Eileen Power of the University of London, unconsciously explodes even as she expounds the cherished medieval theory of the essential inferiority of women. Here is the swan song of Paul Vinogradoff, his last professional utterance on "Customary Law," which the great jurist did not live to see in proof. One adopted American is in the notable company, Norman Gras of Minnesota, who in a comprehensive chapter portrays the economic activity of towns. There are inevitable omissions. Medieval science, which has recently received large attention among us, is reserved, as it should be, for another volume; and art is perforce denied its due meed of attention. Restriction of space often fetters free movement. But perspective and proportion are so justly observed that the wonted discrepancy in the work of several hands is seldom apparent.

"The Legacy of the Middle Ages" does not belie its title. Its informing and increasing purpose glows in the thesis of continuity between past and present. The fields of France are still laid out on the old plan. The American fundamentalist is the spiritual descendant of St. Bernard, and the conflict between order and freedom is waged now as in earlier days. The legal system of the Roman church is almost untouched by time. Minuscule and Gothic scripts still survive and serve, and "The Imitation of Christ" is on many shelves. Private banks flourished in medieval cities and wars were carried on then as now with the help of loans in other lands. The medieval craft guilds have bequeathed ideals of "service," the catchword of our Rotarians. Sometimes we chase a tradition in the spirit of servile imitation. The more we copy Gothic and other forms of architecture the less we catch their inspiration, for "they dreamt not of a perishable home who thus could build." Sometimes evil persists rather than good, making "medieval" a term of reproach. The dogma of the subjection of women lingered long after Burke mourned the passing of the age of chivalry.

L. F. Salzman in his attractive textbook, "English Life in the Middle Ages," does not bring his potent authorities with him to speak for themselves, but has them constantly at his back. Through wide reading of the texts that he cites in modernized form and of the collectors and commentators whose aid he acknowledges, he has fashioned agreeable chapters on life in the country, in town, and in the home, on church and school, on literature, art, and science, on war, law, and trade, on women and wayfaring. In each of these divisions abundant material, much of it accessible in other publications, has been selected and digested. The story is told simply, lucidly, vividly, and in the main accurately, though here and there, as in the section on literature, occur negligences and ignorances. The volume, which is well bound, well printed, and well indexed, will prove a refreshing companion to the student of English history or letters. The author modestly points to the hundred and more illustrations, taken from medieval sources, as "in some ways the most valuable part of the whole book."

FREDERICK TUPPER

Are Artists People?

Roman Summer. By Ludwig Lewisohn. Harper and Brothers. $2.

INTERMITTENTLY the question is raised: Can the artist function freely in America? The cynic might be tempted to interject: too freely—particularly in fiction! But the problem is not to be disposed of thus lightly. Mr. Lewisohn, who has at various times contributed to the symposium, now comes forward with a novel in which the question is put to a laboratory test. He takes John Austin, a small-town newspaper man who successfully hides in himself the making of a Sherwood Anderson, places him in a typical Middle Western town, trains on him a battery of typical American middle-class repressions, and by the way of complication inflicts upon him an incurable craving for Horace and Catullus. Near by he plants, as cunning decoys, "a spuriously Roman state capitol" and a row of Lombardy poplars—and we're off.

Judging by the aesthetic fascination which American machinery exerts upon our art colonies in Paris, Berlin, and Rome, one would think that Columbus, Ohio, was just the place to compose verses in the classic manner. But John is too unsophisticated to understand that. A long struggle ensues between his weakness for Corinthian columns and the deeper unconscious interest which he has (so we are assured) in the pageant of American life. In which his weakness proves the stronger, and John packs his trunk and gets off at Rome, determined to write a play on the life of Catullus. In Rome, John finds himself as constricted. He is advised to visit the Forum, to try the Coliseum by moonlight, and various other cathartics, but his muse remains obdurate. Until he stumbles upon a young lady by the name of Esther Azancot, a dark, passionate Jewess with a past, who talks as if she had stepped out of one of Disraeli's romances. One can easily understand how our befuddled Latin scholar is smitten by this Zionist sibyl, but what she sees in his colorless soul to rouse her to such rhetorical heights is a mystery. Nevertheless she returns his love, but unlike her Moabite kinswoman she feels that his people are not her people, nor his god her god, and therefore flatly rejects his honorable offers. Whereat John returns to America, a sadder and wiser man, and takes it to his bosom in the shape of Louise Derflinger of Sandusky, Ohio. And the fadeout shows him reconciled to sanitary plumbing and threatening to write "quite a long novel of the rise and downfall of an American family of the lower middle class."

Apparently we thus arrive at a Q. E. D. But the question still recurs: Can one write a Middle Western novel in Sandusky, Ohio, or does one have to go to Rome first for perspective? And still another question is forced upon one after reading this tediously elaborated romance of the intimate relations of a novelist and his muse. A question pertinent to much of our fiction. Are artists people? In other words, can they and their problem be profitably exploited in fiction as if they were full-blooded human beings? I doubt it. Artists are creatures whose emotions are disproportionately drawn into one highly artificial channel, leaving them psychologically sterile. The union between the artist as author and the artist as hero is apt to result in anemic offspring. Particularly in America. They may order things differently in Europe; and there may be at large there artists emotionally rich enough to remain interesting as individuals after the artist is duly subtracted. But so far as the American breed is concerned, its life is quite adequately recorded in the publisher's notes which are so charmingly woven together in the gossip shops of our literary reviews.

ALTER BRODY

From Giotto to Van Gogh

Art Epochs and Their Leaders. By Oscar Hagen. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

THIS book brings to mind some things that are not in it; reasons why the reviewer finds it so nourishing in a world of unnourishing books, and reasons why he finds its publication of both artistic and educational import. One meets so many art lovers, not alone outside the walls but intramurally, who are fearful lest a little knowledge will impair their sensibilities. It must be evident to any reader that the author's acquisition of historical detail, and through it his unusual power of surveyance, have only served to increase his passionate regard for art. Without the cloying method of Faure, the god of the appreciators, Mr. Hagen has communicated to a textbook, written primarily for his own students, though its format and its philosophy will recommend it to layman and art librarian, this passion.

Mr. Hagen's book reveals constantly that highest standard of enjoyment, and therefore of criticism, which is held by a man who regards the artistic horizon of his own age with an eye long rested on the mountains of the past. With such important material to work upon, and with that gift, alas how rare among teachers, of reconstructing for his audience civilizations passed out from under hand, it is impossible that the book should not be fruitful alike to those who approach it with little or no knowledge of art history and to those who approach it with other than the author's prejudices. But it has in addition that curious charm of diction found in books not written in the writer's native tongue. This is Mr. Hagen's first book in English; he has written eight in German, perhaps the most important of which is his study of Grünewald. His German sense for word construction carries over in his style, but as often happens in such a situation, noble words that have long since lost their ranking to us by excess of familiarity are given again their first estate.

The situation which brought forth this book, really under curricular pressure, gives extrinsic interest to it. Mr. Hagen was first obtained by the University of Wisconsin as exchange professor from Göttingen, where, in addition to his lecturing duties, he had instigated and carried through the now annual revival of Handel opera. There was such a hungry response at Madison that Mr. Hagen was offered the chair permanently, with results rich, amusing, and hard to forecast. The light-headed co-ed powdered her nose before each new Annunciation and wriggled into her coat as she was shown the Pietás, but by the rigors of his scholastic tradition the lecturer dealt a body blow to the drifting appreciators, who in examination confessed, failing all other subject of confession, that they "could stand speechless before this picture forever." But some twenty out of every three hundred, to whom art had previously meant Maxfield Parrish on a fraternity wall, greeted the German as prophet, bearing revelation to them of an unsuspected expression and perhaps end of life. For these people he wrote his book, throwing it into the really pitiful dearth of analytical art histories in English. Miss Gardner's recent book, of fine and encyclopedic value, was written with an entirely different purpose, for it covers in almost documentary detail the entire field of art. Mr. Hagen covers only the centuries from Giotto to Van Gogh, that is, the modern European tradition. To be sure, this is an embarrassing field, but he has made no pretense of panning the gold —only of laying bare the richest veins: the elaborate fifteenth century; the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, apotheosized in Buonarotti, Dürer, and Rembrandt; the curiously sterile and yet not philosophically phenomenal eighteenth century; the nineteenth, which repeats in small the lessons of the past in the primitive David, the classical Ingres, the baroque Delacroix; and its climax of impressionism and expressionism.

To such people as still find the university the most exciting of social gatherings, each augury of a new period of its life is thrilling. The Middle West is vigorously given over to letters. It both writes and reads them, for struggle begets ideas. But for the plastic and pictorial arts in which example and tradition seem to precede the revelation, it has, save in the centers, not known the alphabet.

CLINCH CALKINS

Tar Lyrics

The Book of Navy Songs. Collected and Edited by The Trident Society of the United States Naval Academy. Arranged and harmonized by Joseph W. Crosley. Doubleday, Page and Company. $3.50.

THIS official collection, well printed and superbly illustrated, contains over a hundred of the songs sung in the Navy or at Annapolis, arranged for solo voice and piano. Many, in spite of nautical and unfamiliar texts, prove at the piano to be old standbys of the college and "home" song-books. Many, on the other hand, are rarer, while a number are printed for the first time. They are classified as historical songs and ballads, celebrating notable engagements, personages, and events, the latter including the abolition of the grog ration; songs of the ward-room (the officers' messroom and lounge); songs and shanties of the fo'c's'le (the corresponding gathering-place of the men); an interesting series of songs of the landing-parties which go into detail as to what the sailors thought of the Philippines; finally, the songs one hears at the Army game.

The texts of the songs are a disappointment. The bowdlerization of good songs is the most ungrateful of tasks, since the more conscientiously it is performed the more viciously insipid is the result: and no one may assert that whoever was responsible for the credit line "Tune, Famous King of England" (italics mine) over two of the airs in this collection was not conscientious. An almost equally serious fault is the crudity of the musical settings; such may be the rule in the college compilations, but the auspices under which this volume appears were calculated to excite hope for arrangements which would do justice to the tunes. As it is, they appear at a heavy disadvantage, yet it is well that they should have been brought together, even in this form, for general circulation. It is particularly interesting to find how many songs, supposedly lubbers, are doing active sea duty under aliases; the truth is that any living tune is a jack of all trades. One can give, perhaps, its latest version, but never its last. Finding "Tarpaulin Jacket," for instance, in these pages, I can record a variant which, ten years ago on the flying fields was current among men who had never heard its original. So far as I know, it has never seen print; then let it be preserved in the files of The Nation:

A handsome young airman lay dying,
And as on the airdrome he lay,
To mechanics who 'round him came sighing
These last parting words did he say:

"Take the cylinders out of my kidneys,
The connecting-rod out of my brain,
The crank-shaft out of my backbone,
And assemble the engine again!"

Gissing the Reticent

Letters of George Gissing. Edited by Algernon C. and Ellen Gissing. Houghton Mifflin. $6.

GEORGE GISSING might well be called the Lord Jim of the world of letters; all his life he seems to have lived with the morbid consciousness of lost honor. We know some of the facts that contributed to this state of mind. Mr. Morley Roberts in his veiled biography of Gissing, "The Private Life of Henry Maitland," goes into the unfortunate incident of theft at Owens College, his first two disastrous marriages, his ill health, his struggles with poverty and with social adjustment. These facts and Gissing's own final comments about his life in "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft"—together with the real difficulty of getting precise information about the man—have served to build up a Gissing legend. Most people who read Gissing enjoy this legend; some would like to substitute for it an account more founded on fact. Every bit of evidence about Gissing is valuable if it helps to illuminate his career and what he calls his "private misfortunes and miseries."

Unfortunately these letters do not answer many of the questions. And one suspects that even if the editors had not omitted and expurgated, the letters still might be very unsatisfactory. For by some quirk Gissing could not in his correspondence be self-revelatory. There is a reticence about his personal life that is often morbidly evasive. In this volume one meets the same barrier one does in turning to Hawthorne's "Journals" for answers to questions about Hawthorne's personal life. Throughout Gissing's letters the feeling of unhappiness deepens, and one hopes that the man will try at least to come to some understanding of his problems. Instead of any analysis of personal difficulties, there are letters filled with moralizing about social questions, about art; chiefly, in later years, letters in which the man's despair is escaped from in long and formal descriptions of landscape.

To talk about himself Gissing needed the merciful veil of fiction. No novelist is more autobiographical. And it is after all to his fiction one must turn to get at the facts of his life. Godwin Peak, in "Born in Exile," gives much more Gissing autobiography than is to be found in all these letters. And Edwin Reardon, in "New Grub Street," fighting (to write the novels he believes in) against serious ill health, poverty, and the naggings of an incompatible wife, explains what Gissing means when he writes to his brother in 1896: "My public progress is terribly balanced by my private misfortunes and miseries."

Yet this volume of letters is important. It is full of

ANGUS BURRELL

Novels in Brief

The Cross. By Sigrid Undset. Translated by Charles Archer. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

In "The Cross" Sigrid Undset completes her noble and memorable trilogy of medieval Norway. In the novel there has been nothing since "War and Peace" to compare with the "Kristin Lavransdatter" sequence; but unlike "War and Peace" the Norwegian epic is not done on the grand scale. You see Norway through the soul of Kristin and her husband; and their domestic life centers the action in intimate scenes rather than in a sweep of historical catastrophes. In the final volume Kristin meets loneliness and age, the hostility of peasants, and the ravages of the plague; and triumphs by the force of her character.

Black April. By Julia Peterkin. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

Hitherto Mrs. Peterkin has been known as the author of "Green Thursday," a book of sketches of Negro life on a South Carolina plantation. Her novel is a well-rounded canvas of that same milieu. It is certainly the finest work produced thus far dealing with the American Negro. It should do more good than a dozen sociological tracts to facilitate a sympathetic understanding between the races, and its vigorous simplicity makes it deserving of a place among the world's best folk-tales.

The Return of Don Quixote. By G. K. Chesterton. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.50.

Mr. Chesterton should write more novels. His Father Brown is the only really original detective since Sherlock Holmes, except possibly for H. C. Bailey's Dr. Fortune. His "Club of Queer Trades" is a delight; and "The Man Who Was Thursday" a fantastic wonder. Now in "The Return of Don Quixote" he returns more or less to his old manner; and in the story of a rebirth of chivalry in England exhibits much of his old sorcery.

The Blatchington Tangle. By G. D. H. and Margaret Cole. The Macmillan Company. $2.

The Emerald. By Hilaire Belloc. Harper and Brothers. $2.

The detective has fallen among strange bedfellows. In the times of M. Lecoq and Sherlock Holmes the detective story was a detective story and proud of its own nature. Now it is being written as if it were a novel; and the results are peculiarly discouraging. Mr. and Mrs. Cole treat the detective story as if it were a study in social types and English country houses; and drag out a slender plot with all kinds of corroborative detail about dinner parties and things just to make it a novel. Mr. Belloc makes a trivial incident into a long and incredibly dreary treatise upon politics and various English political and social types.

The Beadle. By Pauline Smith. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

Miss Smith is another victim of the current misapprehension that a meticulous presentation of inconsequential details about a foreign land carries sufficient interest to make up for deficiencies of plot and inadequacy of character. The theme of abused love in the setting of the South African veldt is no different from what it would be in an English or an American environment; the author never gets beyond the bare statement of her theme.

Mr. Gilhooley. By Liam O'Flaherty. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

Mr. O'Flaherty has been justly praised for the vivid realism of his work and his power to communicate intense emotional experience. So far he has done very little with his gifts beyond displaying them. This most recent novel describes with striking details the adventures of a disordered mind. It actually engulfs the reader as well as its characters in the waves of drunkenness, passion, and frenzy; the characters go down, but the reader rises to ask to what purpose all this stress and strain.

Brackie the Fool. By Klabund. Translated by Herman George Scheffauer. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

Klabund leaves a flaming trail across the dusty realism of the modern novel. In "Peter the Czar" he gave a dark and terrible picture of medieval Russia; and now in "Brackie the Fool" he gives a really Gothic novel compounded of frenzy and mysticism, cruelty and kindness, goblin humor and sweet charity, all put into the figure of the fool who bodies forth the strange wonder of the Gothic spirit. By a series of haunting pictures Klabund gives us the only really Gothic novel of this century.

Max Havelaar. By Multatuli. Translated from the Dutch by W. Siebenhaar. With an Introduction by D. H. Lawrence. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

This book appeared first in 1860, and was a kind of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" about Dutch misrule in Java. As a matter of fact it is much more interesting as a novel than as a tract, for despite its cumbrous machinery and its elaborate humor it has a fascination of a high order. Its irony goes deeper than mere polemics; and its picture of Java has all the life and color necessary to call up a haunting panorama of the East.

The Marriage Bed. By Ernest Pascal. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

A bed of French marqueterie, made originally for the daughter of a noble family in the reign of Louis Quinze, and handed down as a wedding gift from mother to daughter ever since, expresses Mr. Pascal's sophisticated attitude toward modern marriage. He works out the marital entanglements of three families in a narrative that is moving and convincing throughout.

Irene Iddesleigh. By Mrs. Amanda M'Kittrick Ros. Introduction by Thomas Beer. Boni and Liveright. $1.75.

"An Elizabethan born out of her time." These words by Aldous Huxley compose the "blurb" on the wrapper of this curious novel. And Mr. Thomas Beer begins his introduction by the admission that a first reading of the book "made him dizzy." There is a definite connection between the two statements. It is hard to see, however, why Mr. Huxley considers the author an Elizabethan, though it is quite true that her conception and method are quite alien to the year 1897, when her novel was first published. Nor need we go too deeply into Mr. Beer's perplexity on the score of the author having exercised no influence on the literature of her day or ours. At best she is very good indeed; for the sake of these golden, or should one say purple, patches, one may overlook rhetorical outpourings which do not come off so well.

Ironical Tales. By Laurence Housman. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

A great many of Mr. Housman's satiric fables have the bite, the clarity, and the amusingness of the best of Voltaire; and the three or four fairy tales he includes have an engaging conventional beauty. On the other hand, his Gourmontian experiments in cosmic irony really leave the major problems of destiny, order, and morality almost exactly where the author found them. Mr. Housman's dry, lean style is exactly suited to the task of the realistic fabulist; he is perhaps less successful in the world of fantasy.

Music

The Bach Festival

THE Festival of the Bach Choir at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, this year was the occasion of the twenty-first performance of the great Mass in B Minor under the leadership of Dr. J. Fred Wolle. The chief works sung the first day were the six motets. It is not clear that the copyist's designation upon the known manuscripts reflects Bach's own use of this term; and indeed one has hardly denominated a class by calling the six works "Bach's Motets." Only one, "Praise Ye the Lord, All Ye Heathen," the shortest, for four voices, is in any way connected in form with the classical Catholic motet. Most of them, such as "Jesu, Priceless Treasure," are hardly distinguishable from the great group of Bach's cantatas: three stanzas of a hymn are presented as four-part chorales, interspersed with three- and five-part sections quite free and dramatic in form. The greatest, "Sing Ye to the Lord a New-Made Song," which Dr. Wolle has performed many times, is a majestic work for double chorus —eight voices—beginning with a prelude of stirring antiphonal exhortation, leading to a joyful fugue which increases in power and scope till all eight parts are swept into it, pausing in a poignant responsive supplication, culminating in a great fugue in which the two choruses join as one. Again, while four of the motets were written for church performance, two seem to have been composed as funeral odes. It was difficult, accordingly, even after considerable study, to give a satisfactory answer to the question generally asked at Bethlehem: Just what is a motet?

Friday's concerts began with some distressingly flat singing; and the beautiful alto air at the end of the Mass, the "Agnus Dei," was dragged unmercifully. I never heard Dr. Wolle conduct the "Agnus Dei" in this painful fashion before, and I rather believe that he will not do it again. Such distortion (for which he is frequently blamed in high musical quarters) is a perversion due, I take it, to two of his principles: first, his eagerness to give the pulse of life to Bach's measures; second, his search for new interpretations and his unwillingness to repeat himself even after twenty years. Dr. Wolle's first position seems to me entirely justified, for his changes of tempo, if unorthodox, contribute frequently to his most stirring effects. The second principle is a life principle, and criticism is pointless. Dr. Wolle is the kind of man who, I suppose, will experiment as long as he lives.

If one admits these deviations, is the supporter of the Bethlehem Choir then guilty of accepting enthusiasm and earnestness of purpose as a substitute for sound artistry? This would be a serious indictment; but I do not believe it lies. In the first place, the lapses are few; so that I should in any event be prepared to maintain that technically few choruses approach this choir. And the lapses are due largely to the terrific demands which Dr. Wolle makes upon his singers.

But beyond this it seems to me that any group which can make of Bach's music so profound a spiritual experience must be sound artistically. These concerts raise their audience to that plane of feeling where the aesthetic and religious responses come almost together. And though the singing may have begun flatly, I feel confident that for most of the eleven hundred hearers the two days of music provided that katharsis which, according to Aristotle, is the function of all tragedy. If I am right, I think every legitimate demand in the name of art is met by the performances at Bethlehem.

Between the various motets the choir sang some of the chorale preludes for organ, of which Busoni has made several more generally known by his piano transcriptions. One of these, "Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme," only fifty-two measures long, has always seemed to me, in the pure beauty of its musical line, one of the finest flowerings of Bach's genius. There are more than a hundred of these little preludes: one guesses that as organist at Arnstadt, Cöthen, Weimar, and Leipzig, Bach must have improvised hundreds more which were never put on paper. My own question is why, with an organ in the Packer Memorial Church, Dr. Wolle caused these preludes to be played upon a piano; and why, in all these works, Dr. Wolle has discarded the knotty, rich-flavored Lutheran texts, with their figures as rich as Dürer woodcuts, in favor of the flat Victorian translations of the Reverend Mr. Troutbeck. Certainly the Bach Choir ought to have no trouble with the originals.

The Paradox of Gilbert

THOUGH less generally familiar than most of the other Gilbert and Sullivan operas, "Ruddigore" (Cosmopolitan Theater) is completely typical. Ostensibly a satire on a species of melodrama still popular when it was written but now happily extinct, it is actually more like the other works of the invincible pair than it is like anything else. The coy heroine, abandoned in infancy upon a door-step with nothing except a change of linen and the book of etiquette which has become her guide through life; the hero, condemned by a witch's curse to commit one atrocious crime every day in spite of a natural tenderness of conscience which leads him to compensate for his morning atrocity by a universal benevolence during the rest of the day; and the honest British tar, whose determination to follow the dictates of his heart makes him a horrible bore to the rest of the company, who are compelled to respect the purity of his motives even though this heart of his seems to have a way of looking out only for its own interests—all these are characters as perfectly consistent with the traditions of the Gilbertian world as they are inconsistent with any other. That world is not lawless and hence it is not, in any ultimate sense, fantastic, for it has a psychology, a system of mores, and a set of probabilities which belong exclusively to it. Once one has entered it completely it comes to have a verisimilitude of its own; that the wicked baronet, after he has been released from his obligations, should immediately assume the gaiters and shovel hat which are the outward signs of blameless piety seems not only possible but positively likely; and when one of the other characters remarks: "You have no idea what a bad opinion I have of myself—nor how little it is deserved" one recognizes him immediately as an authentic denizen of this world.

So much may be said for the consistency which makes these operas a thing apart. But no critic, so far as I know, has ever resolved the other Gilbertian paradox and satisfactorily explained to us how it happens that his satire can be at once so virulent and so innocuous. "Ruddigore," like most of the other operas, gibes at every important feature of the Victorian ideology. Duty, innocent maidenhood, British superiority, patriotism, and the flag are mercilessly mocked; every sentiment dear to torydom and respectability is outrageously parodied and every intellectual conviction is carried to some reductio ad absurdum. Yet if one happens to cherish any one of these idols it seems to go unscathed. So far as I know, Victoria herself did not resent Gilbert's mockery, and certainly Victorians accepted him as one of themselves, just as aesthetes (at least modern ones) admire "Patience" quite as much as Philistines do. Some sort of complete detachment from reality seems to rob the satire of its sting, and this detachment was not the result of any mere jester's guile assumed by the author in order that he might be permitted to have his fling at tabooed institutions. On the contrary, Gilbert himself was respectable and tory. Fundamentally he revered the conventions he mocked, and he was a Victorian Englishman in spite of all he apparently did to make both the adjective and the noun ridiculous.

Perhaps, indeed, the fantastic imagination which made him so delightful was the result of an inward conflict. To say things in a manner extravagantly humorous is often to involve them in an ambiguity which serves to disarm not only others but, if need be, oneself as well. One can hardly doubt, for example, that when Mark Twain made the highly characteristic remark: "Wagner's music is not as bad as it sounds," the form of the expression was conditioned by the fact that Clemens himself was torn, as he usually was, between the plain American's distrust of everything high-brow and an uneasy fear that he was not quite up to appreciating the best. The joke may lie in either direction you prefer, and the technique of the humor results in the fact that the humorist is saved from the necessity of committing himself. Nor is it impossible that Gilbertian fantasy was generated in a manner not dissimilar and that it performed a not dissimilar function. His intellect warred with his prejudices and neither won. In fantasies extravagant enough to pass the censor as mere harmless foolery he expressed the criticism which he could not bring himself to express in less ambiguous form, and thus he became a great humorist in order that he need not be forced to the uncomfortable necessity of abandoning the prejudices of his class. Under the circumstances it will hardly do to wish that he had been more consistent or, if one desires to take up the position of the moralist, that he had had a greater integrity of character. Granted it he might have been an earnest satirist, useful to his time but heavy handed and obvious for us; without it he became a humorist whose charm is perennial.

No complaint is more commonly heard among theatergoers than that which is concerned with the comparative paucity of Gilbert and Sullivan revivals; but the truth is that they are not easy to do successfully, as the present instance will indicate. It is highly enjoyable as any moderately competent performance of "Ruddigore" is bound to be, but it is not, except in the part played by the seasoned William Danforth, all that one could wish. Violet Carlson, as Rose Maybud, has an adequate though distinctly metallic voice, but her manner is that appropriate rather to the current tradition of Broadway musical comedy than to Gilbert and Sullivan; and Alexander Clark, as Robin Oakapple, simply lacks the breath necessary to complete the execution of his obviously sound intentions. These operas require a combined sprightliness of humor, virtuosity of voice, and agility of limb that is all but superhuman. Danforth comes about as near to it as is humanly possible, but as for the rest we are compelled to make the best of what mere competence can give. Yet, withal, even that makes "Ruddigore" delightful enough. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS ARE MADE to be broken. Charles Lindbergh's heart-stirring non-stop flight of 3,610 miles across the Atlantic has been bettered by the plane Columbia, piloted by Clarence Chamberlin, with its owner, Charles Levine, as passenger, in a long-distance flying record of approximately 3,900 miles. The passengers of the liner Mauretania, bound for New York, were fortunate enough to cheer the Columbia as she leisurely circled the ship on her way to Germany, and to signal the transport Memphis, carrying their hero, Lindbergh, back to his native land. Thus trans-Atlantic flying seems less a feat of sheer daring and luck than it did a week ago when Lindbergh alone had accomplished it. The Columbia will be welcomed in Germany with almost as much enthusiasm as Lindbergh received in Paris; our European neighbors will be generous to American aviation and to the courage and skill of American aviators. Mr. Levine will be rightly congratulated as the first "air passenger" to be carried across the Atlantic Ocean. The truth is that we have much to learn about aviation and that courage is not a national virtue. Nor have we made more than a beginning in the direction of crossing the Atlantic by air. With the splendid results achieved by the three men who have made the non-stop flight from New York we cannot be content, nor will we be. The grand gesture has been made successfully. Science, fortitude, and good fortune made it possible. It will be necessary now to consider the situation with less dependence on the two latter qualities, and with an eye to the transportation of regular passengers and cargo.

LINDBERGH HIMSELF is coming home as the guest of the United States navy. But the best part of his achievement is that it was a purely civilian undertaking. Though he ranks as a captain in the Missouri National Guard, he flew not in uniform but in the clothes of the air pilot he had been, and he stuck to his civilian clothes in Paris and London. This befitted the son of the man who denounced the World War as set forth elsewhere in this issue; it certainly was in keeping with the American spirit. Yet already plans are made to exploit the hero for military purposes. Army, navy, and marine-corps contingents are to escort him from the station in Washington to the Washington Monument; the Governor of Missouri is to make him a colonel, and some of the militarists are already citing his deed, not as a wonderfully fortunate exploit which has brought America nearer to the English and the French than at any time since the armistice but as proving that now we are open to attack from Europe and therefore must at once vote many millions more for fliers and airplanes. None of these things can hide the fact that the overwhelming and unprecedented ovation which Captain Lindbergh will receive while these lines are being read will far exceed that given to any general or admiral, American or foreign, or any king or Allied statesman, and this was the case also with Gertrude Ederle.

NEWS OF THE FLOOD has already been relegated to the fifth or sixth or even tenth page of the newspapers. In the first place, we have had spectacular flights to think about these last few weeks; in the second place, people can stand only so much calamity. After a while it begins to pall and finally it has no meaning whatever. Take the Father of Waters off the front pages, therefore; he has had enough publicity for one season. In certain parts of the country, however, he is still very much on the front page: in Illinois, in Missouri, in Tennessee, in Arkansas, and above all, in Mississippi and Louisiana. Here the waters have gone down a foot, there they are still rising; here the levees are still holding, there they have widened to let the river through. And by now more than half a million persons are homeless, to say nothing of hundreds of thousands of animals, domestic and wild, floating dead upon the water. It means little to say that this is the greatest single catastrophe recorded in America; more appealing, somehow, are the accounts that tell of one poor dog struggling in the water, or a baby pig desperately afloat on a raft, or a rowboat making a spectacular rescue from a third-story window. And even the most specific and dreadful accounts of what is taking place in the flooded regions fail to bring in as much money as is needed for relief. The Red Cross is crying for more millions; it is evident that vast sums will be required to rehabilitate the persons who have lost everything. If ever any situation required government instead of private assistance, this situation does. Yet President Coolidge still refuses to call Congress in special session, and Speaker Longworth talks of aid when Congress meets—in December.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE'S Memorial Day address would have seemed unreal if Sinclair Lewis had put it into the mouth of George F. Babbitt. Sentences in it indicated a talent for smug self-assuredness which seems fictional and amounts to genius when indulged in by an office-seeking American politician. This nation, which began as a strip along the Atlantic coast and won the Southwest by one of the sheerest wars of aggression in history, has, he said, in its entire record, shown "no craving for power, no greed for territory"! And this President, who a few weeks before had told the Filipinos that independence was a dangerous illusion, whose personal agent had just warned the Nicaraguan Liberals that United States marines would take their arms from them if they did not lay them down "voluntarily," solemnly stood up and declared that "we have robbed no people of their independence; we have laid on no country the hand of oppression"—and no one jeered or even smiled. "We want our relationship with other nations based not on a meeting of bayonets but on a meeting of minds," he added. Admirable sentiment! Three days later another regiment of marines was ordered from Manila to Shanghai, and 4,000 Americans in uniform moved north in China to be on hand when the Nationalists reach Peking.

WHAT IS A NEWS AGENCY'S JOB? Is it to report news impartially or to help the government of its country to carry out its policies? European governments maintain semi-official agencies, often subsidized, which are mere mouthpieces for their governments—Wolff in Germany, Havas in France, Stefani in Italy, Reuter's in Great Britain, and others. These agencies, formerly known as "official" agencies, banded together and took the name of "Allied News Agencies" at the press-association conference called by the League of Nations at Geneva. Recently they met at Warsaw, and the Polish Foreign Minister, M. Zaleski, defined their role, without protest, as follows:

> The news agencies which you direct are charged with the task of communicating to the public the intentions of your governments. You are, therefore, to a certain extent, organs which supplement the Ministries of Foreign Affairs, which, without your efficacious aid, would be deaf instruments devoid of resonance and echo.

Significantly, the Associated Press of the United States of America joined the twenty-four European agencies at this meeting. And its recent action in broadcasting irresponsible State Department propaganda against Mexico, without indicating the source of its misinformation, seemed to indicate that it accepted M. Zaleski's definition of its role. More power, then, to agencies which conceive their task as the dissemination of truth impartially, rather than to supplement anyone's propaganda.

THE FRENCH HAVE VERVE—and common sense. When the British anti-Russian hysteria cast its ripples upon the shores of France, French tories began to howl that Marcel Cachin and several other Communists condemned months ago should begin to serve their terms in jail. The Government, it seems, had sensibly neglected to apply sentences which might have sent up an inconvenient aroma of martyrdom. But the Communists howled as loudly that Léon Daudet, royalist, also had a prison term unserved. The Poincaré Government, with impulsive impartiality, announced that it would send both to prison—and the howls of protest were drowned in a flood of laughter. The thought of Daudet and Cachin as fellow-martyrs in adjacent cells was too amusing. Where else can such things happen? Where else, indeed, is the art of life so instinctive as in the capital where, when the Academy barred "midinette" from its classic dictionaries, the midinettes paraded, protested, burned the Immortals in effigy, until Marshal Joffre, one of them, stepped forth to proclaim his innocence. He at least had voted for the precious word. We do not, indeed, pretend that our Pershings and Woods are scholars; but if we did, could any one imagine "Black Jack" protesting to a riotous crowd of American flappers his own loyalty to slang?

A GOVERNMENT ON THE RAMPAGE is what our International Relations Section documents show this week. The Government of Great Britain, disregarding decency, propriety, and law itself; the officials of Great Britain's Government giving themselves the lie, reversing the statements made in supposedly good faith to a neighbor government. The documents gathered by the Anglo-Russian Parliamentary Committee, extracts from which we print, show that the British government raid on the Russian Trade Delegation offices was made in spite of provisions in the British-Russian Trade Agreement which gave members of the Trade Delegation diplomatic immunity from search and seizure; it was conducted by policemen who refused to show their warrant until an hour after the search was begun, and then only in response to vigorous protest by Russian officials; it was carried through in the most high-handed manner, with no receipts given for property seized, no opportunity for Soviet officials to be present while documents were being removed, and with actual violence—two of the clerks in the cipher room being assaulted by the police. Of course, in emergencies between governments treaties are traditionally scraps of paper—denials to the contrary notwithstanding; of course, when premises are being searched by policemen gentle methods are not the rule. But considering the high moral tone adopted toward the Soviet Government by other nations, not excepting Great Britain, it might be thought a breach of policy to proceed—whatever the provocation—in just this rough-and-tumble manner.

COMMUNISM AT COLORADO'S School of Mines was the horrendous charge recently investigated by the faculty of that institution. Let us at once say that the charge was discovered to be unwarranted; the Colorado School of Mines is not tinged with red except in combination with white and blue. A young man named Frank I. Olmstead, secretary of the School of Mines Christian Association, was accused by representatives of the American Legion of being an "adherent of the Soviet form of government of Russia." It was also said of Mr. Olmstead that he was a disbeliever in military training, that he was "active in preaching pacifism," and was "otherwise talking and conducting himself in our opinion inimical to good government." These serious charges were quite properly investigated, and it is pleasant to record how pointedly the representatives of the American Legion were requested to mind their own business and betake themselves elsewhere. Mr. Olmstead, it was revealed, had a courageous and honorable war record but had recently come to be opposed to military training, although, apparently, refraining from attempting to make converts to his opinion. Otherwise his "patriotism" was beyond question—he was so far from being inclined toward the Soviet regime as to have received the military medal of St. George from the White Russian Government for bravery in action against the Soviet forces. In other words, this was a tempest in a very small teapot. It is typical, however, of the activities of certain Legion branches. The brave and honest action of the college authorities in combating and refuting Legion charges is, unfortunately, not so typical.

WHY WAS THE PLAY "SPREAD EAGLE" barred from the movies? Our readers will remember that in our issue of June 1 we raised this question and stated that Will Hays's office had refused to tell us why. Miss Detzer, the secretary of the Women's International League, throws some light upon this, by calling our attention to the fact that Will H. Hays is a lieutenant colonel in the Adjutant General's Department Reserve, and Jesse Louis Lasky, the picture magnate, a major in the Signal Corps Reserve. She also sends us a clipping from a Los Angeles paper, which, after reciting these facts, adds:

> These movie magnates and several others representing leading producing companies have been sworn in with army titles. They are officers of the Signal Corps motion-picture advisory council, United States army. The interest of the average fan lies in the fact that the screens are going to show many more military pictures. The film industry has promised its aid to the army, which in turn will aid in the making of pictures. The alliance just effected promises that help of commanders in the making of features with military flavor. On its part, the movie men promise to make more martial subjects as propaganda for the war branch of the government. Cecil de Mille, Richard Rowland, H. R. Cochrane, Hal Roach, Albert Warner are some of the parties to the contract to acquaint the public with the army's activities and combat pacifist doctrines, which are the avowed purposes of the alliance.

We do not doubt that this does throw some light on Colonel Hays's attitude toward "Spread Eagle." As the case of Captain Paxton Hibben showed, the War Department undertakes to control or supervise the opinions of reserve officers. If it can annex the leaders of the motion-picture industry to its propaganda machine by issuing reserve commissions to them, what could be more delightful? The producer, or the "Czar," becomes major or colonel, and the War Department has its grip on another opinion-making force.

AMONG THE MANY REQUESTS that come to us for approval of one campaign for funds or another we cannot decline to call attention to the appeal of the School of Medicine of Howard University in Washington, D. C., for an endowment fund of $500,000, toward which the General Education Board has promised half if the remainder can be raised by the end of this year. This medical school is of enormous value to the colored race. It comprises three colleges, which have graduated to date 1,318 physicians, 703 dentists, and 420 pharmacists. It has been rated as being in Class A by the American Medical Association, but it will not be able to continue in that category unless it can show an income of $25,000 a year, in addition to the amount received from students' fees. While the university as a whole receives a generous annual appropriation from Congress, only a very small amount, given for supplies and equipment, goes to the Medical School. It is of vital importance that the colored race has only a few medical schools, while the need for educated and competent physicians is overwhelmingly great. All too often these people are exploited by incompetent Negroes or unscrupulous white doctors. The appeal of Howard is one which should meet the readiest response, and we are glad to note that Senator Couzens of Michigan has contributed $5,000.

THE LATE MARQUIS OF LANSDOWNE deserves lasting fame as one of the few Englishmen in high office who kept their sanity during the World War. In the middle of it, in 1916, he startled his countrymen by asking for a simple, plain statement of what the Allies were really fighting for. The ensuing uproar was tremendous, and if he had not had an inherited title and been a Cabinet minister, Heaven knows what might have befallen him. His associates in the Cabinet deemed it a crime that anyone should inquire just why they were sacrificing a million of their countrymen. Mr. Wilson had not yet formulated the Fourteen Points; the Allies had not yet pretended to accept them; the disgraceful secret treaties had not yet been published. Had Lord Lansdowne's Cabinet associates answered his request that their war aims be stated, in order to see if the Germans would not be moved to a peace by negotiation, they would have had to reveal their sordid bargains. So Lord Lansdowne was denounced and charged with aiding the enemy, and the millions of Englishmen in arms had to go on fighting and dying without the slightest idea of what was going on behind the scenes or what it was really all about. But for asking that simple rational question Lord Lansdowne deserves to rest in Westminster Abbey, to which his other long and able but conventional services hardly entitle him.

A GALLANT SPIRIT passed from us when William M. Fincke died. The public, and especially the labor movement, knew him as the man who, together with his wife, first made Brookwood Labor College possible, and then, leaving it in competent hands, started a second venture, primarily for the children of the workers, on his own farm in Pawling, New York. His illness has been a terrible handicap to an experiment which deserves success not so much as a monument to him as for the sake of the splendid idea which Manumit School embodies. These educational ventures were only the last part of a life work crowded with various interests. After making a name for himself as man and athlete at Hill School and Yale University, Mr. Fincke went to work as a mining engineer in the coal-fields. He left that business to study for the ministry. A forthright pacifist sermon shortly after we entered the World War lost him his pulpit in the Greenwich Presbyterian Church in New York, but, characteristically, while the close vote was going against him the pastor was on his way to Europe as a stretcher-bearer in a hospital ambulance corps. After the war, at various times, Mr. Fincke served at the Labor Temple in New York City and for a year at the Community Church at White Plains. Ultimately, his own loyalty to truth as he saw it compelled him to leave the church, and he gave himself with full devotion to educational work. But he never lost sympathy with any good cause or any aspect of the struggle for social justice. In 1919, during the steel strike, he represented the American Civil Liberties Union in a free-speech fight at Duquesne, Pennsylvania, and the experience cost him a short stay in jail. But greater than anything that Mr. Fincke did was what he was. And nothing in his career was finer than his bearing while he waited the inevitable end of a terrible chronic illness.

Behind the Red Walls of Peking

SUMMER comes, and the lotus blooms in the dank pools outside the mighty red walls of Peking, and the flies swarm through the unscreened city. It is the time of year when the foreign women and children disappear to the seashore or to summer homes built in what were once cool Buddhist temples in the Western Hills. This year a new restlessness is added; the rumble of civil war draws near. And to foreign ears civil war has a new grim meaning; it is no longer simply a struggle between rival generals, but part of a national revolution which strikes at the privileged position of the foreign communities.

Yet the correspondents still gather at the Peking Club bar each noon to swap yarns, as they do far to the South in the Hankow Club and in Shanghai at the bars of the American Club and of the Shanghai Club, its British rival, which boasts itself the proud possessor of the longest bar in the world. And out of the gossip at those bars, and occasional friendly chats with race-conscious officials, grows the picture of China reflected in the news cables sent to America.

Japan has landed 2,000 troops at Tsingtao in Shantung —the port the Germans took from China as compensation for the death of two German missionaries in an inland village, which Japan took from Germany in the early days of the World War, which Japan returned to China after the great boycott movement of 1918-1921 had ruined her China trade. Great Britain still has her overgrown "defense force" at Shanghai—more than one defender in uniform for every foreign civilian in the city; but her warships have begun to move North, to be ahead of the Nationalists. And the United States has already sent its shiploads of excited marines to Tientsin, where, presumably, they will disembark to help guard the British Concession—for we have no concession of our own there.

The little foreign communities have an absurdly exaggerated sense of their own importance—but to a tragic extent they carry the world with them. Shanghai worked itself into a magnificent fury, with curfews, and sandbags, and barbed wire, largely to convince the outside world that more foreign troops were needed in China—and then gave the game away by going ahead with its race meetings, which drew larger crowds than any political meeting. And when the races were abandoned, it was quite frankly explained —locally—that "while there might appear to be no more reason in the actual circumstances of Shanghai why races should not take place than games of football, the effect abroad would be deplorable." The home countries, in other words, might realize that Shanghai's hysteria was hysteria, and that the assemblage of these vast armadas of foreign warships actually increased rather than lessened the danger to foreigners in China! The same pathetic myopia appeared in the dispatches from Hankow. British and American business men, it was stated, were staying on despite consular advice, because they feared that otherwise they would lose all their trade to the Germans. And why were the Germans so favored? Simply because they had no frowning warships on the scene, and had renounced the "protection" of the unequal treaties.

Most of our news is of what happens in these foreign communities—although we do not hear all of that. The Shanghai correspondents do not bother to cable that British Tommies stand guard at new brothels, especially established, with white Russian girls on sale, for the benefit of the restless defense forces; they tell us only that, the British military forces having taken three-year leases on their quarters and the new crop of defenders having doubled the number of foreign buyers in the city, business is good. From Peking we hear only the foreign side of the story. When Mr. Randall Gould, representing the United Press in Peking, ventured to dig out news for himself, and to cable facts unpalatable to the bumptious bureaucrats in the American Legation, he was promptly barred from the press conferences in the American Chancellery. Americans representing Chinese news agencies are also barred from these sessions, although the representative of Reuter's, the semi-official British agency, is admitted to the inner confidences. And today, when the Chinese masses of Peking are eagerly waiting for news of more Nationalist victories, praying for the withdrawal of Chang Tso-lin's Manchurians and the coming of the Nationalists, we hear only of the fears of the foreigners. In the interval between withdrawal and arrival, in the last despair of defeat or the first flush of victory, incidents may occur—foreign homes may be looted, or foreigners attacked. Of the larger meaning of this mighty awakening of a continental people we hear next to nothing.

Despite all the eager prophecies of Nationalist defeat and disruption the tide of Chinese Nationalism, as The Nation has consistently predicted, rolls on. The Hankow regime seems to have reorganized itself despite the presence of foreign warships; it has reached at least a temporary working agreement with Chiang Kai-shek, the "moderate" leader; Feng Yu-hsiang, the "Christian general," has effected a comeback in the Northwest; the result is that the Northern "anti-Communist" armies are sweeping back in retreat toward Peking. In China, where wars are largely wars of propaganda and prestige, a retreat once begun is hard to stem. There will be more squabbles and rivalries within the Kuomintang, of course; but no power, foreign or Chinese, can prevail against the living force of Nationalism in China.

Into the nebula of swirling aspirations and crystallizing hopes that is China today is thrust, unfortunately for the world, an alien conflict. It is not alone the effort of the West to hold what it has taken in China; there is also the conflict of Russia and Britain, with all its rich cargo of meanings. Britain, with her empire on which the sun never sets at stake, dominated today by a group of Die-hards who stop at nothing—who raid the Russian Trade offices like movie heroes, who sponsor legislation which aims to kill trade-unionism at home, who send their bullying warships to Egypt when the Egyptians suggest that they would like to have Egyptian officers in their own army—is of course appalled at the prospect of any Asiatic nation rising to self-control. If Chinese Nationalism is successful, what excuse is left for the historic British Empire? Russia, naturally, accepts the challenge gladly, and will do all in her power to make Chinese Nationalism a success. And Japan, an Asiatic nation herself, stands hesitatingly on the sidelines.

It is a dramatic spectacle, when one gets away from the club bars. Something real is at stake. The people huddled behind the fortified walls of Peking's Legation Quarter have a right to be restless.

Those Neutral Rights

AN exchange of notes between Great Britain and the United States, on May 19, provided for the settlement, among others, of the claims of American citizens arising out of the violation by British Orders in Council of American neutral rights in the period 1914-1917. These measures, denounced by Secretary Lansing as "illegal and indefensible," did immeasurable injury to neutrals and to international law. The settlement just effected removes a cause of friction, but it does nothing to settle the essential principles involved.

By its war measures from 1914 to 1917 the British Government, step by step, destroyed the right of neutrals to trade in non-military commodities, not only with the Central Powers, as was their long-established right, but also with the neutrals of Europe. Trade was permitted only with Britain and her Allies. A similar attempt in 1793 had been frustrated by Jefferson's refusal to acquiesce; in 1917 a more pliant United States yielded, and thus became unneutral, to its permanent disadvantage. In 1917 a powerful British propaganda undertook to show a gullible world that British violations of law were in the highest interests of morality, whereas German violations indicated a barbaric hostility to civilization.

Millions of dollars of American cargoes and ships were either confiscated or detained under Orders in Council which virtually wiped out the neutral privilege of trading with continental Europe. To make foodstuffs contraband, the distinction between combatants and non-combatants and between neutral and enemy destination had to be destroyed. A pliant prize court enforced the Orders in Council as "logical" extensions of the "rights" of belligerents. The German prize courts were less hypocritical, calling the German measures "political" rather than "legal." The measures of both belligerents were dictated by military expediency, regardless of law. In the long run, the British violations are likely to prove more destructive to mankind.

When the United States, in April, 1917, after tolerating the British violations while vigorously contesting the German, entered the war, it was announced that the German violations were of such a character that their settlement brooked no delay, whereas the British violations, involving injuries to property, would be settled at the end of the war "to make the world safe for democracy." For nine years virtually nothing was done to make good the promised settlement of these claims against Great Britain. It was only after Senator Borah introduced a resolution demanding their settlement that the Department of State ceased deprecating the claims and awoke to mild action, and in the settlement just announced the spirit of altruistic sacrifice of American to British interests is a prominent feature. Furthermore, by making the settlement an "executive agreement" the treaty-making power is evaded.

The agreement undertakes to settle, for about one and one-half million dollars, the claims of American citizens arising out of illegal confiscations and detentions, amounting to many millions of dollars. The million and a half is obtained by the gracious consent of the British Government to waive the collection from us of sums due for war supplies furnished our forces in Europe.

The sacrifice of the claimants is evident in the fact that no claim will be paid unless the claimants have gone into the British prize courts. This will kill off many meritorious claims. When binding legislation, like the Orders in Council, is responsible for the injury, it is useless to ask a British court to set the legislation aside. The requirement of going into the British courts to test the Orders in Council, already many times sustained by them, imposes on the American claimants a harsh and unnecessary condition calculated to discourage the presentation of claims.

When this settlement is compared with what we imposed on the Germans the contrast is startling. Germany must pay in full, with interest, all damage sustained during the war by American citizens, regardless of source or of international law. Even post-war depreciation of the mark was often included. Claims thus leaped up to $180,000,000, and, with the tacit support of the Department of State, we have threatened further to violate international law by confiscating German private property to pay this sum.

The present surrender is a fitting climax to the arbitrariness of 1917. In 1793 we were able to defend neutral rights without going to war; in 1917 we were unable to defend them, and went to war anyway—an interesting commentary on the contrast in diplomatic skill. In the distribution of the sum now available, and in the preparation of legal opinions, the United States can do something to retrieve the sacrifice of neutral rights which its recent diplomacy has entailed. The new theory, centering about the League of Nations, that every war must be a world war and that neutrality is today impossible, is one of the dangerous illusions to which war psychology gave birth. The protection of law is more necessary against the strong than against the weak, and the future, like the past, is likely to find more advantage in strengthening the rights of neutrals than in buttressing the interest and claims of belligerents.

Who Invented the Steamboat?

"THE federal and State governments today formally honored John Fitch, inventor of the steamboat," says an Associated Press dispatch from Bardstown, Kentucky, dated May 25, describing the unveiling of a monument at that place. In his dedicating address Governor Fields of Kentucky said that only one thing remained to be done, "that is to see that history is corrected and that textbooks be made to teach that Fitch, rather than Fulton, be credited with this wonderful invention."

This passion for correcting history is laudable, but it might be well for someone first to read enough of the record to find out what he is doing. One hesitates to have his history corrected ex cathedra by a State whose legislature recently came within one vote of rewriting the history of the world by excluding the doctrine of evolution from its public schools. Nobody who has read anything on the subject holds that Fulton produced the first steamboat. On the other hand, neither did Fitch. There had been experiments with steam navigation a century before either of them; like most complicated machines, the steamboat was the product of many men laboring through successive decades, and exact apportionment of honor leads one into a maze of partisan, doubtful, and contradictory testimony. It is true that Fitch's first steamboat, launched in 1787, was twenty years ahead of Fulton's Clermont, but it is also a fact that Denis Papin, in France, was studying the application of steam to vessels before the close of the seventeenth century, and in

William Henry, a well-to-do resident of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, visited England in 1760 and saw a Watt engine. Upon returning to this country he made a steam engine of his own, installed it in a boat fitted with paddle-wheels, and launched the vessel in the Conestoga River. The operation was successful but the patient died; that is, Henry's theory was sound but his boat sank. Undiscouraged, he went on to other experiments, and, according to Fred Erving Dayton's "Steamboat Days," inspired both Fitch and Fulton, who were his proteges. Fitch was a poor man, dogged all his days by misfortune and an inability to interest men of means in his ideas. He worked contemporaneously with James Rumsey, and at about the same time they tried out their first steamboats in different places. Rumsey's method of propulsion was a steam pump which forced a stream of water aft and thus thrust the vessel forward. He drove a boat by this means at four miles an hour on the Potomac River, but his system of propulsion failed to attract permanent interest. Fitch relied upon a kind of paddle wheel. His first vessel, completed in 1787, turned out to have many defects, although it moved at a rate of three or four miles an hour. His second steamboat was an improvement, and his third, in 1790, made seven miles an hour, carrying passengers on the Delaware River between Philadelphia and Trenton. But the venture was not commercially successful and Fitch went to France to seek fresh capital. He failed to find it and, returning to this country, eventually settled in Kentucky, where he died in Bardstown in 1798, supposedly by his own hand.

Probably Fulton did not invent anything of consequence that went into the Clermont. The most important item, the engine, was imported from Boulton and Watt in England. But Fulton had studied the problems of the steamboat for many years in America and Europe before he built the Clermont and he brought a high degree of technical knowledge and skill to his task. The result was a vessel that traveled from New York City to Albany, about 150 miles, on its first trip, and proved that the steamboat as a commercial possibility had arrived.

John Fitch is entitled to a generous share of credit for the development of the steamboat, but not for as much as Governor Fields suggests. It is hard to see, also, what claim Kentucky has to Fitch, or to any reflected glory from his work. Fitch was born in Connecticut and his experiments with steamboats were on the Delaware River under grants from Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Kentucky's only connection with the inventor seems to have been to drive him to suicide in his old age. Perhaps, too, Governor Fields would have modified his oratory at Bardstown had he known that in 1839 Kentucky voted a commemorative medal to the son of James Rumsey as a tribute to the latter for "giving the world the benefit of the steamboat." Thus the State over which Governor Fields presides is now on record as having honored two different men for a single achievement. Perhaps that is why somebody thought to provide an extra niche by getting rid of Charles Darwin.

The "N. E. D."

THE current year is expected to see the appearance of the last volume of the "New English Dictionary." Probably most people will not remember 1927 chiefly for that, but it is not likely that any of its other achievements will more deserve to be remembered. In the course of preparing this gigantic work every extant book printed in English, as well as whole libraries of later books, has been read; every meaning of every word has not only been defined but supplied with one or more quotations illustrating its use in that sense; and scholars from nearly every country of Europe, as well as from the United States, have contributed. No similar work—not even the great German lexicon of the Brothers Grimm—is comparable to it in magnitude, accuracy, or completeness.

Not only no single man but no single generation of men could complete a dictionary upon so stupendous a scale, and it has, indeed, used up the lives of several editors-in-chief. Hartley Coleridge, the first, died in 1861, shortly after assuming the task. It was then handed on to F. J. Furnival, founder of the New Shakespeare Society, and Walter Skeat, most famous of Chaucer editors, who labored on it until their deaths. Though by 1878 some two million quotations had been gathered, the work languished in the absence of anyone with the requisite industry and scholarship until James A. H. Murray, a schoolmaster with a genius for lexicography, was appointed editor in 1879. He had, of course, a corps of assistants, and there were many voluntary contributors, but it is to his furious industry, continued unremittingly until his death at nearly eighty, that the work is chiefly due. He had hoped that he might live to see it complete, and three years before he died in 1915 he was working seventeen hours a day, but the task was too vast to be accomplished by even such intemperate labor, and since his time three men, Dr. Bradley, Professor Craigie, and Mr. C. T. Onions, have been chiefly responsible for bringing it to a conclusion.

Here one may find twenty-one closely printed columns devoted to the single word "point," and fifty-four meanings of "put," each provided, as usual, with a quotation to illustrate its first occurrence in print and usually with at least one other from a more recent century. In all, over 400,000 separate words are defined and more than 1,750,000 quotations made. But bulk is no adequate measure of the dictionary's accomplishment or any indication of its meticulous accuracy. It has taken all written English as its province and it is the very reverse of the pedantic—Americanisms are as welcome as Chaucerian English, and the Lumberman's Gazette is quoted as gladly as Addison's Spectator.

Few would be capable of performing such a task—fewer still would consent to devote their lives to labor so exhausting and so unremunerative. The "New English Dictionary" is one of those magnificent achievements which are only possible when an organization exists capable of drawing to itself during several generations the precise men for the task in hand. Since 1860 it has existed as a challenge, and it is at last complete because, one after another, men have appeared to accept that challenge, in many cases laboring without reward of any kind. It is one of the greatest monuments to the patient persistence of scholarship and one of the most sterling illustrations of that strange piety which only scholars can understand.

The Tabloid

Lindbergh's "Bolshevik" Father

By MARGARET S. ERNST

SAID the New York Times editorially of Charles August Lindbergh, Jr., on May 23, 1927: "This clear-headed, clean-lived, modest but daring son of America who . . . drew the peoples of many nations together in their concentration upon something of their common and supreme admiration"—a sentence which expresses aptly the sentiments of some millions of Americans about their countryman.

Said the New York Times editorially of Charles August Lindbergh, Sr., on May 29, 1918, after commenting on the fact that Mr. Lindbergh, then Nonpartisan League candidate for Governor of Minnesota, had been refused a hall in Duluth for a political speech, and after quoting from his book "Why Is Your Country at War": "Such is the gospel which Duluth refused to hear. Such is the platform of this candidate of the Nonpartisan League. More fortunate than many of the managers and orators of that concern, Mr. Lindbergh, so far as we know, is not under indictment for sedition"!

It is not entirely fair to the Times, perhaps, so to quote chapter and verse against it in its treatment of the Lindbergh family. It was not the only paper which found the utterances of Lindbergh, Senior, seditious, "Bolshevik," pacifist, unpatriotic. But in both cases it was voicing the opinion of the majority, it was accepting the current hurrah as gospel. And the Lindberghs, both father and son, have distinguished themselves by refusing to do just this thing: the father would not be stampeded by the patriots into blind acceptance of the war, the son would not permit himself to be swept off his feet by temptations of money, movie fame, vaudeville popularity, or the opportunity of being a nine-days' wonder in the tabloid press.

Lindbergh, flying without stir or stop across the 3,000-mile gray plain of the Atlantic—that achievement lifts us all on sure wings, we all take part through type and story in his victory, and in a measure we can even understand how with cool head and perfect mechanical sensitiveness this boy arrived beyond the door of miracle.

The post-phenomena of flight have been harder to understand. How a boy of twenty-five, flying into the uproar of applause and idolatry, kept his head, remained simply an aviator, turned down offers of millions for cheap exploitation seemed a more superhuman victory—until one recalled the "Junior" trailing his name like an heraldic banner. It is from his father that young Charles August got his ballast of decisiveness, courage, untouchable naturalness.

In the New York Public Library are two slender volumes, well-read to judge by the thumb-marks, which tell a part of the story of the Lindbergh character.

"Why Is Your Country at War and What Happens to You After the War, and Related Subjects" is the cumbersome title of the father's volume, published in 1917. When the levees of peace gave way and the World War rushed over the United States, Lindbergh was a Republican member of Congress from Minnesota. He had been in Congress since 1907, with a clear and courageous record all through those ten years, consistently on the side of the Farmer-Labor group, consistently against what he termed the Money Trust and the war-for-profit group.

As early as December, 1915, Lindbergh warned the President: "Speculations and loans in foreign fields are likely to bring us into the war." On July 15, 1916, he spoke of himself as "inspired by the logic, eloquence, and candor of La Follette." "I believe that I am as patriotic as any one," he said. "To be that implies bias in favor of my own country." And then followed the "buts," his pacifist, pro-labor conscience speaking out, though in the minority: "The war-for-profit group has counterfeited patriotism." "There is a fourth group, the profiteers of peace, the patrioteers of war, who busy themselves with the other three groups [farmer, wage-earner, business man], exploiting them." And finally "Peace with universal victory and no defeat is what we must get out of this war; not as a logical result of war, but as a sequence to the absurdity of war."

Lindbergh was attacked for these pacifist proletarian opinions, naturally. And for saying: "We have been dragged into the war by the intrigue of the speculators." In June, 1918, the Chicago Tribune staff writer, Arthur M. Evans, wrote of his book: "The reader looks instinctively to see if it bears a German copyright. It doesn't, but it contains many choice morsels of thought that might be gobbled with relish in Potsdam." The Tribune's Washington correspondent telegraphed a report of an attack made by Representative Miller in which Lindbergh was declared "because of the attacks which he has made upon the American government, a friend of the Kaiser."

In Congressman Lindbergh's book there is a delightful frontispiece—the two Lindberghs, senior and junior, both very clean and Swedish-looking, the father thoughtfully and courageously sitting for his picture, while young Charles—the world's young Charles now—a little boy of ten or so, seriously and proudly stands beside his dad.

Lindbergh's second book, "The Economic Pinch" (Dorrance, Philadelphia, 1923), was written with a pen dipped in hatred—hatred of the so-called Money Trust and of the profiteers who according to his conviction had kept the United States from becoming a leader among nations. The book seethes with his contempt for those who profiteer at the expense of many. His Congressional record showed him fighting the Esch-Cummins Act, the Federal Reserve Act, and instigating the Money Trust Investigation, and the same economic-political background looms large in his book.

Today, as he was a few years ago, Lindbergh's father would be called Radical, Red, even Bolshevik.

Young Charles is too much a son of his father, we believe, to mind. He will take his victor's crown on his fair head with a smile; he will be decorated by kings and he will chat with princes; he will even come home on a triumphant warship (whose construction his father fought)—unspoiled. It may be that he will be a flier all his life, a doer of deeds; or it may be that after maturity his broad wings may weary of the empty air-lanes, and he may turn, following his father, to a new but not less spectacular flight in the realm of ideas. For only by the flights of those who are far ahead of the majority is progress in human relations achieved. And liberal leaders of courage and intelligence are almost as rare as trans-Atlantic fliers.

Voting Red in Austria

By ROGER N. BALDWIN

Vienna, May 14

TO see a brisk, cosmopolitan city plastered with signs Vote Red, varied with big posters showing a red man with his arms stretched out toward you, must have jarred the complacent American tourists in Vienna during the election campaign in April. It was unlike any campaign back home. Red signs everywhere—"Vote Social Democratic." Red movies displayed every evening from a high building opposite the Opera. Red meetings; red processions; red handbills; red sky-writing by aeroplane. In New York they would have called out the militia. In Vienna the militia is red, too.

And in Austria the redness of Social Democracy is the brightest Socialist red in Europe. Talk to any Socialist critically of the impotence of the Socialist movement, and he will cite Vienna in rebuttal. He is right. It is different—militant, revolutionary in feeling, practical in achievement. It has left Communism without an appeal. Socialist Vienna is what its enemies call it, "a red island" in the capitalist sea.

The result in terms of election figures in state and cities shows a Socialist gain of three seats in Parliament—two coming from Vienna, where the fight was hardest—and a cut in the government majority to five. An opposition Land Party increased its vote from five to nine, and it is this group that the government must win over for a safe margin of support. The Socialist vote in all Austria is over 40 per cent of the total, and in Vienna over 62 per cent. The increase over four years ago was about 7 per cent, with 10 per cent more necessary for a majority. As the Socialists largely control the industrial district, the fight of the future is for the villages and the peasantry. The Tyrol for the first time showed Socialist gains. The system of proportional representation has tended to help the Socialist ticket, for it wins more seats on "residue" votes than the other parties.

Can Socialism win a majority and form a government? What will it do if it does? What does this bitterest of all campaigns in Austrian history mean? Why is Austria today the one country in Europe freest from repression, and yet in the midst of battle over vital issues? I can answer only from brief observation at political meetings, conversations in the heat of election days with all sides, and my rather labored reading of the press. On all sides I was conscious of an exceptionally courageous, intelligent, and driving organism in the Social Democratic Party, with a freshness and youthful vigor not found elsewhere among European Socialists.

The Social Democratic Party was on the defensive in Vienna. The struggle of the campaign was for the "mastery of Vienna," the stronghold of Socialism, though I did not find anyone rash enough to expect the defeat of a party with an overwhelming majority in the city council. The Christian Socialists who control the national government (being neither Christian nor Socialist) hoped to cut Socialist representation in Parliament and to deprive them of their three-fourths majority in the Vienna council, with legal powers much greater than a mere majority. To do it, they formed a "United List" ticket of the conservative parties. They attacked even the personal lives of Socialist leaders, raised the Bolshevik bogy, and charged extravagance, graft, and corruption in the multitude of welfare activities of the Socialist city government, in the great housing enterprises, and in fiscal administration. The Socialists hit back with charges against the national government. A Finance Minister fled to Cuba. Others were implicated. Mud-slinging to a degree unprecedented in Austrian elections marked the campaign, which was everywhere characterized as "American"! But this had little effect on the result. It was incidental to the real issues on which the campaign was fought. They concerned primarily the Socialist protection of tenants against landlords, the city housing enterprise, and the high taxes in Vienna on the luxuries of the well-to-do. The city finance commissioner, author of these taxes, was the special object of attack, but he emerged from the campaign with increased popularity.

At bottom it was clearly a class struggle, waged to protect the results of the 1918 revolution and to increase working-class power in opposition to the middle class and the more prosperous peasantry which support the present government. In the political meetings this line-up was clear. Working-class enthusiasm and determination marked the Socialist gatherings. The government meetings were much less spirited, labored, heavy—in a word, middle-class. I heard Otto Bauer, the leader of Austrian Socialism, speak, expecting the usual campaign promises, platitudes, vilifications, and claims to achievement. Instead he painted a vivid picture of the thirty-eight-year struggle of Socialism in Austria, analyzed its present position, and made it plain that whatever had been done was only a step on the road they were traveling to complete socialization. No truckling for middle-class votes; no trimming the issues for fear of being too extreme. Social revolution is the object—a peaceful, parliamentary revolution, to be sure, but essentially revolution.

Of course, you can hear Socialists talking about revolution almost anywhere, but there is a different ring to the discussion in Austria. There they push ahead further than any other Socialist Party. The test of their genuineness is the insignificance of the Communist Party. It has not, and never has had, a single member in Parliament or in the Vienna city council. Its vote in Vienna was 1 per cent of the Socialist vote. Its vote in the country was smaller. It has steadily declined since the revolutionary days of working-class ascendancy in 1919 and 1920, before the reaction set in with Allied control, and after all hope of a workers' dictatorship vanished in the defeat of the Hungarian workers, the emergence of Fascism, and the consolidation of capitalism. Communism is a weaker force than in any other country in Europe with free elections, and the reason for it is the character of Socialism. One of the leading Socialists said to me: "Communism lives on the faults and mistakes of Socialism. In Austria we have the fewest."

I do not need to point out the difficulties facing those who talk of legal revolutions. The Austrian Socialists are fully aware of them. Although they do not say so, their conduct indicates that a revolutionary period would not find them sticking to outworn parliamentary methods and ideas of legalism. For the present their program is to hold the achievements so far won, to enlist the peasantry in a country over half agricultural, to maintain at least a balance of class forces to prevent interference with working-class activities, and to push the taxing and welfare program in the red island of Vienna.

Already there is enough balance of power in Austria to make repression impossible. There is not and has not been a single political prisoner worth the name since the troubled days of five years ago. Political meetings are held without police or the "red guard" and their canes, so universal at radical meetings in Europe these days. Vienna is a haven of refuge second only to Paris for political refugees from the adjacent dictatorships. When governments protest at the political activities of refugees and the police attempt to deport them, an appeal to the Socialist burgomaster of Vienna usually results in permission to remain on condition of keeping quiet. The press is entirely free. I heard of only one current free-speech case, and that was for alleged blasphemy. There is no Fascism, no militarism, and only sentimental monarchism. The Roman Catholic state church is, of course, still strong as a conservative influence, especially among the city middle classes. But a majority of the new Parliament is now definitely anti-clerical, with what promise of action nobody ventures publicly to guess.

The economic difficulties of a country reduced by the war from a unit of 56,000,000 to 6,500,000 persons, cut off from former markets and supplies, surrounded by hostile tariff barriers and by intensely nationalist states make it clearer as time goes on that union with Germany is the only solution. The majority of the new Parliament is for it. The peace treaty is against it. The alternative, an economic federation of the Danubian states, looks increasingly remote. The Socialists have been in favor of union with Germany from the days of the revolution, and their stand for that solution, now championed by a large part of the bourgeois parties, contributes to their strength. It is generally recognized, too, that they saved the republic in its days of greatest danger both from monarchists and Communists.

All this sounds perhaps over-optimistic for the future. But today Austria stands out as the one country where Socialism, both in its work in Vienna and in its opposition in the national government, is a fighting force. The Socialist leaders display traits common to politicians the world over. Some of the well-known vote-getting tricks of Tammany Hall are not unknown among them. But on the whole they are a devoted and determined crowd.

Much might be said of the impossibility of Socialism, even with a majority, achieving substantial results in raising the amazingly low wages of Austrian industry, in attacking the stubborn problem of unemployment, in lowering high prices, in extending trade. These are the common problems of all Central Europe today. No detached solution is possible. But Socialism as it works in Austria represents a force leading to solutions that the capitalist system cannot and will not undertake—as the Economic Conference at Geneva makes abundantly clear. In Austria "Voting Red" means business—the workers' business.

What Will Become of the Farmer?

By REXFORD GUY TUGWELL

THE emergency faced by our American agriculture is one which calls for emergency remedies. It is perhaps true that an abolition of tariffs which favor our manufacturing group and operate disadvantageously to farmers would correct the worst artificial handicaps they suffer. So much may be taken for granted since it is a matter by now of almost universal recognition among economists. Failing such a remedy some artificial price-raising of agricultural products would seem only just, and disquisitions on the hardships it might impose on certain persons appear irrelevant. For this reason the continuance of political activity in this direction, even after the first failures of the Farm Bloc, were to have been expected. There were, for instance, several bills offered in Congress during the winter of 1925-1926 which were substantially similar to the McNary-Haugen bill. None of them came nearer to passage than the original measure. But discussion of the issue became so intelligent and the claims of the farmers seemed so just that a considerable public sentiment was aroused in their favor. Some measure of a price-fixing sort seemed much more likely to pass in the near future than at any time in the past.

In the second session of the Sixty-ninth Congress, therefore, it was not surprising to find the Farm Bloc in such an improved position that they succeeded in passing a revised McNary-Haugen bill which, though it displayed some changes from the original act, sought the same ends in much the same way. It declared the policy of Congress to be that of promoting "the orderly marketing" of basic agricultural commodities. To do this it would provide for the "control and disposition of surpluses." A Federal Farm Board was to be set up to administer the act, chosen by the President from among farmer-nominated candidates. The members of the board would have the duty of keeping advised "from any available sources of crop prices, prospects, supply, and demand, at home and abroad, with especial attention to the existence . . . of a surplus of any agricultural commodity or any of its food products."

The enumeration of these "basic agricultural products" included only cotton, wheat, corn, rice, tobacco, and swine. What is notable about such a list is, of course, its restriction. Hay, beef products, dairy products, potatoes, apples and other fruits, poultry products, all "vegetables," sugar, and other important crops are omitted for no observable reason save a political one, of course. Certainly none of them is permanently in a more favorable position than wheat. Some of them, as apples and milk, are perhaps in a worse one. Extension of the list, however, would under the act require further Congressional action.

So far, then, as these six products are concerned the Farm Board would have to "order" their marketing, a tactful way of saying that it would expect to raise their prices by restricting their supplies. Here there is seen a feature of this legislative attempt which would surely strike a foreigner as curious. He would at once assume, when he had grasped the idea that farmers are being discriminated against and that a higher price for their goods was wanted, that the mode of procedure would be either to restrict production, thus giving a monopoly advantage in the market, or to give them some sort of a subsidy obtained by taxing more fortunate classes. We can do neither. The federal government has control only over goods in commerce among the States. It cannot enter a State and direct its citizens to produce. Nor can it tax one class in the community to the advantage of others—at least not directly. Congress had therefore to meet its problem in abnormal and indirect ways, approaching always the limits set by the Constitution, yet endeavoring to keep within them. It therefore avoided the use of any phrase which suggested special taxes, the fixing of prices, or the controlling of production. Nevertheless all these were the objects the Farm Bloc sought.

We need to notice three mechanisms in particular which were written into the bill: (1) Stabilization funds, (2) equalization fees, and (3) the "agreements," to be made through farmers' cooperatives wherever they existed, through which the policy of "surplus control" would be carried out. The first of these showed a continued adherence to the idea that there should exist a stable relation between agricultural and other prices. By "stabilization" it was not expected to stop general price fluctuations, but only to keep the prices of the controlled commodities exactly in tune with general movements. This is because farmers lose more than they gain from long-run, cyclical changes in price levels. Equalization fees are the taxes laid on the commodities to make up the equalization funds. Congress, under the bill, would have set up a $250,000,000 revolving fund to support the equalization fund at first. The funds were to be used to carry out the "insurance of prices" for the organizations of farmers with whom agreements are made. These "agreements" are the crux of the matter. The provisions of the act in this respect read as follows:

> During the continuance of such [control] operations, in any basic agricultural commodity, the board is authorized to enter into agreements . . . with any cooperative association engaged in handling the basic agricultural commodity, or with a corporation created by one or more of such cooperative associations, or with processors of the basic agricultural commodity. Such agreements may provide for (1) removing or disposing of any surplus of the basic agricultural commodity, (2) withholding such surplus, (3) insuring such commodity against undue and excessive fluctuations in market conditions, and (4) financing the purchase, storage, or sale, or other disposition of the commodity.

It was by this means that the legislators hoped to avoid unconstitutionality on the one hand and to gain relief for the farmers on the other. The bill passed both houses of Congress. It was, however, vetoed by the President who stated his reasons in a lengthy veto message.

The veto message attacked the bill on three main grounds: (1) Its constitutionality, (2) the probable efficiency of its operation, and (3) the soundness of the policy it sought to carry out. As to its constitutionality, this was attacked on four grounds in an appended report of the Attorney General: (1) Because it limited the Presidential appointive power, (2) because it was an undue extension of delegated powers by Congress, (3) because it was a price-fixing act rather badly concealed, and (4) because the equalization fee would result in the taking of property, without due process of law, from some to assist others.

As to the soundness of these arguments the legislators are entitled to an opinion as well as the Attorney General. It would be interesting to discover the opinion of the Supreme Court which would settle the matter. The first two objections would be as pertinent to other laws such as the Federal Reserve Act; the last is a routine objection always adduced to unpalatable property laws. The important objection is the price-fixing one. There can be no question that the bill was intended to influence prices. If it did not do that it would accomplish none of its avowed objects. But whether the Farm Bloc had discovered a way of doing this which would seem to the Supreme Court permissible was the most interesting question.

The President felt, aside from the matter of constitutionality, that the bill was inexpedient because (1) it would impose burdens on many to benefit a few, (2) it would build up an unwieldy bureaucracy with a difficult administrative problem, and (3) it would defeat its own purpose by stimulating the production of commodities at the very time when their supply should be limited. In much of the contemporary discussion there was admitted to be cogency in this last objection, especially since the operation of the act was restricted to only six of our many crops. If it had covered all of them, shifting from one to another would not be possible. Of course a total increase in agricultural produce might result, and if it did, farmers as a whole would be worse off than ever, provided they had done nothing to reduce their costs. The only way in which they could possibly benefit ultimately would be not from inflated prices but from continual payments out of the stabilization fund. But this was not intended to be supported from the public treasury, except as a revolving fund originally provided. If it were found that the board could continue to dump abroad enough, even of increased crops, to restrict supply here and so increase domestic prices, then the argument of the veto message would not hold. Now, a belief that this could be done has always been a main dependence of the Bloc's legislative efforts, even in the first formulations of policy. The President refers to this possibility, but feels that "with such increased surpluses dumped from the United States on to foreign markets, the world prices will be broken down and with them American prices, upon which the premium is based, will likewise be lowered to the point of complete disaster to American farmers." This is, at best, a matter of conjecture.

It seems only fair to infer that the veto message proceeded rather from preconceptions of what general economic policies are best than from any desire to assist in the solution of our agricultural problem. When its last paragraphs are reached, this appears very clearly: "The main policy of this bill is an entire reversal of what has been heretofore thought (sic) to be sound. Instead of undertaking to secure a method of orderly marketing which will dispose of products at a profit, it proposes to dispose of them at a loss. It runs counter to the principle of conservation, which would require us to produce only what can be done at a profit, not to waste our own soil and resources producing what is to be sold at a loss to us for the benefit of the foreign consumer." This is doubtless true. Indeed, many of the Bloc leaders have admitted as much. But it is no more true for farmers than for industrialists, who, these leaders say, are permitted this same anti-conservation policy. The President does not admit this fundamental inconsistency. He goes on to say that the policies contemplated by the measure also "run counter to the well-considered principle that a healthy economic condition is best maintained through a free play of competition." Here again he is simply subscribing to a doctrine, not arguing from facts. It is true, as he says, that "for many generations such practices (as restraint of trade) have been denounced by law as repugnant to the public welfare." But this overlooks the growing opinion among statesmen that free competition fails in just such crucial tests as are here applied. Specifically it allows agriculture, as one who looks may see, to degenerate in precisely the ways it should not have done if the justification of competition as the life of trade were sound.

What really fails to be recognized in all this discussion is the fact that agriculture is ailing in a chronic way as other industries are not. It seems unlikely that the removal of the tariffs which favor manufacture would affect many industries at all, except for the wiping out of certain superprofits which they now enjoy. Certain readjustments would, of course, take place, all of which cannot be foreseen. But no wholesale reorganization would occur. And this would be because America has by far the most efficient industrial machine in the world. That farming needs such a stimulus to keep it in existence at all—as is claimed by the proponents of price legislation—shows the probability of difficulties which go deeper and which would not be touched by price-fixing. These are of the sort which are involved in the fundamental fact that farming has advanced in technique far less rapidly than other crafts.

It may well be that farming as a way of life is doomed. There is a good deal of truth in what is said, for instance, by Henry Ford—that farming as it is usually tried on is not an industry which ought to be allowed to live. According to him there are only thirty to sixty days of genuine effort needed on a well-managed farm during the year. Why, he asks, should we pay a farmer a year's wages for doing two months' work and pottering about the rest of the year? His method of solving the difficulty, which he has put into practice in a small way, is to correlate farming with manufacturing and to use the otherwise largely wasted time of farmers at really productive tasks.

However we ultimately move, the economist must admit that farming as it is carried on at present cannot long continue to exist. The farmer is industrially so weak that his productivity remains low; and he is so poorly organized that stronger classes continually find him ineffective in bargaining. Everything goes against him. So we see the farms being drained of men, only the poorest stock remaining; we see farms being abandoned; we see production being reduced to a point which, in view of our national growth, becomes positively dangerous. Finally we must admit the choice of permitting this degeneration, or of formulating policies which will cause agriculture to develop normally as a part of the national economy as, of course, ultimately it must—for we have not learned to get along without food or raw materials. What at present seems most likely to occur is the forcing of the issue by the ever-active Farm Bloc in such a way that a choice will have to be made between the abandonment of protection to manufacturers and the extension of the protective system to farmers through the instrumentality of some such measure as the McNary-Haugen bill. The strength and strategic situation of the Farm Bloc are such that it seems unlikely that it can be fought off much longer. Its remedy, however, is temporary and artificial. It is even more inevitable that in the long run fundamental changes must take place in agriculture itself. Either it must be allied with industry and run as supplementary to it or it must be so reorganized as to avail itself of the efficiencies which, in our day, are revolutionizing the manufacturing arts. Perhaps it will come to large-scale operation with fewer proprietors and more laborers working under direction. Or, perhaps, what most students hope but scarcely expect, farmers will learn the lessons of cooperation so thoroughly that they can retain what so precious in country life by sacrificing what is inefficient and obstructive.

The Third Degree and Crime

By A. C. SEDGWICK

WHAT happens in the detective bureau is nobody's business but the policeman's. But once I happened to be in a downtown police station when some detectives brought in four prisoners whom they had captured after a hold-up. One of them had been shot several times in the back of the neck. The blood poured down from his wounds in rivulets. He groaned, sobbed, and denied everything to a group of uniformed policemen who had gathered around him as he sat on a bench in the back room. An ambulance doctor came in later and took him to the hospital, where he died.

The other three men, dapper in cheap clothing, with dumb, roving eyes, were ushered into the detective bureau, a small room with two desks and chairs, by the big-jowled detectives who had captured them. Other detectives followed. They could not miss the show. I was a young police reporter, full of enthusiasm. I, too, wanted to see the show. On account of the unusual excitement I made my way into the bureau unnoticed. The door closed. I was in the room in all about five minutes.

The newspapers latesaid the three men were questioned and admitted not o what they were caught doing but all sorts of "stick-upsin the last six months. They admitted everything with hich the detectives charged them.

Here in this little room questioning and answering take place. The prisoners st in a row. They are turning their hats around in thenands nervously. They look at their inquisitors, now at ss, now defiant. They say the revolvers found in their were not theirs—they do not know how they came to bere. Perhaps a good lawyer could have disproved posson of the guns. But this little court, like every other li court in the eighty-odd police stations in Greater New k, knows no counsel for the defense. Justice is the polhen's business here, and so is punishment.

The detectives must have alean" confession. They know the prisoners shot at thin the chase which followed the hold-up. They think same men did the "jobs" which are still on their books ansolved. They "have the goods on them," but the men refuse to talk. The detectives must make them talk—must "go to work on 'em" till they do.

One detective takes a piece of rubber hose, which is part of the equipment of the detective bureau and is favored for use because it leaves no marks. Another takes out his black-jack. Others grab anything—black-jacks, revolvers, night-sticks. "I seen you before," bawls a detective. "No, sir," the prisoner answers. The detective strikes him. This is the signal. The "shellacin' " has started. Blow after blow from the rubber hose, black-jacks, and night-sticks. The prisoners fall to the floor. The blood pours from their faces. They spit and cough blood. The detectives, still in a white rage, look at them. The door opens. A young policeman in uniform pokes his head in. "You fellers is easy with 'em," he says. "Is that so?" roars a detective and kicks a prisoner in the face, pulls him to his feet, props him against the desk, then with the butt end of his revolver makes a gash in his head. The three prisoners go to the hospital.

If it were asked of any official source what happened to these men it would be said that they received their injuries resisting arrest, or perhaps that the "sidewalk come up and hit 'em." Policemen are supposed to use only that force which is necessary in the effecting of an arrest. But force, third-degree methods are necessary, the policeman believes, necessary to himself especially, for by beating a prisoner he is not only showing his authority but he has a chance to get from the prisoner confessions which may win him publicity and promotion. The third degree is known to all who have associated with policemen, but it is one of those things which is winked at and tolerated. Who can prove to a judge that a prisoner has fallen victim to violence in a police station when all the witnesses are policemen?

Once in a while someone who is neither a crook nor a policeman learns of what goes on in this little court and torture chamber. The well-meaning sentimentalist decries it, weeps over it, makes a plea to the police commissioner, perhaps, or refuses to sit on a jury in a criminal case, believing the prisoner has been driven through force to a confession by the arresting detectives. The hard-boiled law-and-order specialist says the crooks deserve all the punishment the police can give them. The criminologist says there is nothing to be done for the criminal but glandular adjustment and psychoanalysis. And all the while the big detective who knows the crook is a "rat" solves the problem by giving him the lumps." It must be added: What joy he takes in it!

The detective is not the man-hunter of fiction. As a general rule, he is a man of neither superior knowledge nor cunning. He differs from the truck-driver and the pianomover only in one respect. He is clothed with authority. He has no greater knowledge than his supposed lesser brethren—no greater learning, though he would pretend to have. The detective's main chance for success lies in his acquaintance with characters of the underworld. He must know the low dives, "gin-mills," and poolrooms in his district, not only because the crooks hang out in such places but because it is there he makes the acquaintance of men who may be valuable as stool pigeons. The greater the familiarity with low life, the more proficient the detective. Society expects the detective to be proficient in his front-line work of combating crime.

Those three men who were brought into the downtown police station and given their "shellacin' " were caught red-handed. With the aid of a shyster, schooled in legal loopholes, the three of them might have got away scot-free had a jury and judge alone decided their fate. Although the law forbids it, the treatment they received from the detectives may act as a warning to other offenders. But criminals are seldom caught red-handed. Most arrests are made after a tip to the police by stool-pigeons. Stool-pigeons are pointers and spies. They have taken to "squealing" on their brothers to insure better treatment for themselves at the hands of the detectives. They are often paid betrayers. They are too degraded to hold the truth. They give hearsay as information. It is to their advantage to lie. As the detectives nearly always work on information given them by stool-pigeons, they are all too likely to convict innocent persons in their little court in the police station. And besides, since the detective's job depends on his accomplishment, it is a temptation to convict one whom he merely suspects and to extort a confession at any price.

Often the detectives "give out the lumps" because of a personal grudge, due perhaps to race prejudice. "You Guinea. . . . You Jew . . .," they bawl out. After each epithet comes a blow with a rubber hose. If it is not nationality it may be manner of speech or personal appearance. "I didn't like the color of his eyes," I heard a detective say once, "so I made 'em black."

The police abuse the right they have assumed to hold court and to punish. By the practice they show themselves to be without justice. Also they make a great practical error. Policemen, by virtue of their own methods, appear to the underworld as a bad lot, as bad as any crooks. As representatives of law and guardians of society they instil into the class of offenders contempt of law and hatred for society. The crooks believe them no different from themselves; they just happen to be on the other side of the fence.

In the Driftway

IS noise a danger to health and life? The Drifter thinks it is. Indeed he is so much of a crank on the subject as to believe noise to be as great an evil as impure water, dirty milk, or bad sewage. Naturally, therefore, he is pleased when the Health Commissioner of New York City, Dr. Louis I. Harris, issues a blast against the noise of riveting in the construction of steel-frame buildings. But though agreeing in principle, as the diplomatists say, the Drifter is not sanguine that anything will come of Dr. Harris's protest. Dr. Harris is a public official busy with many chores and, unlike the Drifter, is probably not enough of a crank in regard to noise to keep everlastingly after it until he accomplishes something. The newspapers seem to have established that riveting is unnecessary—that electric welding, a noiseless process, would do as well. But there are many men whose capital and business experience are tied up in riveting; there are numerous others who make their daily living by doing it. The Drifter questions if public feeling against noise is sufficiently aroused to overcome this influence—unless electric welding can be demonstrated to be cheaper.

* * * * *

THAT the public at large not only does not object to noise but positively revels in it can hardly be doubted. Most of us are still children in that when we are especially happy—and often when we aren't—we can't think of anything to do about it but shout or bang on a tin pan. Our cities are built and conducted without the slightest conception that noise is devastating to thought, temper, peace of mind, and health. Day and night our ears are filled with a banging, whanging, clanging racket, a tooting, yelling, yipping babel, most of which is unnecessary. The drilling machine—with which excavations are made and pavements uprooted—is as bad as the riveting hammer. Worst and most general of all is the automobile horn. Although the Drifter is opposed to capital punishment for such a trifling offense—if not a national pastime—as murder, he would retain the death penalty for any car-driver who uses his horn as a signal from the street to somebody inside a house; also for all those Nervous Nellies who when caught in a traffic jam work off their impatience by starting a honking chorus. In fact the Drifter would abolish the automobile horn altogether in the interest of greater safety as well as of less noise. Since the law never authorizes a car-driver to honk a pedestrian or a slower vehicle out of the way, the man at the wheel could complain of no injustice and he would inevitably have to drive more slowly or be put to the continual annoyance of getting out and disentangling bodies from his front wheels. If it be objected that the horn is a useful signal between two cars at crossings or curves, the Drifter retorts that it wouldn't be necessary if drivers observed the rules in regard to right of way and stuck to their own sides of the roads.

* * * * *

STILL the Drifter doubts if he will live to see the automobile horn abolished or our cities appreciably quieter. His one hope is that as he grows older he may become deaf. To phrase it according to the modern cant, the public is not noise conscious. Years ago Mrs. Isaac L. Rice, a resident of Riverside Drive, New York City, started a crusade to reduce the unnecessary whistling of boats on the Hudson River. She deserved a monument, but she got the merry ha-ha. Some day, decades hence, we shall have practically noiseless cities. But no credit will go to Mrs. Rice, Dr. Harris, or the Drifter. The glory will fall to some later-day smart Alec who joins the crusade after the public becomes noise conscious. THE DRIFTER

Democracy in the Unions

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: We have read with interest Mr. Benjamin Stolberg's article in your May 4 number dealing with the present unfortunate dispute in the Cloakmakers' Union. As a group concerned with the question of democracy in trade unions, we wish to point out that this important issue, which lies at the heart of the dispute, is practically ignored by Mr. Stolberg.

Mr. Stolberg takes the position that the expulsion of the New York Joint Board was the result of the conduct of the general strike of the cloakmakers. We understand that the expulsions can be traced directly to the demand of the rank and file for greater democratization of the union. It is a matter of common knowledge that in the summer of 1925 the rank and file of the union pushed the question of "proportional representation" to the fore, and President Sigman was ordered by the emergency convention, held in Philadelphia in December, 1925, to submit the question to a referendum of the membership within six months. Although a year and a half has elapsed, this has not yet been done. It would seem that the present expulsions and the reorganization of the Joint Board and the four locals are an attempt on the part of President Sigman to avoid this referendum.

In view of the significance of this struggle to the general labor movement we feel that it is unfortunate that Mr. Stolberg neglected this aspect of the situation to raise the outworn alarm of communism. We wish to register here a protest against the expulsion of members of any labor union for opposition sentiment. If the policy is upheld we can see only disintegration for the American labor movement, since expelled workers must either become scabs or be forced out of the industry altogether.

Strike Finances

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In my article on The Collapse of the Needle Trades in The Nation of May 4, in which I dealt largely with the strike of the cloakmakers in New York City in 1926, I said: "Previous strikes in the industry have cost from 50 per cent to 200 per cent cheaper." Obviously nothing can cost "200 per cent cheaper."

To avoid controversy I wish to make a correction in the form of a table of the larger strike and lay-off expenditures in the International Ladies Garment Workers Union during the last decade.

General strike, 1916.....	16	weeks—45,000 workers—	$ 597,760.62
General strike, 1919.....	9	weeks—45,000 workers—	145,145.74
Lockout, 1921-22.....	20	weeks—40,000 workers—	1,037,593.57
Stoppage, 1924...(officially)	6	weeks—40,000 workers—	493,417.17
Cloakmakers' strike, 1926..	17	weeks—33,000 workers—	3,500,000.00

This last figure is putative, for no true account of expenditures was kept. During the first two weeks after the strike settlement strike benefits are usually paid. Of course, both the cost of living and the cost of fighting has steadily increased since 1916. These figures were obtained from the chief auditor of the I. L. G. W. U. All these figures were properly audited except the last one.

The Lefts make much ado about the joint responsibility of both sides in the conduct, especially the financial conduct, of the strike. Four Right-Wing chairmen were in charge of four expensive committees. The truth is that these four Right-Wing officials were forced to play a purely nominal part. And their willingness, especially toward the end of the strike, to play such a part for political reasons, does not change the fact that the strike was run by the Left Joint Board.

New York, May 10 BENJAMIN STOLBERG

The Left Wing Replies

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In Mr. Benjamin Stolberg's article on the needle-trades situation in your issue of May 4 I find serious inaccuracies which I feel ought to be pointed out to the readers of The Nation, many of whom are greatly interested in the outcome of the present struggle. Mr. Stolberg seems to have been misinformed as to the calling of the recent general strike of cloakmakers, its finances and management, its gains for the workers, and as to the outcome of the present dispute within the union.

The demands for which the strike was fought were formulated by President Sigman and his associates in 1924, more than a year before the present Left-Wing administration in the Joint Board came into power. The membership voted to strike for the demands in that year. Instead of carrying out the order to strike, President Sigman presented the demands to a commission named by Governor Smith. When the commission reported, after two years, its terms were such as could not be accepted by the union, as President Sigman himself pointed out in many speeches and interviews. In an affidavit, sworn to on September 20, 1926, he discussed the commission's findings as follows:

> The recommendations, which undoubtedly are the result of careful and painstaking investigation and of a conscientious effort to remedy some of the evils of the industry, fell considerably short of satisfying the most substantial demands of the workers. Our union, after very careful consideration of the commission's recommendations, reluctantly reached the conclusion that they were entirely inadequate to remedy the most crying evils under which the workers suffered. . . . Our union thus found itself forced to declare a strike in order to bring about the necessary improvements in the conditions of the workers.

Mr. Sigman has since reversed himself, in his efforts to find some excuse for getting rid of the opposition to his administration by the time-honored method of expulsion, and Mr. Stolberg has made the mistake of taking Mr. Sigman's contradiction seriously.

In discussing the general management of the strike, Mr. Stolberg's analysis is misleading. Contrary to the practice of the Right Wing, which in past strikes had always excluded Left-Wing leaders from strike committees, four of the most important of the eight committees were placed in the hands of Right-Wing leaders. These were the finance, settlement, law, and out-of-town committees.

Mr. Stolberg's sweeping statement that "Never in the history of American labor has a strike been more incompetently, irresponsibly, and wastefully managed," is both ridiculous and untrue. A casual examination of the facts is sufficient to show that the strike, which lasted twenty-four weeks, was proportionately no more expensive than other needle-trades strikes, and indeed, more economical than most. To give only one instance, the International spent a half million dollars on the stoppage of 1924, which officially lasted only two weeks—the strike of 1926 therefore spent only seven times as much for a period twelve times as long.

Mr. Stolberg's figures omit the expenditure of $476,000 by the Out-of-Town Committee, headed by J. Halperin of the Right Wing. This amount, added to the $302,378 spent by the Law Committee, headed by Joseph Fish, also of the Right Wing, accounts for $778,379 of the strike funds, or about twice as much as was spent by the three committees (picket, hall, and organization), headed by Left-Wing chairmen, whose total expenditure was $392,982. Mr. Stolberg notes that "only $1,500,000," or half of the entire funds, was spent for strike benefit, but fails to discover that of the total strike funds only about one-seventh was in the hands of members of the Left Wing at all.

Furthermore, all of the finances of the strike were under the control of a Finance Committee, headed by Abraham Baroff, secretary-treasurer of the International, all disbursements were made by Joseph Fish, a member of the Right Wing, and all financial reports were regularly audited by Mr. Sigman's accountants and approved by the General Strike Committee, of which Mr. Sigman was a member.

In discussing the gains to the workers, Mr. Stolberg has minimized them in most instances. He states that the workers received some increases in wages above those recommended by the Governor's commission, but that these affect "only about 800 out of 7,000 workers." As a matter of fact, the agreement made by the Joint Board with the employers obtained increases of from $1 to $4 above those recommended by the commission in every craft.

Mr. Stolberg's summary of the situation is that "the Sigman administration won." This is manifestly untrue. If President Sigman has won, why do thousands of cloak and dressmakers flock to the mass meetings and pay their dues to the Joint Board? And why does President Sigman still refuse to allow the members to hold elections? Why does he still delay the referendum to decide the question of proportional representation, which he was ordered to carry out within six months of the 1925 convention? Although he makes a passing reference to the question of proportional representation, Mr. Stolberg entirely fails to understand its significance as the real cause of the present struggle, just as he fails to note that this struggle is a continuation of the 1925 fight for that principle.

President Sigman's administration is kept in power by a "rotten-borough" system of representation to the convention that elects him. When the Left Wing defeated him in 1925 he was forced to promise a reform, and at the convention agreed to submit a plan of representation to the membership. Two courses were then open to him—to carry out the referendum, which in all probability would cause the overthrow of his administration, or to attempt to discredit the Left-Wing leaders who had led the movement for proportional representation. He chose the latter course. He has stated publicly that he will not allow the referendum to be held until "peace" has been restored. If the "Reds" can be eliminated, President Sigman probably will have nothing to fear from a referendum, democracy within the union can be avoided for another few years, and the bureaucracy will continue to flourish.

Fair Words

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Benjamin Stolberg's series of articles on the situation in the needle trades is a study of great value, and I should like to thank him for writing it and you for publishing it.

There are certain conclusions I should like to emphasize.

1. To an amazingly small degree has there been any difference of principle between Lefts and Rights in the New York needle-trade fight. Left and Right slogans and banners were convenient rallying points or, to drop the figure, were convenient rationalizations for quarrels over personal animosities and ambitions and questions of local tactics. Both in the International Ladies Garment Workers Union and in the Furriers the Lefts went in as reformers to clean house rather than as revolutionaries to set up a dictatorship of the proletariat beginning in the needle trades. It cannot be said that in many aspects of the struggle questions of philosophy—Socialist, Communist, or American Federation of Labor—were really involved.

2. Nevertheless, the serious mismanagement of affairs—to use no harsher word—in the furriers' and the garment workers' unions must reflect with severity upon the Communist Party, which claims to keep a rigorous discipline over its members and to assume a responsibility for their behavior which no other party or group has ever claimed. The Communist leaders of the furriers' and cloakmakers' strikes did not, it is true, discover any brand-new principles in their use or misuse of money for unsavory purposes. They did go back on their own pledges of reform with cynical and appalling completeness. Moreover, the improper use of funds for gangsters, fixers, police, etc., rarely if ever, got so little results in terms of immediate success.

3. Not only in the needle trades in New York but in the labor movement at large it is of the utmost importance that factional quarrels should give way to reconstruction of the movement and reassertion of its genuine ideals. In such a forward movement in the ranks of labor there is a type of Communist energy and devotion, manifest in Passaic if not in New York, which has its place. But it is difficult to ask the unions to recognize this fact so long as the Communist Party claims the right to control by rigid discipline the actions of Communist members or officials of labor unions in the affairs of the unions.

Such considerations as these are of primary importance to the workers themselves, but they ought also to be of some concern to certain liberals and radicals who hastily assume that because the Rights have been wrong at a number of points therefore the Lefts must be right. (No pun is intended!)

Another Explanation of "Big Bill" Thompson

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your article on the recent Chicago election was splendid, but the writer neglected one important factor. Dever was elected mayor four years ago on a straight "immediate municipal ownership and operation of street cars" platform.

Immediately after his election he repudiated his pledges and fought against this principle continuously. Under the circumstances sincere believers in municipal ownership were forced to repudiate him and, having no other choice, to support Thompson.

Catholics in High Office

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I am interested in current United States politics, and especially in the political maneuvers centering about the coming Presidential election. The people of the United States call their country the land of liberty and freedom, yet discussion is rife over the possible nomination and election of Governor Alfred Smith, a Roman Catholic. Why all the worry? Let Americans look at the example of Canada. We have had two Catholic Premiers: Sir John Thompson and Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The great Sir Wilfrid, although a Roman Catholic, was a true progressive and in nowise subservient to the church. Just read the history of the Manitoba school act!

Barnard Graduates' Jobs

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: May I correct a statement in a recent paragraph in The Nation regarding the occupations of the 1926 graduating class of Barnard College? You stated that there were 140 graduates and that none of these were married. As a matter of fact, the Barnard Bulletin, from which you undoubtedly copied the statement, omitted from the list the graduates who were married and those who were not working. I am giving below the correct figures:

Class of 1926	223
Married	17
Working	133
Studying	67
No information or unoccupied	6

Of those listed as either working or studying, 27 are doing both; of the married graduates, 6 are working and 2 studying.

Why Cars Kill

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: One of your correspondents writes: "If Mr. Ford should reduce the speed of his cars, competitors would eat right into his business."

This is a very dreadful insinuation. It implies that Mr. Ford would rather continue to support a speed which is causing the death of twenty-five thousand human beings annually in the United States than suffer a diminution of his profits. I think better of Mr. Ford: that gentleman has the reputation of being an unusually humane and conscientious man.

Your correspondent continues: "If Mr. Ford should induce the leading automobile men of this country to set a speed limit—what would stop those who want speed from buying foreign cars?" Foreign intoxicants have been excluded from this country, and why not foreign automobiles? If the automobile manufacturers of the United States were to get together to reduce the speed of automobiles to a safe and reasonable limit (for the preservation of human life) I am confident that the United States Government could be trusted to come to their assistance, by increasing the duty upon foreign automobiles to a point at which their importation into America would become unprofitable, or, even, by excluding them altogether. Our automobiles would then have the home market entirely to themselves, and that market takes 80 per cent of the output of the entire world.

As an alternative to this solution of the speed question, I propose a federal law, prohibiting the manufacture of automobiles capable of attaining a speed dangerous to human life. Such a law should have been passed twenty years ago: hundreds of thousands of human lives would then have been spared; and millions of men, women, and children, who are now cripples for life, would be sound and well.

Porto Rico's Delegate

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your issue of April 13 Roger Baldwin says that none of the United States colonies was represented in the Congress Against Colonial Oppression and Imperialism, held in Brussels in February last.

Porto Rico, however, was represented there by Dr. José Vasconcelos, former Minister of Education of Mexico, who had credentials from the Nationalist Party of Porto Rico. Dr. Vasconcelos, as our delegate, presented a resolution demanding cooperation for the immediate and absolute independence of our country.

Books and Plays

Shadows There Are

By A. J. M. SMITH

Shadows there are, but shadows such as these
Are shadows only in the mortal mind
Blown by the spirit, or the spirit's wind.

Yet shadows I have seen, of me deemed deeper,
That backed on nothing in the horrid air,

And try as try I cannot limn the form
That some of them assume where I shall pass.
They grow transparent, and as sharp, as glass.

The Map of Places

By LAURA RIDING

The map of places passes.
The sacredness of paper
Tears with paper.
Land and water where they are
Are only where they were
When words read here and here
Before ships happened there.

Now on naked names feet stand,
No geographies in the hand.
And paper reads anciently
And ships at sea
Turn round and round.
All is known, all is found.
Feet wither on ghostly ground.
Death meets death everywhere.
Holes in maps look through to nowhere.

Poincaré's Defense

The Memoirs of Raymond Poincaré. Translated and Adapted by Sir George Arthur. Volume I. Doubleday, Page and Company. $5.

BEGINNING with the publication in 1920 of Joseph Caillaux's "Les Responsables" and the following year of Fernand Gouttenoire de Toury's "Poincaré a-t-il voulu la guerre?" there has been a steady stream of books and pamphlets produced in France assaulting the diplomacy of M. Raymond Poincaré from January, 1912, to August, 1914. His assailants have included partisan pamphleteers, distinguished literary figures, eminent scholars, and famous publicists. The more important of these have been, in addition to the two authors mentioned above, Victor Margueritte, Ernest Judet, Alfred Pevet, Alfred Fabre-Luce, Mathias Morhardt, Colonel Converset, Georges Demartial, Gustave Dupin, "Lazare," Armand Charpentier, Grillot de Givry, and René Marchand.

The indictment of Poincaré which has been formulated by his own countrymen may be summarized under the following points:

(1) When he assumed office as Premier and Foreign Minister in 1912 he rejected the German efforts at a rapprochement, including the offer of far-reaching autonomy for Alsace-Lorraine; (2) his all-absorbing life passion was the recovery of Alsace-Lorraine, which he recognized could be achieved only by war; (3) in November, 1912, he promised Izvolski that in case France was kept informed concerning Russian policies in the Balkans, France would follow Russia into any war which broke out over a Balkan crisis and brought in Germany against Russia; (4) he connived at the recall of the moderate French ambassador to Russia, Georges Louis, and replaced Louis by the incendiaries Delcassé and Paléologue; (5) he cooperated with the Russians in the bribery of the French press in order o induce the French papers to publish material designed to persuade the French people to support the French government in joining Russia in a European war over Balkan issues; (6) he approved the large French loans to Russia in 1912-1913 for the purpose of increasing the Russian army and building strategic railroads from central Russia to the German frontier; (7) he helped to obstruct the Anglo-German accord in 1913 and exercised a powerful part in promoting the Anglo-Russian naval convention in the spring of 1914; (8) he greatly strengthened the Russian militarists while on his visit to St. Petersburg in July, 1914, encouraged them to take a bellicose stand against Austria, and rejected Sir Edward Grey's pacific proposal to the effect that Russia and Austria should avert a crisis by amiable direct conversations; (9) when the great decision had to be made on the night of July 29, 1914, as to whether France would stand for peace or war, he threw the weight of his great personal influence for war at a time when he knew that diplomatic negotiations would in all probability succeed in adjusting the situation without an armed conflict; (10) once he and his clique had made the decision upon war he launched a policy of deceiving the French people as to the facts in the crisis; (11) he cleverly invented a number of diplomatic subterfuges designed to influence not only the French people, but also the public opinion of Italy and England, in order to detach Italy from the Triple Alliance and to bring England into the war on the side of France and Russia.

These serious charges rest for the most part upon the materials revealed through the publication of the Russian documents in the "Livre Noir," the Stieve collection, and the complete "Orange Book." If they are true they prove Poincaré to have been, along with Izvolski, primarily responsible for the diplomatic revolution of 1912-1914 and for deliberately forcing the Austro-Serbian crisis of 1914 into the proportions of a general European conflict. What has M. Raymond Poincaré been able to say in self-defense?

In 1921, in answer to some of his earlier critics, Poincaré composed his "Origines de la guerre," setting forth his version of the diplomacy in 1914. This was thoroughly demolished by a French publicist, writing under the name of "Lazare," in a trenchant work entitled "A l'Origine du mensonge." In the summer of 1925 the editor of Foreign Affairs was able to tease out of M. Poincaré a summary article once more attacking his critics, this time especially his American critics. This was published in the above-mentioned periodical in October, 1925, and was immediately riddled by Professor Fay, Judge Bausman, M. Dupin, and the present writer. Undaunted, M. Poincaré made use of the spare time afforded by his political retirement to prepare his official apology, which may run to ten volumes. This work he has had the audacity to entitle "Au Service de la France." Three volumes, covering the period of 1912-1913, were published before his return to public office in the summer of 1926. The volume under review constitutes a translation and slight abridgment of the first volume and the first half of the second volume of the French original.

As Alfred Fabre-Luce says, "Poincaré has contented himself with the effort to conceal highly significant omissions under a luxuriant mass of explanations dealing with wholly secondary issues." He often attempts to refute the deadly criticisms of his French opponents, not by dealing with their specific charges but by invoking irrelevant personalities. Fabre-Luce is dismissed because he was only twenty-six years old when he wrote his "La Victoire." Victor Margueritte's charges have no validity because Margueritte has not been duly grateful for past political favors from Poincaré and because he was dismissed from the Legion of Honor for writing "La Garçonn." René Marchand's "Livre Noir" and other writings are not to be taken seriously because Marchand was not adequately thankful for Poincaré's aid in getting him established as a reporter in Russia. Ernest Judet's editions of Georges Louis's diary are not to be trusted because Judet was opposed to the aggressive Franco-Russian diplomacy and favored a negotiated peace with Germany At other times, when Poincaré detects a minor error in the works of a critic, he will devote pages to an ostentatiously minute refutation.

In dealing with the basic charges against him Poincaré ignores his own letter of 1912 admitting the ardent German desire for a rapprochement with France, and presents the conventional tirade against German aggression and ambitions. He is successful in showing that he was opposed to the outbreak of the Balkan Wars in 1912 and that he preferred not to have a European war start in 1912 or 1913. But this does not in any sense prove that Poincaré and Izvolski were not planning a European war at a later date when France and Russia should be ready. It merely shows that Poincaré had the good sense not to want to precipitate hostilities prematurely.

The section in Poincaré's apology which has been most exploited by the "bitter-enders" is that in which he attempts to prove that he never made his famous promise of November 17, 1912, to aid Russia in the event that an appropriate crisis broke out in the Balkans. No one who honestly compares Izvolski's account of Poincaré's commitment and Poincaré's official version can contend that there is any essential difference in the sense and implications of the two accounts. What Poincaré stressed was that France must be informed as to Russian policy and that Germany must enter the conflict in order to bring in France. The latter was necessary if France was to recover Alsace-Lorraine through her aid of Russia. These two points reveal nothing new: they were repeatedly stressed by Izvolski in his correspondence with Sazonov. We may grant, though Poincaré does not prove it to be a fact, that Sazonov rather than Poincaré took the initiative in demanding the recall of Georges Louis, but the fact is that the chief item in the case against Poincaré at this point is not the recall of Louis but that the firebrands Delcassé and Paléologue were appointed as his successors. With respect to this capital point Poincaré does not even attempt to offer any defense.

The remaining items in the case against Poincaré either are left unchallenged or are not dealt with in this first volume. In the second and third French volumes he admits his part in the bribery of the French press, but tries to represent himself as participating in order to prevent the situation from getting out of hand. As Poincaré cannot be expected to know more at the present time about the crisis of 1914 than he did when he published his "Origines de la guerre" and his Foreign Affairs article, it can hardly be believed that he will be able to make a better case for himself in the succeeding volumes than he has in the three thus far published. The publication this spring of Georges Demartial's "L'Evangile du Quai d'Orsay"—a most devastating exposé of French official lies in 1914—may well cause Poincaré to reflect as to whether he should not allow the excuse of official duties and advancing age to prevent the resumption of his apology.

Throughout the work Poincaré bitterly attacks Izvolski as an impostor who persistently misrepresented him, but, while he is able to show in some cases slight verbal discrepancies between Izvolski's reports and the French official records, he is not successful in proving that Izvolski misrepresented the French policies or commitments in any decisive manner. Izvolski had every reason to represent Poincaré accurately to his home government, and Poincaré has both every reason to desire to falsify in his apology and almost unparalleled safety and facility in so doing. Nor can we accept Professor Fay's contention (in the New Republic) that Poincaré's aggressive diplomacy can be excused on the ground that he felt that war was inevitable and that he must prepare France for it. Poincaré's confession that in 1912 Germany was eager for a rapprochement completely destroys this interpretation. If war was "inevitable," Poincaré well knew why it was going to be inevitable, namely, because of the policy he and Izvolski formulated in 1912 and carried through resolutely until August, 1914.

Another consideration of basic and elemental importance is that if Izvolski misrepresented Poincaré, then the way to make this apparent to the whole world is to publish the documents in the French archives in full. Though premier twice since 1918, Poincaré has made no move to do so. Until these documents are made freely available for public consumption Poincaré and his associates in 1914 must stand self-condemned before the bar of skeptical public opinion.

The fact is that the present controversy in France concerning responsibility for the World War is the Dreyfus case all over again, with Victor Margueritte occupying the role of Zola. Indeed, it is not without significance that Mathias Morhardt, one of the leaders in the effort to establish the truth in the Dreyfus conspiracy, is also one of the active directors of the present struggle for truth and justice in regard to war guilt and international good-will. But it will be a harder struggle to discredit Poincaré and his clique than it was to incriminate the conspirators against Dreyfus. The foes of Dreyfus could only make use of class and race hatred, while Poincaré can invoke in his defense the whole patriotic sentiment of France, the ostensible self-respect of a nation, the prestige of a great victory over a traditional foe, and the fruits of a dictated peace. It will be interesting during the next generation to observe how far the situation in France with respect to war guilt confirms or disproves the late Mr. Lincoln's optimistic observation as to the inability of politicians permanently to deceive the populace at large.

Tabloid Science

Types of Mind and Body. By E. Miller. A Short Outline of Comparative Psychology. By C. J. Warden. The New Science Series. W. W. Norton and Company. $1 each.

The Nature of Man. By George A. Dorsey. The Age of the Earth. By Arthur Holmes. Science of Today. By Sir Oliver Lodge. The Stream of Life. By Julian S. Huxley. Things to Know Series. Harper and Brothers. $1 each.

THE title is used with apology. Applied to convenient and condensed surveys of topics of large moment, "tabloid" may be used with curt but emphatic approval. These manuals differ from the primers of an older period in that they aim at a different ideal suited to a differently oriented public. Theirs is not a one-syllabled over-simplified version of subjects in small area, but a selection of significant themes, derived from the major disciplines, for concise treatment adapted to mature but not specialized intellects. It is a cordially commendable venture in adult education. Furthermore it gives an author opportunity to take stock critically of his specialty, and show the trend and bearing of it upon the actualities of modern thinking. These "tabloids" are then far more than the work of skilful compilers; they are original presentations by masters of their fields, setting in order the accredited conclusions of other masters.

The Today and Tomorrow Series was the pioneer in the enterprise. The New Science Series is explicitly dedicated to responsible and provocative popularization, and under the editorship of Mr. C. K. Ogden gives assurance of merit in standard and accomplishment. The volumes so far issued indicate a prominent social-psychological interest. Mr. Miller's book has the special merit of providing a survey of a field not otherwise accessible. It is an excellent statement of the problem of "human types" as recently formulated in the light of psychiatry as well as of endocrinology. It will be as welcome to the professional student as to the general reader, for it reflects the aim of tabloid science to call attention to issues and interpretations of interest even before they are incorporated into textbooks or have left the controversial stage. Mr. Warden's brochure is excellent in all but its title. It provides not an outline but a history, and one that was needed to indicate how modern insight arose. No better account of how men have slowly learned to interpret the ways of animals is available in any compass.

And now we have the Things to Know Series—a wider orbit which will include history and literature and art as well as science. Mr. Dorsey's volume suggests both the value and the danger of condensation. The success of his "Why We Behave like Human Beings" was deserved. It was a rich book—full of compact facts and their interpretation. In that setting the value of any one view could be appraised in terms of evidence. Condensed to this compass, with no facts and a one-sided interpretation, it conveys the misleading impression that this is the "nature of man" upon which psychologists are agreed; which is false to the n^{th} degree. For Mr. Dorsey fairly limits himself to the psychological story of man and to the behavioristic brand of it. This alone is selected for the tabloid version. The result is so off scale that the title might be "Denatured Man." And more's the pity, for if Mr. Dorsey had not put his arm in the sling of behaviorism, he might have given it free swing with good effect.

The three other contributions are of a different stamp and of a quality not likely to be excelled. Professor Holmes has the difficult task of focusing the combined evidence from many technical sources upon a single problem. While the details transcend the average comprehension, the amazing logic, especially that involved in the conversion of radio-activity into a time-clock with a million years as the unit, is an impressive triumph. Sir Oliver Lodge tells the equally ingenious tale of the atom—how its inscrutability has been scrutinized by the logic of scientific genius and the technique of the laboratory. At once broad in scope and intimate in rendering is the account by Professor Huxley of the biological stream as it bears upon the story of evolution and man's place in it—again a product of rare insight and tested hypotheses. Macrocosm and microcosm and the human cosmos are reduced to study-hour wonder-tales, told with an expertness combining authority with intelligibility. They make knowledge attractive and ignorance a neglect.

One should mention with like approval, by the way, the entrance of Harvard University into this field, both with lectures-in-print and with such timely contributions as that of Dr. Macfie Campbell on "Delusion and Belief." These evidences that men of capacity and distinction are ready to serve the public not by writing down but by writing up significant topics for general consumption, and by providing a rich but digestible diet for eager appetites, are welcome indeed. May the tabloid newspapers take heed of the example. JOSEPH JASTROW

Jemez

The Pueblo of Jemez. By Elsie Clews Parsons. Yale University Press. $7.50.

THE village of Jemez is one of the "southern Tanoan" pueblos, linguistically related to Taos to the north, Isleta to the south, and also to the now abandoned Pueblo of Pecos. Jemez is not near the ordinary lines of travel, and it is one of the less-visited of the New Mexican pueblos. Culturally it has been strongly affected by its Keres and Tewa neighbors, and has received elements from Zuni and the Hopi villages of the West, as well as some influences from non-Pueblo Indians. The colonial Spanish influence is of course strong. Possibly in part due to its relative remoteness (although this is no invariable criterion in Pueblo culture), Jemez has preserved in its ritual and ceremonial life a certain earnestness that is not so manifest in towns such as Taos and Tesuque or San Ildefonso, where the contact with the white men's "show" spirit is more direct.

All of these factors appear to have influenced Mrs. Parsons's choice of Jemez for her thorough and valuable study, although the primary and justifying attraction is the fact that here still live a portion of the descendants of the ancient people of Pecos, preserving the ceremonies of their own clans and fitting into the economy of life of their hosts by a slow process of adaptation. The third generation from the Pecos immigration is now mature at Jemez, and yet the assimilation is but partial, either in ideas or in blood. The process is the very ancient one of amalgamation of communities and complexification of culture, marking the retrocession of the Pueblo boundaries now for many centuries. Long before the Discovery this process had been going on. At one time Pueblo culture extended far beyond the boundaries of New Mexico and Arizona. Now it is confined to restricted areas within these two States. Attacks from nomadic hunters forced concentration even where it did not annihilate, and thus time has created the most interesting of our native civilizations, perhaps the only one within the borders of the United States which truly merits this description. When Coronado made his famous expedition in 1539-1541, Pecos was the eastern outpost of Pueblo land. It maintained itself for three centuries, having been abandoned in 1838 chiefly because it was weakened beyond further resistance. The last handful of its people joined their remote kinsmen at Jemez, by invitation, and the slow process of amalgamation has since been going on, the new blood and the new ideas introduced into Jemez representing as it were the last testament of what had been but a few decades before the largest and most thriving of the pueblos. It is the spectacle of the melting-pot in miniature, and it is a matter of no wonder, as it is a matter of much gratification, that Mrs. Parsons has made of this interesting confluence the subject of her study.

HARTLEY ALEXANDER

The Greek

The Spanish Journey. By Julius Meier-Gräfe. Translated by J. Holroyd-Reece. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

THE spirited translator of Count Hermann Keyserling's "Travel Diary of a Philosopher" has gone back nearly two decades and found another German philosopher's diary which might, a few years ago, have excited more discussion in the English-speaking world than is likely to greet it now. Meier-Gräfe published his impeachment of Velasquez and his glorification of El Greco in the year 1909. Cossio's "Life of Theotocopuli" came off the press a little earlier, but as far as the general public was concerned the German critic's dashing and readable travel-diary certainly won more suffrages for the neglected Greek than Cossio's bulky and austere volumes could ever have claimed. By now El Greco is almost as well known, in this country at least, as any other of the old masters. We have a considerable fraction of his best work in our museums, and Meier-Gräfe's witty and boisterous defense of him, while still both useful and amusing, affects us in 1927 somewhat as the wealthy Londoner does who is reputed to have visited Mr. Coleridge in the Lake Country and assured him that Shakespeare was a great poet.

One can well imagine that this apparently naive confession ("ars celare artem") of a Damascus Road conversion made a vivid impression when it first appeared. "I am Domenico Theotocopuli whom thou undervaluest." Meier-Gräfe, ardent admirer of Velasquez, went to Spain to spend six months studying and enjoying him. One good look at a first-class El Greco, and Velasquez becomes almost instantly superficial, second-rate, unable to formulate a mass, a talent but no genius, and El Greco's St. Mauritius "the most beautiful picture of mankind." Very interesting; but although this well-furnished art critic of forty, with several important books behind him, had up to this time had little opportunity to study El Greco, he had seen important Velasquez pictures in Germany, France, and Austria. Great artists are not mistresses, nor are critics sworn to monogamy. It is not quite likely that "A Spanish Journey" was solely the impulsive day-by-day diary the author and the publisher would have us believe. It is too much of a piece, and sees the end too clearly at the beginning.

One has a feeling, too, that the title is not quite candid. Why "Eine Spanische Reise" and not "El Greco"? There is a great show of brilliant random comment on bull-fights, Tangier Negroes dancing "a sort of danse du ventre from behind," the crown prince's shirt-studs, and the like, but the jovial journal is at bottom as deliberate and determined a brief as any essay by Taine or Ruskin.

No part of the above is intended for criticism. "The Spanish Journey" is one of the most praiseworthy, as well as one of the most successful propagandist documents in literature. Velasquez was pleasing and popular, and will always remain so. But the mysterious Greek-Italian-Spaniard with the absolutely new and personal sense of color, form, composition, this man who thought with a brush in his hand as other men have thought with a pen in theirs, needed an advocate because the art-loving world needed him. And it is to Meier-Gräfe's eternal credit that he spoke a courageous word in season.

The book is enriched with nine admirable reproductions of the Greek's best pictures.

ROY TEMPLE HOUSE

Kliuchevskii's "Course"

A History of Russia. By V. O. Kluchevsky. Translated by C. J. Hogarth. Vol. IV. E. P. Dutton and Company. $4.50.

"SCRATCH a Russian and you'll find a Tartar," says the old wives' tale. "Translate a Russian history and you'll disgrace a scholar," runs the practice of our publishers. Vasilli Osipovich Kliuchevskii (1841-1911) was one of Moscow's greatest historiographers and justly jealous of his reputation. For decades his "Course of Russian History" provided intellectual sustenance for students of their country's past; but from 1888, when he ceased to issue to his students the usual lithographed copies, until 1903 his lectures were not available to readers. They were first printed in 1902, in a de luxe edition of 20 copies only, which is said to have been prepared by Witte for the private use of the emperor. Other editions, likewise unauthorized by the author, found their way into circulation; in 1907, for example, over 6,000 copies were put on sale to raise funds for the revolutionary movement. Professor Kliuchevskii, who naturally resented the publication of garbled versions of his work, had no sympathy with such proceedings. In 1903, therefore, he undertook the preparation of an authorized edition of his course, which closed with the death of Nicholas I. Four volumes had been published when death interrupted his labors.

The first three volumes appeared in English translation in 1911-1913. Publication of the present volume, which covers the period from 1700 to 1762 (with an initial chapter on the first twenty-eight years of Peter's life), completes Hogarth's translation of the authorized portion of Kliuchevskii's "Course of Russian History." Ironically enough, the translation is badly garbled. It must not be taken as a sample of Russian scholarship, much less as an index of the literary talents of Russian historians. The reader, toiling with the cumbrous involutions of Hogarth's sentences, may be inclined to blame the Russian language and to wish that the translation had been less literal. But, in truth, had Hogarth set down word for word, sentence for sentence, paragraph for paragraph, the result would have been more felicitous. Russian, especially Kliuchevskii's Russian, is a simple, supple instrument. Kliuchevskii was a master at the use of short, incisive sentences; Hogarth an adept at addling them.

Kliuchevskii, though a pupil of Solovev and an adherent of the "Westerners," did not regard the reign of Peter the Great as a turning-point in Russian history. He was too keenly aware of the turn things had been taking for a century, too profoundly conscious that Peter effected very little change, except on paper. He was far enough from the scene of action not to be blinded by the clouds of dust that Peter knocked out of the windmills he tilted at. To be sure, Kliuchevskii, with his ingrained respect for legal forms, did not go so far as his disciple, Platonov, in denying Peter the right to be acknowledged as a crowned revolutionist. But out of his deep interest in economic history comes a presentation of Peter's reign as an economic disaster, as a period of incredible suffering for Peter's subjects. Peter's pedagogic methods in introducing into Muscovy the refinements of Western social intercourse, presented in some detail, afford a valuable sidelight on the "Europeanization of Russia."

Against this volume, as against Kliuchevskii's work in general, may be brought the criticism that the author was too much absorbed in the history of the state, as opposed to the history of society. The state was for him an abstraction, something apart from the people, though "the popular welfare is the true and only purpose of the state." The central theme of this volume is that Peter identified himself with the state, whereas, under the next six sovereigns, "the ties of state, juridical and moral, were broken one after another," until the state was "locked up in the palace with casual, ceaselessly changing masters." How little serious, however, is this charge is perhaps attested by the fact that in 1923 the Communist State Press issued a reprint of Kliuchevskii's four volumes, to the number of 11,000 copies.

For this volume is no mere chronicle of court adventures, but a penetrating analysis of state activity and its social reflexes. Kliuchevskii retails no backstairs gossip, indulges in no subjective study of personalities. He dwells rather on the relationships of the several social classes to each other and, above all, to the state. Notwithstanding the scars of translation, this volume is the most important English-language publication in the field of Russian history to appear for many moons.

J. D. CLARKSON

Books in Brief

Behind the Scenes with a Newspaperman. By E. J. Stackpole. J. B. Lippincott Company. $5.

If anybody wishes to know why the bulk of the provincial American press is incredibly dull, narrow, partisan, ignorant, and nationalistic, he will find a complete explanation in this volume. Mr. Stackpole has spent his life as a journalist and office-holder in one of our most corrupt States, in Harrisburg under the dome of the rottenest, in the point of view of corruption, State capitols ever built anywhere on the globe. If he had really wished to write what has gone on behind the scenes there he could have made one of the most sensational and startling of books, the best seller of a decade. But he gives us nothing but short sketches of Pennsylvania governors and other political and press personalities which any reporter could put together. The measure of his ideals may be taken from his praise of Matthew Stanley Quay and Boise Penrose. Mr. Penrose, he once publicly declared, was a "living expression of what constitutes the will of the people"! When one realizes how Penrose rose within Quay's machine one must take this statement as a joke; Mr. Stackpole means it seriously, and he actually thinks that Quay was a great man, "an intellectual and political giant." Naturally, Mr. Stackpole has little to say for the most recent ex-Governor, Gifford Pinchot. As for his newspaper ideals it is sufficient to quote this one gem of thought: "In the service of the community pulpit and press should work together in providing the people an unselfish natural development of more exalted standards of living without the poor pretense of a superior level of society." If that does not entitle Mr. Stackpole of the Harrisburg Telegraph to a place in our journalistic hall of fame, what could?

The Last Victorians. By Arthur A. Baumann. J. B. Lippincott Company. $5.

The fault with this book is not that its author, "a Victorian Tory, naked and unashamed," defends the Victorian tradition by presenting a series of sketches which depict some of its leading politicians. That tradition, despite the clatter of contemporary "criticism," is perfectly secure; if any prophecy is certain, indeed, it is that one of these days we shall see its revival (witness Trollope today); but such a revival will not be hastened by books like this. Sheer septuagenarian perversity seems to have influenced Mr. Baumann in evoking the gray ghosts who falter, rather than flit, through these dull, peevish pages.

The Harvest of the Years. By Luther Burbank (with Wilbur Hall). Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

It would be easy to poke fun at the "homely philosophy" which Mr. Burbank intrudes on almost every page of his autobiography; but whenever he abandons cloudy speculations on life, death, and immortality, and simply narrates how he overcame this, that, or the other difficulty in his specialized field of inventive horticulture, he is both canny and entertaining. If his book makes no contribution to scientific theory, it will nevertheless greatly grieve the followers of Bryan, and will be a not unworthy addition to the works of Burroughs and Thoreau.

Trumpets of Jubilee. By Constance Mayfield Rourke. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

"Magnitude seems the single positive legacy of that forgotten time," writes Miss Rourke of the lush and sprawling era whose representative specimens she finds in the three Beechers (Lyman, Henry Ward, and Harriet), Greeley, and Barnum. "Out of sheer noise—power!" The boisterous crudities of Barnum's museum and circus were not, after all, essentially different from the tinseled metaphors of H. W. Beecher, the flagrant morality of Mrs. Stowe, or the strident, sizzling rhetoric of Greeley. All this, and much more, the author knows. She depicts her characters with an acid, penetrating elegance not untouched by sympathy; but, while she is shrewd and sharp, something of the florid expansiveness of her subjects has infected an otherwise admirable style.

The Arrow. By Christopher Morley. Doubleday, Page and Company. $1.50.

Here is a happy excursion into pure absurdity, adroitly introduced by an impressionistic picture of life on a trans-Atlantic liner. Mr. Morley knows his ocean; his description of "the lull and ecstasy of the sea" is a gem of humorous prose. The realm of fantasy into which he chooses to drift is bounded on the north by irony and on the south by sugar; it is mellow and amusing.

Mother Knows Best. By Edna Ferber. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.50.

Miss Ferber's skill in narrative, her ready wit and deep discernment, and her responsiveness to the shifts and eddies of contemporary life—these qualities are reflected with unfailing zest on every page.

A Methodist Saint. By Herbert Asbury. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

Mr. Knopf has exercised his considerable skill as a printer in producing this life of Bishop Francis Asbury. The editorial contents are not so beautiful, however, as the author has sought to capitalize the popularity of "Up from Methodism" a little too quickly.

Ariane. By Claude Anet. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

This novel has created sufficient stir in Europe to warrant a serious preface on art, love, and subsidiary topics of aesthetics and life. In its English version it is a rather prosaic description of a prolonged emotional climax which ends happily and almost morally, granting the contemporary interpretation of morals.

The Pope of the Sea. By Vicente Blasco Ibáñez. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

A clumsy romance in which large slices of historical narrative are sandwiched between the incidents of an uninspiring intrigue.

Morning, Noon and Night. By Kenneth Phillips Britton. Hartford, Connecticut: Edwin Valentine Mitchell. $2.

Another now-it-must-be-told novel of early sophistication that is smarter in attitude than in execution. Its poorly written reminiscences of college life add nothing to the information entertainingly offered by Mr. Britton's predecessors and models.

Drama

Summary—I

EVERY so often the popular theater revises an old formula and rewrites the successes of the past in the language of the moment. The real problem of the popular dramatist is to seem new while being familiar, and he receives his greatest applause when he succeeds in being the first to refurbish a type which has passed out of fashion. A few years ago, for example, when audiences were just beginning to fancy themselves too sophisticated for the conventional dramatization of the detective story, the "comedy mystery melodrama" was invented. It embodied in even exaggerated form all the tricks of its predecessor, but at the same time it tipped its audiences a wink calculated to save the face of those a little ashamed to be caught taking a penny dreadful seriously, and it became the reigning novelty of the moment, in spite of the fact that its chief stock in trade was the sliding panel and the secret chamber which have been familiar to every generation since the days of Mrs. Radcliffe and "The Mystery of Udolpho." This formula was endlessly repeated, and the fact that this year "The Spider" stands out as one of the conspicuous financial successes of a season during which several freshly interesting plays could find no audience illustrates how slight a variation was necessary to make it once more what the great public regards as "novel." But though "The Spider" will doubtless have its imitators, it is melodrama of a still older sort that is now most conspicuously resurgent. "Broadway," "The Barker," and "Spread Eagle" have each made history on the street for which the first is named, and all three belong essentially to a genre which was supposed to have perished utterly when the movies dealt their death blow to the ten-twenty-thirty.

Moralists at least may take heart from this fact and conclude that even along the Great White Way sophistication is no more than face-powder deep; for even if "Spread Eagle" may seem slightly subversive if regarded from a political angle, its appeal rests fundamentally upon good old, two-gun situations, and the others are as naive in their premises as the now famous ballads of the mauve decade. Who would have supposed that theatergoing New York, popularly regarded as in the last stages of depravity, would evince the greatest enthusiasm of the year for a play concerned with the fortunes of an extraordinarily pure show girl who escapes the wiles of a seducer in order that she may pass safely into the arms of her dumb but faithful swain ("Broadway"), or that it would next acclaim a piece in which it is once more demonstrated that even among such unlikely people as the carnival folk innocence flowers in unsuspected places and gets true love as its reward ("The Barker")? Who, indeed—except anyone who has watched the theater long enough to know that through all changes of fashion these, or rather this, is recurrently if not perennially popular? Each of the plays is romantic melodrama—violent external action taking place against a picturesque background—and romantic melodrama is destined, I think, to be the most popular type of play during the next few seasons, just as the milk-and-water domestic comedy which told how the poor young man suddenly made a fortune by turning his father's blacksmith shop into a modern garage or by taking an option on the meadow where the railroad company was planning to put its shops was the most popular type of play a few seasons ago. Such fashions have no more meaning than fashions of any other sort, but they are as curiously seductive to most people while they last.

O'Neill was perhaps the first to bring back violence, variety, and romantic color to the serious drama, which had got in the habit of concerning itself chiefly with drawing-rooms. Such plays as the Stallings-Anderson "What Price Glory?" and Sidney Howard's "They Knew What They Wanted" also took advantage of a reawakened interest in strange happenings among unfamiliar people; but their neo-romanticism was quickly exploited in a more superficial manner and a new melodrama of the sort just discussed was the result. The moralist, as I said, may rejoice, and those theatrical managers quick enough to gather the first fruits of the new fashion may join him, but the student of the drama may be excused from any great enthusiasm. Such popular plays are merely the popular plays of yesterday seasoned to contemporary taste.

As to the events of the week, they were few: "Patience" was revived at the Theater Masque in a manner which aroused the anger of some devoted admirers of Gilbert and Sullivan. I found it unnecessarily boisterous but entertaining nevertheless. "Merry Go Round" (Klaw Theater) is a revue of the somewhat less lavishly spectacular sort now generally termed "intimate." It shows evidence of being rather hastily put together, but it has its moments of amusing comedy and agile dancing.

The Soviet Raid in London

FOLLOWING the raid by British police on the premises of Arcos, Ltd., and the Soviet Trade Delegation, the Anglo-Russian Parliamentary Committee collected data and documents on the manner of making the raid, and published these in a pamphlet, from which we take the extracts printed below.

Foreword

The premises of Arcos, Ltd., and of the Trade Delegation of the USSR in Great Britain are housed in one building, 49 Moorgate, London, E. C. 2. Arcos is a joint-stock company registered in Great Britain in accordance with British laws. The activities of the Trade Delegation are based upon the trade agreement between His Majesty's Government and the Soviet Government concluded in 1921.

The chairman of the Trade Delegation, being the official trade agent of the Soviet Government, and his offices enjoy diplomatic immunity as provided in Clause 5 of the 1921 Trade Agreement. The above agreement specially provides for the right of the official trade agent to use cipher codes in his communications, and so on.

It is particularly important to note that the Trade Delegation, although housed in 49 Moorgate (premises belonging to Arcos, Ltd.), occupies apartments which are self-contained and on all the entrances of which are notices in large type, both in Russian and English, "Trade Delegation of the USSR."

It is, therefore, quite impossible to confuse the premises occupied by the Trade Delegation with those occupied by Arcos.

On May 12, at about 4:30 in the afternoon, a considerable force of uniformed and plain-clothes police (according to the press reports about 200) entered No. 49 Moorgate.

According to the evidence of people who were present the raid was carried out in the following manner:

The police, immediately on entering the building, took possession of the telephone exchange, disconnected all the telephones, and occupied the lift and all the entrances to the building. Various groups of the police occupied the entrances to all the floors and rooms belonging both to Arcos and the Trade Delegation. Within a few minutes the whole building was in the hands of uniformed and plain-clothes police.

The warrant authorizing the search was not presented before the search began. Mr. Sorokin, acting chairman of Arcos, Ltd., was only allowed to see the warrant an hour after the search commenced and only after repeated demands. Mr. Firsov, the secretary to the Trade Delegation, was shown the warrant half an hour after the commencement of the search.

The warrant authorized a search of the premises occupied both by Arcos, Ltd., and by the Russian Trade Delegation.

All persons found by the police on the stairs, corridors, and landings of the huge building were detained by the police. The employees of Arcos and the Trade Delegation who were in their offices were ordered to leave them and go into the corridors. Only the police remained in the offices, and all the demands of employees to be permitted to be present during the search were refused and they were not allowed to enter the offices then occupied by the police.

One group of police officers rushed immediately to the cipher room of the chairman of the delegation of the USSR, Mr. Khinchuk. At that time there were in the room the cipher clerks, Messrs. Miller, Khudiakov, and Mrs. Miller and Mrs. Granovsky. Mr. Miller told the police officer that this room was one of Mr. Khinchuk's offices where the cipher communications of the chairman of the delegation were kept, and that they, the cipher clerks, were not allowed to permit anyone into the room or to show the cipher communications to anyone without the express permission of the Official Trade Agent, or of one of the members of the Trade Delegation or responsible official of the Trade Delegation.

No notice was taken by the police of the protests of the cipher clerks, and the attempts of the latter to prevent the police officers from access to the cipher communications resulted in Mr. Miller and Mr. Khudiakov being assaulted by the police, the latter receiving several blows on the face.

At about 5 o'clock the police entered Mr. Khinchuk's private office.

Those employees who were detained in the corridors were questioned, the majority were told to turn out their pockets, and some underwent a personal search by police officers. Some of the women were also subjected to a personal search. None of those detained were allowed to take a single step without being followed by the police. Even the women were accompanied by uniformed police officers to and from the cloakroom.

Among those detained was Mrs. Rosengolz, wife of the Chargé d'Affaires of the USSR in Great Britain, and in spite of her protest her handbag was searched. The reason for the presence of Mrs. Rosengolz at 49 Moorgate was that as a doctor she was giving medical attention to the employees of Arcos and the Trade Delegation.

An hour later the women were gradually allowed to leave the building, the men were detained longer, some of them till late at night.

In about an hour after the commencement of the raid the police gave permission to the secretary of the Trade Delegation, Mr. Firsov, to examine some of the rooms. Similarly Mr. Sorokin, the acting chairman of Arcos, Ltd., was allowed at about the same time to enter the various rooms in the company of a police officer.

In almost all the rooms there were police officers.

During the whole of the late afternoon and evening of May 12 and of the night following the search proceeded in most of the rooms in the absence of representatives of Arcos or of the Trade Delegation. During the night the premises remained under police guard.

On the morning of May 13, in view of the fact that the search of the Arcos premises was still proceeding, Arcos was compelled to suspend business and posted an announcement to that effect on the entrance of its premises.

The Trade Delegation also withdrew its employees, as it was quite impossible to do any work. Thus on May 13 49 Moorgate remained in the exclusive possession of the police.

During the whole of the search there was no single case in which the police drew up any formal list or report of documents found or taken away, in the presence of representatives of the institutions raided.

Up to May 15 neither Arcos nor the Trade Delegation had been informed as to whether any documents had been taken away and what were the objects of the search.

In view of the fact that the raid on 49 Moorgate and the search of the premises of the Trade Delegation and of the private office of the official trade agent is of quite exceptional importance and endangers not only economic relations but may lead to a complete rupture of all relations between Great Britain and the USSR, the Anglo-Russian Parliamentary Committee considers it advisable to publish all the documents which may throw any light on the raid and the circumstances under which it was carried out.

With this end in view, the Anglo-Russian Parliamentary Committee instructed me as secretary to interview members of the Trade Delegation and Arcos, Ltd., as well as representatives of the press bureau of the embassy of the USSR and to collect all the materials and documents published herein.

W. P. Coates,
Secretary of Anglo-Russian Parliamentary Committee

Sections of the documents collected by the Anglo-Russian Parliamentary Committee follow.

Extracts from the 1921 Trade Agreement

Article IV. Each party may nominate such number of its nationals as may be agreed from time to time as being reasonably necessary to enable proper effect to be given to this agreement, having regard to the conditions under which trade is carried on in its territories, and the other party shall permit such persons to enter its territories, and to sojourn and carry on trade there, provided that either party may restrict the admittance of any such persons into any specified areas, and may refuse admittance to or sojourn in its territories to any individual who is persona non grata to itself, or who does not comply with this agreement or with the conditions precedent thereto.

Persons admitted in pursuance of this article into the territories of either party shall, while sojourning therein for purposes of trade, be exempted from all compulsory services whatsoever, whether civil, naval, military, or other, and from any contributions whether pecuniary or in kind imposed as an equivalent for personal service, and shall have right of egress.

They shall be at liberty to communicate freely by post, telegraph, and wireless telegraphy, and to use telegraph codes under the conditions and subject to the regulations laid down in the International Telegraph Convention of St. Petersburg, 1875 (Lisbon Revision of 1908). . . .

Art. V. Either party may appoint one or more official agents to a number to be mutually agreed upon, to reside and exercise their functions in the territories of the other, who shall personally enjoy all the rights and immunities set forth in the preceding article and also immunity from arrest and search, provided that either party may refuse to admit any individual as an official agent who is persona non grata to itself or may require the other party to withdraw him should it find it necessary to do so on grounds of public interest or security. Such agents shall have access to the authorities of the country in which they reside for the purpose of facilitating the carrying out of this agreement and of protecting the interests of their nationals.

Extracts from Parliamentary Debates

On May 4, 1925, Sir W. Davison asked the Prime Minister what "number of persons representing the Russian Soviet Government or any department of the same have special diplomatic privileges in this country; whether such privileges include the admission of correspondence and other literature in sealed bags; and whether he is satisfied that these privileges are not used for the issue of propaganda hostile in this country, as was found to be the case in Germany by the president of the State Court of Leipzig at a recent trial?"

The Prime Minister: "The answer to the first part of the question is four; and to the second part, in the affirmative. As regards the third part, His Majesty's Government have no reason to suppose that Soviet diplomatic bags are being used for propaganda purposes."

On June 23, 1926, in answer to a question by Commander Oliver Locker-Lampson, Mr. Locker-Lampson said that "the Soviet Trade Delegation is the only trade organization associated with the Soviet which is allowed to send and receive sealed bags; the weight of the bags is limited to five kilograms a week under the Trade Agreement and subsequent correspondence."

In reply to a further question, Mr. Locker-Lampson said that "the chairman of the Soviet Trade Delegation appointed under the terms of the Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement of 1921 is the only commercial agent of the Soviet Government who enjoys diplomatic immunity in this country."

On July 1, 1926, Mr. Lansbury asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs "whether the head of the Russian Trade Delegation enjoys any diplomatic privilege or immunity or the privilege of receiving or sending letters in diplomatic bags, other than those enjoyed by commercial attachés, trade commissioners, and commercial counselors representing the governments of the United States of America, France, Germany, and Italy, attached to embassies in this country."

The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Godfrey Locker-Lampson, replied that "There is a difference in form, but it is not one of substance. All the officers named are accorded the ordinary diplomatic privileges and immunities, but, except in the case of the Russian Trade Delegation, there is no special arrangement for a sealed bag."

Extract from Hansard, May 16, 1927:

"Mr. Thurtle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will state the nature of the diplomatic immunity enjoyed by the staff and premises of the Russian Trade Delegation?

"Mr. Lumley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the whole Trade Delegation of the Soviet Government in Great Britain enjoys diplomatic immunity or only the head of the delegation?

"Mr. Locker-Lampson: Neither the Trade Delegation, its staff, or premises, nor the head of it as such, enjoys diplomatic immunity. The head of the delegation is the official agent appointed under Article 5 of the trade agreement and the privileges he enjoys are those prescribed by Articles 4 and 5 of that agreement.

"Mr. Thurtle: May it not fairly be said that its official agent does in fact enjoy what is known as diplomatic immunity —the official agent himself?

"Mr. Locker-Lampson: No. I was referring to the official agent. There is only one and he is not on the diplomatic list at all and he does not enjoy diplomatic immunity."

Following is the statement of the Press Bureau of the Embassy of the USSR in Great Britain, published May 15:

(1) Immediately on being informed of the raid, at about 5 o'clock in the afternoon of May 12, the First Secretary of the Embassy, Mr. Bogomoloff, called at the premises of the Trade Delegation. On his way, he called on the director of the Northern Department of the Foreign Office, Mr. Palairet, who, however, expressed complete ignorance even of the fact that the raid was taking place. At about 7 o'clock of the same evening Mr. Bogomoloff rang up Sir Austen Chamberlain's private secretary requesting him at the instruction of Mr. Rosengolz, the Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of the USSR in Great Britain, to arrange an immediate interview between Mr. Rosengolz and Sir Austen. At the same time Mr. Bogomoloff explained that the question which Mr. Rosengolz desired to discuss with Sir Austen was the raid on the premises of the Trade Delegation and the violation of the 1921 Trade Agreement. The interview, however, was fixed only for 11:30 a. m. on May 13. Whereupon Mr. Bogomoloff requested that Sir Austen Chamberlain's private secretary should be so good as to arrange an interview for Mr. Rosengolz immediately with some responsible member of the staff of the Foreign Office, but when, ten minutes after the telephone conversation, he arrived there, he found neither Sir Austen Chamberlain's secretary nor any responsible member of the Foreign Office staff. Thus all the attempts made by Mr. Rosengolz to communicate with the Foreign Office during the evening of May 12 were without result.

Instructions Issued to Soviet Employees

Instruction No. 27: To the Trade Delegation of the USSR in Great Britain and Subordinate Organizations.

December 29, 1926

To All Departmental Managers.

You are asked to inform all employees under personal signature of notification of the following instruction issued by the Embassy and the Trade Delegation of the USSR in Great Britain on December 16, 1926.

Supplementary to previous instructions and orders, we once again categorically request that all employees, without exception, of the Embassy and Trade Delegation of the USSR in Great Britain refrain from any actions which might be interpreted as interference in the internal affairs of Great Britain. In particular, the English employees are requested to refrain from any political work within the limits of the territory of the Embassy and Trade Delegation. They are also forbidden to form any organizations in any way connected with political parties.

You are notified that in the event of any employee violating this instruction in any way he or she will be immediately dismissed.

This instruction is to be shown to every employee, who must attach his personal signature.

For the Plenipotentiary Representative of the USSR,
(A. ROSENGOLZ)
Trade Delegation (KHINCHUK)
Certified correct, O. SOROKIN

On March 2 a letter was received from Mr. Firsov, secretary of the Trade Delegation, that the above notice had been signed personally by all the employees of the delegation.

Extracts from the statement by the acting chairman of the Trade Delegation, Mr. J. Boieff, published in the Press, May 16, 1927:

. . . The officials of the cipher department were kept in a separate room under police guard and nobody, not even Mr. Boieff, was allowed to communicate with them, while from six to eight of the police were left alone in the cipher room and proceeded to ransack Mr. Khinchuk's safe.

The same procedure was adopted by the police against the secretary of the trade delegation, Mr. Firsov, who was ordered out of the room notwithstanding his protests and demands to be shown the search warrant. Some time afterward, Mr. Firsov was allowed to enter the corridor in which his room and eight other rooms of the Trade Delegation are situated, in order, evidently, to act as a kind of witness to the proceedings, although it was obviously quite impossible for Mr. Firsov to observe in any way what was going on at one and the same time in nine different rooms.

At the same time, Mr. Firsov saw in one of the rooms a Scotland Yard official at one of our typewriters typing something. Immediately on the arrival of Mr. Firsov he stopped typing and took out of the machine the note he had typed. . . .

Extract from the statement by Mr. S. I. Hermer, member of the council of the trade delegation.

I was not present at 49 Moorgate when the raids started, and arrived only about half past five, together with Mr. Boieff.

What struck me at the first moment—an impression strengthened by later observations—was the extremely aggressive and hostile attitude of the police. They seemed to be looking and waiting for trouble. Such attitude was in no way justified by the position of affairs in the building and the behavior of the employees. It was clear at the first glance that the employees were taken absolutely by surprise, the great majority of them probably never expecting a thing like that to happen in Great Britain. No resistance in any form was offered anywhere; there were no attempts to conceal or hide anything, or to destroy papers or documents. The only exception occurred in the cipher room, where the officials, as in duty bound, quite properly wanted to burn the code and decoded telegrams before admitting the police. As is evident from Mr. Boieff's statement, they failed in this attempt and succeeded only in burning a few telegrams which arrived and had been decoded that day. No other document or paper was burned, and this would have been impossible, as, except for the cipher room, there are no fireplaces in the whole of the building, which is heated by central heating. . . .

Extract from the sworn statement of Anton Miller, head of the cipher department.

. . . I asked for the acting chairman of the Trade Delegation or any other member of the Trade Delegation to be called in and also requested them to say who they were and what they wanted. I received no answer, but the three incomers gripped me forcibly. Two took me by the wrists and ran through my pockets, while the third tore out from the left pocket of my trousers the keys of the doors of the room and the safes. Others meanwhile ran through the pockets of Mr. Khudiakov and Miss Granovska, and Mrs. Miller was pushed out of the room. Then the man who had in his hands the keys which he had torn out of my pocket began to open the small safe in which are kept the cipher codes with which Mr. Khudiakov and I work. Khudiakov and I leaned heavily against the safe, defending it, and declared again that, without permission of the chairman of the Trade Delegation, the acting chairman, or a member of the Trade Delegation, we had no right to show them the codes. We were turned away from the safe by force and told not to resist, but as we continued the defense one of the men behind me struck me on the neck. I felt dazed and could not resist any more and cried out with pain. Several policemen ran into the room and held my wrists and one of them took hold of Khudiakov by his throat. Mr. Khudiakov received several blows and fell down on the floor unconscious. The policemen held me by the wrists and, gagging my mouth, proceeded to empty my pockets, working mostly behind my back. They told me they had taken certain things out of my pocket, but I had no means of ascertaining whether the things they mentioned had actually been taken out of my pockets or not. . . .

Mr. Khudiakov and I were pushed into room No. 6a, which adjoins room No. 5. There our boots were taken off, we were partly stripped and searched, and were left sitting there with no boots. We were not allowed to go home until about 1 o'clock in the morning.

The policemen were all armed and I saw that they each had something which looked like whips of a black color. One of them, when attacking Mr. Khudiakov, drew out a revolver. I cannot say with what kind of instrument the blow was administered to me—by one of these whips or by fists, as the blow was given from behind. . . .

Extract from the sworn statement of Sergey Khudiakov, clerk in the cipher department.

. . . I resisted, then one of the detectives called in more men and drew out a revolver. Four persons seized me and a fifth began to strike severe blows upon my head with some weapon. The men who held me twisted my wrists. Finally I fell, and was then placed upon the settee, beside me being stationed a policeman on guard, who held his baton over my head. After a few minutes they began to push us out of the room. Miller and I again offered resistance. Miller was taken out in front of me. I was still offering further resistance, but in spite of my bleeding and swollen face one of the detectives seized me by my hair, bent my body down, and forcibly squeezed my head between my legs. At the same time I received several blows on my back. In this way I was dragged out into the adjoining room, where my boots were taken off and policemen were put on guard. . . .

What Made These Women "Modern"?

The seventeenth article in the series of personal revelations by well-known women will appear next week. John B. Watson, behaviorist, and Beatrice M. Hinkle, psychoanalyst, will analyze these articles for The Nation.

Oswald Garrison Villard

EDITOR OF THE NATION

Of the first edition of this book, Robert Morss Lovett wrote: "Mr. Villard is unusually well fitted for his task. He inherited the ownership of a great newspaper. No one ever questioned his journalistic ability or his high view of the responsibilities of the profession, to which he was willing to sacrifice material success. . . . Undoubtedly the chief interest in Mr. Villard's book is in the narratives of successful struggle and the vivid portraits which lend to his subjects the interest of drama and character. He shows how practically all the great newspapers of his country owe their origin to some dominating individual, the New York Times to Ochs, the World to Pulitzer, the Herald to Bennett, the Chicago Tribune to Medill, the Louisville Courier-Journal to Watterson, the Kansas City Star to Nelson."

Mr. Villard belongs to a family that "has had the privilege of serving journalistic ideals for one hundred and five years." He himself has belonged to the profession for thirty years. New Edition. $3.00

IF Cooperation has a weakness

It lies in the unwillingness of men and women to share the responsibilities of others. The combination that works best is where individual freedom and financial responsibility exist with like-minded men and women grouped together in a small area. *MT. TRIUMPHAL CELEBRATIONS unsurpassed in their magnitude, their spontaneous enthusiasm, their affectionate welcome, their demonstrations of justified national pride, have failed in Washington and New York to shake the poise, the simplicity, the modesty, and unaffected sincerity of Charles Lindbergh. By no act has he lowered the high esteem in which all hold him. He has pretended to no oratory, assumed no universal knowledge, and indulged in no preachments, but he has appealed for the future of civilian aviation along the lines of our leader of this week, which was, of course, written before his article in the New York Times. Hundreds of thousands have glimpsed this young man, drooping and bent with fatigue, who has taught the youth of America some of the finest lessons ever exemplified by a single conspicuous individual. They have seen him disdain wealth, accept honors not for himself but for the cause so dear to him, refuse to deck himself in the colonel's uniform the army was so eager to have him don, and bear himself precisely as a plain young American gentleman should. And like mother, like son. Mrs. Lindbergh, too, has won the hearts of everyone by her modest refusal to allow herself to be exploited. Finally, the whole nation has been quickened and uplifted by its ability to spend itself without a dissenting voice in a great wave of enthusiasm for an individual, with no cleft of politics, or theology, or class feeling, and no regret, as so often, that here was a hero who builded his fame on the death of multitudes.

WHILE WE WERE ALL REJOICING in the fact that, as Charles Evans Hughes has put it, Charles Lindbergh typified the spirit of America in its best aspects, came the news from Mississippi of an act of fiendishness possible only in the United States. A mob of one thousand American citizens—not foreign-born immigrants or recent arrivals from "the slums of Europe"—took two Negroes, brothers, from the hands of the sheriff, tied them to a telegraph pole, poured gasoline over them, and burned them alive. Their screams were so terrible that one member of the mob had a momentary impulse of humanity and tried to beat out the flames. The sadists near by promptly restrained him. Their victims were not guilty of the "usual crime"—rape. They were merely charged with having shot to death in a quarrel the white superintendent of a sawmill which employed them—and they had not been proved guilty. They were not seeking to escape; they were in the hands of the law. But, as usual, "the sheriff fired in the air." Equally as usual, "because of the darkness, the officers were unable to recognize any members of the band." If Mississippi does not find a way to identify the members of the mob and punish them then the argument for a federal lynching law once more becomes unanswerable.

IT WILL SOON BE TIME to form a society for the protection of Calvin Coolidge—everybody is beginning to throw brickbats at him. Here is Will Rogers saying that most people who go to the Black Hills go to hide something or to get away from something, and that Mr. Coolidge has more to get away from than anybody else who ever went there. What can he mean by that? Next there are growls because Mr. Coolidge did not rejoice properly or quickly enough about Captain Lindbergh, and there are some persons mean enough to say that it was outrageous to bring the great flier back and take him to Washington so that the President would not have to shorten his vacation by a single day. Then there is the Levine episode. When the President cabled his congratulations to Chamberlin he never mentioned Levine and the Jewish press declares this economy of words was quite too parsimonious. Now the navy has a grievance. It prepared the great review for him and ninety-seven men-of-war passed before him. The newspapers with their usual kindliness to the President told how he stood on the bridge and saw every ship roar its tribute and then sent his message "Well done." But the report reads, after twenty minutes "he left the bridge and retired to a couch in the stern of the boat, where for two hours he could neither see nor be seen." The navy is furious. But we—well, we have a simple explanation. Our guess is that Mr. Coolidge had merely failed to take a certain famous sea-sickness remedy before starting on his cruise.

THE RICHMOND NEWS LEADER is another one of the skeptics as to the greatness of the "greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton." It points out that the refunding of the second Liberty Loan on a basis of 3⅜ per cent has been made possible by the great acquisition of wealth immediately after the war, with which Mr. Mellon has had nothing to do. It admits that Mr. Mellon's handling of our maturing government obligations has been good, but it calls attention to the record made by the Treasury immediately after the Civil War. During that struggle the government had to pay 5 and 6 per cent, even 7.3 per cent, interest in the dark summer of 1864. By 1874, however, only nine years after Appomattox, just after the dire panic of 1873, the government negotiated some demand loans of 3 per cent, had refunded part of the war debt at 4 per cent, and had issued $200,000,000 of 5 per cent bonds to take the place of higher loans which were called. More than that, in that same year the United States bonds stood at from 111 to 122. The average of the refunding in 1874 was 1 per cent less than on the original bonds. Says the News Leader: "Mr. Mellon has not been able to make a better record. . . . The average of the refunding has not been as much as 1 per cent under the average interest on the original bonds, which was the figure attained in the corresponding year after the war between the States."

BRIGADIER GENERAL JOHN H. RUSSELL, American High Commissioner in Haiti, is returning to Washington, the newspapers announce, with Dr. W. Cumberland, the Financial Adviser and General Receiver, to discuss with the State Department an irrigation project, sponsored by Illinois financier-politicians, which will open up 100,000 acres for "development." The Chicago Tribune correspondent adds that > General Russell is anxious to prove to Secretary Kellogg the complete failure of Haitian justice, the administration of which is not covered by treaty. He declares that it is impossible at present for Americans and other foreigners to conduct cases in the courts, and that they always lose because the judges and juries raise the color issue.

What more damning revelation of the lies of marine-corps publicity could be made? The Haitians are contented under American rule, peace and happiness reign, they say. But the Haitian judges and juries are uniformly anti-American. Every self-respecting Haitian is anti-American today. The Americans brought the color line with them, and of course it turns against them. Americans actually had the insolence to force Haitian hotelkeepers to refuse to receive their own dark-skinned countrymen in the main dining-rooms of the hotels! Today, all over Haiti, men are protesting against the Rodenberg Concession which General Russell and Dr. Cumberland are sponsoring. Doubtless some of them will be put in jail. Doubtless the editors of the protesting Port au Prince newspapers will be among the jailed, as they have been in the past. And probably Washington will continue to ratify the arbitrary acts of its agents and puppets in Haiti. The real test must come in January. Will Washington permit Haiti to have a free election then—the first since American marines landed twelve long years ago?

"NATION SHALL NOT LIFT SWORD against nation; neither shall they learn war any more." These are noble words and come from the Bible, ordinarily safe from the blue pencil of the censor, but Major Henry Adams, chairman of the United Veterans Board of Plainfield, N. J., does not like them. They have been carved in bronze at the base of Plainfield's war memorial, and besides agitating the veterans in general they have moved Major Adams to this expression of his disgust:

> It's that line—"shall not learn war any more"—that we object to mainly. It just isn't the kind of thing for the younger generation growing up to read—it is pacifistic, that's what it is. We stand for preparedness, the kind shown by our marines and sailors in China in this recent trouble.

It is interesting to record, however, that the inscription was selected by Edward Sacker, a young man who had been a captain in the World War; the monument has been presented to the City Council, subject to the approval of the trustees of the Crescent Avenue Presbyterian Church, owner of the plot on which the column stands. The Rev. Dr. John J. Moment, pastor of the church, is quoted as earnestly hoping "that the City Council will not put itself in the ridiculous position of formally requesting permission . . . to change the inscription." Here, then, is a soldier, Mr. Sacker, who learned something from the recent bloody conflict, and a minister who reads his Bible and believes it. It is the professional head-hunters, the irrepressible "patriots" who will never learn from experience and who will not believe the evidence of their own eyes.

AT BOSWORTH the British Liberals won their third by-election in ten days. The election was fought on the issues of the Tory trade-union bill and the break with Russia, and the result surprised almost everybody. The seat had been safely Tory; but Labor, although running third at the last election, had hoped to capture it. Instead, the Liberal candidate nosed his way into first place by 271 votes, with the Tory more than 4,000 votes behind. Does this mean that British Liberalism, under the leadership of Lloyd George, is awakening to new life? At least it marks a halt in the progressive decline of that historic party. Labor, meanwhile, consoles itself with the fact that the Cooperative Union Congress, in a close balloting, voted definitely to affiliate with the Labor Party. But Cooperative candidates have long acted in alliance with Labor, and while the congress vote may mean more funds for Labor it will hardly bring many new voters to the Labor standard. The Tories, too, have their consolation. Successive defeats at by-elections may prove their unpopularity in the country, but their majority in Parliament is still so vast and the Tory members are so docile and disciplined that the Government can push through any measure it likes, whatever the wishes of the country.

INDIA HAS SHOWN little gratitude over the latest mark of British protection and generosity. Although the Indian constitution cannot be changed until 1929, and Indians have often been told that it was useless to hope for any greater measure of independence before that time, the British Parliament has just passed a bill which modifies that constitution to the extent of creating a national navy for India. Indian boys are eligible for appointment as officers at the rate of one a year. The Indians are ungrateful enough to point out that agreements for naval disarmament prevent England from maintaining as large a fleet as in certain circumstances she might wish in Eastern waters, and that this Indian navy, by the terms of the bill, can be used for imperial purposes with only the consent of the Governor General. Labor members, among them Mr. Pethick-Lawrence and Lieutenant Commander Kenworthy, tried to have the bill amended so that the fleet could not be taken out of Indian waters without the consent of the Indian Legislature, and so that the expense when it was used for imperial purposes should be borne by the imperial treasury. Lord Winterton declared that this suggestion was an insult to Indian patriotism, which should not be deprived of the right to make a generous contribution, and so forth. So the amendments were overwhelmingly defeated. In its final form the bill contains one safeguard for Indian interests: when the Royal Indian Navy is used for any other purpose than Indian defense, India shall not pay the bill without the consent of both houses of the British Parliament!

Negro Boy Runaway

A small colored boy about 14 years old ran away from his home near Stapleton Jan. 4th. Anyone seeing him will please notify me and hold him untill I arrive. I will pay reward. I object to anyone useing him.
Roy Haines, Stapleton, Ga.
Rt. 1 Box 16

THE INTERESTING LITTLE ADVERTISEMENT printed above was not, devoted reader, taken from the Richmond Enquirer of, say, May 2, 1849, or even the Charleston Courier of possibly April 16, 1855. One of those worthy papers has long since gone to its reward, and the other has changed its name. But on January 27, 1927, which, if we are not taking leave of our senses, is the current year, the Jefferson Reporter, a weekly, published at Wrens (population about 1,500), Georgia, carried, without comment, the item we reproduce. It has been suggested that it was the plea of an irate father for his son, and as such faintly justifiable. We doubt it. It may have been the request of some one who never heard of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States. We doubt that, too. In Georgia, as in other parts of the South, these amendments are not unknown. But systematically, repeatedly, in the most diverse and ingenious ways, and with a persistence that would do credit to a far better cause, they are ignored.

UPTON SINCLAIR LOVES A FIGHT as well as anybody alive, and in his conflicts he never fails to be on the side of justice, liberty, and—paradoxically—even peace. This time he is fighting the Boston censors who have removed from sale his book "Oil" on the ground that it is obscene. Other books have been banned in Boston, notably "Elmer Gantry" and "An American Tragedy," but to date Mr. Sinclair alone has decided to fight for his rights as H. L. Mencken fought the suppression of the American Mercury. Two Sinclairs, father and son, are making "Oil" a test case, twenty-five-year-old David being offered as Exhibit A to prove that his father's books are not corrupting or indecent. Last Sunday on Boston Common the police presented themselves as Exhibit B, attempting to harass Mr. Sinclair. Unfortunately, his permit to speak was in good order, the speakers were willing, to the delight of the crowd, to push the automobile off the Common, thus not being guilty of driving it, and loud guffaws of laughter greeted the policeman who pulled out his watch and gave the crowd five minutes to disperse or be charged with inciting a riot. Mr. Sinclair left the scene amid the cheers of the spectators. The police departed by the back door. It is difficult to deal with a man who so patently pines to be arrested. It almost makes a policeman seem ridiculous, and even in Boston that must, if possible, be avoided.

ROLAND HAYES, the famous Negro tenor and one of the most interesting figures in the world of music, has decided to build a school for his people near Calhoun, Georgia. With no family to support, with wealth rolling in upon him, he has hit upon this means of erecting a memorial to the mother who was so devoted to him, so fearful that his taking up singing as a profession might lead him into bad company and bad ways, who unfortunately died just before he became one of the foremost male singers of the world. He wishes, he says, to build a school "as enduring as her great gifts to me," and he wishes to make his tribute in the high standard of instruction provided. There are plenty of Negro schools in the South adequately equipped with bricks and mortar, bedrooms and schoolrooms and trade-shops, and all the rest, but there are far too few in which the standards are of the highest. For decades past we have longed for someone to appear who had the means to make a model rural school for Negroes with an attendance of from one hundred and fifty to two hundred children; who would not be compelled to spend his time going hat in hand to beg for doles to keep the school alive, but could make an institution physically perfect in every particular, with the best teachers to be had. Such a school could exercise a tremendous influence all through the South by setting standards for the managers of every similar undertaking, whether for blacks or whites. We do not know whether this is Mr. Hayes's plan; we do know that he has hit upon one of the finest types of memorials and one that does credit alike to his heart and to his head.

THE CIRCUMSTANCES UNDER WHICH Francis Grierson died in California are among the most melancholy that can occur in literary life. Famous, the author of many useful and beautiful books, and the recipient of international honors as a musician, Francis Grierson had yet passed the years of his eighth decade—he died at 79—in poverty and virtual obscurity. Waldemar Tonner, his secretary for forty-one years, had struggled with him to the end, and doubtless he enjoyed some local repute as a lecturer after he had long ceased to have much to say; but for the most part he was desperately alone. The tide which once supported him had ebbed away. His experience had been rich. Born in England, he had spent his boyhood in Illinois where he had heard Lincoln debate with Douglas and whence he went to serve as page to General Fremont in the Civil War. Then to Europe, where he achieved a name as pianist, literary critic, economist, and psychologist, and where he enjoyed the friendship of some of the greatest living men. Then to America once more to serve as lecturer, reviewer (for The Nation among other periodicals), and biographer of his hero Lincoln. And now dead in Los Angeles lodgings. Until the golden age returns it seems likely that only the luckiest of artists will ever spend their last years serenely.

The Flights and Commercial Aviation

THERE has been nothing in his whole attitude more praiseworthy than Charles Lindbergh's continuous stressing of his belief that the importance of his achievement lies not in what may be called his "stunt," but in the effect of his trip upon commercial aviation. It is really a misfortune that his stay abroad has been cut short by the royal orders from Washington. Since he will hereafter speak on aviation matters with greater authority than any other American, it would have been all to the good could he have stayed and seen for himself how far ahead of us European commercial aviation is. If he can finally be freed from public adulation and be allowed once more to take up a normal course in life it would be well worth while indeed if he could go abroad and watch the commercial flying for a time. No one else, not even the President, could do as much to draw the attention of Americans to their backwardness in this field.

Mr. Levine, it is reported, desires to found a two-million-dollar company to institute transoceanic flying at once. That, it seems to us, is going too fast. Years of experimentation and study are essential to any such undertaking and above all a most careful examination of the records of the Imperial Airways, the great English company, and the German Lufthansa, the most successful and the safest of European air companies. The development of the modern automobile did not come overnight; because of the greater risks to life and limb that of the airplane is bound to be slower. Progress can only be made if science and experience go hand in hand. We have learned much from the two transatlantic flights, but there is an enormous body of knowledge still to be acquired before anybody should start a regular transoceanic service. Take the question of sleet, for instance, that deadly menace to fliers which probably cost the lives of Nungesser and Coli. How is that to be met? By electrical devices, as Colonel Lindbergh is reported to have suggested to M. Blériot? But more than the question of any single hazard is the fact that, unlike France, Germany, and England, we have, outside of our mail service, no group of trained commercial fliers.

A rush into transatlantic flying would attract the foolhardy, but it might by a series of untoward happenings put back by years the actual coming of regular traffic. We would remind our readers that immediately after the sensational first flight of Hawker across the Atlantic the New York Times said, on June 17, 1919: "We now know that any well-engined airplane can fly the Atlantic in clear and fair weather, with a competent pilot at the wheel. The task set inventors is to provide a plane that can get across in any but the most tempestuous conditions, and there will follow a regular air service." How astonished that editorial writer must be to recall his words and ponder upon the fact that we have had to wait eight years for another non-stop Atlantic flight. The press at that time was teeming with announcements of the immediate coming of regular ocean lines. In July, 1919, it was declared that a Zeppelin line would start in October. Vickers, Ltd., the great British arms company, was announced as the head of a huge English combination of capital to start immediately transatlantic services and cross-European routes. That company went so far as to discuss the value of various American towns, such as Atlantic City, for air ports. Vickers even announced a provisional fare of $240 for a passenger from England to New York, with mail rates at 3½ pence an ounce, the service to be by airships of the Zeppelin type with a speed of sixty miles an hour. As the world is aware, nothing of the kind has happened. A year ago there was announced a Zeppelin service from Germany via Spain to South America, to be ready in the coming fall. That, too, seems to have died aborning. A number of American companies have been founded to maintain passenger lines in this country—only to disappear. One has recently been started and two others have been functioning for some time, but we are still far removed from such a service as that offered by the German Lufthansa.

Yet we have no doubt that if American energy and enterprise and capital will set themselves to this task we shall take the lead in this field precisely as we have in the automobile industry. But each particular problem must be studied by itself. For instance, it is a flying boat that is needed for cross-seas traffic, and not a land airplane. Announcement that the British Admiralty has perfected a flying boat, equipped with masts and sails so that it may keep the sea and progress on the water if its engines go out of commission, may be a long step in the right direction. Again, in the London Nation, Oliver Stewart points out that besides the stability and safety of the engine there is still a great deal to be done for the comfort of the passenger. He believes that the airplane has reached the necessary degree of safety and that the failure of the public to patronize the British air lines in large numbers is due to the uncomfortable vehicles in which the passenger has to ride. He declares that fourteen passengers are often compressed into cabins suitable for only four, and adds that "one, two, or three hundred miles an hour are no paregoric for the straitwaistcoat seat and the coffin cabin." Sir Samuel Hoare, the British War Minister, who recently flew with Lady Hoare from London to Delhi, has pointed out that not only must the traveler seek a hotel every night, but that during the flight he is confined to his chair. Much experimentation is needed, and we again acclaim the generosity of Daniel Guggenheim, who recently donated a half million dollars to the Guggenheim School of Aviation at New York University. There, and at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, problems of enormous importance to the future of flying are being worked out, and invaluable data are being collected and filed.

Indubitably we have made some progress. It is something to have an Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Commercial Aviation. The air mail has already paid incredibly large dividends in Chamberlin and Lindbergh. There is no difficulty in finding young men to carry on the services that exist. None the less, we repeat that there is still a great need of additional emphasis on the commercial airplane and the flying ship. Everybody in America seems to wish to map out the remainder of Charles Lindbergh's life for him. We have no such ambition, but if we could earmark two or three of his years we should dedicate them to propaganda on behalf of commercial flying. There is no country in the world, save only Russia, that could profit more by it, for this remains the country of magnificent distances.

Those Balkans

EUROPE has been suffering a series of mild earthquake shocks, and wondering whether they marked a process of settling down or indicated a new era of activity on the part of the row of political volcanoes along her Eastern frontiers. The Anglo-Russian break sent a war shudder across the Continent; there followed another of Mussolini's saber-rattling speeches, then a new Albanian crisis and a Rumanian coup d'etat; and now the Soviet Ambassador to Poland has been assassinated.

Poland and Russia have speedily made up their minds to peace. Poland is loading the diplomatic couriers with apologies, regrets, and explanations; and Russia, despite Litvinov's note, seems to be turning her wrath against England. England, the Soviet leaders say, is really responsible for the current convention that ordinary laws do not apply to Russians. The defiance of law in the British-inspired raid on the Soviet Legation grounds in Peking and the British raid on the Soviet offices in London seems to have led Russian monarchists to believe that they could even go so far as to murder Russian officials with impunity. There may be something in the theory; but it verges on the realm of diplomatic psychoanalysis, which is unsteady ground. And, if the reports be true, it is unfortunate that the Russians' nerves have been frayed to the extent of indulging in more political executions. All Europe needs a return to normal. Britain's anti-Bolshevik spree nullified the good effect of Russian participation in the Geneva conferences; and Russia's own excesses may still further deepen the gulf which separates her from the rest of Europe.

However, it is in the Southeast of Europe, in that perennial hatching-ground of wars, the Balkans, that the smoke conceals real fire. One never knows just how seriously to take the words of a paranoiac like Mussolini; they may mean nothing more than a small boy's excess of good spirits. But even if he does not mean his own words seriously, some of his nervous neighbors may take them so. He has just shouted:

> We must, at a given moment, be able to mobilize five million men, thoroughly armed; we must strengthen our navy; and our air fleet, in which I believe more and more, must be on such a large scale and so powerful that the noise of its motors will surpass every other noise and its wings will obscure the sun from our land. Then, when, between 1935 and 1940, we shall reach the vital moment of European history, we shall be able to make our voice heard and to see at last that our rights are acknowledged.

Since Mussolini's idea of Italian rights occasionally seems to involve restoration of the entire Roman Empire, such speeches are disturbing. A few days after this oration Mussolini was able to continue the Italian conquest of Albania. The Albanians arrested an interpreter attached to the Serbian Legation in their capital, Tirana; the Serbs, seeing behind this arrest the hand of Italy, demanded his release; Albania refused; the Serbs broke off diplomatic relations. Since the negotiation of the Treaty of Tirana (see the International Relations Section of The Nation for January 12) Albania is no longer an independent nation; Italy is her guardian, and shares in any dispute she enters; and Sir Austen Chamberlain's refusal, at the time of the last Italo-Serb dispute, to permit this treaty to be brought before the League, has given it an unusual sanctity. The net result of the recent outburst is that Italy has tightened her grip on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean.

There are signs, however, that England is tiring of Mussolini. He is an uncertain friend and an exigent ally. No one in Europe knows just what Sir Austen Chamberlain and M. Briand said to each other when they were closeted together in London in May, but their meeting was too elaborately staged, simultaneously with King George's elaborate welcome to the French President, to be a mere formality. And one cannot be friends, in Europe today, with both Italy and France. A week after these meetings the Rumanian overturn occurred, and the Government which had been selling itself to Italy was replaced by one with closer ties to France.

Balkan politics are too involved for any American to understand them or for any two Europeans to agree about them, but certain trends seem to be defining themselves. Hungary and Italy, both in the hands of irresponsible autocrats greedy for more territory, are drifting into a natural alliance. Rumania, hitherto Italy's staunch ally, cannot be friends with Hungary's friends, and is returning to its old allegiance to the Little Entente, more or less under French inspiration. Italy is seeking everywhere for allies which may help it to dominate Southeastern Europe, and is ready to growl and shake a sword and even run the risk of war at any time that Mussolini sees any chance to gain a point or win prestige or limelight as a result of it. Italy has sought to destroy the growing Serb-Bulgar friendship, to hem in Jugoslavia and Austria by an alliance with the Hungarian despots, to win a new field for exploitation in Rumania, and to expand its boundaries in North Africa at the expense of France. The Fascists regard French Savoy and French Tunis, as well as an indefinite area in the Balkans, as part of Italia irredenta. With England's support, they have just succeeded in one forward move. There is no telling where Mussolini may break loose next.

Has Poetry Retired?

A RECENT editorial in the Saturday Review of Literature expressed a representative opinion when it spoke of American poetry today as something which, after a brief period of eminence, had sunk back into furtive solitude. We hear this on every side, and we wonder what it means. The reference, of course, is to that "renaissance" which is supposed to have befallen poetry around the year 1912, and which was marked by the emergence of such figures as Robert Frost, Carl Sandburg, Vachel Lindsay, Edgar Lee Masters, Amy Lowell, and, considerably later on, Edna St. Vincent Millay. Edwin Arlington Robinson had emerged more than a decade earlier and had stood for a time alone; but even Mr. Robinson began thenceforth to receive attention of the sort which no poet might have received between 1900 and 1910. T. S. Eliot was lurking in the background with Ezra Pound, to steal forth after the war and become a teacher around whom dozens of pupils should devotedly collect. Now, say the Saturday Review and other critical voices, a dearth is upon us. The poets of the great decade are growing middle-aged, their juniors are merely piping to themselves in secret corners, and in general we are faced with the prospect of a period in which no major note will be struck. Intensity, beauty, and truth are conceded to certain of our younger poets; but not the major note.

What is meant by "major" here? We believe that it refers not to anything at all that has to do with poetry as such—if poetry can be "as such"—but to a special kind of subject matter which the poets of the renaissance were so lucky as to discover. This was hopeful and positive subject matter; it had a sociological tinge; and it was accepted as important because it was closely connected with the life of institutions and affairs. It was of liberal or radical persuasion, but that did not matter, because the poets who employed it did, after all, seem to say that American life was worth attacking and improving. Edgar Lee Masters was bitter about Spoon River, and in his epitaphs disposed forever of the sweet village of late Victorian legend; but he talked also of Liberty, Justice, Virtue, and Truth. Carl Sandburg shouted approval of the new life he saw and heard everywhere in Chicago. Vachel Lindsay struck the cymbals of joy as he prophesied the glory that should some day be Springfield, Illinois. Now these men were good poets, and still are. The point is that they were acclaimed by a crowd of critics who did not care greatly for poetry, but who thought they did, and seized upon volumes which dealt with big, newsy, recognizable themes as evidence that poetry had at last become "important." Poetry, they said, had learned how to "grapple" with the "problems" of "real" American "life." In other words, it said what prose was saying.

Edwin Arlington Robinson's definition of poetry as something which says what cannot be said was doubtless unknown to these critics, but it would have meant little anyway. It happens to be an excellent definition, and it happens also to apply with particular accuracy to much of the recent poetry that the Saturday Review dismisses as minor. The word "minor," incidentally, is a poor word to use in the assessment of poetic ideas. It properly means lesser, which in poetry means shorter, and should be resorted to only when a distinction is being made between, say, epics and lyrics. Epics, good or bad, are major poems because they are long; Milton's "Lycidas," a good poem, is minor because it is short. But if the word must be brought in when ideas are being discussed, it is unfortunate that criticism should almost universally take the line that only happy or hopeful ideas are major. The trend in contemporary American poetry is so completely pessimistic, or at least so deeply skeptical, that criticism seems incapable of discovering the ideas which express this pessimism and this skepticism. While a group of women poets, notably Louise Bogan, Leonie Adams, Laura Riding, Edna St. Vincent Millay in one of her incarnations, Babette Deutsch, Genevieve Taggard, Clinch Calkins, and Idella Purnell, are refining upon the themes of barrenness, frigidity, and locked, incommunicable passion, men here and there are saying that there are no ideas in the modern world to support them as they exercise the poetic faculty. T. S. Eliot, Hart Crane, Allen Tate, Archibald MacLeish, John Crowe Ransom, and others reveal a desolate waste land of the intellect—one so forbidding and difficult that it is no wonder most critics dismiss it as unworthy of the muse. But it is not that. It is distinctly interesting, and these poets are doing rememberable work. So are others who, without turning to the contemporary confusion of ideas for their subject matter, more or less admit it by confining their efforts to intimate, out-of-the-way matters of emotion. So, too, of course, are such men as William Ellery Leonard and Robinson Jeffers, who happen to have written major poems; but "Two Lives" and "Tamar" are pessimistic.

Flappers Prefer——

THEODORE DREISER took third place in a recent questionnaire as the favorite author of certain young lady students at San Jose State Teachers College. And lest it be thought that he gave place to, say, Shakespeare and Milton, it must hurriedly be admitted that Elinor Glyn stood first, with Michael Arlen as second choice. Then followed in order Shakespeare, Louis Bromfield, Katherine Brush, Joseph Conrad, Ethel M. Dell, Philip Gibbs, Peter B. Kyne, de Maupassant, Margaret Pedler, and Booth Tarkington. It is evident from this list both that the younger generation has catholic tastes and that it reads widely. One suspects that Shakespeare ranked as high as he did more out of duty than out of inclination. Common gossip has so long called him the greatest of English writers that even the younger generation has heard of him. And in their frankly avowed preference for Elinor Glyn we see a refreshing disregard of authority, which after all is the first mark of thought.

Other marks of thought were contained in the questionnaire's replies: 93 per cent of the students favored recognition of Russia by the United States, 89 per cent were opposed to a war with China, and 85 per cent were against a conflict with Mexico. This is strange enough when the periodical reading matter of the questionnees is considered, for 21 per cent choose College Humor as their favorite magazine, 16 per cent the Cosmopolitan, 13 per cent Good Housekeeping, 7 per cent the Atlantic Monthly, and 4 per cent each the American, Whiz Bang, Vogue, and the National Geographic. Duty cannot account for the political opinions expressed above; certainly the magazines listed cannot account for them either. Possibly 100 per cent of the student body bootlegs The Nation. Wherever they get their opinions 71 per cent accept the theory of evolution and 23 per cent call themselves atheists.

In affairs of the heart the young ladies were not as cynical as the modern flapper is popularly supposed to be. Seventy-two per cent believed that love continues after marriage. And they wrote themselves down as seeking in the man they would marry, first, personality; second, wealth; third, looks. Even "petting," that mooted modern vice, was welcomed by 68 per cent of the young women, but was tolerated in nearly all cases only with the "right one." And 91 per cent of the answers expressed a wish for, nay, an expectation of, matrimony as a career.

All this shows conclusively that youth must be served, or that our young people are going to the dogs, or that, after all, one generation of young ones is just about like any other, according to one's individual preference in the matter. If there seems to be a certain freshness and heartiness about these young persons, we, at least, find it attractive. They have minds of their own, they are not afraid, they are willing to accept life as it seems to be and to make a cheerful best of it. Has youth always been as fair and as frank? Possibly. Possibly only middle age is reticent, crabbed, intolerant, lacking both the violent enthusiasm of youth and the acquiescence of old age. Ten or fifteen years from now it will be interesting to inspect what remains of the flapper of today. Will she still cut her hair and walk with a free swing; will she still be able to hold her own in an argument, to manipulate a typewriter with one hand and a young hopeful with the other, so to speak? Or will she still prefer Elinor Glyn to Shakespeare?

The younger generation of angels having been discovered flying about clad only in their wings, the American Board of Censors has decreed that Heaven be padlocked for one year.

Padlocked!

The Negro and the Flood

By WALTER WHITE

THOSE familiar with the history of the South would expect cause for complaint regarding the treatment of Negroes in the areas recently inundated by the Mississippi River—the more so because the flooded areas in Mississippi and Arkansas include few towns of any considerable size but are composed of great plantations employing scores or even hundreds of Negro laborers.

A recent tour which I made through the flooded districts, however, brought many surprises, not the least of these being that there was a greater measure of fairness in the administration of flood relief so far as Negroes are concerned than reports had given ground for expecting. Inevitably, there were numerous minor causes for complaint by colored refugees, but on the whole Negroes were being given food, clothing, shelter, and medical attention little different from that given to whites. Army cots, for example, were often given to whites, first, and to Negroes only after the whites had been fully supplied. There were instances, too, where the choicest clothing was distributed in the white camps and the left-overs given to Negroes. The Red Cross, however, with commendable diligence had seen to it that Negroes should have an essentially fair deal.

One enslaving custom more or less generally followed, however, is likely to do lasting harm. To understand this situation thoroughly one should know the background. As has already been said, the flood areas consist in the main of large plantations, owned in many instances by absentee landlords and worked on the share-cropping or tenant-farming system. Particularly in the States of Mississippi and Arkansas, where these share croppers and tenant farmers are Negroes, it is rare for Negroes to obtain fair settlements from their landlords. They live in a state of virtual peonage, and the flood situation has been used to strengthen their chains.

It is worth while recalling the famous riot in Phillips County, Arkansas, reported in The Nation for December 6, 1919. That county is in the flood area today. In 1919 the Negroes there organized a society through which they planned to pool their meager resources and to use the dues paid by the members to retain a white lawyer to represent them in the courts in obtaining settlements for their crops. Word was sent forth that these Negroes had organized instead to "massacre white people and seize their land." Mobs poured into Phillips County, and, to quote the decision of the United States Supreme Court, "a number of colored people assembled in their church were attacked and fired upon by a body of white men, and in the disturbance that followed a white man was killed. The report of the killing caused great excitement and was followed by the hunting down and shooting of many Negroes." Seventy-nine Negroes were arrested, given a farcical trial, and twelve of them were condemned to death, while the remainder were sentenced to long prison terms. Subsequently the cases of these men were taken to the Supreme Court of the United States and there the convictions were reversed, and the men were eventually freed. The case was a revealing picture of peonage conditions in this area.

There enters into the flood situation, also, the great migration of Negroes from the South during the past decade. Drawn into the North on the one hand by industrial opportunities, safeguarding of life from attacks by mobs, and educational advantages, and on the other hand driven out of the South by oppressive conditions, some two million Negroes have left the South. Plantation owners in the flood area were highly apprehensive lest they lose their Negro labor when the flood caused abandonment of plantations.

It is in the handling of this problem of labor that legitimate ground for complaint is to be found. In many of the refugee camps Negroes are carefully guarded, and when the flood recedes and the land dries they are released only to the landlord from whose plantation they came. There is, for example, the area from which refugees were placed in the National Cemetery at Vicksburg. This area comprises parts of five Mississippi counties and all of four others in which, according to the United States Census estimate for 1925, there resided 173,000 persons, of whom 80 per cent were Negroes. According to the Jackson, Mississippi, Daily News of April 30,

> General Green and Dr. Underwood on Friday detailed Dr. H. H. Boswell to visit several points in the delta in order to hasten the evacuation of refugee camps by explaining to the planters and business men that their labor will be protected from labor agents in all authorized camps. "General Green cannot be responsible for this matter in unauthorized camps," declared Dr. Underwood. . . . "It is believed that the principal reason why so many refugees remain in small camps, where it is impossible to protect their health, is on account of the fear of the planters that labor agents will seduce their labor to other parts of the State.
> "This has been absolutely prohibited from the beginning in authorized camps. All labor in authorized camps will be held and not allowed to go to other sections of the State, and after the flood danger has passed and conditions are such that they can resume work, they will be taken back to their homes in the various sections of the delta from which they came."

It is hardly necessary to add that the labor referred to is Negro labor. When I was at Vicksburg, I talked at length with General Green, who was most courteous to me. General Green, in command of the Mississippi National Guard troops, with headquarters at Vicksburg, explained to me the system by which a plantation-owner or his manager bearing credentials would come to the camp, identify "his Negroes," and then take these Negroes back to the plantation from which they came.

At Cleveland, Mississippi, a meeting was held on May 5 of the Executive Committee of the Citizens' Relief Committee, with J. C. McMullen, director in charge of Red Cross Relief work at Cleveland. According to the Vicksburg Evening Post of May 5,

> . . . the matter of parties, covering a wide range of the delta section not overflowed, going to Cleveland with the view and purpose of being permitted to remove families from the camp and place them on their own plantations was thoroughly discussed and considered, with the result that the matter of releasing families or individuals to parties other than the one [with whom] they have previously contracted for the year was placed in the hands of V. W.

Thomas. Mr. Thomas was instructed by the committee not to release any family or persons from the camp except on written consent of the landlord from whose plantation the laborers came or on the personal request or authorization of the landlord.

From a number of camps, among them that at the Fair Grounds at Memphis, I heard of Negroes eluding guards placed around their Negro camps and escaping to shift for themselves, choosing to forego food, shelter, clothing, and medical attention rather than go back to virtual slavery on the plantations from which the flood waters had driven them.

These instances are typical of many. Those in immediate charge of flood relief, whether wittingly or not, are, I believe, permitting the relief organizations to be used by plantation-owners further to enslave or at least to perpetuate peonage conditions in many parts of the flood area. The higher officials of the Red Cross, notably men like Dr. William R. Redden, Chief Medical Officer for the Red Cross, are resolutely opposed to such use of the disaster. There was, for example, the problem of giving relief to sufferers after they had returned to their homes, where Negroes or whites voluntarily chose to go back to the plantations from which they came. Obviously, the most economical and efficient method of distribution of such supplies in cases where there are fifty or a hundred or two hundred people residing on a plantation would be to turn over the supplies for the whole number to the plantation owner. Negroes feared any such plan, knowing that some of the landlords would claim to have paid for these supplies and would charge against the Negro beneficiaries all the supplies that had been given them. They took this matter up with the Red Cross officials, and the result was an order that no supplies be given in bulk—only to the individual sufferers.

Negroes in hundreds of cases were forced to work at the point of guns on the levees long after it was certain that the levees would break. Conscripted Negro labor did practically all of the hard and dangerous work in fighting the flood. Harrowing as many of these stories are, they are the almost inevitable products of a gigantic catastrophe and are part of the normal picture of the industrial and race situation in certain parts of the South. The greatest and most significant injustice is in the denial to Negroes of the right of free movement and of the privilege of selling their services to the highest bidder. That, if persisted in, would recreate and crystallize a new slavery almost as miserable as the old.

Shanghai—International Danger-Spot

By THOMAS F. MILLARD

Shanghai, May 14

WHETHER Shanghai will continue indefinitely to be an international danger-spot is a question not likely ever to be solved by local authority here or by the Diplomatic Body at Peking. A solution depends now on action outside of China; on decisions of the major Pacific Ocean Powers, or, if diplomatic sensibilities are observed, of the American, Japanese, British, French, and Italian governments. The situation provides an exceptional opportunity for remedial and constructive action of the Powers.

At the annual taxpayers' meeting of the Shanghai International Settlement held in April, 1926, a resolution to admit three Chinese members to the Municipal Council was adopted without dissent. One year later, at the next annual taxpayers' meeting in April, 1927, that resolution was mentioned only by implication and another conciliatory resolution of lesser consequence, to admit Chinese to public parks and open places of the municipality, was rejected. Speaking on an amendment to that resolution (to adopt it but postpone its enforcement) one taxpayer said: "I look upon this amendment as a resolution of surrender and fear. At the present time we should face the Chinese with no compromise."

In 1926 the attitude of our local government toward foreign and Chinese relationships in this port was outwardly one of compromise. In 1927 it openly was one of no compromise. No compromise is deadlock. If the impasse is to be removed the home governments will have to do it.

It is pertinent to repeat what I wrote in 1926 immediately after the taxpayers' meeting of that year:

> It is a departure, and a significant one, when the traditions of foreign position here are breached by inviting Chinese into the council. The action logically concedes two things: that the Chinese have a right to take part in government of foreign concessions in China and that they are competent to do so.
>
> One knows that this proposal of the foreign taxpayers is not generous but was made because of fear of serious consequences otherwise. The average foreign taxpayer in Shanghai no more believes now than he did ten years ago that Chinese have a right to participate in government of this settlement or that they are competent to do so. That resolution was proposed and adopted as a gesture having two principal objects. One object is to placate the Chinese temporarily and avert a repetition of strikes, boycotts, and other modern forms of anti-foreignism. Another object is to create an impression in home countries that the municipal authorities here are doing all in their power to conciliate the Chinese, so if trouble comes the Powers will back them up.
> Adoption of the resolution was "cut and dried." It was known beforehand that it would be passed. It was known also that Chinese would not accept the proffered representation. This was common knowledge for some time previous to the meeting. The day before the meeting and that morning the Chinese General Chambers of Commerce, representing Chinese opinion, published full-page advertisements in foreign and vernacular newspapers stating that anything less than full racial equality in the settlement and representation on the council proportionate to taxes paid by Chinese and foreigners would not be accepted by Chinese.
> In pronouncements relating to this issue the humbug was not altogether on the part of the foreigners. The foreigners were offering less than they will give if forced into a corner. The Chinese are demanding more than they will take at a real showdown. Leading Chinese have told me that they will be satisfied, for the while, with equal representation. On the basis of the chambers' published manifesto the Chinese would have probably a five to one majority on the council.
> In this connection it is interesting to reconsider briefly how the settlement has been governed in the past and how it is governed now. After administration was taken over from the British, American, and French consuls by a Municipal Council acting under "Land Regulations" (tantamount to a municipal charter) framed by ministers at Peking, it fell naturally under the domination of the "taipan" system. A taipan is head manager of a foreign "hong," or business firm. Separated by long distances from the home offices, taipans in China of the great mercantile houses, banks, and shipping companies wielded extraordinary influence and authority. They exercised a degree of control over their subordinates and employees that is unusual in Western countries. . . .

The International Settlement at Shanghai is today as much controlled by the taipan oligarchy as it was forty years ago. That statement probably will be contradicted, but it is true essentially. An analysis of candidates presented at the last election of the council shows plainly that, with one possible exception, all of them were nominees of the taipans. Within the oligarchy in later years are a number of powerful local institutions having extensive real property and other investments and by consequence affected by municipal policy and developments like road extensions and transit facilities. . . .

Therefore in Shanghai we know that when a resolution recommending that three Chinese will be admitted to the council was proposed and adopted at the annual ratepayers' meeting it was because the oligarchy willed that action.

Chinese know that also. They know further (which may be overlooked in home countries) that such a resolution of the taxpayers cannot become operative until the Diplomatic Body at Peking, acting under authority of the home governments and in consultation with the Foreign Office, will revise the Land Regulations to meet the occasion. That resolution in fact does not give the Chinese representation on the council; it merely discloses the opinion of taxpayers here. So if dilatory tactics among diplomats at Peking or in the foreign offices hold up revision of the Land Regulations for a year or two or indefinitely, that resolution will mean very little. It might be an empty gesture. Chinese so regard it, I believe.

The resolution passed in 1926 was duly forwarded to Peking, where it was pigeonholed. Nothing came of it, which probably is what was intended and expected by the government of this settlement. When so many Powers have a technical treaty interest in a matter like this it is hard to discover and trace diplomatic obstructive tactics. Revision of the Shanghai Land Regulations slumbers now in the Legation Quarter. The last revision was in 1881 and the Diplomatic Body at Peking did not approve it until 1898. I perceive a connection between that pocketing of reform of the Shanghai Land Regulations with measures taken by Chinese Nationalists since then to recover foreign residential areas elsewhere in China. Chinese think it is futile to go on trying to accomplish those reforms by customary diplomatic procedure.

In the International Settlement there is, on the Chinese side, an absolute-rendition party which demands that foreign authority here be abolished unconditionally. (That party, however, is not so vociferous since the fiasco of Chinese administration at Hankow.) Then there is a party which advocates Chinese membership on the Municipal Council in proportion to taxes paid by foreigners and Chinese. There is a party which asks for equal representation. And there is a conservative class which would be content if Chinese got three seats on the council to the foreigners' six. There is no Chinese element satisfied to have things remain as they are.

On the side of the foreigners there is a standpat element which bitterly opposes giving Chinese any part in government of the settlement. A minority of foreigners favors giving Chinese equal representation under limitations and safeguards. Very few foreigners are in favor of absolute rendition, although many believe that must be the outcome.

An effort was made a few years ago to compromise with the Chinese on this issue by creating what was called an advisory council. That advisory council was composed of Chinese selected by a Chinese taxpayers' association. Although Chinese accepted that plan then to the extent of appointing members, the advisory council's connection with administration of the settlement was perfunctory, and in a short time intelligent Chinese realized that they were in a position which seemed to give them representation in government of the settlement without giving them any power. Immediately after the shooting incident of May 30, 1925, the Chinese advisory council resigned in a body and it no longer exists except on paper.

A proposal advocated by some Chinese is that Chinese and foreigners vote for all candidates for the Municipal Council. That would be equivalent to giving Chinese control, for Chinese taxpayers far outnumber the foreigners, and by concentrating their votes they could elect an exclusively Chinese council, or if the Land Regulations required the election of some foreigners they might elect a certain type of foreigner by Chinese votes. Objectors to that plan point out the possibility that with an overwhelming majority of Chinese voters and a right of Chinese to vote for foreign candidates, the administration of this settlement quickly would descend to the lowest level of "graft" politics in Western cities.

International sentimentalism has no place in my observations and conclusions about Shanghai. Nor do I favor giving Chinese place and power in government of these foreign concessions from any undue confidence in their administrative capacity. The existing administration of these concessions has anomalies, incongruities, abuses, and some notorious corruptions; but the worst foreign administration here is at the present time likely to be better than the best Chinese administration.

Reform of administration here, like the entire question of treaty revision with China, is a matter of political expediency. It is a choice between disagreeable alternatives. My prejudice is for the foreigners. But my political judgment is that in the long run the position of foreigners in China and the relations of foreign nations with this country will be improved by timely concessions to the new Chinese Nationalism. One sees that in many instances the results of Chinese administration of modern public institutions and facilities are disappointing and that foreigners suffer along with Chinese (but in lesser degree) from those failures. I do not conclude from some immediate results of Chinese municipal administration at Hankow and elsewhere that the broad course of events will change. Those results are due to conditions attending one phase of the revolution and are not characteristically Chinese. Chinese stable classes deplore them as much as foreigners do. If taken rightly the Communist episodes in municipal government can be made to react favorably in obtaining a satisfactory compromise at Shanghai.

Presence of foreign troops and naval forces here is chiefly responsible for the change of local foreign attitude toward municipal reform. When thrown on its own defensive resources the oligarchy was willing to talk compromise. Defended now by foreign forces at the expense of home governments and taxpayers, compromise must not be spoken of. And yet, since the troops are here and by all indications expect to remain indefinitely, their presence makes conditions easier for reform. With them on hand, foreigners here and the home governments do not appear to be acting under compulsion or fear in agreeing to readjustments. And after the reforms are operative the presence of troops will assure tranquillity and that radical Chinese elements will not attempt subversive measures. When the new regime gets organized and is running smoothly the troops can be gradually withdrawn.

The treaties that created these concessions assumed Chinese participation in their government. In 1864 the Diplomatic Body at Peking declared a policy regarding them in five articles, and Article V stated: "There shall be a Chinese element in the municipal system to whom reference shall be made, and assent obtained to any measure affecting Chinese residents." Demands of Chinese now for participation in government of the settlements revert to that provision.

Dr. Manley O. Hudson, professor of international law at Harvard University and associated with the League of Nations, visited Shanghai lately and spent more than a month studying conditions here. On departing he said:

> Much stress is now laid on the international character of the settlement. But my study of the situation has led me to think that its control is more international in name than in fact. The Consular Body has not enough authority to be called the real governing power. And it seems to me inevitable that the present degree of irresponsibility in the local government should not be permitted to continue indefinitely. It is neither responsible to the residents of Shanghai nor to the goverments of the Powers.

Dr. Hudson's observations are just and they confirm my own during many years' contact with conditions here. Actual government of this settlement is vested in the taipan oligarchy, which is predominantly British. It decides the by-laws (municipal ordinances) and police regulations under which we live here, usually without reference to any superior authority, and appeal from its decisions and acts is so difficult that it seldom is attempted and then never gets beyond Peking. I know of no case that has been appealed to home governments or courts in order to obtain a decision as to legality of by-laws and regulations enforced here.

Chinese taxpayers and responsible local organizations now have a committee waiting for a propitious time to discuss questions of municipal reform with the Municipal Council of the settlement or with the Consular Body. Apparently no one wants to talk with them. It is certain that the oligarchy and other beneficiaries of the system will fight reform with all their influence and power. But unless the home governments continue to provide troops to uphold the status quo reform is inevitable.

There are several plans to readjust administration of the foreign concessions at Shanghai. Some are visionary, others are advanced to camouflage diplomatic motives, some are practical enough. What is needed at once is for the Powers to take firm charge of matters here and appoint commissioners to work out, with the Chinese, an equitable solution.

These Modern Women

A Hotbed of Feminists

ANONYMOUS

[We print herewith the seventeenth and last of a series of anonymous articles giving the personal backgrounds of a group of distinguished women with a modern point of view. In an early issue of The Nation we will publish analyses of these articles by Beatrice M. Hinkle, psychoanalyst, John B. Watson, behaviorist, and Joseph Collins, neurologist.]

A VAGUE smell of olive oil and mama in bed—this combination always meant a new baby.

In our family it was one girl after another, which pleased me greatly, for I considered boys not only unaesthetic but extremely unnecessary creatures. Not so my father! Though fond and proud of his collection of incipient artists (they all drew as soon as they could hold a pencil), he was always a little piqued at the non-appearance of a son.

The sixth venture brought the desired result. A boy at last—a Muhr who would stay Muhr through all the mutabilities of life and marriage! I remember father on the night of this event—running busily up and down the stairs, his face swollen with toothache, but radiant with ineffable joy and triumph. Now his family was complete!

My father was too idealistic to face the fact that no artist could survive in a mediocre Middle Western village. True, New Swabia had a rich European background and a sturdy pioneer past, but the vitiating spirit of Main Street was already becoming evident, and after all that was what father had to combat.

He painted and decorated houses for a living and kept us in modest comfort. On Sundays he painted pictures in our attic Malzimmer. My mother, and even the half-peasant uncles and aunts "down at grandma's" had the aesthetic urge in some form or other—and I spent my earliest years in the serene belief that drawing and painting, like eating and sleeping, belonged to the universal and inevitable things of life.

My mother, who was a natural iconoclast, arranged our hair in unusual ways, refused to burden us with starched clothes, and considered shoes and stockings unnecessary in hot weather, Sundays included. Our Sundays were gemütlich: The mingled smell of paints and a Sunday cigar drifting down from the Malzimmer, Zimmtkuchen in the kitchen, and Sabbath chimes floating in to us from five directions. The latter gave us a vicarious feeling of sanctity, for we never went to church. We were not even christened. My parents, both Catholic Bohemians by birth, had deserted their faith in early youth and were now "nothing," as I was often forced to admit to my playmates. These children, safe in the folds of some church or other, informed me of our unfitness for heaven. I asked my father about it, and he said: "Nobody knows what will happen to us. Just do the best you know how and everything will be all right."

Somehow, we got away with all this. "It's all very well for the Muhrs," said the people, "because they're artist's children."

I had always regarded my father's delicate constitution as something which went with his being an artist, much like his long slender fingers or his pointed beard. But as time went on, it could not be passed off in so romantic a fashion. It was easy to see that he was worried about it, too, and to make matters worse, after four years another child was born—a girl! Father was not much pleased. While mama was having the baby, he was in a neighboring town painting murals in a damp, unheated church. When he returned, he was forced to stop working and put to bed. On the baby's first birthday he was buried.

We felt dazed and helpless. Father had been unable to work during that last year—all we had was the house and his insurance amounting to a thousand dollars. "You'll have to take in washing," mother was told, "and Senta, of course, must clerk in a store and support the family." But mother, after the strain of the past year, was too weary and ill to do even her own housework, and I could see that the few dollars I would earn as a clerk in a village store would never solve our problem. Besides I was needed at home to help with the housework and to take care of the baby. This I did, and by drawing place-cards and writing childrens' stories which I illustrated I earned about as much as the store job would have brought.

There followed years of struggle for us all. To me it was a jumble of housework, hungry children, endless wood-chopping, "drawing-fits," and adolescent sentimental moods —and a yearning for oysters and butter.

We determined that the title of the house should be kept clear and that we were never to get into debt. The insurance money was made to stretch over six years, so even with occasional donations, and eight dollars a month which the county allowed us for groceries, there was rarely enough food. Our meals were often pitiful—in retrospect, amusingly so. For instance, there was the famous "Dingle supper." Dingle was an old baker who sold us stale sugar-rolls—having a rancid taste—very cheap. A dime bought enough of these for a scanty supper, the sugar coating serving as a substitute for molasses—butter and jelly were to us the rarest luxuries. We ate Dingle rolls and nothing else.

It was a task to divide the food fairly between us, until we thought of putting it on the basis of a game of chance. After making seven equal divisions (mother always took a smaller share with the excuse that she was not growing any more), one of us numbered the portions mentally. Each child chose a number at random, and received the portion which that number represented. As there was no finding fault with one's own choice, everybody had to be satisfied. It might be supposed that the one who did the numbering could juggle the portions to her advantage, but no one thought of questioning her integrity. There is no way in which I can describe our extreme sense of honor in this matter, swearing on the Bible being a pale oath by comparison.

Among the donations we rejoiced in were other people's cast-off clothes. I often went blocks out of my way to avoid meeting the person whose contribution I happened to be wearing. We soon learned to remodel them beyond recognition, and became so expert that we were criticized for "dressing so swell." I could not stop drawing and reading and was made to feel guilty for that. "Senta could find something better to do than sit in the yard and read and draw all the time." We were finally completely crushed by these criticisms and regained our self-respect only when we were safely assembled in our funny tall house, where we drew, sang, and played games among ourselves. I think this self-sufficiency, in spite of our poverty, nettled the New Swabians.

After a year and a half at home I came, not without tears and fumbling, to an important conclusion. Things were looking hopeless, and it seemed to me that whether we were to swim and come out Muhrs, or sink and stay New Swabians forever, depended on a plunge—a high-school education for us all. To have planned this for the rest and sacrificed myself to the noble cause would have been preposterous enough in the eyes of the natives; but brazenly to include myself was nothing short of selfish; and it was, in a way. I was eager to help the family, to be sure, but how much of me did they really need—all? How much did I belong to myself? To what extent had I the right to ignore myself—not the physical part that walked around and worked, but that fiery thing inside which was always trying to get out and which made me draw so furiously? That was something to be considered, too. Hadn't papa told me? His last conscious words had been in regard to this very thing. "Senta," he had said faintly and with that utter-artist look in his eyes, "what papa has left undone, you'll have to do." And I had nodded my head, speechless with the sudden realization that he was dying and overwhelmed with the poignant drama of what was happening to me.

Now then, was not this a justification of my course? It was more than that—a rich legacy, a coat of mail, something to fight the world with! A defiance flashed into birth within me, "I must go to school again!" Mother was willing if I could see a way to do it. A few discerning people saw my point of view and even offered to help me. And so I went to high school, earning more than my way by drawing and writing stories as before, and giving many a day besides to household duties.

After graduating I taught country school for a year. The autumn after that, my oldest sister Barbara was ready to teach, which was fortunate, for in the meantime I had won a scholarship and was sent away to art school—not by the New Swabians, and not without the usual hints as to my selfishness from some of them. One favorite criticism was: "Why didn't she go on teaching school? Here she went and got a good education, and all for nothing!"

Art school brought cavaliers and the question of marriage. With my father as an example of one who had tried to combine art and a family (and with his family still on my hands!) I hesitated. My drawing fits were my greatest joy; and much as I liked men, I knew that art would always have to come first. I made the startling announcement that I would marry no man unless he would promise to run the house during my drawing moods and would excuse me from scrubbing floors. At the Y. W., where I was staying, the girls were horrified at my "unwomanly attitude" and thought I would make an unnatural wife. But the boys at school were merely amused, probably because they thought I would forget all about it when I found the right man.

During the next several years I had the good fortune to find another patron. I managed also to get friendly contributions for the family from various sources. Erda, the third Muhr, had just started teaching when our weary mother, who had been fading away before our eyes all these years, died. We must have looked as forlorn as we felt, for people really seemed to feel sorry for us. The children were well-behaved and rather pretty, and several childless couples offered to adopt them and give them "good homes." This would have simplified matters considerably but I could not accept—for, although the term "bourgeois" was not in my vocabulary at the time, I felt its meaning instinctively and revolted against it.

Then there were the Methodists who had long had a missionary eye on us and who finally saw a chance of rescuing the youngsters from my heathen clutches. In order to soften me toward their plan of taking the three youngest to their orphan asylum, they voted us five dollars' worth of groceries. I withheld my negative answer until the food was safely in my hands, my ethics at that desperate stage being that of the proverbial lioness and her cubs.

Instead of thus giving the children a chance to grow up in comfort I made a plan, precarious perhaps, but in my estimation not as "crazy" as people told me it was. I sold the house and moved the family to a big city. The children were delighted and said they would gladly put up with anything to get to a place where our poverty would not be known. We decided to use the house-money for rent, light, and fuel during the next six years. I, who was about to be sent East on another scholarship, would send what I could. Barbara and Erda, since they were escaping room rent by this plan, would take care of the food and clothing. The fourth Muhr, just finishing school, would keep house; and Erda, who had a knack for such things, would manage the family budget.

After coming to New York, I went through a long and agonized period of disillusionment. One fact after another was pushed down my throat, and it seemed as though I would never get through swallowing. The fact that one of my youthful love affairs was running into a somewhat sterner phase only bewildered me the more. What was one going to do about it? Homer, an incipient radical, was as shy of marriage as I was. Free love? The idea did not shock me, but it was hardly a solution if one planned to have babies.

Both courses seemed so extreme—was there no happy medium? With my room-mate's help I drew up an outline for a contract marriage, but I never even showed it to Homer and our problem remained unsolved. However, I lost no opportunity after that of asking the advice of almost everybody I met. Since most of these were men, I soon found myself in possession of an exceedingly liberal education in regard to men, women, and sex.

I pondered and wept over my new information, but there was no getting around it; "good old Mother Nature" was merciless, selfish, and deceitful—and above all, cruel to women. I began to wish I had been born a man. About the physical disadvantages of being a woman nothing could be done; but there were certain privileges which men possessed merely because of custom, and these it might be possible to capture and make one's own.

And babies? One day a well-known artist asked me what kind of drawings I was most interested in doing. I said promptly, "Children's illustrations."

"Oh," he said in mild disgust. "Women are always drawing children."

It made me a little angry; not so much with him as with myself. Was I just another one of those sentimentally maternal females? Why did I want children, anyway? Because I was interested in drawing and raising them, because I was curious to see what I would produce, and because I wanted to reinvest my aesthetic urge in another human being. And how did these reasons stack up against the one big urge to express myself in drawing and painting? This difficult debate with myself lasted for several years and ended with my conviction that if it came to a choice I was more interested in creating aesthetically than physically.

I am fond of men, and at first I was afraid that these new convictions might drive them away. In general, however, I was pleased to find that most of the men I met were not only willing to put up with but actually seemed to prefer this attitude in women.

Our family struggles are not over yet, but we have managed to keep afloat and, I believe, are coming out Muhrs. If papa had only known what a hotbed of feminists he was starting, he need not have worried so about having a boy; for, with one exception, all his daughters bid fair to remain Muhrs through all the mutabilities of life and marriage!

Adele, and the Swami, and I

By T. SWANN HARDING

IN the year of grace 1927, in the capital of this great republic, after generations of mental evolution and regardless of scientific progress, Adele and I heard the Swami. The Swami held forth in the largest auditorium in town; it seated some four thousand. No miserly church auditorium this. If you arrived at seven you got rather a good seat. But well before the Swami appeared in his opulent orange robe at eight there were no seats left at all and many had been turned away sorrowful. It was Sunday night, but, working against the combined competition of the movies, the legitimate theaters, and the churches, the Swami filled this enormous hall with idolators, and had hundreds left over.

These people wanted something; otherwise, it is reasonable to suppose they would not have been here. They got what they wanted; otherwise, they would not have been here this night, when the Swami had already held forth for two weeks. That they knew what they wanted and comprehended what they got—that is quite another matter.

Adele is rather a skeptical sort of person. Reared as she was in a bisectual family (half Roman-half Protestant) she views most religious exhibitions with an aloof superciliousness that faintly damns and vastly annoys the faithful. So it was rather astounding to me to witness her immediate surrender to the Swami. For she surrendered abjectly. Her lower jaw fell with the others; her eyes fixedly stared at the speaker; her face registered the appropriate emotions for Swami worship—adoration, adulation, satisfaction, progressive enlightenment—just like the other faces.

The gentleman who introduced the Swami, a reformed Protestant minister, congratulated the audience upon its intelligence. Nor was he flattering. These persons were not mental riffraff in appearance. Instead, they were as irreproachable as the persons who attend recitals of classical music, operas, scientific lectures, and serious drama.

Then came the Swami. He was coppery dark. He was robust, "sweet" faced, much given to simplicity. It was unfortunate that he waddled rather than walked. His figure displayed obese rotundities that bode ill for longevity. His long black hair seemed some strange, anomalous barbarism in 1927. But his orange robe was splendor itself. Here was no thin, lugubrious, desiccated mystic and saint. For the Swami was over-nourished; he was very happy and he told anecdotes, some of which were reasonably new. But his dark eyes flashed mystery; his singsong chant in a strange tongue invoked awe; his assumption of tapping the great sources of cosmic energy inspired vague, powerful beliefs.

Like Dr. Crile of Cleveland, the Swami believes in the bipolar theory of life. The body is a battery. It is charged and rendered diseaseless, fatigueless, and successful by an inpouring of cosmic energy through the medulla oblongata. There is a minor difference in exegesis here, for Dr. Crile holds to the brain and the liver as the battery poles.

But before the Swami revealed his secret method he very kindly consented to quiver for us. He held up his arms and could make either fore or upper arm vibrate rapidly like a motor. Ladies were invited upon the stage to feel his arms quiver. They quivered at the silent command of his will. His thighs and calves would also vibrate and gentlemen were invited to feel these. His abdomen—but he did not invite anyone to be convinced about that. He could hold a plain sheet of paper in each outstretched hand and the paper quivered, too. There were murmurs of awe. This quivering was to the onlooking spectator of secular or profane mind decidedly analogous to the voluntary muscle jumping accomplished by certain females in our music halls and there called Oriental dancing. But it could not actually have been that. For parties of four were later invited to the platform to lay hands upon the Swami as he quivered, and lo they quivered also, but left him thereafter with a renewed sense of well-being and of fulness of life, and vastly contemptuous of their husbands. But that happened later.

Meanwhile the Swami spoke. He told interesting tales of his childhood and youth. He intimated that he was very old. He explained that cosmic forces had at various times produced money for him. He expounded the fatigueless life of success achieved by concentration, by establishing communion with the great cosmic reservoir of energy. He told of miracles in far-off India—of walking on the water, of leaving lessons unlearned and later learning them by instantaneous miracle—some useful, some trivial accomplishments. Always he voiced those great, roomy generalizations within which the private aspirations of his individual hearers could crawl, lie down in comfort, sleep, and dream contentedly. He made vague statements. His audience suffused these statements with vital meaning of their own and credited him.

There was much talk of happiness, diseaselessness, material success, scientific law, God, Jesus, and the great cosmic source of energy. There was never once anything concrete, specific, detailed. But it was intimated that such marvels would be revealed to an inner circle with $25 each to enable them to meet for twelve intimate personal contacts with the Swami in the rose room of the most expensive hotel in the city.

And meet they will. More generalities shall they have. Nor will there be complaint or suspicion of cupidity or of impotence on the part of the Swami. These students will assuredly get something which they sincerely believe to be the thing that they want, and they will go their way joyful and uplifted. Is that not enough to condone the Swami?

For there is a great yearning abroad. A civilization which offers greed, success, desperate economic struggle, and material satisfaction, but which denies mysticism, does not offer enough. These Swami idolators are usually Protestants, or renegade Protestants. They are not Roman Catholics. As the Protestant churches have gradually surrendered the awe, mystery, supernaturalism, and passion for unity which are the red meat of religion they have lost their hold on the masses.

These people have been driven to cheap fiction—in movies or magazines—which offers a sugared sentimentality to contrast with the harshness and bleak coldness of everyday life. They yearn. People who love art and literature and science and music; people who think and create do not search out Swamis; do not venerate obfuscated metaphysics. Nor are Swamis sought by people who adhere to dramatic, emotional, highly supernatural religions. But Protestantism, with its modernized austerity, has driven these poor souls forth to choose between movies and Swamis and yet it is cruel enough to want to close the Sunday amusements by law in order to compel these wanderers to return to the dismal sanctuary.

Swamis have their place in the scheme of things. Let us hope they are sincere Swamis—sincerely thinking that their ludicrous muscular twitchings do attest an attunement with the batteries wherein are stored the great cosmic energies. Let us hope that they actually cannot afford, for some occult but sound reason, to give their secret of life freely to the yearning multitudes who hang on their words and would have life more abundantly. Let us hope that they never laugh in their capacious sleeves at the credulity of these advanced, civilized, scientific Occidentals.

But Adele has always viewed religious bigotry as absurd. She has always rather pitied these dear, dogmatic people who tell her that this or that is the truth—I mean The Truth. And she has been inclined to twit them. So I thoughtlessly said, on leaving, something silly about mutual quivering as a guide to Truth. But Adele became offended at once. She declared that these were motor-like, health-producing vibrations, that the Swami was a dear, simple, altruistic soul with not an evil cell in his entire structure and that he had found The Truth.

But you ask what is that Truth? I should refer you to Adele, because she heard all twelve of the Swami's lectures and I but one. Yet he stated the Truth that Sunday night. Everyone said so. I heard it because I listened hard while I was awake. Yet all I can say is that you concentrate; then you get in tune with the great cosmic forces; then your muscles twitch and quiver; then you are fatigueless, you have a high immunity to every disease, you have become successful, and you know why you are on this earth and where you are headed.

And, as Adele says, the profoundest truths are, after all, the simplest.

In the Driftway

SUMMER having come at last the Drifter's uncle who, unlike his nephew, is fond of automobiles, has taken his 1921 Buick touring car, for which he paid $147.37 a year ago, out of its moth-balls and has begun his week-end roamings around the country. His net score to date is five punctures, one injured dog, and two mud-guards mashed, one by a noisy gentleman in traffic on Broadway, and the other anonymously in the first garage in which he left his car for the night. To his regret he again finds himself confronted with a road problem which he hoped would have disappeared by this time—the hitch-hiker. Nothing tries his democracy more than to go sailing by men and women waving frantically for a ride when he has three vacant seats in his car—for he almost never allows himself the luxury of a back seat driver. He cannot get away from the feeling that he has been supremely selfish in not giving a helping lift to the less fortunate who are pounding along the road. For the next two miles it spoils his enjoyment of the countryside, but then his other self asserts its opinion that there is no ethical problem involved and that there ought to be a society for the stern suppression of hitch-hikers rather than a display of the slightest friendliness.

* * * * *

THE Drifter's uncle admits that he was biased against hikers a number of years ago when he picked up two men on the road from Narragansett to Providence in a thick fog with rapidly increasing darkness, and asked them to pilot him to Providence since the main road was closed. The men piloted him with a vengeance and a couple of hours later he wound up in a dense wood, miles out of the way, in a heavily falling rain, stopped by a puncture. Then and there he recognized his folly. He was at the mercy of his guests on the back seat; they could have stripped him of all his belongings—when the joke would have been on them—and left him to spend the night there, twenty miles from nowhere. As it was he reached Providence safely about 1 a.m., thankful that his skin was unharmed and his small change untouched. That experience came back to him forcefully when two friends of his told him of their touring in the West, and their picking up a poor old woman who did not even signal for help. They could not bear to see her dragging herself along the road and so the mother and daughter stopped, placed her on the back seat and drove on. A few minutes later the daughter happened to look in the mirror only to find that the passenger had drawn a revolver from the bundle she was carrying and was pointing it directly at them as if in mortal dread of being kidnapped or attacked. Mother and daughter kept their composure and after much discussion in French drew up at a cross-roads and asked their passenger to alight. Muttering to herself and still holding the revolver in her shaking hand, she descended. No hitch-hikers are ever taken in by those good women, and unnecessary are the warnings of their insurance company that the courts have held the driver liable if there is any injury to a passenger who invited himself into the car.

* * * * *

STILL the Drifter's uncle recalls with pleasure long and interesting conversations with those he has picked up on the road, men, women, and children. They have given him delightful insights into their own mental processes; they have usually piloted him correctly when he did not know the roads, and they have added not a little to his knowledge by their descriptions of the territory he and they were passing through. But of all these passengers who have unexpectedly found their way into his car, one, a woman, stands out above all others. She stood at the foot of a long Devonshire hill, bent and old and worn, and carrying a huge parcel on her back. It was in the early days of automobiling when people still yelled "get a horse" and threw stones and hated the motor-tourist for the dust he created. The driver was a fine young Englishman who was much shocked when told to stop and pick up the old woman. Thereafter his pride came to his aid and he drove like the great artist that he was, swooping down one hillside at fifty miles and roaring up the next incline, the road being open and not another car appearing for an hour at a time. The old lady who must have been terrified at such speed on her first ride compressed her feelings until her destination was reached, a high-lying village miles away. As the car slowed down for the main street the people rushed to the windows to see the new-fangled contraption, only to recognize a neighbor and a friend on the front seat—Maria Smith come to town in the car of quality. Maria Smith said not a word, but straightened up, threw her shawl around her and assumed the haughty and disdainful mien of a blasé beauty to whom a motor car was an every day affair. To not one vocal greeting of the neighbors did she respond; to that she could not descend. Like a Queen of England, she bore herself with incredible dignity until the car stopped at the Grey Horse Inn. There she alighted, curtsied, and mumbled her thanks.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Jugoslavia and Albania

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The admirable and impartial article by Mr. G. E. R. Gedye on The Albanian Peril in your issue of April 27 was a clear and unbiased statement of existing conditions. The curse of Balkan politics has always been interference by non-Balkan Powers. For half a century the rival policies of Austria and Russia kept the peninsula in a turmoil. The one thing they desired in common was to prevent a Confederation of the Balkan States. Such a miracle did, temporarily at least, come about when, under the influence of their common hatred of the Turk, Serbia, Bulgaria, and Greece made an alliance and in 1912 took the field against the Ottoman Empire. If this Confederation could have been maintained and consolidated the whole course of European politics might have been changed.

After the World War for the first time in their history the Balkan states were, therefore, masters of their destinies. The Serbia of 1912, with its population of two and a half millions, had become the powerful Jugoslavia, with a population of nearly thirteen millions, and took her place as the leading nation in the peninsula. Jugoslavia saw the necessity of maintaining her complete independence at all costs and enunciated the principle of "the Balkans for the Balkan peoples." This is the "Monroe Doctrine" of the peninsula and the Magna Charta of the future existence of Jugoslavia, Bulgaria, Greece, and Albania. Each undertakes to respect the independence of the others and to bar the door to interference from without.

In the past month or two the legend has been put forward in certain quarters that Jugoslavia, unfaithful to this doctrine, has designs on Albania and is plotting to seize that country. This is put forward as justification of Italy's action in establishing an Italian protectorate over that country.

There could be no greater mistake. Jugoslavia has no intention of taking over 800,000 people, alien to her in blood, language, customs, and mentality. The Belgrade Government knows that it would only weaken Jugoslavia to take over the turbulent tribesmen of Albania, 90 per cent of whom can neither read nor write, and whose various clans are split up by bitter blood feuds.

Italy, on the other hand, plots aggression and aggrandizement. It is her ambition to replace Austria in the Balkan peninsula and reduce the various peoples to the position of vassal states. To do this she will undoubtedly revive the old Austro-Russian policy of intrigue and disunion, setting people against people for the greater glory of Italian imperialism.

New York, June 7 GORDON GORDON-SMITH

Mr. Kallen and Mr. Edman

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A friend has sent me here a copy of The Nation of April 20, containing a review of my book "Why Religion," by Mr. Irwin Edman. I have read this review with great interest. Mr. Edman makes it fully, I might say passionately, clear that he does not like my book and that he cannot understand it, and he asserts, of course, that the fault is in me. I am sorry. I wish I might have pleased him. I wish the argument of the book had been clear to him. It seems to have offered no intellectual difficulties to many minds that Mr. Edman would regard as quite inferior, and this fact might justify the inference that the obscurity was due not so much to the exposition of the writer as to the emotions of the reader.

I will pass by the various remarks that may be due to emotional blindness or just ignorance—they are a reviewer's privilege—to take a point of general interest that is raised by Mr. Edman's animadversions on my diction. Mr. Edman asserts that I say things in a complicated and affected way when I could and ought to say them in a simple and unaffected way. He declares that I don't say what I mean: that I say "Judaist" when I mean "Jew," "conventual" when I mean "conventional," "formulary" when I mean "formula," "each development becomes a condition and circumstance for the exfoliation of others" when I mean "one thing leads to another."

These different expressions mean to me different things. To me a Judaist is a person who believes in Judaism. Such a person may or may not be a Jew. There are Jews who are not Judaists—perhaps Mr. Edman is such a Jew, and there are Jews who are Judaists. If Mr. Edman were more sensitive to shadings in the meaning of English words he would realize the difference between the suggestion of action in "conventual" and the suggestion of inertia in "conventional"; he would know that the almost proverbial "one thing leads to another" has a far poorer and more generalized content than the expression "each development, etc.," which indicates process, forms of causation, and one certain manner—exfoliation. Only loose and lazy habits of thought rationalized by a theory of style which mistakes the easiest way for the clearest, the least troublesome for the most precise, could make the astounding identifications Mr. Edman makes.

Years ago The Nation printed an article, Style and Meaning, in which I pointed out that words were instruments of classification as well as of designation and that their functions as meanings lie not in what they denote but in what they connote. "Salt," I said, denotes the same thing as "sodium chloride" but does not mean the same thing. For "salt" puts the familiar white powder in a setting of shops and dining-rooms, in a system of social and material relations quite other than those of the chemical laboratory, the drugstore, and the like in which "sodium chloride" sets it. I trust I may be forgiven for believing that what irks Mr. Edman in my style is not its pretense to elegance but its aim at precision.

On the Evolution of the Psyche

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A group of men and women here in New York have been meeting weekly at the Women's University Club for the past year or more, hearing and intensely enjoying a series of lecture-discussions on the evolution of the psyche in man. Many of the students are college graduates, a few are elderly people, and some come from far out in the suburbs, weather never interfering. What are they all seeking, and what maintains this interest? The explanation is only in part the teacher, remarkable woman though she is, and versed in the art and science of the East and the West. Fundamental in the study is a comparison of the principal world religions, with the revelation of how perfectly they harmonize in their inner meanings and how woefully they have been distorted in their outer expression. No course could do more to adjust the individual within himself and to his fellow-men.

We know there are many craving just such an antidote to the poisonous influences in the environment; many, too, who are seeking deeper insight than their scientific or religious education has vouchsafed them. To those who have such interests we extend an invitation to communicate with the chairman of the group committee,

"C. O.'s" in the Civil War

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "Conscientious Objectors in the American Civil War" is the title of a study which I am making in the Graduate School of the University of Pennsylvania. It would be of great assistance to me to learn of any letters, memoirs, or diaries which are known to any of your readers and which might throw additional light on this subject. Personal reminiscences would be of great interest if there are any who are willing to take the time to put them on paper.

These for Your Hurt

By HERBERT S. GORMAN

These for your hurt—the day the willows flung
  Their wild green arms above a world that died
  In my still eyes, and your unbroken pride
Reared silently as some white shaft among
The withered graves of hours that stay unsung;
  And that dead minute when we met dry-eyed
  By the old beaches where the white birds cried
And found no speech in either trancéd tongue.

These for your hurt, and for my heart's allay—
  The memory of passion dark as blood,
The travail of Time's dubious delay,
  And hollow wash of that slow-mounting flood
Of pain that broke the brain's thin dikes and thrust
Your face, your breast back to the senseless dust.

One Against a Thousand

The Rock Dust Remedy. By Harry Phythyon. Belle Vernon, Pennsylvania: The Belle Vernon Agency. $2.

MR. PHYTHYON disagrees with the United States Bureau of Mines and almost all the articulate element in the coal industry with regard to the coal-dust menace and the rock-dust remedy. The Federal Bureau of Mines is generally regarded as a scientific institution and as one of the most eminent authorities on the safety of coal mines. It was created by Congress primarily to study the causes of our mine explosions and to find preventives for them. The bureau very quickly advanced the theory, which its directors derived from Great Britain, that our bituminous mine explosions have been mainly due to the explosibility of coal dust. The principal remedy it proposed was to render the coal dust inert by means of water or rock dust. Recently the bureau has centered its attention on the rock dusting of mines as the best method of preventing mine explosions and has waged a campaign to compel the rock dusting of all the bituminous mines in the country. It has been joined in this campaign by almost all the intellectual and articulate men connected with the mining industry, by the coal-mining journals, by the compensation-insurance companies, by organizations such as the American Association for Labor Legislation, and by the liberal magazines.

Who, then, is this man who stands one against a thousand, and why does he do so? Mr. Phythyon is surely entitled, perhaps far more than many intellectuals of the industry with whom he disagrees, to the term of expert. He not only is a graduate from college and from advanced schools of mining engineering, but has been a practical mining man for several decades. As a boy, before his college days, he worked for five years underground as a practical miner. Since then he has held positions as fire-boss, mine foreman, and superintendent in some of the most dangerous coal fields. He is today a State Mine Inspector in the bituminous fields of Pennsylvania, a position he has held for nearly fourteen years.

Impressive as the odds were against him, he has given one of the most reasonable and scientifically complete discussions of the coal-dust theory and rock-dust remedy, so far as I know, that have appeared in print. He is familiar with the studies of the Bureau of Mines and its experiments in coal-dust explosions at its experimental mine and laboratory at Bruceton. In his book he gives the case for the Bureau of Mines and then item by item proceeds to demolish it. He has not stopped, however, merely with destructive criticism. He has evidently written the book because, as it says, "the part played by coal dust in our mine explosions has been unduly magnified in the public mind to the neglect and discredit of causes and remedies of greater practical importance." He feels that "the coal-dust theory has served a long time as a smoke-screen and a strawman to defeat the purpose for which the Bureau of Mines was created," and that "when a mine explosion is blamed on the coal dust when it was due to faulty ventilation, operators are not prepared thereby to avoid other explosions." It is easy to see how the coal-dust theory would be welcome in this country; it reduces the odium attached to coal operators who have explosions.

Mr. Phythyon does not take the extreme position that coal dust can play no part whatsoever in mine explosions. His position, as distinct from that of the Bureau of Mines, is that coal dust alone, in the absence of explosive gas, will not make trouble. While he admits that coal dust is inflammable and will burn under certain conditions, he makes a distinction between an explosion and a mere conflagration of dust which will not extend beyond the source of heat. It is generally understood that approximately 5½ per cent of methane gas in a mine atmosphere, if ignited, is sufficient to cause an explosion. Mr. Phythyon believes that if fine, dry, bituminous coal dust is suspended in a mixture containing less than 5½ per cent of gas, an explosion may occur. His central idea is that coal dust helps to make a mine atmosphere explosive, when some explosive gas is present, by lowering the explosive limit of gas; and that coal dust itself, suspended in the air, will serve somewhat to extend a mine explosion. But he shows conclusively that mine explosions are not due to coal dust alone.

The main arguments that the author uses to sustain his case are taken from the source we would expect to furnish the best data—the coal mines. He gives a detailed history and explanation of many of our great mine disasters and near the end of his book presents three main facts which are incompatible with the coal-dust theory. First, explosions in gaseous mines are always started in the presence of explosive gas, and their extent and destructiveness are in proportion to the amount of gas that can reasonably be estimated to have accumulated when the explosion occurred. Second, mine explosions are nearly all local in character and die out in the presence of fresh air, whereas if coal dust were responsible one might reasonably expect explosions to reach the entire underground territory of mines where they have occurred. Third, in the entire mining history of Pennsylvania no major mine explosion has ever occurred in a strictly non-gaseous mine, although the non-gaseous mines outnumber many times the gaseous ones.

It is significant that since the appearance of Mr. Phythyon's book neither the Bureau of Mines nor the mining journals that were preaching the coal-dust theory and rock-dust remedy have taken issue with him. While they have not publicly indorsed the book, there is reason to believe that it has somewhat modified the views of some of them. For instance, Coal Age in its issue of November 11, 1926, says: "The change of attitude shows a general confidence in improved equipment and methods of ventilation, in permissible explosives, and in the last line of defense —rock dust." Mr. Phythyon would certainly not relegate rock dusting to a less important position than the last line of defense. He is not against rock dusting as such, but he insists that it should be kept in its proper place. In time to come, in my opinion, Mr. Phythyon's book will be considered as a classic in coal-mining literature. While it may appear to some as if it has merely served to cast a doubt over a brilliant advertising campaign of the Bureau of Mines, it must be pointed out that human life is at stake and that the acceptance of a mistaken theory and the stressing of secondary defenses as against primary ones may be the direct cause of further loss of life. The primary means of avoiding mine explosions is adequate and reliable ventilation to prevent gas from accumulating in explosive quantities. The undue stress accorded to rock dusting in the bureau's campaign not only induces neglect of ventilation but in some cases has evidently even tended to discredit it. The following amazing quotation is taken from what may well be an authorized statement of the Bureau of Mines in the Salt Lake City Tribune for March 12, 1926. So far as I know this has not been repudiated by the bureau: "The Bureau of Mines is convinced that neither ventilation nor water will prevent mine explosions. Ventilation particularly is ineffective, as tests have shown that explosions occur only when the dust is in motion, and ventilating fans therefore add to rather than diminish the danger." When a mine inspector like Mr. Phythyon squarely faces a government bureau which he thinks is endangering lives in the coal industry, the country should be glad that he has the courage to express his convictions.

POWERS HAPGOOD

The Posthumous Sumner

The Science of Society. By William Graham Sumner and Albert Galloway Keller. Volume I. Yale University Press. $4.

IN the whole literature of the social sciences there are few books to which magic can be ascribed. When William Graham Sumner was at work upon the volume which has become "The Science of Society" he wrote a chapter which ran away with him to the extent of 200,000 words. "Folkways," published in 1907, has run away with many a reader and has in these years established its claim as authentic magic. Sumner died in 1910, with his larger work still far from completed, leaving his notes, manuscript, and case material to his colleague, Albert G. Keller. The book, begun in 1899, is just now coming from the press in four large volumes, of which the first is here reviewed. The labor of love involved in working over the materials of a dead scientist is often an example of love's labor lost. It is pleasant to record that Professor Keller has built up out of his original materials a structure that is both admirable and noteworthy.

One of the distinctive features about anything Sumnerian is the solidity and naturalness of the approach. The reader is assured of the inductive method and he is assured of theories that can be traced to the basic phenomena of every-day life. The influence of Darwin and of Spencer is also to be counted on, and this first volume of the long-projected sociology does not differ in these respects from the other writings.

"The Science of Society" assumes a knowledge of evolution and starts off with "adjustment" as a keynote. It seeks the sense of societal customs and institutions and studies their expediency as adjustments in living, whether or not any conclusion can be drawn as to their origins. It starts out with two elements, man and land, and holds that the man-land ratio is at the basis of all society and itself determines the development of society. It is squarely against any instinct of the herd or of sociability, holding that the tendency to associate is acquired rather than inherited through the germ-plasm, and that association is another of those long-standing usages which, like "natural rights," are referred to "nature" because their origin is not known. Association has become a habit of mankind because of its high survival-value in the evolution of civilization; discipline and then more discipline are required to rear an acceptable member of society; men have to be driven to think in terms of society and very few come to do so. The child has to learn all those qualities which are indispensable to membership in society, and no form of association exists into which men can enter without sacrificing personal liberty. Nevertheless, the utilities of association are so manifold and decisive that the formation of society was a winning expedient in the art of living. Brotherly love has nothing to do with early association; men quarreled and fought unless they were too broken or too cowardly. Only under civilization does the individual get away from violence; societies have not yet got away. Hostility and war are as primordial as poverty. Peace is not a natural boon, but a benefit to be striven for.

Hunger, love, vanity, and fear are the socializing forces, for they are the stimuli that drove men into society and held them there. Those who developed association were the fit, and by their survival it prevailed. These socializing forces are also the war-forces; actually they are what impel men to action of any kind. Hunger is a long wave, imperative as no other force is. Problems of self-maintenance are very near to reality, and this is why adjustment of maintenance-ways is quicker and surer than adjustment of those belonging to self-gratification, marriage, or religion. Sex-love is, compared with hunger, unsteady, transitory, and violent. It is essentially a passing thing, and no enduring human relationships have been formed upon it alone. Out of hunger develop the maintenance organizations of society, including the industrial, and out of love come the fundamental organizations of marriage and the family. Human society may then be defined as a group of human beings living in a cooperative effort to win subsistence and to perpetuate the species. But there are other human activities above those of maintenance which are not due to sex-love or ghost-fear. Such activities minister to self-gratification, and the impulses behind them are vanity and the desire for pleasure.

Vanity and the desire for pleasure have not resulted in massive institutions such as property, government, or religion, but they are significant and important. To vanity is attributed war for glory, ornamentation, and much of ceremonial—whatever aims at the display of superiorities in the individual or the group. Art falls into this group, as well as various other forms of catering to the senses, reducing boredom, and making life more interesting. Although such impulses are not indispensable to society's maintenance or perpetuation they are very strong and men may come to the point of overlooking necessities in the search for luxuries. However, the development of activities of self-gratification depends upon an earlier development of the maintenance-organization, for existence has to be assured before people can play or practice ostentation very much.

Ghost-fear is like vanity, a typically human product depending upon association; it becomes a socializing force, for it holds men together; it is not so primordial as hunger and love, for it cannot be explained by physiology. The fear of the supernatural causes men to develop joint methods of confronting the supernatural menace, and these seem at times the strongest influence in the life of society, but each of the four great forces is likely to appear strongest when it is being intensively studied.

Proceeding from this basis in human impulses "The Science of Society" is divided into sections on self-maintenance, self-perpetuation, and self-gratification. Organization for self-maintenance appears the most complicated and important, being based upon hunger and fear and resulting in industrial organization, property, regulative organization, and religion. Self-perpetuation is of course concerned with marriage and the family, and self-gratification comprises a variety of uncoordinated forms of activity.

It is to be regretted that where so much is excellent the chapter on sex-specialization in labor should be filled with such twaddle. That the Greeks derived hysteria from the word meaning uterus is no excuse for our ignorantly continuing such an association of ideas. To say that "the female nervous system is less stable than the male, being more affectable and susceptible to neurasthenia, hallucinations, hypnotic influences, and hysteria," is almost as funny as to say that "one sex acts under high pressure, the other under low pressure; one revolts at monotony, the other takes naturally to routine; one shows a restless pursuit of the new and untried, the other an 'organic conservatism.' " The chapter reads as though it might have been written twenty-five years ago, when such generalizations were in better odor among scientists than they are in these later skeptical days.

This first volume of the "Science of Society" carries the study through capital, property, and appropriation of energies of fire, animals, and men, through war-groups and usages, development of government, class distinctions, group-control, and the antecedents of the state. The volume next to follow will be concerned entirely with religion, beginning with the very fruitful concept of the aleatory or "luck" element in human life. So far as the present volume goes we can see developing a carefully thought out, coherent, and useful system for inventorying the activities of society. It lacks inevitably the magic of the "Folkways", which is one of America's truly great books, but it is a real achievement in coordination and analysis. Whether the entire work will advance sociology as a science is a question not to be answered at this stage. The probabilities seem against it.

LORINE PRUETTE

Rimbaud

La Vie Aventureuse de Jean-Arthur Rimbaud. Par Jean-Marie Carré. Paris: Librairie Plon.

"WE only know what we have made: the mind gathers knowledge only in the act of creation," said an Italian philosopher, and this aphorism might well stand as a blazon for the poetry of Jean-Arthur Rimbaud. He was keen, cerebral, wilful, and he came to know the world because he created it afresh each time in his poems. He was bold, experimental, cross-grained—fumiste reussi, successful charlatan, was the summary epithet bestowed upon him by François Coppée. And yet, in the light of what has happened since his death in the realm of French poetry, he belongs undoubtedly in the front rank. For first-rate poetry dies a curious kind of death, but it dies into something new, overshadowing, and strange, and alchemizes, as it is itself in part altered by, the spirit of man brooding upon it. The great poem is never finished. It lives, perhaps, because it is always drawing collaborators to itself, and these collaborators are its audience from age to age.

The present biography, although it starts out to be a novel, tries as it goes along to deal suggestively with the centrifugal chaos of the poet's life which ultimately became order—a perverse sort of order, it is true—in his poetry. Miss Lowell, it will be remembered, attempted to do something along this line for Keats; M. Carré is more detached, and there is no macula of contemporary fashion in his method. Rimbaud led a pugnacious, varicolored, free-lance existence, but if you examine it you will find that it was really harmonious with himself and amazingly cool-blooded. Unparalleled in the history of genius is his evolution from a precocious lad of sixteen, writing what may be called poetic dynamite, to the Eastern traveler, colporteur, soldier of fortune who subdued African natives, crossed deserts, and at last died, lonely, tended only by his sister, in Marseilles. He died in the arms of the church he had loathed and despised.

Rimbaud was born in Charleville in 1854. He was educated in the Catholic schools of the town. The most formidable ally of his youthful dreams and aspirations was his teacher, Izambard, who was a republican. Rimbaud imbibed the principles of republicanism from him. He became ferocious in his hatred of the church and used to chalk up on the church-door on Sunday mornings, just before the end of service, "Mort à Dieu!" He wrote feverishly. His earliest poems show a most astonishing gift for rabid imagery and a sense of rhythm that is harsh, and iconoclastic, but quite in keeping with the motion of his perturbed spirit. After the siege of Paris he sold his watch and bought a ticket for the capital. He made the acquaintance of André Gill, the caricaturist, slept on benches, on the quays, under bridges. On a second trip he met Banville, Gautier, and, above all, Verlaine, who was his most fervent admirer and—to put it mildly—his most sentimental friend. Upon the occasion of his first official appearance at a literary dinner he created a scandal by stabbing a fellow-writer with Verlaine's sword-cane. Later, he met Hugo, who could not deny the impulse to utter another immortal phrase: "C'est Shakespeare enfant." A little later Anatole France wrote: "We learned with surprise that a new Villon had come among us."

Oddly enough, although Rimbaud had the most profound influence on both the life and work of Verlaine (deranging the former and enriching most phenomenally the latter), Verlaine, on his part, wielded absolutely no power over his younger friend. Verlaine was an incurable sentimentalist, feeble and lachrymose, whereas, troubled in his own spirit and searching it drastically for crime, sickness, knowledge, and superhuman strength, Rimbaud appeared in all outward things self-centered, wilful, penetrating, and remorseless almost to the point of inhumanity. He had a baiting scorn for the diligent plodder, who, as he once put it, starts out from the horizon which has long been exhausted by the first-rate imaginative artist.

Both "Bateau Ivre" and "Saison d'Enfer" attest the sort of purgation which comes only from some deep inner experience. There can be no doubt of this. Audacious, impudent, incoherent at times, rich to excess, Rimbaud yet writes "poetic autobiography"; in "Saison d'Enfer" the prose is alive and burning. He was "ingenious," too, as has been frequently charged, and it is undeniable that he was touched with the malady of what has been called "ingeniosité ordurière." But there was also that in his spirit which could offset the unsavory details of his tumultuous life.

PIERRE LOVING

France by a Journalist

France. By Sisley Huddleston. The Modern World Series. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

N the nature of Gaul Strabo saw proof of divine providence, and Sisley Huddleston, examining the same thing at this later date, also finds himself convinced of something or other —exactly what it is is difficult to ascertain. In his desperate impersonation of Jekyll and Hyde, however, he does succeed in confirming a suspicion that the inkstained eyewitness is no historian.

The book is divided into three parts: to the Second Empire, from Napoleon III to the World War, and from 1914 to the present day. It is difficult to understand how the writer of the latter sections produced the first part. Book I, under the title The Making of National Unity, is analytical history which never approaches harmony with the burden of its title, while the following portions belong to the rapidly increasing "Mirrors" library and are a valuable acquisition by that collection.

The Making of National Unity lurches forward with all the dramatic intensity of "The World Almanac," concessions being made, in form, to those of us who prefer their statistics in prose. We read: "In Algeria are nearly six million persons; in Tunisia two millions; in Morocco four and a half millions. . . ." And so on for a paragraph. However much effort one puts into the reading of these pages they refuse to live—perhaps it was not intended that they should—and yet they are slapped together in such a way that they are useless for reference. We are offered the scent of a topic and follow it a while only to be jerked off at a tangent and asked to peer through the gloom at something else. Dates, instead of being used as pins to tack the whole in place, are juggled back and forth, used for decoration, and repeated until they lose all significance. That the facts are painfully correct only adds to the pity of it all.

We thought that Bagehot, for one, had traced the connective tissue of history and shown that all civilizations must run their infancy, childhood, and adolescence in proper order; finally developing into something rather remote from the heart's desire. Attacked by periodic illness they recover to gain additional strength or are left permanently scarred. "L'histoire des peuples est une échelle de misère dont les révolutions forment les différentes degrés" was how Chateaubriand summed it up. In God's good time the feudal rash breaks out and is scratched till it irritates. A few generations and it has concentrated in the great purple boil of royalty which, in time, is pricked for the good of the constitution and the general health of the body politic. And so on. . . . We thought all this was recognized, and yet here is Sisley Huddleston gaping in amazement when he finds traces of it in the history of his beloved France—the acknowledged prototype.

Is it fitting, in this day, to adopt the feigned surprise of a conjurer in pointing out that without Julius Caesar the France of today would be something else, that feudalism as a means to an end justified itself, or that Louis XIV really served a purpose? Le Roi Soleil, in forging the tool which sharpened the point of Sieyès's "L'état c'est nous" alone, vindicated himself completely.

How obviously the inconsistency of the contemporary stands out! How forbidding are individual trees in the modern end of the forest! We are told that from time to time in the story of France the call has been for a Man. In the glorious days gone by we find that some obliging, if sometimes inadequate, individual graciously responded; Henri IV, Richelieu, and Napoleon among others. If this has been so why scorn the possibility that the present day will produce a similar article to satisfy insistent demands? If France is not decadent —the which he insists—why is it so absurd for her to howl now for a Judge Landis?

Thus till times within the ken of living man. Here Mr. Huddleston is on his chosen ground as eyewitness, journalist, and gossip, and he satisfies. His thumbnail sketches of contemporary Frenchmen are worth the first two hundred pages and more. When "I write with personal knowledge, for my duties took me to France and kept me there in an exceptional post of observation . . . " he scores on every page and we feel that we are in the midst of it all. With him we rub shoulders with statesmen, politicians, musicians, artists, and writers and feel with him that that company offers good reasons for high hopes.

THOMAS COMPTON

Love and Work

Red Love. By Alexandra Kollontai. The Seven Arts Publishing Company. $2.50.

THIS is the eternal tragedy of the triangle with a Soviet Russian dressing. The modern Bolshevik background with the emerging new woman against it adds interest to what might otherwise have been only another novel.

Vassilisa is a young active Communist. In the early days of the revolution she falls in love with Volodya, a sparkling "American" anarchist, who has made peace with the Soviets and works for them. Theirs is the love born of broad mutual interest, of intense common labors, and, last and least, of sex. Vassilisa is a woman, but so devoted to the cause as to have no time and energy to be the woman Volodya needs. Periods of geographical separation intervene. He has "affairs." She is always the comrade and friend; sometimes the wife. But he loves Nina Constantinova, the very reverse of Vassilisa, amorous, bourgeois, unsocial, selfish, luxury-loving. For a period Volodya, who has become the well-paid and quite un-Communistic Soviet business manager, lives on with Vassilisa but loves Nina. Vasya suspects, then knows, and is jealous. (Communism hasn't changed such matters yet.) Vasya goes back to her own provincial town. She discovers that she is pregnant, is glad, and decides to bring up the child herself with the aid of the state. Vasya, absorbed in her party work, discovers now that the bond of affection with Volodya is broken and, convinced that under such circumstances she has no claim on him—not even to support her baby—she writes in the true bigness of her spirit to Nina giving her benediction to the marriage of her former husband to his former mistress.

This is all very good, but I don't get the point. Judged as a literary production, "Red Love" surpasses expectations. There is some really fine writing in it which the translation has not spoiled. But why did Kollontai print such a thing? The most revolutionary doctrine she preaches is that of voluntarily giving up one's partner in marriage when love has disappeared. Of course, Kollontai has a philosophy of sexual relations which comes better to view in the original Russian "Love of Working Bees," where one finds the present story with two shorter ones. This philosophy is brought out somewhat too generally in a foreword—actually a postscript sent in from Mexico City. Love and family, Kollontai argues—and as one of Europe's leading feminists she merits as much attention as any suffragette—are sideshows in a man's life. He is judged by his job. The ambassadress advocates the same measuring-rod for women. A woman ought to be considered "good" or "bad" not because she does or does not conform to a certain set of bourgeois morals but according to whether she serves humanity and society. There is a life for women outside the kitchen and nursery and beyond love. Fine. But Kollontai has presented a bad illustration, for Vasya loves less the more she works. It need not be so.

LOUIS FISCHER

Popular Race Science

The Pulse of Progress. By Ellsworth Huntington. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

MR. HUNTINGTON assists, through innumerous books and magazine articles, in educating the mind of Demos by means of the popularization of science. Here he writes on migrations, farms and cities, nomads, weather and civilization, the effect of climate on history and on racial temperament, the fact of the social suicide of Russia, and the manner in which races are created and perpetuated; and finally he gives a résumé of all Jewish history, a sort of Haldeman-Julius size Graetz, with the addenda of biologic, geographic, and anthropologic footnotes. "The one thing at which we have aimed has been to give an example of how geography, migrations, and racial selection combine with genius, sociology, politics, religion, and other phases of human culture in explaining human history. Only by combining all these factors with even-handed impartiality can we understand the true philosophy of history."

Yet with all Mr. Huntington's large intention his understanding of the true philosophy of history is not, one suspects, always come at with quite the even-handed impartiality that he suggests. He makes it easy for himself, for instance, by assuming without controversy the superiority of the dominant white civilizations. The increasing complexity of mechanical inventions is equally taken for granted as the criterion of progress. His analysis of Russia's "suicide" is based on the tale of the two million executed—the flower of the country—and the more than two million that have fled the land since the war. This credulous acceptance of the statistics of the London Times as basis for a sociological study is, for a scientist of Mr. Huntington's repute, not quite good enough. Nor his hypothetical selection of four racial groups who are to be dumped on equal terms in the plains of northwestern Argentina —used evidently as a poser to prove that the London-bred Englishman will demonstrate his inherited racial superiority by coming out on top.

In spite of Mr. Huntington's predilection for the tool-making, inventive male Nordic he confesses also to a fervent pro-Semitism—a psychic mechanism so rarely found that its analysis might prove of value. Mr. Huntington's Jewish chapters are the outgrowth of some talks given to Sunday-school teachers on the geography of Palestine. The geographer believes that the Jews are the greatest of all races and that they have become so by a process of rigid racial selection. According to Mr. Huntington, the Jewish Jews have from the beginning remained within the fold and have bred toward the religious temperament, attracting to their number non-Jews of a like temperament; the non-Jewish Jews—such perhaps as Heine, Marx, Felix Adler—have left. Just what Mr. Huntington would do, on this theory, with the streams of racial infiltration acquired through the spoliation of the Jewish women I do not know. Again on the basis of selection the author explains the supposed change from the ancient militaristic Jewish spirit to the passive and commercial one that has obtained during the Christian epoch. This radical divergence has been occasioned, says Mr. Huntington, by the fact that the Jews who were the fighters managed, by the very fact of their aggressiveness, to get themselves killed, whereas the ones who were not, emigrated and raised families. Surely this ought to be a simple enough explanation for anyone determined to apply the natural-selection theory to races.

Mr. Huntington gives a chapter to the "evolution of racial character." Those who question the existence of biological differences in the mentality of races he dismisses with the statement that they are "a relatively small group of scientific men, especially those who belong to races that are not dominant." This thrust—despite Palestine!—is evidently meant for Boas, Goldenweiser, Fishberg, Sapir, and some others. What, however, will Mr. Huntington do with Woodworth, Ripley, Haddon, Thomas? For these men, whatever their differences, agree in their skepticism as to "race types" and "race culture"; are wary, in view of the relatively small amount of verified data, of any sweeping generalizations on race; and are inclined to emphasize other factors.

FLORENCE KIPER FRANK

A New World of Science

La Plasmogenia. By Alfonso L. Herrera. Barcelona: Casa Editorial Maucci.

DR. A. L. HERRERA, head of the Administration of Biological Studies of the Mexican Government, is the Columbus of a new world. For twenty-six years or more he has been working on the problem of the origin of life, his researches culminating in the experimental production of artificial cells which display nearly all the salient characteristics of living protozoa. To the system or department of science resulting from these experiments he has given the name plasmogeny, and in his latest work—an impressive and beautifully illustrated volume of over four hundred pages—has developed it to cover its ramifications in almost every department of thought.

Postulating a "protobial realm" between the organic and the inorganic, a region in which life, given the necessary conditions, will arise from the non-living, Dr. Herrera traces the evolution of all living beings backward to the original stuff of the universe. This he calls the ether, and here lies the chief weakness of his scheme; in physics he is not so firmly grounded as in biology, and his estimate of the theory of relativity and its effect on the ether theory takes too little account of the actualities of the case. He seizes eagerly on the anti-Einsteinian results of the recent experiments of Professor Dayton Miller, whereas still more recent researches tend to confirm Einstein and to render the ether of the older physicists unnecessary. Moreover, Dr. Herrera's entire system could as easily be built up without the luminiferous ether as with it.

It is a fascinating story he tells as he relates plasmogeny to organic, inorganic, and biological chemistry; to cytology, histology, physiology, mineralogy, botany, and biology. In astronomy, as in physics, the conclusions are clouded by the dependence on a material ether. But the fine flower of the author's achievement blooms in his account of the philosophical and sociological aspects of his theory. It may easily be seen that a system which makes all life an unbroken chain must demand a complete revision not only of cosmology and the other material sciences but even more of our religious, philosophical, and social viewpoints. Thoroughly free from mystical prepossessions or supernatural atavisms, and heartily in accord with the forces seeking to civilize our so-called civilization, Dr. Herrera provides a scientific background and justification for those among us who dream of a world in which mutual aid will be the activating power.

There is nothing dogmatic about Dr. Herrera's assertions or speculations; he is thoroughly the scientist, presenting what he has discovered, drawing the logical conclusions, and offering the whole for the consideration of thinking men and women. These strange beings of his, compounds of common chemicals under simple, easily repeatable conditions, which grow, exhibit irritability, and reproduce, like the lowest order of living animals, challenge the world. The museum in his charge in Mexico City contains the only complete exhibit of them, but his results have been photographed and described many times, in several languages, by himself and others. They cannot be dismissed with a wave of the hand; they exist, anyone can create them, and their creation is based upon years of study and research by a thoroughly trained and competent scientist. They must be explained—or accepted.

"La Plasmogenia" has not yet been translated into English, though it should be. But for the reader of Spanish—and one reader none too well grounded in that tongue can testify that its Spanish is clear and simple—here is one of the most fascinating volumes yet presented to the inquiring and receptive mind.

MAYNARD SHIPLEY

Books in Brief

I, the Jew. By Maurice Samuel. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

It will be recalled that Mr. Samuel not so long ago published a violent polemic, "You Gentiles," in which he attacked the Jewish Problem and the relationship between Jew and Gentile in bitter and uncompromising terms and with little regard for the polite amenities of the cult of the brotherhood of man. He declared that Jew and Gentile constituted races apart and lived in two mutually exclusive worlds. The tone of the book was such that a posse comitatus of anxious Jews and Gentiles organized to take Mr. Samuel in hand. His fantastic thesis was ridiculed as in plain contradiction of common sense, but as, above all, counter to all the implications of science. Mr. Samuel now comes forward with a sequel purporting to be a history of the evolution of his ideas. He is at pains to explain that he pursued the scientific ideal for a good many years but had to abandon it for his soul's salvation. In short, he gave science its chance. Yet he finally had to conclude not only that science is a poor guide through the problems of race and heredity and environment but that its importance in general is vastly overestimated. He offers an elaborate theory that life is full of "mysteries" and that these mysteries are from their very natures insoluble. Among them presumably is the growth and decay of cultures and the survival of the Jewish people. It is to be hoped that Mr. Samuel, now having rationalized his irrationalism, to at least his own satisfaction, will rest content. Others have loved the Jewish people, but Mr. Samuel is singular in the respect that he had to abjure science to do so.

Roman Architecture. By G. T. Rivoira. Oxford University Press. $35.

The Oxford University Press has again put us all in its debt by making available, for the first time in English, the late G. T. Rivoira's monumental work on Roman architecture. Surely, there are few books in which intensive knowledge so triumphantly emerges from the fog of a literary style severe to the point of baldness, or from the haze of purely technical information that, handled less surely, would have been staggering. It is as if there were behind the writing of this book a passionate fire—not the fire of emotional or poetic inspiration but a kindred brilliance and heat of archaeological curiosity. Rivoira strips Roman architecture to its starkest skeleton. Not a word is here of Roman decoration, carving, painting; only Roman construction, Roman masonry bonds, brick stamps, vaulting methods, and in particular Roman domes. And as the history of a growing skill in masonry-vault technique unfolds in magnificent illustration and bald, crude language, it grows somehow itself exciting, takes on an epic quality, the story of man's conquest of a new kingdom. Yet Rivoira is not always to be believed uncritically. Behind his learning is a parti-pris, behind his archaeological passion the passion of the missionary. His knowledge is the servant of his ideals, his dreams; his dreams and his ideals are a confused shouting of the names Rome and Italy, Italy and Rome; no other part of the world shall be allowed credit for inventiveness; no province except an Italian province ever taught Rome. His is a learning arrogant with the same modernistic nationalism that has inspired D'Annunzio's later life.

History of the Origin and Establishment of the Inquisition in Portugal. By Alexandre Herculano. Translated by John C. Branner. Stanford University Press.

Alexandre Herculano, native of Lisbon, enjoys an enviable reputation as a scholar in his own country. His treatise on the Portuguese Inquisition was first printed in 1852 in three volumes. It clearly demonstrates that the Holy Office was introduced into Portugal in 1532 largely in order that the fanatical King João III might have an effective instrument at hand with which to wring moneys from the Jews. It tells the unedifying story of the bitter struggle which ensued between the King and the Pope over the control of the Inquisition—a struggle which terminated in 1547 by the firm establishment of the dread tribunal under royal control and without restrictions. No less scathing than Lea's is Herculano's verdict upon the Iberian Inquisition as "the most atrocious, most anti-Christian institution that human wickedness could invent." The translator has rendered the cumbrous Portuguese into readable English. Students of Hispanic history will welcome this substantial addition to the scanty literature in English concerning Portugal.

The Main Stream. By Stuart Sherman. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

The last collection of critical essays by the late editor of Books, this volume shows that Mr. Sherman was continuing his vigorous and sensitive search for ground in American life and letters upon which he could stand. That he has not found it does not prevent these essays from being rich with the critical character he had for years been forming.

The Feast of the Cannibals. By Barukh Jonas. Maumee, Ohio: The Author. $2.

Mr. Jonas, who blue-prints his books and sells them himself, insists here, as everywhere throughout his work, upon the importance of the intellect in the affairs of man. He looks about him and finds very little mind being used, and so in his satire takes the hide off humanity for what he considers its own good. He is a direct and stimulating writer who seasons his amateur discourse with much true salt.

Drama

Summary—II

IN all probability the future of the theater belongs to some form of drama capable of appealing to the imagination with a greater force than is possible within the limits of the realistic form. Ibsen, Hauptmann, Shaw, and their contemporaries seem to have come nearer to exhausting the possibilities of the expository play than either they or their earliest admirers supposed, and it is a significant fact that no successor has equaled them. No dramatist who has emerged since their appearance could possibly be called better except in so far as he was radically different, and that fact alone is sufficient to suggest that the form received in their hands its highest possible development. Shaw himself has told us how the first touches of realism which he saw in the London theater produced in him a sense of elation, and many others could testify that when naturalism was new it had, paradoxically enough, a certain air of romantic daring which made things glamorous for the very reason that no factitious glamor was permitted to invest them. But the theater at its best is capable of more than a mere literal fidelity to life and a mere intellectual integrity. Realism does not utilize those capacities for producing illusion which constitute the theater's chief claim to consideration as a separate art; it does not provide either the actor, the director, or the designer with his most fruitful opportunities; and it may well be that future students will look back upon it as something whose chief value consisted in a certain discipline which it exercised. Thanks to it the shabby, shopworn imbecilities of the nineteenth-century drama were replaced by something which was at least entitled to intellectual respect, and the theater could once more be regarded as a possible medium for artistic expression. But only rarely, since that rehabilitation, has it risen to the heights of which it is capable, even though in the plays of O'Neill as well as in certain productions, notably those of the Theater Guild and the Neighborhood Playhouse, there have been moments which make not wholly absurd the hope that we may some day have here a dramatic art comparable in amplitude and sweep to that of the Elizabethans or the Greeks.

During the season just past we have not had either a play from O'Neill or any production equal in poetic richness to "The Dybbuk." Franz Werfel's "Juarez and Maximilian," performed by the Theater Guild Company, and "The Witch," translated by John Masefield from the Norwegian and played briefly at the Greenwich Village Theater, stand out as the two plays of the year having the largest appeal to the imagination; but neither is supremely great or entirely satisfactory, and the extent to which we must still depend upon realistic pictures of contemporary life for the majority of our more profitable evenings in the theater is illustrated by the fact that the two most completely realized efforts at playwriting which the season revealed were Maxwell Anderson's "Saturday's Children" and Sidney Howard's "The Silver Cord."

Both might be easily belittled from the standpoint of either the protagonist of imaginative drama or the more exacting even though friendly critic of the realistic school. Both deal in a fashion primarily argumentative with a contemporary social problem, and both reveal traces of a facile, shallow technique learned in the Broadway show-shops; but both are nevertheless fundamentally honest and thoroughly shrewd so far as the larger issues are concerned. Mr. Howard's study of the effect of a pathological "mother-love" upon two young men is perhaps the most successful attempt yet made to use Freudian psychology as the basis for the exposition of character, and Mr. Anderson's sympathetic picture of the attitude of sophisticated youth vis-a-vis with marriage is singularly free from any kind of cant. Though both deal with large problems both lack that largeness of effect which only imaginative works of a different order can have and which therefore plays written within the limits of such realism must inevitably lack. Yet in the absence of fully developed drama of a different kind they are the plays which might understandably be called the "best" of the season.

India and China

By D. N. BANNERJEA

IN March, 1927, Lord Irwin, the Viceroy of India, disallowed, in the exercise of his prerogative under the Government of India Act of 1921, the moving in the Indian Legislative Assembly of a Swarajist resolution on China. The resolution asked that Indian soldiers shall not be called upon to fight the Chinese on their own territory, and that the Government shall not thus seek for armed intervention in the internal affairs of a country striving to put its house in order. Apprehensions were also entertained in political circles in India that apart from the violation of Chinese neutrality implied in the dispatch of troops, the Indian Exchequer might be burdened with the cost of what in well-informed quarters is regarded as an unwarranted aggression. Fears have since been allayed by Lord Winterton's declaration in the House of Commons, in answer to the questions put by Labor M.P.'s, that no part of the expenditure incurred by the movement of the Indian army would be charged to Indian revenues.

Large sections of public opinion are inclined to believe, however, that the saving of expenditure does not and cannot atone for India's loss of honor. For what indignity, they all point out, can be more humiliating than to be compelled to mobilize the soldiers of the country against a people with whom we have no direct or indirect ground of controversy? And it is idle for the Government of India to pretend that they are unaware of a new spirit abroad in the East.

We are fully aware that the Imperialist may retort that troops are being sent to protect the life and property of British and Indian nationals in the International Settlements and not to wage war with the Chinese people. Our reply is that the same plausible reasons were given on previous occasions when the task of "protection" quickly degenerated into massacres of the Chinese, mulcting of their territory, and loot of their valuable property. Nor are we aware that any Indian merchants and business men have asked for the protection of troops. We run great risks in sending armies to the soil of another country. Trivial incidents or minor provocations on either side may unloose the flood-gates of passion and call out the vilest instincts which in the course of wars disfigure the annals of history.

The ideas and sentiments embodied in the Swarajist resolution were not the claptrap of political rowdyism as certain London papers tried to make out. On the contrary, they reflected a great deal of political sanity and of sympathy with the arduous struggles of the Chinese people for independence and national sovereignty. Nor let us forget that in all the indefensible opium wars against China, in the course of which concession after concession was wrung from the country at the point of the bayonet, Indian troops have invariably been employed by Great Britain for the promotion of her imperial ambitions in that unfortunate land. The capture of Hongkong, the annexing of Weihaiwei, "the International Settlements of Hankow and Shanghai" were all effected by the assistance of Indian soldiers.

Stripped of all diplomatic verbiage this means that the citizens of a country herself in a state of tutelage have been compelled to fight at the bidding of England to destroy the freedom of other countries with which India has had no direct ground of dispute. Such a process might have been tolerated when the flame of nationality burned low in India, but with the growing realization of political nationality there the attempts to use her troops beyond her borders will continue to be bitterly resented. India's intellectuals have lost all sympathy from countries which her soldiers have been called upon to subjugate or overawe at the instance of Great Britain.

But it is not only the emphatic repudiation of imperial adventures and armed intervention in the affairs of another country that is being energetically voiced in Indian political circles today. There are more fundamental and valid grounds of protest. In the first place there is a widespread opposition and revolt against the hegemony of European nations over Eastern countries, and for this reason the vicissitudes of the Chinese struggles are being watched with breathless interest all over the Orient. This interest is being enhanced and is gathering momentum because of the universal desire among the self-conscious elements in subject nationalities to rid themselves of what Mr. Asquith called "the intolerable degradation of a foreign yoke."

India is not alone in assuming a critical attitude toward the dispatch of troops to China. Japan has protested against the billeting of British troops in certain areas in Shanghai. The British Labor Party has denounced the policy of their own Government. Lord Parmoor has been suggesting a recourse to the League of Nations, on whose Council sits a Chinese delegate. If the Pekingese delegate has not proper credentials, another could be appointed who might be an authorized spokesman for his people.

The distinctive and essential elements in the Chinese struggles for unity and independence are not only the desire for the establishment of a central government with plenary authority but the abolition of all foreign privileges and control in their territory in the shape of capitulations and extraterritorial rights. The Chinese struggle for the abolition of these rights is being watched with a great deal of interest in Egypt and India. In Egypt, after the grant of partial independence, foreign European residents pay no taxes, though they have built up considerable fortunes in Cairo and Alexandria; they enjoy all the benefits of citizenship and in legal proceedings are tried by their own consular courts or by mixed tribunals.

In India public men are deported or interned for long periods without charge or trial under Regulation III of 1818 and other archaic repressive measures legalized by the passing of emergency acts. And yet if a single Englishman of the commercial or professional community were deported or interned without the aid of counsel and without a public trial, the agitation which would follow might threaten to shake the foundations of British rule in that country. The reason consists in the assumption that laws are to be administered in one way for the Oriental and in a radically different manner for privileged European oligarchies destined by high heaven to wield the scepter in the East. Speaking from his place in the Legislative Assembly in March, 1926, Pandit Motilal Nehru, the leader of the Swarajist Party, pointed out that "some of the noblest sons of India had been shut up in jails" without charge or trial. The reference was to political prisoners interned in the Mandalay Jail on police suspicion. These were originally 120. Some have gone mad, a few died in prison, others have been released to be kept under police surveillance, while a great many still lie interned, including the chief executive officer of the Calcutta cooperative. This gentleman, an honor graduate of Cambridge, has since been returned unopposed to the Legislative Assembly. Still the Government declines to release him, though the Swarajists have charged the Government with the violation of privilege in keeping him away from his place in the Assembly. Pandit Nehru warned the Government that unless it took great care it would find the whole country honeycombed with secret societies. On the conclusion of his speech he walked out of the Assembly with all his followers.

On this occasion, as on previous ones, the Government argued that a state of emergency existed analogous to a state of siege, when constitutional guaranties, Magna Charta, and the writ of habeas corpus must be suspended. The difference between the official point of view and the standpoint of all the political parties on this question is absolute. But these debates and discussions, the assertion of rights and demands for the redress of grievances are only incidents in the formulation of the demand for autonomy and self-determination. The days of foreign rule in Eastern lands are numbered. Imperialism has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. Only time is needed to seal its doom.

There is not the shadow of a doubt that the passive resistance and non-cooperation movement of Mahatma Gandhi had appreciable repercussions in China. And happenings in China are galvanizing hopes and aspirations in India, as they have done ever since the downfall of the Manchu dynasty. One has only to read the Indian newspapers as they comment on the advance of the Cantonese and on the program of the people's party to realize how pervasive this influence is. One has only to pass through the bazaars and market-places to hear the scraps of conversation carried on even by the uneducated. The burden of the subject is the same, a lively interest in the struggles of an Eastern neighbor for emancipation, social, political, and economic.

But what will happen in the event of a military intervention by the great Powers in China? The answer is quite simple. Not only will such an ill-starred attempt serve to unite the Pekingese and the Cantonese, but it will undoubtedly fan into a flame the smoldering fires of discontent in India. Such a policy will be interpreted as an attempt to continue that ascendancy over the internal and external affairs of Oriental countries which is becoming, in an increasing measure, intolerable to the Oriental consciousness.

Whatever the defects and shortcomings in the political ideals of Japan, the country has at least fought through to a recognized place in the comity of nations. With China and India politically stabilized and emancipated, there seems to be a high degree of probability that we shall have a real league of nations in the East, as Europe has a League of Nations in Geneva. Behind this cultural federation and this political alliance will be the desire for peace and development and not for war or aggression. We believe that prophecies of yellow peril will be proved to be only figments of the imagination. We also believe that freedom will contribute to the enriching of the cultures of the East, and that to an independent and adolescent East Europe and America will be welcome, not as masters but as friends.

An American "Subject" in China

THE letter, extracts from which are printed below, was written by an American resident of Shanghai and appeared in the British-owned and controlled North China Daily News. It is now being reprinted throughout China.

The following remarkable letter is by the head of an important American firm in Shanghai. While we withhold names, the sentiments expressed are undoubtedly shared by the overwhelming mass of Americans in China.—[Editor North China Daily News.]

As Americans doing business in this country creating a market for our goods, we had cause to expect protection in our legitimate pursuits, but we received a very severe shock when the present difficulty first became acute in China, and there was very evident necessity for protection and a request was made that troops be sent to protect our interests. In reply we were informed by the American Consulate that if it became necessary for Americans to evacuate China, the Government would provide transportation to either Japan or the Philippines.

Imagine for one moment our feelings; the United States Government, one of the greatest if not the greatest nation in the world telling her subjects [sic] that it might be necessary for us to evacuate China. What disposition did the officials at Washington expect us to make of our interests? Did they expect us to turn it over to a howling mob? This attitude on the part of our Government held us up to ridicule by the subjects of other Powers interested in this part of the world, and not until very urgent demands were made upon our Government for protection did we receive any assurance that same would be given. . . .

Later it was unofficially announced that Senator Borah and his followers were dictating a policy of non-interference in China, with the result the President and the Secretary of State were in a political deadlock with the Borah faction. It is very regrettable that Senator Borah is the senior Senator on the Foreign Ways and Means Committee [sic] for his policy and radical utterances are a serious menace to the people of the United States, and most especially to its manufacturing interests and manufacturers interested in foreign trade. . . . This individual should be banished from active political life back to his Idaho wheat ranch and for the remainder of his natural life. . . .

It is pitiful the lack of knowledge that our would-be statesmen have regarding affairs of the moment in China. Senator Borah and others have made such ridiculous statements about the unjust treaties existing between China and other Powers that the people of various parts of the world and more especially the United States, are led to believe that we are treating the Chinese unjustly and holding them down, preventing them from enjoying their national aspirations, which is so far from the facts, and the actual situation is directly contrary to these statements. Senator Borah may know how to run a wheat ranch in Idaho and talk its people into sending him back to the United States Senate year after year, but he knows absolutely nothing about Oriental affairs.

Great Britain now has in the neighborhood of 10,000 troops stationed in the city of Shanghai, and I assure you that the first contingent of Indian troops arrived here just in time, for there is no question but what this city would have been taken by the radical Reds, fostered by Red Russian agents. As an American with considerable interests here, I surely feel grateful to Great Britain for the protection which we enjoy, living in the settlement guarded by her soldiers. This is a very pitiful situation that subjects of the United States should have to depend upon protection by a foreign government.

SAFE IN SOUTH DAKOTA, the President dutifully set about his fishing and has been abundantly photographed. It must be considered good politics, or his publicity staff would have vetoed it. To our simple minds, however, it would seem that even a Presidential Izaak Walton might be permitted to wear a soft collar. The correspondents and the photographers agree that Calvin Coolidge fished in a stiff, starched collar, and in his office coat and vest. We understand that the Coolidge economy program is such that Senator Norbeck had to buy him horses and the poor State of South Dakota had to pay $10,000 for the private Presidential telegraph wire and $30,000 to get the lessees out of the President's hotel. The War Department, Frank Kent says, provides the Coolidge cars. Is there no State, Senator, or department willing to donate a Presidential khaki shirt?

IT IS A MISFORTUNE for the peace of Europe that the meeting of the Council of the League of Nations should have adjourned without taking any action as to the many French troops which are still garrisoned in the Rhineland—many more than the Germans maintained in their own garrisons prior to the war. It was one of the unformulated considerations of the Locarno pacts that these troops should be reduced or altogether taken away, but nothing has been done after a year and a half of the much-vaunted Locarno spirit. It is not merely that the presence of these troops is an affront to the peaceful people of this section, eight and one half years after the surrender; their being there not only gives rise constantly to most unhappy incidents, but it enormously handicaps the development of these communities which have to bear the burden of supplying quarters, brothels, barracks, parade-grounds, and target-ranges for the use of the troops. Germany has to pay for the upkeep of these forces, which further handicaps the recovery of the Reich and its power to pay indemnities under the Dawes Plan. At each meeting of the Council Herr Stresemann has begged for relief, but in vain. Once more he has had to return to Berlin empty-handed, which makes his position at home infinitely more difficult, as does Poincaré's attack upon Germany in his address at Lunéville—one of his old speeches charging bad faith on the part of the Germans. He acts as if he were trying to bring about the fall of Stresemann and the strengthening of the Nationalist and militarist crowd.

S. PARKER GILBERT, the Agent General for Reparations, has been so generous and just in his dealings with the German situation that one must take seriously the charge in his report of June 10, treating of the results of the first nine months of the third annuity year, that the increasing German governmental expense jeopardizes the execution of the Dawes Plan. While giving full credit to the German Government for good faith, he declares that German expenditures, including payments to states and communes, have risen sharply, that expenditures exceed revenues, and that only borrowed money balances the Reich's budget. At the same time he points out that the essential stability of the budget remains unimpaired, and reports a steady increase in the Reich's income despite the tax diminution. The budget for 1927-1928 calls for a total expenditure of 9,100,000,000 marks as compared with 7,200,000,000 in 1924-1925 and the military and naval budget has grown in four years from 458,000,000 to 700,000,000 marks. He emphasizes the fact that his warning is as much in the interest of the economic development of Germany itself as in that of the Dawes Plan. Private advices assure us that there is a wholesome improvement in the spirit of the whole German people of late. Anything that would check this would be a misfortune, and we trust that Mr. Gilbert's friendly warning will receive the immediate attention of the government of the Reich.

IRELAND IS STILL IRELAND. It's agin the government. The Free State elections gave 47 seats to the Cosgrave Government party, 44 to De Valera's Republicans, 22 to Thomas Johnson's Labor Party, 11 to the Farmers, 14 to members of three lesser parties, and 15 to out-and-out independents. Two-thirds of the members, however, are reckoned pro-treaty, and De Valera's followers may be counted out if they keep their word and refuse the oath of allegiance to the King without which they may not sit in the Dail. Mary MacSwiney's party, for which De Valera was too mild, almost disappeared. Ireland, plainly, is in a divided state of mind; as why should it not be? With the die-hards in the saddle in London, a majority for De Valera might well have meant a return to civil war; Michael Cosgrave's dictatorial methods have lost him the popularity which his real achievements might otherwise deserve; and the result is that the Irish voters have turned to independent-minded individuals. This of course makes it difficult to form a Government, but in the long run the new balance of power may give Free State politics a reality which they have hitherto lacked. One may admire the idealism of the Republicans and sympathize with their detestation of the imperial bond; in present circumstances Ireland needs their political cooperation.

SOUTH CAROLINA has come out for fundamentalism. With Governor Richards on the board of trustees, Winthrop College has removed from its faculty Professor William Garner Burgin because he has taught evolution in his classes. The Columbia (South Carolina) Record declares that the fight began in a trustees' meeting last February, when it was charged that Professor Burgin was an atheist. When he was discovered to have been a Baptist preacher in Pasadena and teacher there of a men's Bible class of 300 students, it became necessary to scratch around for other grounds for dismissal. Anonymous letters were sent to students asking for information on their professor's conduct:

> Do you know of . . . marks, teaching, or bad influence exerted by Mr. Burgin at Winthrop? If so will you send a letter stating these facts to Governor Richards, who is chairman of the board of trustees. . . . If you know any other girls who can give facts and stand by them, especially in regard to improper remarks to them on sex teaching, please have them write immediately by special delivery. Please do not mention this until after Tuesday. Gossip or hearsay will not do. Facts which girls could absolutely swear to, if necessary, are very important. . . .

It is a pleasure to record that to this scurrilous and underhand attack more than eighty students replied in the most forthright terms, completely repudiating the charges made against Professor Burgin and bitterly denouncing the letter and the method of sending it. Presumably, since he requested the answers, they went to Governor Richards. It is to be hoped he found them pleasant reading. At all events, he was not deterred from completing the removal of Professor Burgin, and he announced moreover that South Carolina was not going to tolerate in its schools any departure from the strictest adherence to Bible doctrine.

MANSLAUGHTER IS THE CHARGE of which two New Jersey State policemen have just been found guilty. These were the leaders in the midnight attack on the Meaney farmhouse in Ludlow in December, 1926, which resulted in the death of Beatrice Meaney and the crippling of her brother. We hope that this will be a lesson to the police. But they will still be armed "in order to preserve law and order in the community," and some of them will still discharge their firearms recklessly and disastrously, without stopping to investigate. The citizen without arms will suffer accordingly from this "protection" afforded him by the "law." The Meaney trouble arose out of the complaint made to the S. P. C. A. that the Meaneys were mistreating their cattle. Two agents went to investigate, accompanied by a constable. Meaney declared they did not state their errand, that he had a large sum of money on the premises, and that he ordered them off the place at the point of a shotgun. Evidently the police took this as a joyful summons to a battle. Trooper Larsen began hostilities by shooting Meaney in the knee and then went to summon reinforcements. When the engagement ended at dawn Beatrice Meaney was dying on the kitchen floor, James Meaney was wounded, and Timothy was rendered harmless by tear gas. The house was riddled with bullets. A handsome victory for the police, to be sure; the conviction of the two troopers is a handsomer victory for the public and the good name of New Jersey.

THOSE CHEERFUL SOULS who lay all our troubles to immigration will find little comfort in a report just issued by the Charity Organization Society of New York City. "Usually," the report reads, "the public assume that the foreign-born are our chief concern. Such people will be surprised to learn that of the foreign-born under our care only 5 per cent had been here less than five years. This disproves the idea that it is the most recent immigrant who needs help and guidance." This study was based on an examination of the 3,891 families aided, a majority comprising native-born whites. Despite our much-vaunted prosperity, 41 per cent were brought into the purview of the society by reason of lack of employment. The average weekly wage for the male head of the family was $27.49; for the woman worker only $12.94. Rents, it appears, are still increasing in the metropolis, for the average monthly rental proved to be $23.96. One by one the stock arguments against the immigrant are being disproved. That will not, however, affect those who are swayed wholly by passion and prejudice in this matter. Is not the chairman of the Immigration Committee of the House of Representatives declaring that within ten years no immigrant will be permitted to land in America?

THE PARDONING OF ANITA WHITNEY by Governor Young of California reflects the greatest credit upon that official. Convicted under the criminal-syndicalist act lately held constitutional by the federal Supreme Court, she, one of the most public-spirited women, faced a term in the penitentiary merely because of membership in the Communist Party, no overt act being charged against her. Governor Young rightly declares that the syndicalism act was intended to apply only to organizations planning violence or terrorism, and that there were abnormal conditions surrounding Miss Whitney's trial (the post-war hysteria). He also pardons her because all the evidence showed her law-abiding and opposed to all violence. We warmly congratulate the Governor and the State of California on this decision.

FOR ALL HIS IDLE THOUGHTS Jerome K. Jerome, who has just died in England at sixty-eight, was hardly an idle fellow. Railway clerk, actor, teacher, and stenographer before he turned to journalism, his first literary success was with American editions on which he received no royalties. In those days of copyright pirating it was possible for American publishers to take the entire profits from a sale of a million copies—such as Jerome's "Three Men in a Boat" had—without the author receiving a cent. Jerome was vastly more than a humorist, as "The Passing of the Third Floor Back" will recall; he was an eternally good-humored humorist, which is rare. He believed in a Quakerly Christianity (as that play showed), in the power of human character to awaken response in other human beings. So believing, he could not join the war-time crews of literary haters, and some of his finest later writing found expression in the Labor Party's New Leader. He had in him something of the rollicking spirit of the Mr. Dooley of a quarter century ago; and reform causes everywhere, always over-serious and alarmed, need such tolerant, undismayed foolers.

DR. HENRY P. WALCOTT'S RETIREMENT, because of age, from the Corporation of Harvard University, in which he has served for forty-seven years, must not pass unnoticed in these columns. A distinguished physician, Dr. Walcott became an Overseer of the College in 1887 and was appointed a Fellow in 1890. Twice during his long period of service, in 1900 and 1905, he was acting president of the university during long absences of President Eliot, whose devoted lieutenant he always was. A wise and far-sighted counselor, Dr. Walcott's modesty has prevented adequate appreciation of his devoted labors for the advancement of Harvard University and of university education everywhere. More than that, Dr. Walcott has been one of those great unofficial statesmen with whom America is blessed in richer measure than is generally understood. That appears from the fact that he is an ex-president of the Massachusetts Medical Society and the American Public Health Association, head of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and a trustee of the Carnegie Institution. Long chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Massachusetts General Hospital, he was also president of the International Congress on Hygiene and Demography in Washington in 1912. In addition, Dr. Walcott has rendered inestimable service to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts as chairman of its Board of Health—he has written portions of every annual report of this State board since 1882—and as chairman of the Metropolitan Water and Sewerage Board, which has done so much to beautify and sanitate the neighborhood of Boston and to supply pure water to the people. Fortunate are a university and a State which have had the services of such a citizen for so long a period.

The British Menace

THE bloodhounds are loose again. With Sir Austen Chamberlain, British Foreign Minister, cracking the whip, the dogs of intolerance are baying all around the world. Ernest Marshall, London correspondent of the New York Times, deserves the blue ribbon.

> The Moscow murderers [he writes] have put themselves beyond the pale. They have shown themselves to be the mad dogs of the world, whose extermination [sic] is a necessity for the well-being of the rest of the community.

ther correspondents and statesmen and near-statesmen elp in the same chorus. We seem, for the moment, to be ack in the howling days when every German was a baby-illing Hun, or in that post-war Silver Age when the Times nnounced the death of Lenin and a new Russian massacre breakfast every morning.

The Russians have had their own outburst of terrorism. heir nerves apparently frayed by the attacks upon them in eking, London, and Warsaw, and by Sir Austen's attempt unite Europe in a new crusade against them, they have one back to the time-honored Russian system of political ecution. Of course the Riga and London and Warsaw ories of wholesale executions are propaganda lies; but the facts admitted in Moscow are bad enough. Twenty Russians accused of various counter-revolutionary machinations —many of them of spying for the British officials in Russia —have paid the death penalty in Moscow and Leningrad, and there have been other executions in Odessa and elsewhere. Soviet Russia, after almost ten years' existence, ought to be beyond such Oriental methods.

But it would be amusing if it were not tragic to see the British Tories holding up their hands in horror, and their international propaganda army marching forth on a holy crusade of protest. It is not so long since British Tories cheered General Reginald Dyer, who gave the order that murdered 300 Hindus in the market-place of Amritsar; these same pious gentlemen cheered for joy when Chiang Kai-shek, without even the formality of a trial, butchered 300 Chinese Communists; they make every excuse for the obscene brutalities of Mussolini's Italian terrorism.

The effort to rouse the world to a new anti-Russian frenzy is, of course, just another chapter in the history of the British Empire. The Chinese Revolution has already damaged British prestige throughout the East; the thought of its possible effect upon India makes any imperialist shudder. And, since Britain dare not strike directly at the Chinese, for fear of rousing even greater disturbances, she strikes at the Russians, who have dared to sympathize with and aid the Chinese movement of national liberation. Hence the sensationally staged Arcos raid, the break in Anglo-Russian relations, Sir Austen's desperate effort at Geneva to convert the League into a new Holy Alliance, this time directed against revolutionary Russia as a century ago the monarchs united against revolutionary France.

Like the Russians whom they denounce for it—like all governments indeed—the holier-than-thou men of Britain lie and spy. In the House of Commons on May 30 Commander Kenworthy asked the Foreign Secretary whether any of the anti-Russian documents printed by the British Government were seized in the Peking raids. Sir Austen answered "No, sir." Mr. Kenworthy asked, then, how documents which passed between Moscow and Peking were obtained? Sir Austen declined to reply. "Are we to understand," Kenworthy persisted, "that that part of the Trade Agreement which referred to mutual abstention from propaganda and interference has been broken by His Majesty's Government?" Such an idea, Sir Austen said, was "absolutely contrary to the facts"; but Kenworthy asked: "If that is the case, how is it possible for communications passing between Russia and another foreign country to get into the hands of the right honorable gentleman without such interference?" "That is the question," came Sir Austen's weasel answer, "which I have respectfully declined to answer—and I again decline, on the grounds of public interest"—a virtual confession of guilt.

Such is the man—and the government—who denounces the Russians! Fortunately, this man's effort to persuade all Europe to join him in formal expression of moral indignation at Russian propaganda has met difficulties. France and Germany resisted it; Poland feared, naturally, that it would aggravate her strained relations with Russia. When British pressure was at its tensest M. Briand became opportunely ill. No one, so far as is reported, suggested a joint denunciation of Britain's anti-Russian propaganda. Yet the British have already killed the spirit of Locarno; even Mussolini has hardly done more to revive the war spirit in Europe than the die-hards of Tory England.

The Naval Proposals at Geneva

THE tripartite naval conference which began its sessions at Geneva on June 20 took a leaf out of the book of the Washington Conference and opened its program with definite proposals on the part of the American and British delegates. The United States offered to extend the 5-5-3 battleship ratio adopted at the Washington Conference for the United States, Great Britain, and Japan to cruisers, destroyers, and submarines, and to limit the cruiser tonnage to 250,000 or 300,000 for the United States and Great Britain and to 150,000 or 180,000 tons for Japan with 10,000 tons as the maximum per ship. For destroyers the offer is: 200,000 to 250,000 tons for America and England, and 120,000 to 150,000 for Japan. For submarines, the proposal is: 50,000 to 90,000 for the Anglo-Saxon countries, and 36,000 to 54,000 for Japan. Promptly W. C. Bridgeman, First Lord of the Admiralty, the spokesman for Great Britain, proposed that the future size of battleships be reduced from the present limit of 35,000 tons to 30,000 tons, the life of the battleships be increased from 20 to 26 years, and that the rights of the three Powers under the replacement tables agreed upon at Washington be waived. He also proposed limiting the size of all future cruisers to 7,500 tons and their armament to six-inch guns after an agreement is reached on the number of 10,000-ton cruisers which the Powers will build under the Washington agreement. The Japanese delegation made a straightforward proposal to this effect: "None of the conferring Powers shall, for such period of time as may be agreed upon, adopt new building programs or acquire ships for the purpose of increasing its naval strength," which is good as far as it goes, but merely prevents increased competition.

These seem to us good but timid proposals, so far from revolutionary that it would seem as if they should be accepted with only a few days of discussion. The American proposals contemplate the extension of the principle of the absolute parity of America and Great Britain on the sea, and the limitation of Japan to three-fifths of their respective fleets, so that there can be no question of any armament competition between these three Powers hereafter. Mr. Bridgeman's program goes further, in that it opens up the question of the Washington agreement and proposes its modification as noted above. That will undoubtedly be deplored; it is probably not wise to take up the Washington agreement in any way lest there be a reexamination, perhaps for the worse, of the rules there laid down. It is the more questionable because the other naval Powers which signed at Washington are not represented at Geneva, except that France and Italy have "observers" or "informers." There should be no excuse given to France or to Italy for disregarding the conclusions of the Washington Conference as Mussolini is already threatening to do. Again, Mr. Bridgeman's proposal of six-inch guns only for cruisers and their limitation of cruisers to 7,500 tons is bound to cause considerable outcry. Indeed, the mere suggestion of this limitation has already called forth from navy maniacs of the William H. Gardiner type emphatic protests and assertions that this is merely a clever trick on the part of Great Britain. Since she has the greatest fleet of merchantmen of 7,500 tons or more, and merchantmen cannot be armed with guns heavier than the six-inch, it is argued that she has everything to gain and nothing to lose by the decrease in cruiser size and by the use of six-inch guns. There will also be a protest against the proposal that the United States should scrap more tonnage than Great Britain and Japan. Secretary Wilbur has just assured the graduating class at the Pennsylvania Military College in advance of the publication of his superior's Geneva plans that there will be no further scrapping of American ships in consequence of an international agreement. Mr. Butler, chairman of the House Naval Committee, approved this disloyal sentiment.

For ourselves, we confess to disappointment that a program just outlined by Commander Kenworthy, himself a naval officer of distinction and a member of the British Parliament, was not offered by his countrymen at Geneva. He would stop the building of all kinds of battleships and proposes the reduction of the 10,000-ton limit for cruisers to 6,000 tons. Under the Treaty of Versailles no German cruiser may exceed this size—a fact which we fear has played some part in the decision of Mr. Bridgeman, or rather of the British Government, to suggest 7,500 tons for cruisers. We regret, too, that the United States did not lead off with a demand for the total abolition of all submarines instead of merely favoring it if all the nations agreed to it. We cannot believe that, if Japan, Great Britain, and the United States were to announce their willingness to do away with this vessel of war, an international agreement to that effect could not be obtained from all the other maritime Powers. An English expert, Arthur H. Pollen, writing in the American Foreign Affairs for July, declares that the submarine is useless and especially so against its main enemy, the battle fleet; hence he asks the two Anglo-Saxon countries to renounce both the submarine and torpedo.

We regret the absence of these more vigorous proposals at Geneva especially because English public sentiment has shown itself to be remarkably ready for far-reaching action to reduce her present naval burden, the Japanese delegates to Geneva seem to be in a better spirit even than they showed at Washington, and we believe our own countrymen to be ready for radical changes. None the less, on the principle that even a quarter of a loaf is better than no bread, we shall be thankful even if the American proposals alone are adopted. Many of our American radicals and liberals felt that the Washington Conference was a fraud and accomplished nothing but limiting the numbers of obsolete battleships. We have never shared that viewpoint and can cite the remarkable decrease in the familiar campaigns to stir up naval rivalry and fear between the United States and Japan as proof that the Washington Conference did bestow far-reaching benefits upon the world. Since then the navy maniacs have spent their time in portraying England to us as the enemy and in making such charges of trickery and deceit against out former ally as Mr. Gardiner has just voiced again. Along that road lies war, not disarmament or peace. We trust that public sentiment in America which seeks the limitation or the abolition of armaments will at once make itself felt and ask of our delegates and of President Coolidge who directs them that we go beyond our proposals and abolish the battleship, the submarine, the torpedo, and even the naval airplanes. The churches must now be heard if they desire worthwhile results at Geneva.

Musicians and Their Jobs

THREE recent happenings should help to dispel the pessimism of those who believe that the tremendous increase in the production of musicians threatens near-starvation for those of lesser talent. Foundations like the Juilliard and the many schools of music now being established, it has been said, are beginning to let loose upon the country a flood of mediocre musicians, as well as numerous first-class artists. This, together with the flight to America of high-grade performers from all the impoverished countries of Europe, has been cited as meaning that the world of music is being overpopulated. But here comes the appointment of Walter Damrosch as consultant in all musical matters to the National Broadcasting Company, the engagement of a great violinist at $5,000 a week to play in the newest Broadway movie house, and the selection by the Metropolitan Opera Company of six more young American artists. These are highly significant happenings, for they foretell new and far-reaching opportunities, especially in connection with the latest developments in the entertainment field.

The radio has, of course, widened the sphere of symphony orchestras as well as of jazz players. If the latter have benefited most so far, that must be set down to pioneer conditions. At least with Mr. Damrosch guiding the greatest of the broadcasting companies and himself doing yeoman service lecturing on orchestral music over the radio, the possibilities for the higher branches of music of that marvelous invention begin to appear. That movie producers should feel the need of the best talent is equally striking. Some of their orchestras are remarkable for their brilliance as well as their size. They are giving employment to more and more musicians who may in time be graduated into the best orchestras, and for them some of the new organizations are bound to be formidable rivals.

As for the Metropolitan Opera's absorption of more American singers, that, too, is all to the good, and so is the development of undertakings like the Eastman school of opera at Rochester. The tremendous growth of classical orchestras in this country in the lifetimes of men and women in the early fifties is bound, we believe, to be paralleled by the development of opera companies. In the field of the soloist there seems to be no real evidence of an oversupply of artists. Faster than they can increase grows the taste for first-class music, and with it musical understanding and appreciation. In our colleges and universities the music departments are no longer sneered at as fads to be relegated to the private "conservatories" of our cities. If many of the popular boarding schools are still lagging, Mr. Damrosch testifies that he has been fairly swamped by letters of gratitude from those in all parts of the country who for the first time are able to hear not only a modern orchestra, but an explanation of the program. These same multitudes will also listen to worthy soloists. Chamber music, too, comes yearly more into its own.

But it is in the field of teaching that the opportunities of the musician remain the greatest. The art has to be handed on, the best methods developed, on-coming talent recognized and aided. In fact, the fear that there will be a surplus of musicians is as needless as the periodic dread of a surplus of doctors and professors. It is not their numbers which are to be watched but their quality and the character of their instruction.

"The Woodhull"

FEW occurrences could illustrate more sharply the speed at which we move than the death, on June 10, at Norton Park, Tewksbury, England, of Victoria Claflin Woodhull—Mrs. John Biddulph Martin, as she had become. Fifty-five years ago Victoria Woodhull's name was on every tongue and in every newspaper. She and her sister, Tennessee Claflin (later Lady Cook, Marchioness of Montserrat), were not merely famous—they were notorious. They had come to New York from the Middle West in the late sixties and opened a brokerage business in Broad Street. Women were unknown in business in that day. There were no typewriters or telephones, and no respectable office employed any females except as scrubwomen.

Victoria Woodhull and her sister were not only capable; they were beautiful, which was anything but an asset. By following the counsel of Commodore Vanderbilt, they made over half a million dollars in Harlem Railway operations, and established a journal, Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly, with their earnings. Tennessee Claflin ran for Congress, and in 1872 Victoria Woodhull was nominated for the Presidency on a ticket with Frederick Douglas, the great Negro orator, and she made a rousing campaign of it. Both ladies wore what were then regarded as short skirts, and bobbed their hair. They lectured and wrote in favor of woman suffrage, more liberal divorce laws, birth control, dress reform, and the economic and social independence of women, and they were promptly termed "free lovers" for their pains. On January 11, 1871, Victoria Woodhull appeared in person before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives at Washington, to argue that the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution granted women the right of suffrage, since women were plainly citizens—an ingenious thesis that, had it been accepted, would have saved a vast deal of trouble and expense in securing the adoption of the Nineteenth Amendment half a century later.

It was in connection with the famous Beecher-Tilton case, however, that Victoria Woodhull achieved a notoriety that carried her name to the ends of the English-speaking world. She and her sister had been bitterly assailed by Henry Ward Beecher's two sisters, Catherine Beecher and Harriet Beecher Stowe, and in retaliation Victoria Woodhull printed, in Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly of November 12, 1872, a detailed account of the relations between Henry Ward Beecher and Mrs. Theodore Tilton. The publication created a tremendous sensation, and both ladies were promptly thrown into prison by General Tracy, Mr. Beecher's personal attorney, who was also United States District Attorney at the time, on a charge of sending obscene matter through the mails. They were acquitted—but Henry Ward Beecher was not. Financially ruined, broken in health and fortune, persecuted by Beecher's partisans, both women left the United States forever and made brilliant marriages in England.

Almost every reform for the advocacy of which Victoria Woodhull and her sister were so bitterly attacked has long since become a commonplace. But on the day that Victoria Woodhull died, David Gordon, a young Communist, was sentenced to an indeterminate term of imprisonment, up to three years, for writing a cheaply but harmlessly obscene poem entitled "America," which was printed in the Daily Worker.

Progress, frequently, is more apparent than real.

Lindbergh and the Army and Navy

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

COLONEL WILLIAM MITCHELL is anathema to many people. To them he is a "kicker"; a chronic fault-finder; a "publicity grabber"; a man who "went back on his own crowd"; who "bit the hand that fed him." Just now he has denounced the navy's attempt to take Lindbergh into its camp and has therefore again earned the abuse inevitably showered upon one who seeks to reform an organization not quietly from within but through outspoken public criticism. He has just been described by the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Theodore D. Robinson, as "a man who, on the face of it, doesn't know what he's talking about, and, if he did, couldn't tell the truth about it, anyway"—a retort not unexpectedly hot when one reads it in connection with Colonel Mitchell's assertion that "it is the saying now 'Join the navy and see the world, but join the naval aviation and see the next world.'" His real offense, however, is that he calls attention to the deliberate efforts of the navy—and he might have said the army, too—to annex all possible glory for Lindbergh's flight.

Colonel Mitchell points out, in a letter to the Washington Post, that the dominating navy crowd has tried to conceal the fact that as far back as 1921 the airplane maneuvers showed that battleships were useless because of the development of aviation. He declares that "the naval propagandists still hedged behind the cry that airplanes could not fly across the seas," and that "they were successful in preventing service pilots from doing it." When, however, the civilian Lindbergh flew across the sea the navy knew that his flight would be a tremendously powerful lever for the aviation group in Washington, "because the use of the airplane, an economical instrument, would cut down appropriations for battleships, save money for the taxpayers, and sea-power would become secondary to air-power." They had, of course, done nothing whatever to forward Lindbergh's flight or anybody else's, precisely as they did nothing to aid Commander Byrd, a retired naval officer, in his flight to the North Pole; precisely as they had sent the gallant and unfortunate Commander Rodgers on the Hawaiian flight without giving him adequate gasoline to carry him through, and then made such faulty arrangements that although Commander Rodgers stayed afloat for nine days the navy could not find him until he drifted ashore. Colonel Mitchell even charges the service with having brought about this brave officer's death through letting him fly when he was not fit to do so, and directly asserts that the deaths of sixteen naval fliers in and about Hampton Roads within thirty-five days are due to the incompetence and inefficiency of the men directing naval-aviation affairs.

As to this, Colonel Mitchell may or may not be correct—he sometimes mars his case by exaggerated statements. He is, however, absolutely right in pointing out that the navy sought at once to claim Lindbergh for its own. Lindbergh's return on the cruiser was ordered by the President, against the young man's wish. As he neared the Capes navy and army aviation squadrons were ordered out to greet him. The military crowd was not idle. They had him promoted to colonel in the Army Reserve; then General M. M. Patrick, head of the army aviation, announced that a specially picked aviator would fly over the Memphis and drop a new colonel's uniform, and Major General C. C. Hammond of the Militia Bureau officially wirelessed him to wear it at the ceremonies in the Capitol. Every effort was then made to give a military character to the reception celebration. Army, navy, marine corps, and National Guard units were, according to press reports, in line for this boy, who had no connection with military affairs except a captaincy in the aviation of the Missouri National Guard—almost an honorary title. Then Lindbergh was compelled by the committee to perform that singular rite now expected of every distinguished visitor to Washington, namely, to lay a wreath on the tomb of the Unknown Soldier, though what the Unknown Soldier had to do with transatlantic flight is hard to see. At the tomb there was mounted a military guard of honor to salute the Minnesota boy aviator; he was conducted to the spot by a brigadier general in full uniform, with all his medals. He was then rushed out to the Walter Reed General Military Hospital and agonized by the sight of some of the horribly mutilated victims of the war—precisely as if he were an English or French field-marshal, just back from the war, and not a young post-office aviator. When the scene of action was transferred to New York, the entire National Guard of the city, some 10,000 men, was paraded in honor of this civilian aviator. The crowds were not demonstrative when the troops passed; they were not there to see a martial display, but to greet a plain American youth, who had the good taste and good sense not once to wear the brand-new colonel's uniform, but stuck to his blue serge suit. More than that, the army recruiting posters have everywhere declared of Lindbergh, "the army helped to train him"—a partial but misleading truth.

There is intrinsic evidence that much pressure was brought upon Lindbergh to emphasize the military and to voice preparedness propaganda. He did not say a word of use to the militarists until his speech of June 15, at a luncheon in New York, when he declared that aviation preparedness would help to prevent war, and that the men who could best be transformed into military pilots were civilian fliers with long experience—a mild enough statement. Not once has he referred to himself as colonel; up to this writing, he has not even acknowledged his promotion to that rank. In no speech did he refer to the military turnouts for him; military strutting is obviously as far removed from his makeup as it could well be. According to his pictures, he has refrained from wearing any of his medals, by day or by night. But that has not prevented Admiral Burrage from announcing that he will make a determined effort to have Lindbergh transferred from the Missouri National Guard and army reserve to the navy, so that the navy may have the benefit of his counsel and advice, which, of course, it did not seek before his flight, and which, if it were of the Colonel Mitchell variety, would lead to his being immediately damned by the military and naval cliques in Washington, which dominate those services. As a matter of fact, while Lindbergh said that the air corps would never take the place of the navy, he described the sinking of a battleship and dwelt upon the cheapness of the operation, even if half the attacking fliers were killed, saying that a battleship could be sunk by aviators for one-fifth or one-tenth of its cost. He made it clear that he did not believe that anti-aircraft guns could protect a ship, which is exactly Colonel Mitchell's position.

Thus far the exploitation has gone. The real significance of the whole thing lies in the fact that this military and naval propaganda is unceasingly at work. The Nation has just commented on the fact that some of the motion-picture magnates have been made commissioned reserve officers, and that the War Department has not contradicted the assertion that in return the motion pictures are to be used more than heretofore to aid military propaganda. At the summer training-camps for civilians, and those of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps the straight-out military doctrines we used to call Prussian are being taught. The Scabbard and Blade, an R.O.T.C. organization, publishes regularly attacks upon some of the most prominent people in the country, such as Senator Borah, ex-Governor Sweet of Colorado, Senator La Follette, Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, Francis B. Sayre, son-in-law of Woodrow Wilson; John Dewey, Zona Gale, and many others, and is charging them with being Communists and dangerous citizens—unrebuked by the War Department. The alliance of the War Department with the big-business organizations is open and aboveboard, and is justified on the ground that in the next war to end war all industry must pass into the hands of the government—communism with a vengeance!

The American public is singularly unaware, and singularly indifferent, to this determined militaristic propaganda, which often takes the form of attacking anyone who dares to speak the truth, of breaking up meetings, interrupting speakers, etc. If the Lindbergh episode and Colonel Mitchell's comment on it have helped to open the eyes of some persons to what is going on, it will not be the least of Lindbergh's great services to his country.

Poor Me and Pure Boston

By UPTON SINCLAIR

EVERYBODY admires "Lindy" because he does not talk about himself. I wish I could follow the same charming practice in telling about Boston and its censorship, but unfortunately all I know about it is what it has done to me.

Behold me, therefore, an author who had been known most of his life as the prize prude of the radical movement; a man who can say that he has never told a smutty story in his life, and who was once described by his former marital partner, through the newspapers of the civilized world, as "an essential monogamist"—a very old-fogyish thing to be. I am the author of some thirty books, and a Boston police magistrate has decreed that the last one "manifestly tends to corrupt youth." Let me say at once that "Oil!" is no different in this respect from any of the others. Judged by the Boston method, they are all equally vicious. They are being read throughout the rest of America and in other civilized lands, and Boston alone thinks they are obscene.

It is rather a joke on an author—sitting at his typewriter at home, engaged in work upon a book denouncing what he considers the really obscene writers of his country and time—to have his labors interrupted by a telegram advising him that his own book has fallen under the ban. I am happy to be able to say that I was not calling for the police, but for the moral forces of society to make war upon true obscenity. I wrote that "every time you get a censor, you get a fool, and worse yet, a knave, pretending to be a guardian of morality while acting as a guardian of class greed." And now the Boston censor has arisen to provide me with the proofs!

How does it work here? An Episcopal clergyman stopped me on the street yesterday and told me he knew the man who made the complaint to the police about "Oil!" The clergyman gave me his name, and added: "I have suppressed two reports damaging to his moral character." It is, you see, the old story of "Honi soit qui mal y pense."

The next step, under Boston practice, is that two detectives are sent to a bookstore to buy the book about which a complaint has been made. In this case they chose a bookseller who has the hard luck to be only a few doors from the courthouse. They bought the book from Mr. John Gritz, a clerk, who happens to be only twenty years of age and the nearest approach to a cherub that you can find wearing trousers.

The book is then turned over to an inspector. He is a busy man, and his business isn't reading. Here is a book of something over a quarter of a million words; naturally, he says, "What the hell?", passes the book to a clerk in his office, and says, "Hey, Joe, here's a juicy one." I am telling this not as a fiction writer, but as one who has been hanging round the courthouse for the past week, listening to the men on the inside gossiping about what did actually happen.

Next, "Joe" takes the book home and marks the passages which he thinks corrupted his morals. The book is returned to the inspector and he reads these passages and says: "Holy smoke, here this guy has a girl say to a fellow that she knows how to keep from having babies." Boston is 70 per cent Roman Catholic, you understand, and the percentage prevails in the police department. So the inspector goes before a magistrate, and the magistrate takes the book home overnight, and reads the marked passages. If he is an especially fair-minded man, he may have an impulse to read the whole book; but the law does not require him to do so. The law provides for the condemnation of a book "containing" anything, and under the governing decision only the passages complained of are required as evidence. "You are not trying any book except this," said the trial judge in a charge which the Supreme Court of Massachusetts upheld, "and only such parts of this as the Government complained of. . . . It makes no difference what the object in writing this book was, or what its whole tone is." The test is whether it contains, anywhere, anything "manifestly tending to corrupt the morals of youth." You can see that this confines modern writers to the juvenile department, and makes it impossible for them to write for adults.

For my part, I am not going to be bound by this limitation. I believe that grown people have experiences and needs which have to be dealt with in fiction. I will not deliberately corrupt anyone, of course, but if young people read my books they will learn what is going on in the modern world; also they will learn what I consider to be the cause of this moral breakdown, the presence of parasitism and exploitation in our society—the fact that a class of idlers are permitted to have enormous wealth without doing anything to earn it.

In the case of "Oil!" there are 527 pages, and the police object to nine; that does not seem to indicate an abnormal interest in the sexual aspects of life. The first scene they object to begins on page 193, and anyone who buys the book looking for obscenity—a great many people are now doing so—will find it rather slow in starting. There are four or five pages about a "petting party," and that is very bad, according to the Boston police; but on the other hand there are twenty-six pages about how to lease a tract of ground for a drilling-site, and really that does not seem to be giving undue emphasis to the "petting party" aspects of the life of a young "oil prince."

Of course, when a born preacher like myself puts such a scene into a novel, it is for a purpose. I am showing my young "oil prince" groping his way out of the customary life of his class and into a better one. The next time he is invited to a "petting party," he does not go—because he is looking for a better kind of love. Curiously enough, I was rebuked by the reviewer of The Nation for these little preachments. "To inject a paragraph of moralizing into the piquant incident of Mrs. Thelma Norman's attempt to be seduced in Bunny's cabin is absurdly priggish." I had hoped that what displeased The Nation reviewer might help me out with the magistrate, and I took a copy of the review to court, but alas, I was not allowed to show it, or to say a word. It can never be introduced, under the law, nor can the "petting-party" scene be judged in the light of what comes after, what lessons are drawn from it, what repudiation it meets with from the author and the hero later on in the book. Speaking strictly, I may get such testimony in if the Superior Court sees fit to admit it, but the court is under no obligation to admit it, and if it declines to do so the Supreme Court will not call it an error: such is the governing decision, brought out by a trial of the novel "Three Weeks."

I wanted to be the defendant in this case, instead of the cherubic Mr. Gritz. But alas, the police department of Boston does not want me. Mr. George E. Roewer, the unwearying defender of unpopular causes in Boston, approached the authorities with the customary proposition for a test case with a minimum fine upon conviction, but it appears that the police consider the birth-control utterance of my flapper, Eunice Hoyt, especially bad, and I am to go to jail for a year if they can get me. What I am going to do I will not say until after I have done it, but I can assure you I am not going to spend a year on Deer Island.

It is obvious that under this law very little standard English literature can be sold. Consider Smollett or Fielding, "Tess of the D'Urbervilles" and "Ann Veronica." Or consider Shakespeare and the Bible. One of the newspapermen here tells me that the public is sick of Shakespeare and the Bible, because every publisher of a book, obscene or claimed to be obscene, always proposes these tests. Nevertheless, poor Boston will have to go on hearing about it, until it changes its laws so that these two books can be legally sold and so that modern writers may be free to produce great literature if they can. I have called a meeting at Byron Street House, headquarters of the Community Church of Boston, for the morning of June 16, and I am there going to read the very offending passage of Act III, Scene ii of "Hamlet," and offer this book to the police at bargain prices. Then I am going to read the quite horrible piece of obscenity in Genesis 19, 30-38, and see if the police will buy that.

POSTSCRIPT—JUNE 16. I offered a copy of the Bible to the police this morning. They would not buy it. I sold it to a Boston rationalist of very high moral standards who is distressed by the thought of how such a passage will corrupt youth and promises to appear before a magistrate and demand a warrant for my arrest. I then offered the police what they thought was a copy of "Oil." I did not say it was "Oil." All I did was hold it up before the audience. The police bought it and notified me to appear in court tomorrow. Then they examined the volume and found they had bought the Bible bound in a cover of "Oil." They demanded their money back, and I was too polite to keep it. The only way to fight this law is to make a monkey of it.

JUNE 21. At last I have found a policeman willing to buy a copy of "Oil" and have sold him one.

Earth Horizon

By ELIZABETH SHEPLEY SERGEANT

> And all your peoples
> May your thoughts come to us.
> (Rain Song of the Giant Society, Sia.)

AMERICANS still go to Europe in search of ancient civilization. Yet there exists, within four days and nights of New York, a living American civilization as archaic as that of Egypt and much more primordial than that of Greece and Rome. The frame of the Southwestern country is vast and crystalline. Nowhere is rock so naked or so crudely stained with the record of geologic ages. Nowhere is the fluidity of water so visible as in this great dry desert which it has sculptured. One travels in the wash of dead seas. On these mottled ridges of shell pink, rolling endlessly as breakers, the very sand is pungent, for the sun has scorched the hoary elbows of the cedars into a black and fossil growth. The whole land floats in prismatic light. Mesas riven with wine-dark voids stand level above deep valleys below the folding peaks. And here, suddenly looming against striated cliff or cobalt mountain, one notes amazedly a town-built outline. A terraced outline, solidly hewn of red Southwestern stone, or molded from the substance of this earth horizon, the Pueblo village appears a monolith secreted by time itself. That is fitting. For its square plazas have preserved, as by some special magic, a race of brown men hung with turquoise, whose lives move in a rhythm that swings back to the ancient world.

When the rhythm breaks through the marble crust of winter one sees these brown Pueblo people, their hair tied in queues, their bitten Mongolian faces fixed in a grave and self-sustained remoteness, riding over the barren ridges to share an invocation to fertility.

Soft, soft, still, still, in the sunken plaza, moves the Pueblo woman, her head proud under its blue tablita, her bare toes just stirring the dust in measure. Bold, bold, free, free, moves the Pueblo man, hurling his agile whitened knees, and the coyote skin trembles on his cotton-girded loins. Side by side, pounding out the cadence on the drum of earth, winding a long dark coil of two's backward and forward in the glare, while the gray Delight Makers, clapping striped pot bellies, stroking striped lank bellies, thread and leap their way between. The earth is a resonant skin, stretched taut over eternity. The air is a hot cloud that mocks the sun with burning motes. Water, water, where is water? Piñon boughs shaking, black hair waving, dull drums booming, silver and wampum and turquoise rattling, long white banner fluttering its eagle feathers, dipping its pollen of parrot feathers over each dancer in turn.

Come rain, come rain
Corn grow, corn grow.

The cry, urgent, deep throated, flows far into the legendary world where the Pueblo psyche has its home.

The man who summons rain to music kills wild beasts with prayer. He counts his months by moons and reads time by the stars. A common adaptation to the earth horizon, its contours, creatures, and seasons, has given him, in spite of marked tribal differences, a common spiritual cast. The men of northern Taos are tall and strange, they walk alone, and their feet and their long braids have the spring of the animals of the forest. The men of San Ildefonso, intrenched among Spanish and white folk in the Rio Grande midlands, are courteous, sad, accustomed on the streets of Santa Fe. The men of Santo Domingo, untamed and colored by their southern desert, move their hips like cats in a column of dust, scallop their buccaneering chests with shells inlaid from a mine of lost treasure, and greet the stranger with fierce, primeval stare. Yet, judged by the standard of a culture, such diversity is inessential. Tanoans or Keresans, Zunis or Shoshonean Hopis, separated by sand and snow peaks as well as by barriers of tongue, are easily discernible as one family. And though their civilization is in fact the highest which America, north of Mexico, has evolved out of native elements, they appear alike exotic on the soil that produced George Washington.

But why, after all, should a man who owes his origin to a foam cap fertilized by the sun; a man whose great-great-grandfather was born deep in the cave wombs of the earth mother, and led up to the brightness of his father the sky by the twin brothers of light—why should he resemble you and me? Once they had reached the familiar crust of earth, so the Zuni creation myth tells, the twin saviors, the Elder and the Younger Brother, divided the Pueblo people into two great seasonal groups, those of Winter and those of Summer, under which were ranged the matriarchal clans, according to their totems. So divided and instructed, led by their priests, who had become the Fathers of the people, they journeyed seeking the Middle of the World. There they now dwell forever.

From the peaked hilltop in the Tesuque Valley where I have raised a flat New Mexican roof tree, I look straight into one of these "Middles," these ancestral hives in which the Pueblo culture was nurtured in prehistoric times. Midway of the soaring Jemez Mountains—the western boundary of the Rio Grande Valley—the Mesa del Pajarito thrusts forward like a table, over the alluvial sweep of the plain. Rock walls splashed with polychrome tints hang above, and drop sheer to the irrigated fields of the Tewa Pueblos. The Tewa village names, save for Tesuque and the more remote Nambé, have a Spanish-saintly ring: San Juan, Santa Clara, San Ildefonso. Yet for all their Spanish Catholic borrowings these Indians rightly claim direct descent from the Ancient People who hollowed their homes in the sunny face of the Pajarito canyons. On the high plateau are hundreds of stone ruins, immemorial, overgrown with sage and sheets of yellow flowers. Most of them unscratched by the archaeologist. Many scarcely known even to Indian sheep-herders. Yet this discarded shell of vanished communal life is but one link in a vast chain of cliff, valley, and mesa dwellings, now deserted and crumbled, with which present Pueblo life is continuous. From Colorado into Mexico, from the eastern rim of the Grand Canyon to the western edge of the Great Plains, the Pueblos once built stone houses and raised their crops of corn. The fabulous outline of the Mesa Verde cliff palaces, roofed by aerial ledges, the exquisite curve of the Puyé cliff on the Pajarito, with its simpler form of cave dwellings, represent to the Pueblos of today, as truly as the fallen cities of Greece or Sicily to their modern heirs, the ancestral heart of a living civilization.

Indeed it amuses me to think, as I sit in the "dry and spotted place"—so, in the Tewa tongue, the Indians have named Tesuque—that within thirty miles of me lie just such beauties as I have sought on the older continent. The imponderable brilliance of the air brings them within touch of my hand. There, spread out in the sun and wind and silence, tenanted only by butterflies and dazzling lizards and circling bats, are citadels that teemed in pre-Columbian days. Puyé, Otowi, Tsankawi, Navakwi, Tcherege. Sky-pitched sites that Delphi cannot rival. On the Pajarito even the ant hills are heaped into pyramids, formed out of quartz crystals, matrix of gold. And under hard-burned earth, below the empty cave houses, gleaming white and topaz pink, are hidden uncounted jars and bowls of antique shape, ornamented in black and red, like the jars of Crete. Here are key patterns, hatched or swallow-tail triangles, diamonds, zigzags, dots, parallelograms, arranged in bands; here are awanyus, those curious hand signs or serpent signs, set in whirling figures; here are sun symbols, life symbols, including tortoises and dragon flies, not to mention the enormous array of prehistoric birds, stylicized into three straight tail feathers and a delicate button hook of a head. Stone idols, hidden in little niches, animal fetishes with turquoise eyes, dark with the blood of the victim, plumed serpents, coiled in adobe circles on the rock; pecked and painted pictographs of hunts, where mountain goats leap high before the spear; stone pumas carved life-size in shrines: these are some of the treasures of the Pajarito.

One thing more. Here, deep in the burial places, are mummies. Mummies of men and women with their hands tied to their thighs with ropes of hair, yucca sandals on their feet, with painted jars and shell beads packed about them. Further west and north, below the ruins of the cliff people, have been found the entombed mummies of a still earlier folk, who have coiled baskets of fine weave inverted over their heads and behind their backs. In the graves of these Basket-makers are new-born babies, strapped to their woven cradles, with their bast diapers and umbilical pads, all complete. Sometimes there are even curly haired dogs lying with their masters.

BUR... PUBLIC LIB

Beside the dead of the Ancient People, through all this shining desert, one finds an invariable offering. Just as the Pueblo storehouses shelter, in their piled cells, one parti-colored crop; the earth-beaten plazas one timeless ceremonial; the wrinkled hands of old men one supernal commodity; so do the Pueblo graves hold the Seed of Seeds. The Divine Maize, as the Aztecs called it. No ornaments of gold attend the antique farmer to eternity. But search among his bones and you will always find one pointed symbol of fertility, that lies pregnant still in the wine-stained dust, below the stone-ribbed mountains: an ear of shriveled corn.

A Chinese Warlord

By RANDALL GOULD

Peking, May 1

A FIRST meeting with the "Mukden Warlord" Chang Tso-lin is always a shock. Surrounded by all the ornate atrocities of a Chinese ceremonial room, one awaits the arrival of the ta jen, or great man, with growing nervousness and a conviction that this famed ex-bandit will prove a physical prodigy.

When, in place of the robust, saber-clattering, uniformed giant imagination had pictured a meek and smiling little man in Chinese robes steals into the room, it requires a moment to adjust one's mental sights to the new objective. And from that time on the visitor must go through a series of readjustments of various kinds.

Marshal Chang, drawn to Peking from his native Mukden "to cooperate with the foreign ministers in saving China from Bolshevism," talks in terms of nations but continues to think in terms of provinces. Anyone who has spent half an hour with him knows this. The Strong Man of Mukden has improved his propaganda vocabulary but he is using the same old brain—shrewd, keen, but sharply limited.

In a crowd of a dozen foreign correspondents, all but one of whom were English or American, it took the Marshal twenty minutes to decide what language the Continental European spoke when he asked questions through his own private interpreter. Finally, in the midst of a question, the Marshal laid down his cigarette-holder and bent forward with the look of a pleased and precocious child. "Ah—Ni Gwa jen!" ("Ah—you're a Frenchman") said he, and settled back content. The episode was significant, not of the Marshal's lack of intelligence, but of his lack of experience in dealing with foreigners. He is a clever man. In the aggregate he has met many foreigners. But during the greater part of his long life he has lived simply, surrounded in his native Manchuria by his own people and his own problems. He has not traveled abroad, he speaks no language other than his own—and but a simple dialect of that—and now, in the declining years of his life, he is trying to grapple with great international problems which he views with an amused tolerance and with no conception of their magnitude. His mind is still adroit in dealing with matters in old fields, but it is no longer flexible enough to wrap itself around new problems propounded by the foreigner.

Certainly Marshal Chang—or those near him—knows the things which will sound impressive when cabled abroad. The interpreter confers with him for a moment, then proclaims with unction:

> The Marshal says that he will protect the lives and property of all foreigners. He holds himself personally responsible. No foreign troops are necessary for defense of foreigners in North China.
> It is the wavering attitude of the Powers which has helped the South. The Powers have not heeded the Marshal's advice, they have negotiated with the Cantonese, they have yielded step by step.
> Bolshevism is the great menace in China. The Chinese people do not hate the foreigner. But Soviet Russia desires to destroy the foreign trade and the very existence of the British and Americans in China.

During all this the Marshal has seemed quiescent, almost indifferent; he glances about from time to time through half-shut eyes, but beyond an occasional show of earnestness he plays the traditional inscrutable Oriental to the life. Direct questions he evades. In precisely what cooperative act can the Powers join, since their troops are not wanted in North China? Ah, that is something which is not quite settled as yet. Something may be said about that later.

But let mention be made of some specific military move—a recent victory or even a recent defeat. Immediately the Marshal is all attention. Gesticulating and interrupting the interpreter, he goes through the entire story. His hearer must understand exactly where each body of troops was located, and how the unexplained defection of General So-and-So, coupled with the regrettable absence of General This-and-That at the crucial moment, resulted in a collapse which will speedily be repaired and the enemy driven back with heavy losses. This is the sort of thing which interests the Marshal.

To question Marshal Chang on international events is to waste one's breath. He knows nothing of the outside world. He knows nothing of the art of government, and says as much frankly. Politicians he despises as meddlesome time-wasters of no value to practical men. Action, military action, that is what the Marshal understands, and as he talks one forgets his frail figure and the softness of his handclasp and begins inevitably to think—hackneyed though the figure be—of a keen and sagacious old fox bearing toothmarks of many a fight.

And, watching this fox, one thinks in turn of the directing figures of the Cantonese. One thinks of Eugene Chen, whose carefully chosen phrases in the most perfect English bite like a blade; one thinks of the Russian High Adviser Borodin, massive, a scholar, an engineer, builder of nations. In the feudal North of China there is animal intelligence, but in the South there is the brain of modern man. Here, perhaps, is an answer to the Chinese puzzle.

In the Driftway

THERE are two types of writers which the Drifter wishes into the old isolation camps of Shredna Kolymbsk. They are the pun pests and the alliteration addicts. Very shortly now, the Drifter is going to have constitutional amendments passed against these. He hereby notifies the anti-tobacco and anti-bobbed-hair advocates that he has the Twentieth and Twenty-first amendments reserved. Let them concentrate on the Twenty-second, if they must. For long the Drifter was undetermined with which of these to begin. And then he discovered a volume called "Alliterative Aphorisms. A Thousand Themes for Thorough Thinkers." That decided the Drifter. The alliterationists come first.

THE Drifter can put up with an alliterationist that can smile at his own folly, as, for instance, Swinburne. After he had perpetrated "the lilies and languors of virtue and the roses and raptures of vice," he could parody his own weakness: "From the depth of the dreamy decline of the dawn through a notable nimbus of nebulous moonshine." There is hope for a man like that, and the Drifter promises in advance that he will get under way a petition for mercy for any such person falling under the ax through his amendment. But no mercy will be shown to any writer guilty of the atrocities found in "Alliterative Aphorisms." Judge for yourself. "Feminine fondness for fiction, foolish fads, frothy foods, flimsy fabrics, flippant flirtations, and frivolous friends finds fruition in the full-fledged flapper." Here's another gem: "Maidenly modesty, manifested in mild manners—minus mercenary motives—meets a manly mate, and makes matrimony and maternity more than a mere modern myth." So much for the women; now the politicians. "The panacea promised by politicians—promoting partisan plans, not patriotic purposes—proves a poor palliative for the perturbation of the public." And then we can learn about religion. "Supine submission to sacrilegious sophistry of a self-styled sage—seeking salvation through science—is a sure sign of spiritual sickness." On and on, this madness goes for almost a hundred pages. The alliteration amendment will be the Twentieth without question.

The Prosecutor's Duty

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You ask my view upon the proposition that

> A prosecuting officer is violating no canon of legal ethics in presenting evidence which tends to show guilt while failing to call witnesses in whom he has no confidence, or whose testimony contradicts what he is trying to prove.

It is obvious to me that a prosecuting officer should not call as a witness any one in whom he has no confidence, meaning by that, no confidence in his truth-telling capacity, and, by the same token, a prosecuting officer in such case is not called upon to tell defense counsel about a witness of that class. No one wants to hear witnesses who are not telling the truth.

When it comes to a case, however, where a prosecuting officer knows of an important witness whose testimony contradicts the theory of the prosecution, he is not required by any canon of ethics with which I am familiar to put this witness on the stand as his own, but he should give to the counsel for the defense the name and address of this witness. When a prosecuting officer brings a case into court he obviously is intending to prove guilt. He rarely knows whether guilt exists or not, but in solving that perplexity he is certainly not required to call all of the witnesses who are witnesses for the defense and thereby make them his own witnesses. He goes beyond the limit of his duty if he advises defense counsel of the existence of these contradictory witnesses.

Nothing, of course, could be more reprehensible than for a prosecuting officer to procure the conviction of one whom he knows to be innocent. As the American Bar Association has declared:

> The primary duty of a lawyer engaged in public prosecution is not to convict but to see that justice is done. The suppression of facts or the secreting of witnesses capable of establishing the innocence of the accused is highly reprehensible.

To put it another way, the prosecuting officer shall deal fairly according to the circumstances of the case; he should satisfy himself, to the best of his ability, that in presenting his case he is not perverting justice; but it is impossible to lay down the rule that he must try both sides of the case or present evidence which he believes incredible, or present a witness whom he deems it his duty to discredit.

New York, June 6 CHARLES H. STRONG

A Catholic President

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The announcement of the death of the son of Marshal MacMahon, second President of the French Republic, naturally recalls the latter's sensational retirement in the middle of his term. President MacMahon, as a loyal member of the Roman Catholic church, felt it incumbent upon him to resign when the policy of the French Government clashed with that of the Vatican.

That was all he could do. What, and how much, he might have done to help the Vatican thwart the French Government if he had had the political power which, unfortunately, our President has through his appointive power, each of us must determine for himself.

Anyone who imagines that Alfred Smith, in like circumstances, would fall short of MacMahon in devotion and obedience to his church is greatly mistaken.

New York, May 25. BENJAMIN MACMAHON

The Catholic Conscience

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Governor Alfred E. Smith's creed as stated in his reply to Mr. Marshall did not reach the fundamental issues on which objections to his being President rest. He said: "I believe in absolute freedom of conscience for all men" and "I believe in the absolute separation of church and state and in the strict enforcement of the provisions of the Constitution that Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

A fundamental problem involved in these statements is, Who makes the conscience? Conscience is assumed to be something that is correct and intelligent, therefore to be obeyed. But this is not so. Conscience is merely a man's imbedded opinion, and that opinion depends on how he was brought up and trained and who or what trained him. It is an entire fallacy to say that conscience has inalienable rights—often it has none.

The Catholic church aims completely to form the consciences of its members, in this way making the authority of the church instinctively supreme, so instinctively supreme that ultimately it will be the deciding factor in all important questions.

How does the Catholic church plan to create a conscience of this kind in its members? By giving them the education that will create it, and excluding all other education. From infancy to maturity the Catholic church proposes to exercise total supervision and direction of all persons' development. By this process it can manufacture in its members the kind of conscience it wants for regarding the church as sovereign over the state.

No other church attempts this as the Catholic church is doing by its system of parochial schools and church colleges. The remedy is to forbid sectarian education of children before the close of their sixteenth year, thereby eliminating parochial and convent schools.

To Emily Dickinson

By HART CRANE

You who desired so much—in vain to ask—
Yet fed your hunger like an endless task,
Dared dignify the labor, bless the quest—
Achieved that stillness ultimately best,

Being, of all, least sought for: Emily, hear!
O sweet, dead Silencer, most suddenly clear
When singing that Eternity possessed
And plundered momently in every breast;

—Truly no flower yet withers in your hand.
The harvest you descried and understand
Takes more than wit to gather, love to bind.
Some reconcilement of remotest mind—

Leaves Ormus rubyless, and Ophir chill.
Else tears heap all within one clay-cold hill.

The Old New York Stage

The Annals of the New York Stage. By George C. D. Odell. Columbia University Press. Volumes I and II. (To 1821.) $17.50.

THE early American theater was too provincial in the literal sense of the word to afford a very attractive field for either the philosophical historian or the critic of art. Its earliest professional actors came from England, and at least until the nineteenth century was well advanced it did little except to follow a few steps behind the taste of London. The companies, which, from about the middle of the eighteenth century, made theatrical entertainment a fairly regular feature of New York life, brought with them the English repertory of the time and the works of the more important new dramatists were added not long after their success in London, but the drama here has little history which is not the history of the drama abroad. At the beginning of the new century the, to us, incomprehensible vogue of Kotzebue broke over New York as it had over England, and a few years later the absurdities of the melodrama delighted New Yorkers as they had delighted the patrons of the minor theaters in London, but America can hardly be said to have exhibited any individuality of taste. The theater became both a fashionable and popular amusement; it was called "an elegant entertainment," and as a "school of virtue" it was defended against the attacks of Puritan prejudice in terms borrowed from the current cant of England; but it was long in developing any standards of its own, and for a century at least it seemed, however popular it may have become, a form of expression almost as little natural to Americans as opera is today. As for such examples of the native drama as reached the stage, they were not only notoriously feeble in themselves but strangely lacking in local flavor, even when they dealt ostensibly with the American scene. Early American plays have won collectors, but there are few who would not rather catalogue than read them.

The history of the New York theater is literally, then, a history of the theater, not of the drama, and even there such interest as it has is almost purely an antiquarian interest. Professor Odell has wisely recognized this fact, and in the work here begun he concerns himself almost exclusively with the annals of the stage, which he records with a far greater completeness than has been attempted by any previous historian. A passion for the theater which lends a factitious interest to every fact connected with it has sustained him through laborious researches, and by a more careful study of contemporary newspapers, as well as by a more thorough use of all other available sources than has been made before, he has piled up a mass of facts concerning playhouses, players, and performances which makes his volumes by far the most imposing repository of such information which we have. Not even Genest, the unwearying analyst of a century and three-quarters of the English stage, was more completely indefatigable in collecting casts, and besides Professor Odell extends the limits of his subject to include, during these early years, not only the drama but concerts, waxworks, "monsters," and exhibitions of legerdemain, horsemanship, and juggling as well. All the vain amusements of our ancestors concern him; he requires well over a thousand large pages to carry him from the beginning through the first appearances of Kean during the season of 1820-1821; and, even though the field will doubtless be gradually narrowed, the work, when completed, will probably run to twelve or fourteen volumes.

Professor Odell is humorously aware of the fact that his passion for the minutiae of a record whose significance would be hard to explain to anyone who did not share his interest is a sort of perversity; but the usefulness of such a work is in direct proportion to its completeness, and he is right to include every fact which can be discovered. There is, in a case of this kind, no danger of missing the wood on account of the trees, because there is not, strictly speaking, any wood there. What one wants is the assurance that one will find included any fact which is ascertainable, and Professor Odell's method gives such assurance. Moreover, though only the special student is likely to afford the time requisite for the reading of so vast a work, the innumerable separate facts which it supplies serve to establish that sense of a direct contact with a past epoch which a chronicle gives to those who know how to read it and which is more immediate than that which one receives in reading the account of a historian who has selected and arranged for the purpose of communicating a predetermined impression. The New York stage is not, it may be repeated, a very important part of American history, but in Mr. Odell's hands it does throw a sidelight upon the national culture of the time, and the general effect of innumerable bits of information which he has collected—like, for example, his description of the stage directions for the patriotic spectacle "Bunker Hill," which was performed in 1797, and which President Adams witnessed—is to remind us forcefully of the cultural naivete of a period likely to appear in political history as one of almost classical dignity and grandeur.

In short, "The Annals of the New York Stage" is a monumental work devoted to a subject which is, it must be confessed, of far from monumental importance. No one can help admiring its conscientious thoroughness, and no one is likely ever to find any fault with it, for the simple reason that it is more exhaustive than anybody is likely to demand and, in all probability, more accurate than anyone will ever ascertain.

Mutual Misunderstanding

France and America. Some Experiences in Cooperation. By André Tardieu. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

WHAT M. Tardieu has to say about the United States has at least the merit of being informed. Few Frenchmen who write have in recent years known the United States so well and few retain so few of the well-nigh invincible prepossessions with which most foreign observers approach these shores. His prepossessions, as far as the present work is concerned, are those of a publicist who still feels more of the glamor than of the tragedy of the World War, and who has entirely definit opinions about what might have happened if the United States had been different. As this lets us know exactly where he stands, it gives a suitable warning and does no harm. Further, M. Tardieu has never been disposed in his writings to praise America overmuch. He can let his rhetoric run in the French manner when he chooses, but the substance of what he says shows a conscious and, on the whole, a successful effort to describe things as they are. When, accordingly, he drives hard at some cherished notions and tears in pieces some consecrated illusions, he nevertheless remains a friendly critic, persistently balancing praise and blame.

M. Tardieu does not believe that there has ever been a real entente between the United States and France. The whole historical development of the two countries, which he skilfully summarizes at considerable length, appears to him to reveal fundamental disparities of mind and purpose. When the United States went into the war it was with very little of the exalted motive of a general kind, and with still less of the conviction that its national existence was seriously threatened, that counted for so much in French thought at the time about that particular episode. On the contrary, the United States had motives of its own, and they were, in the broad sense, selfish. America, he insists, is mass-minded; its people regard themselves as the chosen of the earth; they are not sentimental, and when the United States declared war it declared an American war.

Quite naturally, therefore, he emphasizes the profits which the United States gained in the transaction. Some of the gain was commercial, some indirectly political, a good deal, at least as a matter of bookkeeping, was financial. France, he hastens to tell us, was selfish, too. It expected, for example, that the American credits for reconstruction, which it hoped might continue after the armistice, would be spent through French business houses at what were virtually monopoly prices, and it was aggrieved when, that purpose having been discovered, the credits presently stopped. But selfishness on the French side does not lessen the selfishness of the United States; it only shows that the partnership in the great game was tenuous and that there was no real entente.

Where there is reciprocal selfishness there is likely to be reciprocal misunderstanding, and misunderstanding plays a large part in M. Tardieu's book. M. Tardieu is not the only Frenchman who knew well enough that President Wilson was never properly a pro-German, but France believed that he was, and the belief survives there, as it does here. There seems to be reason for suspecting that even M. Tardieu expected the Senate would ratify the Treaty of Versailles, but French opinion, nevertheless, made the capital mistake, from the point of view of French ambitions, of hoping for Republican success in 1920, notwithstanding that Republican success meant the definitive rejection of the League of Nations and pronounced hostility to Wilson policies. The Washington Disarmament Conference, again, appears to M. Tardieu to have operated to the disadvantage of France without hurting the United States, and he, of course, cannot accept the war-debt settlements as just on any save legal grounds. Yet, in spite of all the play at cross-purposes which the book sets out, it also exhibits the veritable riot of extravagance which attended the financing of the war with American money, and bestows praise without stint upon the American organizations which labored to rehabilitate the invaded regions of France and relieve suffering and distress.

Having stripped the subject pretty bare of pretense and fine words, M. Tardieu, like certain novelists, seeks to give the story a happy ending. His book, "a critical essay in search of coming enlightenment," is "also an act of faith." He believes, "by reason and by experience," in "the possibility of combined efforts by France and the United States," but he is also "convinced, and for the same reasons, of the infinite difficulty of success." "The twain must meet." The prediction may be ventured that the meeting, if it comes, will have little that is formal about it. The war, whatever its effect in disillusioning France about America, opened American eyes, and no amount of persuasion or propaganda will make it easy to launch the United States into such a slough of ignorance, fraud, and self-seeking again. The meeting will come through a frank admission, such as M. Tardieu himself goes far toward making, of the grievous mistakes that were committed on both sides, and a generous appreciation by each people of whatever is worth while in the culture of the other. The world has been made sick of ententes, but it is still willing to adventure something in the common domains of the mind.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

An Ironical Romance

Saint in Irony. By Lorine Pruette. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

BUT still a romance. For at the end, when St. Genevieve looked back over her life, she could think that the "God-thing in every man," the thing that is "at the heart of every religion," is "the courage of desire." And this is romance. It is the romance of a sophisticated undeceived civilization, almost the only romance left to it, when science has explained its miracles and analyzed its ecstasies and exposed its gods. But romance nevertheless, the romance of youth born into an old world; since desire is fleeting, perhaps more fleeting than any of the gods man has espoused. And to live by the courage of such a will-o'-the-wisp is to live briefly indeed, or at best intermittently. One remembers that phrase about the "durable satisfactions of life" which has been forgotten in the post-war jazz. One remembers the Hindu philosophy of non-attachment to those desires that burn so hotly, but that come and go. And remembering, I find it peculiarly appropriate that the subtle mind which evolved this book should have attributed this crowning romance to the Saint in Ivory who lived at a time that, like our own, felt the once solid earth cracking under it as one after another of the systems by which men had learned to live began to break up. Genevieve and her Parisians were only a step removed from barbarism, they were as hardy and adventuresome and new as America; and yet they were as old and as weary as the Roman Empire, just as America is all smeared over with the nostalgia of an old corrupt civilization.

As I began to read the description of Nanterre on that bright spring morning when Bishop Germain decided to create a new saint—for many reasons: unfortunately and shamefully Nanterre was lacking in a church, and a town with a real saint of its own would be inspired to remedy that defect without delay; and a miracle would not come amiss at the moment that holy Lupus was talking with the citizens of the town about sundry business matters—as I began to read of Nanterre on that bright spring day when Germain, thinking of these and other subtleties, suddenly perceived a halo surrounding the head of six-year-old Genevieve, the naughtiest, most headstrong little mischief in the town, I realized that here was that desirable and rarely found object, a book which one reads for the joy of reading. It was going to tell a story, I saw, and that alone marked it as unusual. For in a real story things happen; and few intellectuals can gird themselves up to the point of letting things happen to their offspring. (I sometimes think that Dreiser's overwhelming preeminence comes quite largely from the fact that he dares to trust his characters to the rude shocks of life.) And these happenings, I discovered, would be told wittily and discerningly, in spite of the disarming simplicity of the prose. And then as the tale progressed and I placidly sipped the honey of new facts, so dear to a generation that makes best sellers of Outlines and of Question Books, I began to perceive that my placidity would soon be ruffled, for Miss Pruette was using the legend of Genevieve to unfold a great human conflict. And so after reading the book blithely for its story and its wit and its knowledge of the obscure impulses of the heart, and for its tolerance and perhaps especially for its zest, I turned back again to read it for its fable and its poetry.

These are woven into the meshes of the tale, and cannot be torn out for quotation here. But of the various strands it seems to me that the description of the growth of that sainthood so arbitrarily bestowed on Genevieve at first, and in the end so ingrained in her, is a masterly analysis; and that the relations of the little saint with Gerontia and Julia offer some of the most delightful comedy in the book. Genevieve's sainthood, it should be added, grew side by side with her love for Euric, and her failure to love the skeptical Childeric, and her bullying devotion to Clovis.

True irony cuts both ways. This is a more deadly attack on the shams of religion than "Elmer Gantry." Yet it leaves one with the knowledge, gained by Genevieve before she dies, and often forgotten by us today in our passion for destroying all old truths every time we find a new one, that all men's impulses are authentic, the religious as well as the erotic; and that evil is "failure to respond to life."

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Superior Adolescence

Springboard. By Robert Wolf. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.

THERE are those who hold that America makes up for her grudging and even resentful acceptance of genius by her generous hospitality to talent. Certainly, nowhere else are the clever young men and precious young women who enliven literature without enriching it more thoroughly appreciated. But, by and large, theirs have been shoddy books, hastily conceived and badly written, shallow in philosophy and equally superficial in the appreciation of life.

Now comes "Springboard," still smart, still meager, but infinitely superior to the adolescent confessions that have preceded it by virtue of its matter and its style. The author is sensitive to the beauty, and he respects the meaning, of words; if for no other reason, his book can be read solely for the pleasure of poignant phrase and stalwart rhythm thoroughly coordinated with lucid and honest thought. Much thought, as well as the inspiration of genius, has gone into the conception of Brian Hart's drama. In fact, Mr. Wolf has so carefully provided a sustained intensity of interest in the progress of his hero that the skilful compactness with which the incidents of the plot are set down gives an unwarranted impression of bareness. Yet the story is actually rich in detail. The sardonic, almost vicious portrait of Brian's modern motherly mother, the restrained but unqualified description of a petting party, and the unusually impressive recollections of "prep"-school life have extraordinary emotional power as well as intellectual vitality. Mr. Wolf does extremely well with his incidental themes, which are not only fine in themselves but valuable in building up the climax which is reserved for future volumes.

"Springboard" cries to be characterized as the American "Jean-Christophe." But it is far from "Jean-Christophe," although it deserves comparison with Romain Rolland's masterpiece. For, in common with other American authors though less than most of them, Mr. Wolf shuns the detailed consideration of introspective realities. Where M. Rolland pours forth a torrent of eloquence, the American is silent. The latter cannot or dares not make his hero's spiritual struggles articulate. Brian's affair with the passionate young Catholic is a surface incident; so is his struggle against sexual perversion; so the last flirtation with a childhood sweetheart.

This reticence is inexplicable in Mr. Wolf, who is obviously neither inhibited nor ignorant. He deliberately refrains from elaborating his themes even when he hints that he is aware of all their implications. There is nothing laudable in such restraint. Mr. Wolf differs from his American contemporaries precisely in the fact that he is not interested in writing a snappy story, and he may well differ from them by presenting the spiritual content of American life which these authors are neither willing nor able to consider. He sadly underestimates his own critical faculties if he feels that an expression of his opinions and observations is less desirable than the sophomoric discussions on ethics in the manner of Mr. Fitzgerald which he does include.

It is a strikingly competent work which avouches, as much as any first novel can, a genius among American novelists. This genius will, no doubt, find its proper medium without critical promptings, yet one cannot resist the opinion that it will be most clearly evinced when Mr. Wolf breaks away from the current American style of presenting the documented details of a limited experience and accepts instead that fundamental art form which is the free and complete expression of powerful imaginings.

JOHAN SMERTENKO

The Road to Southwark

Chaucer and the Medieval Sciences. By Walter Clyde Curry. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

OUR cliches and catchwords, later-born than the Middle Ages, warn us that there's no art to find the mind's construction in the face, that men's stars are not the masters of their fates, and that dreams go only by contraries. Modern psychology recks little of the three virtues of the soul, and physiology of the four humors of the body. The astrologer has been replaced by the astronomer, the alchemist by the chemist, the herbalist by the botanist, and the lapidarist by the geologist. Today "star-eyed science watches round" instead of submitting blindly to the guidance of authority and tradition. Five centuries ago false fiats and formulas, now as dèfunct as the dodo, not only stalked pompously in the heavy compilations of the scholar who had taken all knowledge as his province but tried to trip lightly in the verses of the poet, eagerly alive to all that men think and say. Hence medieval science, or what passed as such, must be explored by him who seeks to understand the assimilative mind of Geoffrey Chaucer.

Professor Curry has served more than seven years for his Rachel—which long-wooed lady, by the way, is the medieval symbol of the contemplative life of the student. He is a "verray parfit practisour" in the diagnosis of diseases through horoscopes and images, and discourses disconcertingly on "mansions" and melancholia, on "cusps" and cholera. At home in the houses of the zodiac, he transports with a sure flight amid signs and stars the irresponsible reviewer, no less dazed and mazed than Chaucer himself in the claws of the erudite eagle on his winged way to Fame's house. Not Daniel nor any clerk in Chaldea can better expound the lore of dreams, whether phantoms, illusions, or revelations. "Atazir" or "hyleg" is to him an open sesame and the seven planets, for good or evil, swim within his ken. The pseudo-scientific background of Chaucer's world is interestingly revealed.

On the relation of Chaucer to that background, on the artist's treatment of that crude material, Professor Curry is well qualified to speak by his equipment and by his sense of proportion. He does not forget, in his introduction, that the scientific influence upon the poet is less than the social, literary, philosophical, religious. Yet every page in the study richly illustrates the strange suction power that genius possesses of imbibing nutriment in the most unlikely feeding-grounds. If at times our investigator, with all his folios around him, overestimates the subtlety of the poet and the acumen of fourteenth-century readers, he is always provocative, even when unconvincing. The reviewer, perhaps biased by his own interpretation of Chaucer's complex Pardoner, believes that many of the passages ingeniously presented to support the startling exposé of the scoundrel's "shameful secret" might more obviously be pleaded in refutation of this reproach. He doubts, too, whether contemporary readers of the Prologue were sufficiently Aristotelian in their knowledge or Jamesian in their perceptions to follow readily faint physiognomical clues inward to the heart of hearts of this or that pilgrim. And once or twice appears a flat misreading of the text, as in the attempts to impute loquacity to the dignified doctor and to ascribe the Summoner's deep bass to the Miller. But these slips are slight. Of the delightful but perplexing adventures of a medievalist the little book is a gratifying record. FREDERICK TUPPER

Heavenly Brass

God's Trombones. By James Weldon Johnson. The Viking Press. $2.50.

POEMS are not always greater than their faults. Particularly if the faults are structural, such as stereotype and cliche. Not all the thunder of brass and tympani can obscure the insistence of the trite. It is unfair to ask a poem to transcend such epithets as "milk-white" and "jamine breath." But it is to Mr. Johnson's credit that his trombones carry a poetic experience that is convincing, despite the obtrusion of stock phrases and notes. The flaws, I suspect, arise from the poet's honesty; he wished to be faithful to the original sermons which provided the material. But to be faithful does not necessitate linguistic duplication. As a matter of fact, the final success of the poems is due to the recognition of this dictum. Mr. Johnson has retained the original and yet created his own poems. The poet has recognized his essential task, which is the task of every Negro artist utilizing folk or racial material. For his example he has chosen the greatest of the utilizers of native speech and thought, the Irishman John Synge. To comprehend what is meant by "the conversion of the material," one needs but read Synge's record of the Aran Islands and then study in the plays the conversion of the original data. Mr. Johnson has not attained to the ultimate of a Synge, but after all there has been only one Synge. Yet, within the demands of his enterprise, Johnson has accomplished the poetic equivalent to the original material, the Negro sermon. The climacteric intensity, the chromatic harmony, the intonations, the verbal suggestiveness, the moral attack—all have been organized into poems that, being poems, are greater than any one of these elements. That is, there has been complete fusion.

Mr. Johnson says: "I claim no more for these poems than that I have written them after the manner of the primitive sermons." I, however, claim for them their own individuality. They have been written "after the manner," certainly; Synge's speech was also "after the manner." But they were reorganized and converted to their own artistic purposes. Similarly, Mr. Johnson has made from the characteristic sermons his own works. They are all the more characterful for their origin in the characteristic. They are all the more universal for their origin in the racial. HARRY ALAN POTAMKIN

China in Brief

Foreign Rights and Interests in China. By Westel W. Willoughby. Johns Hopkins Press. Two volumes. $12.

Of the first edition of this work, which appeared in 1920, just before the Washington Conference, an American editor in China once said: "That book taught the Chinese what the unequal treaties were and where the foreigners had arrived." The editor forgot Dr. Koo's work, but Willoughby's work stands unique, a mine of information, indispensable to the student of China. The new edition, which stretches into two volumes, includes all that was in the first, much material from the author's books on the Washington Conference and on the Geneva opium conference; a fuller account of the history of the Shanghai settlements, and enlarged sections in extraterritoriality. It is still thin in its treatment of Mongolia, Tibet, and the Chinese Eastern Railway.

China: Yesterday and Today. By E. T. Williams. T. Y. Crowell Company. $4.50.

A new edition of an excellent, understanding book, with minor textual revisions and a new chapter on Chinese art.

China: A Commercial and Industrial Handbook. By Julean Arnold. Government Printing Office. $1.75.

A magnificent hodge-podge, intended to tell the American business man in China what to eat, how to seat Chinese at a state dinner, how to sell and how to buy, and including almost as much, as miscellaneous, and as valuable information as the famous "China Yearbook."

The Revolt of Asia: The End of the White Man's World Dominance. By Upton Close. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

Mr. Close swept through Asia last year and came back, with the sulphur of its eruption in his nostrils, to write an excited, exciting book. As he tells it, the tired white empires are attempting to use America as their only possible savior. A fraternity of the snubbed is turning the tables in its own continent, and there can be no world peace until the white nations resign themselves to mere equality. Right as he is, he would be more persuasive if he were less breathless.

China in Turmoil. By Louis M. King. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.50.

Personality sketches by an intelligent retired British consul.

China in Revolt: How a Civilization Became a Nation. By T'ang Leang-li. London: Noel Douglas. 7/6.

Here, if one would understand young Nationalist China, is a book worth reading. It is passionate; it is partisan; it is prejudiced; but it speaks from the living heart of a flaming revolution. Read Mr. T'ang's chapter on missionaries if you would understand the anti-Christian outbreaks; his whole book expresses the fever heat of the Nationalist movement as no calm scholar, and certainly no foreign observer, could express it.

What and Why in China. By Paul Hutchinson. Chicago: Willett, Clark & Colby. $1.

A sort of child's history of China since the revolution—simple, pictorial, clear, with a minimum of Chinese names and a full dose of sympathy—marred only on a page or two by the conventional missionary acceptance of the split in the Kuomintang as one between "moderates" and "radicals."

Drama

Summary—III

THE season just past has not been a particularly fortunate one for some of the most distinguished and popular American actors. Ethel Barrymore passed the winter comfortably enough in Maugham's amusing but trivial comedy, "The Constant Wife," and her equally famous brother seems to be content with the profitable regularity of movie engagements which leave him no time to sue for the favors of the always capricious goddess who rules over the legitimate stage; but others were by no means so fortunate. Two old favorites, Mrs. Fiske and Mrs. Patrick Campbell, made brief, disastrous appearances, and two of the most interesting actresses of a younger generation, Pauline Lord and Alice Brady, spent a restless season, the first being seen only briefly in two unsatisfactory plays ("Sandalwood" and "Mariners") and the latter, after appearing in two interesting but unsuccessful pieces ("The Witch" and "Lady Alone"), being compelled to take refuge in the factitious emotionalism of Bernstein's "The Thief," revived for her. In addition, Mary Ellis, who had so distinguished herself in "The Dybbuk," passed unhappily from an old-fashioned dramatization of "Crime and Punishment" to a rather pompous historical tragedy. In general, the most fortunate actors were those attached to the Theater Guild. Under its management, Laura Hope Crews, long recognized as a skilful comedienne, exhibited unexpected powers; Lynn Fontanne gave an especially taking performance of Eliza in "Pygmalion"; and Alfred Lunt created several interesting roles. Indeed, no other actor took, during the season, such good advantage of such good opportunities as did the last-named in "Ned McCobb's Daughter" and "The Second Man." Some record should also be made of the admirable performance of Erskine Sanford in a small part in "The Witch" and in the title role of the Guild's revival of "Mr. Pim Passes By."

Such remarks as these do not constitute criticism, but under the present conditions in the American theater it is unfortunately impossible to make important or just analyses of the talents of individual actors. In the old days, when a standard repertory was being constantly played, the performer was the chief object of the dramatic critic's attention, but today he is generally dismissed with an impressionistic judgment, and the reason is simply that there is little opportunity to study his methods or capacity. A player, let us suppose, attracts great favor in a certain part. He plays it for a year in New York and then he takes it for a year (or even, as in the case of Miss Jeanne Eagels, for nearly four years) on the road. When at last he returns here he appears, perhaps, in three or four worthless plays and then is either forgotten or is seen in only one or two really exacting or important roles during the rest of his career. And even if it so happens, as occasionally it does, that we have an opportunity to study him in a number of interesting parts, it is seldom that those parts have ever been played or ever will be played by any other actor—except one of secondary importance who is put in a road company and who imitates the creator of the role as closely as possible. It is not possible to compare different interpretations, to judge of an actor's style by placing his treatment of a given character alongside that of another, or to arrive at any estimate of his power to bring out the latent values of the text. One is left with a general impression from which it is almost impossible to analyze out the actor's part, and one is deprived of that comparison which affords the surest means of determining the value of an interpretation.

I am not wishing for a theatrical fare composed exclusively of revivals. When a drama is active it is necessary that there shall be ample opportunity for the performance of new works. But it is a striking fact that in both England and America the most distinguished actors have flourished during periods when their chief concern was with the reinterpretation of familiar roles. It is when a tradition has been built up around a certain character that the actor is put to his severest test, since he has then both to assimilate the tradition and to display at the same time his power to make some original contribution to it. It is also under such conditions that acting as a separate art is best understood and best appreciated by an audience.

The Dutch War Resisters

By ROGER N. BALDWIN

Amsterdam, May 31

OF all countries in the world Holland has the longest and most consistent record of resistance to military service. Only in Australia and New Zealand has there been a comparable struggle by the youth of those lands. The fight in Australia has been won; in New Zealand it is apparently being won now. In Holland there is not at present a likelihood that compulsory training will be abolished, but the anti-militarist movement has deep roots and a significance in relation to the working-class that is almost wholly lacking elsewhere. It is not a Tolstoian pacifist movement in the sense of complete opposition to all violence. It is not the religious impulse of Christian pacifism. It is the individualism of a traditionally free people, expressed primarily in an anarchist outlook.

In the past twenty-five years over 1,200 boys of nineteen, the age for training, have gone to prison rather than take military service. Thirty to forty go every year for the usual ten months' sentence in the special prison at Scheveningen, after which they are dishonorably discharged from the army with no further demand upon them. About twenty-five to thirty are in prison all the time, grouped together in a section where they are treated a little better than the other prisoners, for they are not regarded by the government as criminals. The inspector in charge of prisons, whom I interviewed at the Hague, who politely refused me permission to see the men without an official request from the American Ambassador, regarded them with a mixture of amusement and irritation. He thought their ideas queer, romantic, "impractical," and their attitude insolent. When he had last visited them and had spoken a word of greeting they had all refused to respond or get up. It reminded me of General Pershing's complaint when he visited the conscientious objectors' barracks at Fort Douglas, Utah, and every man remained seated and silent. Pershing turned on the Colonel, "Why don't these soldiers rise?" "If you want them to rise, General, you'll have to pull them up yourself," replied the long-suffering Colonel.

I went to the prison, located out in the dunes beyond the town, with the keepers' cottages ranged along the street, neat, trim, gay with flowers, like all Dutch homes. It was far less austere than most prisons, cleaner, friendlier. The warden was an intelligent, courteous, business-like man who regarded the men without prejudice. He explained that in recent years they had been moved from the general prison for mental and tubercular cases to a special section where they saw no other prisoners, and where they got outdoor garden work in summer and indoor handwork in winter. As the conscientious objectors feel their captivity as injustice and the guards cannot understand the mentality of this kind of prisoners, conflicts often arise.

These boys are united only in their opposition to military training. Otherwise they are as varied in their philosophies as our own objectors during the war, with a majority of Anarchists. But even the Anarchists are split into sects. There are the few Tolstoian Anarchists, complete non-resistants, the Anarchist-Communists, more numerous, and individualist Anarchists. The religious objectors, who were a majority of the boys in the earlier days of the movement thirty years ago, are Protestant, chiefly Baptists, which in Holland is a non-resistant sect. The Communists in Holland as elsewhere take military service on the ground that training in arms can be turned to class advantage later. The Socialists also advise their members to take service, though rather from patriotic than class motives. Yet a few Socialist boys have not heeded party counsels and have gone to prison.

I judge that the attitude of them all is well summed up in one of the best short speeches I ever heard, delivered by one of the boys to the military court which tried him. Asked whether he had anything to say, he rose and uttered just three words: "Ik verdom het" (I damn your whole system).

The background of this spirit is to be found in the character of Dutch life, which is intensely sectarian and individualistic. That trait is especially strong among the Friesians, a seafaring and farming people in the north who have kept their own language and customs and were never really subdued, even by the Spanish. An examination of the list of objectors who have gone to prison in the last twenty-five years shows a large majority of Friesians. The Saxon northeast has contributed a large number. Most of the boys come from working-class homes in the small towns and country districts. They are so poor that the loss of the boys' earnings necessitated raising a fund to pay to their families the same amount they would have earned as soldiers. Over $40,000 has been contributed to that fund in the past ten years. It is raised jointly by the four or five groups most affected, in very small amounts from the few thousands of members and many sympathizers outside.

A strong personal influence also enters into the unusual growth of resistance to military service in Holland—the leadership of the Rev. Domela Nieuwenhuis, active first in the eighties as a pacifist minister, later as a Socialist, and, finally, from 1900 to his death in 1919 as an Anarchist.

As you talk with representatives of the groups of resisters you discover that the groups and sects have almost no contact except through the fund for the relief of the boys' families. I found that the several representatives of different groups in Amsterdam, well known in the war-resisters and pacifist movements outside Holland, did not know one another at all or very slightly. Those who do, in many cases know each other only to wrangle over their philosophies. But the movement is weak outside Holland and would not exist but for the inspiration of the Dutch members. Even the organized Dutch movement is now weaker than it was during and just after the war. Not that Holland is more militaristic, but fighting against militarism is more hopeless in the Europe of today, with nationalism stronger and the class struggle sharper. The Dutch press hardly mentions the resisters now. Pacifism has no such middle-class hold as it has in the United States, with greater access to the news than a movement essentially working-class—and worse, anarchist.

The Dutch resisters would be even more numerous if the military service act were more thorough. It takes only every other son in a family. The eldest goes; the next gets off. Alternative civil service is allowed to some of those objecting to military service, although not for the Anarchists, but it lasts a year and a half instead of the six months in barracks. Those who object to both get a court martial and ten months. In the early days they were repeatedly sentenced for their repeated refusals, but the impossibility of breaking their resistance brought the government around to the custom of almost invariable ten-month sentences.

Men who refuse to register at the Town Halls when they arrive at the age of service are liable to court martial and prison. Many have been sentenced for that, others have been ignored, the local authorities evidently preferring not to raise the issue where sincere religious convictions are involved. I met one young chap, a school-teacher in Amsterdam, who had never registered and had never been molested. The authorities were aware of it, and even let him hold his public-school job, though they keep an unusually strict eye on his teaching. His chief inconvenience, he says, is that he cannot get a passport to travel.

Contact with the men in this movement, of whatever group, gives one the sense of an upstanding independence, not of a traditional and obstinate resistance, which I met unhappily too often among American objectors, most of whom belonged to sects whose authority was their supreme law. There is little of the spirit of dependence on a creed or a personality among these Dutch. Each one of them seems to do his own thinking, even within the small groups, which are lively with argument and differences. This is said, however, to be a Dutch characteristic not confined to any section of the people. It is in refreshing contrast to the conformity and crowd behavior of the United States—and other intellectually regulated countries.

The spirit in Holland is also shown in the resistance to compulsory voting. Ten thousand are fined every year for refusal to vote, more than in any country in Europe with such a law. Of course thousands are fined as elsewhere for failure or negligence. But more stand up in court and say they do not believe in voting; others do not believe in being compelled to vote. I was told that even conservative Christian women in considerable numbers had taken that stand, basing it on St. Paul. One anarchist woman who refused was sent to prison for three days, with her three-months-old baby, too.

Perhaps this movement in Holland promises nothing "practical." Perhaps it will not abolish compulsory training or go far on the road against war. But it has bred and is breeding a fine type of manhood. It is keeping alive in one corner of the world that spirit of self-reliance, of independence, of resistance to authority and of union with the workers through which alone any real liberty can be won.

Oswald Garrison Villard

EDITOR OF THE NATION

Of the first edition of this book, Robert Morss Lovett wrote: "Mr. Villard is unusually well fitted for his task. He inherited the ownership of a great newspaper. No one ever questioned his journalistic ability or his high view of the responsibilities of the profession, to which he was willing to sacrifice material success. . . . Undoubtedly the chief interest in Mr. Villard's book is in the narratives of successful struggle and the vivid portraits which lend to his subjects the interest of drama and character. He shows how practically all the great newspapers of his country owe their origin to some dominating individual, the New York Times to Ochs, the World to Pulitzer, the Herald to Bennett, the Chicago Tribune to Medill, the Louisville Courier-Journal to Watterson, the Kansas City Star to Nelson."

Mr. Villard belongs to a family that "has had the privilege of serving journalistic ideals for one hundred and five years." He himself has belonged to the profession for thirty years. New Edition. $3.00
